FOSTER'S CYCLOPÆDIAS.

BY REV. ELON FOSTER, D.D.

NEW CYCLOPÆDIA OF PROSE ILLUSTRATIONS adapted to Christian teaching; embracing Mythology, Analogies, Legends, Parables, Emblems, Metaphors, Similes, Allegories, Proverbs, Classic, Historic, and Religious Anecdotes, &c. Vol. I.

This volume contains a vast and valuable collection of illustrations. The second volume cannot supersede, but only supplement it.

NEW CYCLOPÆDIA OF PROSE ILLUSTRATIONS adapted to Christian teaching; embracing Allegories, Analogies, Anecdotes, Aphorisms, Emblems, Fables, Legends, Metaphors, Parables, Quotations, Similes, Biblical Types and Figures, &c. Vol. II.

This volume contains the latest and freshest prose illustrations in great variety.

NEW CYCLOPÆDIA OF POETICAL ILLUSTRATIONS adapted to Christian teaching; embracing Poems, Odes, Legends, Lyrics, Hymns, Sonnets, Extracts, &c. Vol. I.

This is the only Cyclopædia of Poetry extant, and is the latest and best poetical work for preachers' use. It covers the abstract themes of religion and literature with whole poems and extensive extracts, and makes it possible to study any subject in the poet's light.

NEW CYCLOPÆDIA OF POETICAL ILLUSTRATIONS; comprising Descriptive Poems of the Scenes, Incidents, Persons and Places of the Bible. Vol. II.

This book is the poet's commentary on the most interesting historical passages of the Bible; it also contains analytical, authors', descriptive and textual indexes to the entire four volumes.

These works have been proved to be well adapted to their design, and have won a permanent place among the preacher's requisites. Their advantage appears in the following particulars:

1st. Their copiousness. Smaller books could only give a few illustrations, and would be confined to the common topics. These works embrace a great variety of every kind, drawn from all available sources, and illustrate an unprecedented number of subjects. No one need look in vain for a beautiful presentation of any moral or religious theme. Their possessor has always at hand the best illustrations, either prose or poetic, which literature affords.

2d. The excellence of their matter. The imperishable coined thought of six hundred poets and two thousand prose-writers cannot fail to give these works great interest and value to all readers. Mankind is richer and better because they have lived. Linked with truth, their words become immortal. No books are more important for the library of the student, or attractive for the centre-table of the household. They form a delightful commentary on moral and religious truths.

3d. Their facility of reference. A miscellaneous collection of such treasures as these could not be valueless; but the thorough analysis, classification, and alphabetical method here found, make the works easily available. By the various indexes it is possible to find all that relates to any person or subject. The textual index connects about fifteen thousand illustrations with pertinent texts. These indexes must add greatly to the utility of the volumes.

The economy of these books is an important consideration. The preacher must keep himself fresh on all themes: he cannot afford to buy a treatise on each topic. In these works he can turn to any subject he wishes to present, and find the most available material for use,—illustrations of every kind, from all sources, and on all themes. One of these in a sermon or speech is often of more value than the cost of the books. We have a great number of assurances from those who have used them, that they are the most useful books in their libraries, which they would not be without at any price. Uniform royal octavos, bound in cloth, $5 per volume; sheep, $6; half morocco, $7. Order of your bookseller, or send direct to the publishers.

PREFACE.

THE NEW CYCLOPÆDIA OF PROSE ILLUSTRATIONS was issued seven years since. It was a first attempt in a new field of American literature, and soon gained a position as a standard work. It met a long felt want among the clergy, bringing the best illustrations within the reach of those who had not the leisure or facilities for gathering for themselves. It has been reprinted in England, besides several smaller volumes have been made largely from it. Eighteen thousand copies have been sold in this country, and the demand for it is unabated.

The call for a second volume of prose illustrations, by those who have used the first, has been too persistent to be disregarded. This work is the response to it. A vast amount of new illustrative material can thus be secured, arranged, and classified in a familiar manner, without the necessity of purchasing that which they already have in the first volume.

For some years the author has made the preparation of these works his exclusive business, and those who see nothing in them but the easy product of leisure hours might well hesitate to tread the same path. He has gathered rich stores from out of the way places. He has not omitted to review the work done by others in the same field, and has appropriated the most valuable illustrations from all accessible sources. A large part of the material of this book is original. All of that which appears without a name, and considerable under various signatures has been prepared especially for this work, and is covered by copy-right.

The standpoint of the author is that of the preacher or teacher of moral and religious truth. His question has been, what will best illuminate and enforce an important lesson? This book is the answer. The scope of the work includes allegories, analogies, anecdotes, aphorisms, emblems, fables, legends, metaphors, parables, quotations, similes, and biblical types and figures. Fifteen hundred authors have been quoted or referred to, and over six thousand subjects are illustrated. The historical and biographical matter in the book is a large portion of the whole, which with the gems from various authors in all ages will be highly prized. These are among the imperishable treasures of literature, which like the diamond always sparkle. They are the seed thoughts that have produced heroes, and which never lose their vitality.

The method of the volume is the alphabetical and analytical. The general subject being found, it is easy to review it, or to strike any particular phase of the subject without losing the time required in searching through a treatise. The first series of Prose Illustrations has entered so largely into literature by numerical reference, that it was thought best not to begin numbering the illustrations at the unity, but where the first volume closed, viz., at No. 6276. Bearing this in mind, the number itself in reference, or the preacher's notes, will indicate whether it is in the first or second series. Covering, as it does, all the subjects of the alphabet, it is complete in itself.

Both volumes of Prose Illustrations, taken together, comprise the largest and best classified collection in literature. The fullness and method of the works greatly enhances their value. The best things in two thousand writers are brought into an alphabetical focus. Add to these the Cyclopædia of Poetical Illustrations, and their possessor has a picture gallery comprising the rarest products of the great masters, enforcing the truths of morals and religion.

The times demand such summaries. Their use, of course, is voluntary. There is no law to prohibit one's traveling twenty miles, and spending ten hours, to reach a point he might have gained by another route of two miles in thirty minutes. For the importance and use of illustrations see Nos. 9756-9772 inclusive.

Appreciating the welcome given to the previous works of the author by the laborers in many fields, this volume is submitted with the hope and prayer that it may aid in gathering jewels for the Master's crown.

NEW CYCLOPÆDIA OF PROSE ILLUSTRATIONS.

SECOND SERIES.

AARON.

6276. AARON, Character of. Aaron never appears so perfect a character as Moses. He was more a man of the times, subject to passing influences and prevailing tastes. He also lacked the burning enthusiasm of his meek, yet daring brother. Nevertheless, he must have possessed rare gifts to have been chosen his companion and fellow-laborer in that wonderful deliverance of the Children of Israel from Egypt, and in conducting them forty years through the wilderness to the Promised Land. Much more must he have possessed an elevation and purity of character far above his fellows, to have been chosen as the founder of the Jewish priesthood, the first to minister at the altar, and to represent a sacerdotal dynasty more glorious and immortal than the line even of David, or any succession of kings that ever filled a throne. Headley.

6277. ABEL, Prominence of. Abel is celebrated as the first martyr, and the first mortal to enter heaven. His blood was the first to cry for vengeance. He was the first who received assurance of the acceptance of his offering, and the first believer in an atonement by blood of whom we have any record. Christ calls him "Righteous Abel." His faith was the first voice of reconciliation, and in six thousand years it has lost none of its influence.

6279. ABILITIES, Cultivated. After a remarkable display of eloquence, in Parliament, by the famous Edmund Burke, his brother Richard was found in deep thought by a friend, who asked him its cause. He answered, "I have been wondering how Ned has contrived to monopolize all the talents of the family; but then again I remember when we were at play he was always at work."

6280. ABILITIES, Feeble. Be not discouraged because your talents number four rather than five, or one rather than two. Not the number but the use of talents fills the world with blessing. From a single dollar actively employed princely fortunes have sprung. The feeble shout of a tiny child has saved the thundering train from wreck, and snatched a hundred souls from death. In all lands the widows' mites have filled God's treasuries. He who will do nothing until he can do a great thing, will never do anything. Dr. Geo. H. Whitney.

6281. ABILITIES, Hindrances. How nimbly does that little lark mount up singing towards heaven in a right line! whereas the hawk, which is stronger of body and swifter of wing, towers up by many gradual compasses to his highest pitch. That bulk of body and length of wing hinder a direct ascent, and require the help both of air and scope to advance his flight; while the small bird cuts the air without resistance, and needs no outward furtherance of her motion. It is no otherwise with the souls of men in flying up to their heaven. Some are hindered by those powers which would seem helps to their soaring up thither: great wit, deep judgment, quick apprehension, send about men with no small labor, for the recovery of their own incumbrance; while the good affections of plain and simple souls raise them up immediately to the fruition of God. Why should we be proud of that which may slacken our way to glory? Why should we be disheartened with the small measure of that, the very want whereof may facilitate our way to happiness. Salter.

6282. ABILITIES, Wrecked. A poor man was digging in a garden, when he picked up an ancient coin. He called to a gentleman near, showed it to him, translated the Latin inscription, and gave the history of how the Romans came into that region. The gentleman was surprised to find a farm laborer so cultivated, and thought that it must be some fault that had brought him to so low a position. Upon inquiry he found he had been educated at the university, had taken a degree, had been a clergyman; but had taken to drinking, was expelled from his church, became an outcast from society, and was now earning a pitiful living, digging the garden of a peasant for two-pence an hour. Thus the most brilliant abilities and finished culture may be wrecked by immorality and intemperance.

6283. ABRAHAM, Renown of. Abraham is one of the most renowned persons the world ever saw. Besides the conspicuous place he holds in the Bible history, he is introduced into the Koran of Mohammed, and is regarded by the Arabians as the father of their nation, and by the Jews as theirs. The ancient Persians pay him the highest honor, and think he was Zoroaster, as before their great teacher. In India, too, Abraham is honored by some sects as their distinguished ancestor. The people of Egypt, Chaldea, and Damascus acknowledge their obligations to this illustrious man. But what shall we say of the blessings which he received from God? His believing posterity have been multiplied as the stars of heaven. His venerable name is invested with immortal honor in the history of the Church and of the world,—second only to Him whose name is above every name. Canaan, the Land of Promise, was given to his natural posterity for fourteen centuries, as their peculiar inheritance. And, above all, from his loins the divine Savior in due time appeared in the flesh, to ransom, by His sufferings, death, resurrection, and glory, a multitude of immortal souls, whom no man can number.

Mackenzie.

6284. ABSENCE, Mental. Thomas Aquinas, the angelic doctor of the thirteenth century, frequently forgot himself. Once when dining with King Louis IX., after a prolonged silence, he struck the table smartly, saying, "That is an overwhelming argument against the Manicheans." His superior rebuked him, and he apologized; but the King bade him give the argument. At another time, he was explaining a treatise on the Trinity, holding a candle in his fingers as he spoke, which burned down and scorched his fingers severely before his attention was aroused. He was summoned from his room to meet the Pope's legate and the Archbishop of Capua in the cloister, but on his way fell into a reverie and forgot his errand. Coming to himself, he apologized to his visitors, blaming his feebleness of mind for so slowly solving a theological difficulty. "Isaac Newton once asked a friend to dine with him, but forgetting the appointment, ordered dinner for but one. His guest came, and supposing the plate in the dining-room was for him, ate his dinner without interrupting the philosopher, and departed. Presently, Newton came into the dining room. 'I declare,' said he, 'if it were not for the empty plate, I should say that I had not dined.'"

6285. ABSENT, Faith in the. And cannot a child believe in an absent one? Why, is there not some such conversation as this going on in many a household in our country now?—"Mamma, where is papa?" "He is a long way off, in India." "What is he doing?" "Why, he is engaged in defending the country." "Did I ever see papa?" "Oh yes, my child, you saw him, but you were too young then to know him." "And what was papa like?" "Oh, when he was here, before he went, he was a very fine man; and he is a very loving man, and loves mamma very much, and he is always writing letters to mamma." "Well, mamma, I think I love papa too; I love him with all my heart." And do you not think there would be an influence upon that dear child's mind, flowing from mamma's lips with the very name of papa? And though we have never seen thee, O blessed Jesus, yet still it is true—"In whom, though now we see Him not, yet believing, we rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory." 1 Pet. 1: 8. Dr. Davis.

6286. ABSENT-MINDEDNESS, Notion of. Rufus Choate asked a witness whom he was cross-examining—"What would be his notion of absent-mindedness." "Well," said the witness, with a strong Yankee accent, "I should say that a man who thought he'd left his watch to him, and took it out'n 'is pocket to see if he'd time to go him and get it, was a leetle absent-minded."

6287. ABSTEMIOUSNESS, Example of. Melancthon wondered at Luther, who being such a strong healthy man, could live with taking so little food. "I have seen him," says Melancthon, "continue four days together without eating or drinking anything at all, and many days together to content himself with a little bread and one single herring."

6288. ABSTINENCE, Contrast of. An active temperance man was assailed, in a public place, by a drunkard, with the taunt, "There goes a teetotaler!" He retorted in hearing of the crowd, "There stands a drunkard! Three years ago he had a sum of $400; now he cannot produce a penny. I know he cannot; I challenge him to do it; for if he had a penny he would be at a public-house. There stands a drunkard, and here stands a teetotaler, with a purse full of money, honestly earned and carefully kept. There stands a drunkard! Three years ago he had a watch, a coat, shoes, and decent clothes; now he has nothing but rags upon him, his watch is gone, and his shoes afford free passage to the water. There stands a drunkard; and here stands a teetotaler, with a good hat, good shoes, good clothes, and a good watch, all paid for. Yes, here stands a teetotaler! And now, my friends, which has the best of it?" The chagrined drunkard slunk away, while the crowd cheered the temperance lecturer.

6289. ABSTINENCE, Economy of. An old man in an almshouse in Bristol stated that for sixty years he spent sixpence a day in drink, but was never intoxicated. A gentleman who heard this statement was anxious to ascertain how much this sixpence a day, put by every year at five per cent. compound interest, would amount to in sixty years. Taking out his pencil he began to calculate; putting down the first year's savings (365 sixpences) £9 2s. 6d., he added the interest, 9s. 1½d., and thus went on year by year, until he found that in the sixtieth year the sixpence a day reached the startling sum of £3,225 16s. 8d. Judge of the old man's surprise when told that had he saved his sixpence a day, and allowed it to accumulate at compound interest, he might now have been worth the above sum; so that, instead of taking refuge in an almshouse, he might have comforted himself with a house of his own, costing £700, and fifty acres of land, worth £50 per acre, and have left the same as a legacy among his children and grandchildren!

Temperance Anecdotes.

6290. ABSTINENCE, Example of. Bishop Asbury was a guest of a family where brandy was placed on the table, and he was invited to partake, but he declined. The lady blushed, and said, "Bishop, I believe that brandy is good in its place." "So do I," said Mr. Asbury; "if you have no objection I will put it in its place;" so he put it in the old-fashioned cupboard in the corner of the room, saying, "That is the place, and there let it stay;" and there it did stay, never to be brought on the table again.

6291. ABSTINENCE, Excuse for. On the occasion of a dinner at the Bishop of Chester's, Hannah More urged Dr. Johnson to take a little wine. He replied, "I can't drink a little, child, and, therefore, I never touch it. Abstinence is as easy to me as temperance would be difficult." Many are ruined because they are destitute of the same courage.

6292. ABSTINENCE, Greeley's. Horace Greeley was once met at a railway depot by a red-faced individual, who shook him warmly by the hand. "I don't recognize you," said Mr. Greeley. "Why, yes, you must remember how we drank brandy and water together at a certain place." This amused the bystanders, who knew Mr. Greeley's strong temperance principles. "Oh, I see," replied Mr. Greeley, "you drank the brandy, and I drank the water." Mr. Greeley once wrote an account of a wine dinner, and said that the party had indulged in Heidsieck and Champagne, these both being names for the same kind of wine. His associates laughed at his mistake, which they pointed out to him. "Did I write it so?" said he, with a good-natured smile. "Well, I reckon I'm the only man in this office who could have made such a mistake."

6293. ABSTINENCE, Pledge of. "Put down my name, if you please, sir. I want to join the Cold Water Army." "Why do you wish to join it, my lad?" "Because," said he, with a very serious look, "I do not want to be such a man as my father is."

6294. ABSTRACTION, Securing. It is said that Democritus voluntarily put out his own eyes with the rays from a burning glass, that his attention might not be called off from intellectual contemplations by the allurements of sense. This doubtful story illustrates the importance of protection from interruption to the student.

The mystic and recluse seek solitude that the allurements of the world may lose their power, and their spiritual meditations be undisturbed.

6295. ABSURDITY, Pagan. The Sinites used to keep the idols which they worshiped in their houses, and if anything befel them contrary to their desire, they scourged their idol gods for it, and sometimes cast them into the street. When their anger was over, they brought back their idols, placed offerings before them, and entreated their favor.

6296. ABSURDITY, Royal. When the bridge which Xerxes threw across the Hellespont was swept away by the tempest, he sent a challenge to the sea, and commanded his servants to throw fetters into it, to give it three hundred stripes, to burn ignominious brands into it with hot irons, saying as they administered the punishment, "O thou unruly water, thy lord hath appointed thee this punishment, for that thou hast wronged him, and he deserved it not from thee; but whether thou wilt or not, he is resolved to pass over thee."

6297. ABUSE, Brevities. Though a good man and a wise, yet he is liable to every man's abuse.—Bp. Taylor.—The difference between coarse and refined abuse is as the difference between being bruised by a club and wounded by a poisoned arrow. Dr. Johnson.

6298. ABUSE, Use and. If Christ's example be our precedent, then we may allege Scripture against depraved Scripture. For the bee may gather honey on the same stalk that the spider doth poison. And though a swash-buckler kill a man with his weapon, yet a soldier may lawfully knit a sword to his side; and though there may be piracies committed on the sea, yet may the merchants traffic; or though some surfeit by gluttony, yet may others use their temperate diet. And if the devil change himself into an angel of light, shall therefore the angels lose their light? Or shall Paul therefore deny himself to be a preacher of salvation, because the Pythonite spake it? (Acts 16:17.) Or because Caiaphas by the spirit of the devil (John 11:50) said one should die for the sins of the people, must we therefore believe it? And though (Numb. 22) an enchanter wished that his soul might die the death of the righteous, yet is it a prayer fit to be used of all Christians, though he sold his soul for gold? Philips

6299. ACCEPTANCE, Divine. The Lord was many times pleased to testify his acceptance of sacrifice visibly by fire, as doubtless in Abel's offering, Gen. 4:4; in Aaron's first offering after the erection of the Tabernacle, Lev. 9:24; in Gideon's offering, Judges 6:21; in Manoah's, Judges 13:19, 20; in David's, 1 Chron. 21:26; in Solomon's 2 Chron. 7:1; in Elijah's, 1 Kings 18:38. The Divine acceptance is marked equally of the offerings of the poor and of the rich. See Lev. 1-4. The Levites' tithe of the tithe was to be reckoned to them "as though it were the corn of the threshing floor or the fulness of the winepress," Num. 18:26, 27. Samuel's humble offering of one "sucking lamb," 1 Sam. 7:9, was far more acceptable than vast holocausts of pride and hypocrisy; as in gospel history, the poor widow's mite was preferred before the abundant offerings of the rich, Mark 12: 43, 44. The sacrifices are in many cases spoken of as "a sweet savor unto the Lord." See Noah's sacrifice after the flood, Gen. 8: 21; Aaron's ram and wave-offering, Exod. 29: 18, 25; the Levitical offerings, Lev. 1: 9, 13, 17; 2: 2, 9, 12. Frankincense mixed with the offering, or placed upon the shewbread, was probably designed as a symbol of acceptance. Fragrant in its perfume, it shadowed forth the offering of faith, perfumed with the rich incense of the Saviour's merits.

Bowes.

6300. ACCEPTANCE, Personal. A little girl was helping to nurse a sick gentleman whom she loved very much. He said to her, "Ellen, it is time I should take my medicine; measure just a tablespoonful, and put it in the wine glass." She quickly did so, and brought it to his bedside. He made no attempt to take it from her, but said, "Now, dear, will you drink it for me?" "Me drink it! What do you mean? I am sure I would in a minute if it would make you well all the same; but you know it won't do you any good unless you take it yourself." "Wont it, really?" "No, I suppose it will not." "But if you cannot take my medicine for me, I cannot take your salvation for you. You must go to Jesus, and believe in him for yourself." Each human being must seek, repent, believe and obey for himself.

6301. ACCESS, Provision for. Marcus Valerius, Roman consul, for his victories was granted a triumph, and a house was built for him on Mount Palatine. The doors of other houses at that time opened inward, but he had his constructed to open outward, to show his readiness to listen to all applicants. The gates of prayer are never closed, but stand open night and day.

6302. ACCESS TO GOD, Biblical. Even amongst men we know the difficulty there often is in obtaining access to a superior. Not only difference of rank, but insubordination and offences erect a barrier. We have three examples of this in Scripture—of a wise ruler, a kind father, a great king. Joseph was a wise ruler, but his brethren might not see his face, except upon the condition he imposed, Gen. 44: 23. David was a kind father, but he forbade Ab-salom from coming into the royal presence for a time, 2 Sam. 14: 24-28. Ahasuerus was a great king; but, according to the law of his kingdom, it was death for any one to come before the king, save those to whom the king held out the golden sceptre, Esther, 4: 11; 5, 2. Under the Law the difficulty of access to the Most High, except through the intervention of sacrifice or mediation, was continually set forth. The guards and barriers set around Mount Sinai testified of this, Exod. 19: 12, 21-25; Heb. 12: 18-21. In the Tabernacle service, the severe restriction laid upon the people—"the stranger that cometh nigh shall be put to death"—repeated in Numbers five times, 1: 51; 3: 10, 38; 16: 40; 18: 7. The people were not to enter the tabernacle, except as represented by the priests, nor the priests to enter into the Holy of Holies; but only the high priest, and he alone, once every year, not without blood, Heb. 9: 7. The Kohathites, when they carried the vessels of the sanctuary in their official capacity, were not to "touch any holy thing," nor "go in to see," lest they die, Num. 4: 15-20. But UNDER THE GOSPEL, through Christ, "by a new and living way," believers have "access and confidence through faith," Heb. 10: 19-22. The vail is rent. "Before Christ died (says one), it was death to go within, except for the high priest, once a year. Now, since the vail has been rent, it is death to remain without." Christ is the door into the fold, John 10: 7, 9; the way, 14: 6; the High Priest through whom we have access, Heb. 4: 14-16; 7: 19, 25; 10: 21, 22; like the high priest on the day of atonement, Lev. 16: 12-15; Heb. 10: 19-22.

Bowes.

6303. ACCESS TO GOD, Key of. There are many locks in my house, and all with different keys; but I have one master-key which opens all. So the Lord has many treasures and secrets, all shut up from carnal minds with locks which they cannot open; but he who walks in fellowship with Jesus possesses the master-key which will admit him to all the blessings of the covenant; yea, to the very heart of God. Through the Well-beloved we have access to God, to heaven, to every secret of the Lord. Spurgeon.

6304. ACCIDENT, An Infidel's. Thomas Paine was a member of the convention which ruled Paris in the Reign of Terror. He opposed the bloody measures of the convention, and was thrown into the Luxembourg prison, where he remained till after the fall of Robespierre, a period of eleven months. Paine knew that the guillotine was doing its fatal work, and expected every day that the executioner would call for him. An official passed through the prison and placed a private mark upon the door of the cells whose inmates were doomed to death. The door of Paine's cell opened outward, and set back flat against the wall. When the minister of doom passed, he put his mark upon the door, unknown to the inmates; but it was closed at night, and thereby the sign was concealed from the executioner, and Paine's life was saved. That night one hundred and sixty-eight persons were taken out of the prison, and all but eight of them were executed the next day. Paine says this escape "has all the appearance of an accident."

6305. ACCIDENTS, Providential. What men call accident is God's own part. P. J. Bailey.

6306. ACCOMMODATION, Law of. Without this there can be no such thing as instruction. The teacher must lower himself to his pupils, in order to raise them to himself. So to the child the man becomes a child, and explains the truth in a form adapted to its age, by making use of its childish conceptions as a veil for it. In accordance with this principle, every revelation of God has made use of this law of accommodation, in order to present the divine to the consciousness of men in forms adapted to their respective stand-points.

6307. ACCOUNT, The Great. An honest New Jersey backwoodsman went into the village to settle an account, and took his wife with him, leaving her at the church where a protracted meeting was in progress. Not finding the man, he returned to the church, where the Holy Spirit was present in convicting power. He soon felt that he had a great unsettled account with God, and nothing with which to pay it. He cried "God be merciful to me a sinner," and felt that his prayer was answered, and Christ had paid the debt.

6308. ACCURACY, Importance of. There was a young man once in the office of a western railway superintendent. He was occupying a position that four hundred boys in that city would have wished to get. It was honorable, and "it paid well," besides being in a line of promotion. How did he get it? Not by having a rich father, for he was the son of a laborer. The secret was his beautiful accuracy. He began as an errand-boy, and did his work accurately. His leisure time he used in perfecting his writing and arithmetic. After awhile he learned to telegraph. At each step his employer commended his accuracy, and relied on what he did, because he was just right. And it is thus with every occupation. The accurate boy is the favored one. Those who employ men do not wish to be on the lookout, as though they were rogues or fools. If a carpenter must stand at his journeyman's elbow to be sure that his work is right, or if a cashier must run over his bookkeeper's column, he might as well do the work himself as employ another to do it in that way; and it is very certain that the employer will get rid of such an inaccurate workman as soon as he can.

6309. ACCUSATION, False. A widow who had one daughter, placed the child with a relative, and entered a monastery. He grieved much at the separation, and finally received permission from the abbot to bring the child to live with him. The father reclaimed the girl and disguised her sex by cutting her hair, putting on her boy's clothing, and changing her name from Marina to Marinus. They lived together till she was seventeen, when the father died. She continued to occupy his cell, conformed to all the rules of the monastery, and was much beloved, known only as brother Marinus. She had sometimes lodged at an inn at the port whither she had gone for supplies for the abbey. The inn-keeper's daughter charged her with seduction, which she was too humble to deny. When this accusation had come to the abbot, he rebuked Marinus. She answered only, "I have sinned, my father." So he drove her from the monastery. Marinus lived outside the gates for five years, with the child of the inn-keeper's daughter, which had been brought to him in charge, which seemed to all a confession of his guilt. So holy was his life that the monks pleaded for his re-admission. The abbot reluctantly granted it. Marinus and the child entered and were assigned the most menial work of the house, which was cheerfully performed. Shortly after the monk sickened and died.

The secret of her sex was discovered. Her remarkable silence under false accusation and punishment was counted great virtue, and she was given a place among the saints in the calendar. Such is the record of St. Marina, of the eighth century.

6310. ACCUSERS, The Sinner's. All the elements accuse me. The heaven says, I have given the light for thy comfort. The air says, I have given every sort of winged creature for thy pleasure. The water says, I have supplied thy table with my countless luxuries. The earth says, I have furnished thee bread and wine; but yet thou hast abused all these blessings, and perverted them to a contempt of their Creator. Therefore all our benefits cry out against me. The fire says, Let him be burned in me. The water says, Let him be drowned in me. The air says, Let him be shaken by a tempest. The earth cries, Let him be buried in me. The holy angels, whom God has sent for ministers of love, and who are to be our joyful companions in the future, accuse me. By my sins I have deprived myself of their holy ministries in this life, and the hope of their fellowship in the future. The voice of God, which is the divine law, accuses me. The law must be fulfilled, or I perish; but to fulfill the law is, for me, impossible; and to perish in eternity is intolerable. God, the most severe Judge, the powerful executor of his eternal law, accuses me. I can not deceive him, for he is omniscience itself. I can not escape him, for his omnipotence everywhere reigns.

Gerhard.

6311. ACQUIESCENCE, Example of. Æsop's master one day gave him a bitter melon and desired him to eat it. It was nauseous to the taste, but he ate it without making a wry face. His master looked and expressed his surprise. "What," answered the servant, pleasantly, "have I received so many favors from you, and cannot I manage to eat a bitter melon without making a fuss about it?"

Job. ii

6312. ACQUITTAL, Final. An ancient mode of indicating approbation and acquittal is described by Ovid:—

"A custom of old, and still ordains,
Which life or death by suffrage obtains;
White stones and black within an urn are cast,—
The first absolve, but death is in the last."

This ancient custom was something like our modern balloting, or voting by white and black balls. The white stone promised by our Lord seems to mean full and complete justification at the great day, through his glorious imputed righteousness.

6313. AOT, Influence of a Right. A right act strikes a chord that extends through the whole universe, touches all moral intelligence, visits every world, vibrates along its whole extent and conveys its vibrations to the very bosom of God!

Binney.

6314. ACTION, Adaptation to. Action is at once the destiny and the lot of man. All the conditions of his existence are framed upon the supposition of his activity. It is so in man's physical frame. The elastic foot is for speed; the firm lithe limb for endurance; the arm, at once supple and sinewy, for toil; the eye and the ear are for their respective revelries in sight and sound. It is so in our mental constitution. By the active exercise of the powers which God has given us, we classify objects and understand truths; we discriminate, we invent, we analyze, we compare, we combine. It is so in our moral nature. The power by which we distinguish between right and wrong; an instinct of worship, which, however we may brutalize, we cannot wholly stifle; yearnings after a nobler life, which no debauchery can extinguish nor murder absolutely kill—these are all implanted within us by the Giver of every good and perfect gift. Punshon.

Rev. ii

6315. ACTION, Brevities. Marcus Antonius' rule for his own conduct was, "Manage all your actions and thoughts as if you were just going out of the world." The end of man is an action, and not a thought, though it were the noblest.—Carlyle.—What I must do is all that concerns me, and not what people think.—Emerson.—Our actions must clothe us with an immortality loathsome or glorious.—Colton.—Strong reasons make strong actions.—Shakspeare.

6316. ACTION, Eloquent. Demosthenes being asked what was the first part of oratory, answered, "Action;" and which was the second, he replied, "Action;" and which was the third, he still answered, "Action." Shakspeare says "Action is eloquence, and the eyes of the ignorant are more learned than their ears."

6317. ACTION, Pledge of. A young Roman nobleman of the eleventh century, just married, during the nuptial feast joined in a game of ball, and to relieve himself of his wedding ring, took it off and placed it on the finger of a statue of Venus. The game ended, he went to reclaim the ring, but found it immovable, for the stone finger clenched upon it. Ever after he heard the whisper, "Embrace me; I am Venus, whom you have wedded; I will never restore your ring." Only by calling a priest to his aid was he able to recover his ring. A first act either wrong or right commits us, and is influential in shaping our character.

6318. ACTION, Prompt. The fact is, that in order to do anything in this world worth doing, we must not stand shivering on the bank and thinking of the cold and the danger, but jump in and scramble through as well as we can. It will not do to be perpetually calculating risks, and adjusting nice chances: it did all very well before the Flood, when a man could consult his friends upon an intended publication for a hundred and fifty years, and then live to see its success for six or seven centuries afterwards; but at present a man waits, and doubts, and hesitates, and consults his brother, and his uncle, and his first cousins, and his particular friends, till one fine day he finds that he is sixty-five years of age—that he has lost so much time in consulting first cousins and particular friends that he has no more time left to follow their advice. S. Smith.

6319. ACTION, Reward of a Good. A correspondent of a French paper says: "Baron James de Rothschild once sat for a beggar to Ary Scheffer. While the great financier, attired in the rags of a beggar, was in his place on the estrade, I happened to enter the studio of the great artist, whose friend I had the honor to be. The Baron was so perfectly disguised that I did not recognize him, and, believing that a veritable beggar was before me, I went up to him, and slipped a louis into his hand. The pretended model took the coin and put it into his pocket. Ten years later I received at my residence an order on the office in the Rue Lafitte for 10,000 francs, inclosed in the following letter: 'Sir: You one day gave a louis to Baron Rothschild in the studio of Ary Scheffer. He has employed it, and to-day sends you the little capital with which you intrusted him, together with its interest. A good action always brings good fortune.—BARON JAMES DE ROTHSCHILD.' On receipt of this order I sought the billionaire, who proved to me from the books before him that under his management my louis had actually fructified so as to have swelled to the large sum sent me."

6322. ACTIONS, Inconsistent. A fox, hard pressed by the hounds after a long run, came up to a man who was cutting wood, and begged him to afford him some place where he might hide himself. The man showed him his own hut, and the fox creeping in, hid himself in a corner. The hunters presently came up, and asking the man whether he had seen the fox, "No," said he, but pointed with his finger to the corner. They, however, not understanding the hint, were off again immediately. When the fox perceived that they were out of sight, he was stealing off without saying a word. But the man upbraided him, saying, "Is this the way you take leave of your host, without a word of thanks for your safety?" "A pretty host!" said the fox, turning round upon him, "if your actions had been as honest as your tongue, I should not have left without bidding you farewell." Aesop.

6323. ACTIVITY, Christian. A female with whom I am acquainted acted upon the aggressive principle in extending religion, with great zeal and diligence; and in the course of three years she had the unspeakable pleasure of leading twelve persons into the fear of the Lord, and many of them had been living in circumstances of most revolting depravity. The same line of conduct was adopted by three young men, of most fervent and decided piety; and so successful were their efforts, that above thirty persons, of whose conversion no rational doubt could be entertained, were, in one year, led to the "sinner's Friend." I have also known classes in the Wesleyan Society to act upon this principle; and, generally speaking, they have in the course of one year doubled their numbers; and one class for a considerable time doubled its numbers every quarter, and was divided four times a year.

Robert Young.

6324. ACTIVITY, Future. When Prof. Hascall, founder of Madison University, was near the end of his days, he spoke of his readiness to go on to the heavenly world, but said, "I expect to be busy there. If there is nothing to do there, I choose to remain here." When Captain Thomas Sullivan, sailor preacher in Boston, was retiring slowly, step by step, from this life, he was very patient, though he suffered much. His greatest trial seemed to be that he was obliged to be doing nothing. After his hope of recovery was gone, and after he could only whisper his wishes, he said to the undersigned, "I want to be gone. My view of the future state makes me wish for deliverance from this inactivity. I want to be at work, at work, at work." "His servants shall serve Him, and they shall reign forever and ever" (Rev. 22: 3).

Watchman and Reflector.

6325. ACTIVITY, Incentive to. When Cæsar was reading the history of Alexander the Great, his friends once found him bathing the book with tears. They asked him why he wept. His reply was, "Do you think I have not sufficient cause for concern, when Alexander at my age reigned over so many conquered countries, and I have not one glorious achievement to boast?"

6326. ACTOR, Conversion of an. Ardalis was an actor, and was called to amuse his heathen audience by burlesquing a martyrdom. His imitation of Christians before the judge drew boisterous applause from the spectators. But while this amusing farce was going on, the Holy Spirit came powerfully upon him, and changed all into sober reality. Under its influence he cried with a loud voice, "Know that I am in earnest." He was condemned to be burned A. D. 300.

6328. ADAPTATION, Natural. You may think, perhaps, that it would be a matter of indifference to us whether our globe were a little larger or a little smaller than it is, since for so many years man lived upon it in total ignorance of its size. But there is a necessary proportion between the size and weight of the earth and the strength which God has given to our limbs and muscles. If, for example, we could be conveyed to the moon, and if it were like the earth in all respects except its size, we should there weigh five times less than we do upon the earth. We might bound up like grasshoppers to a great height in the air, but we should be so unsteady that the hand of a child could throw us over. And if our earth, on the contrary, was as large as the planet Jupiter, all other things remaining the same, each of us should feel as if we were forced to carry the weight of eleven persons as heavy as ourselves. The weight of a man of ten stone would be 120 stone, and none of us could walk or stand upright—scarcely even move. Ah! let us repeat what we said before, "The work of the Lord is perfect. It is always good—very good."

Prof. L. Gaussens.

6329. ADDER, Sting of the. A gentleman encountered an adder in the fields, and studied his snakeship as well as he could. The snake was not more than a foot long. He was timid and tried to ward off all comers by a wheezy blowing, which corresponds with the alarm of the rattle-snake. His first effort was to escape. He can not coil himself up and strike, or spring like other snakes. When pressed he will open his wide jaws and bite, and woe be to the man or beast who receives his venomous fang, for its touch is certain death. The gentleman's companion pinned the snake to the ground with a crotched stick and said, "See, I will make him bite himself, and he will die of his own venom in three seconds." Sure enough the adder struck the fangs into his own body, and in less than three seconds he was dead. Wine "biteth like a serpent, and stingeth like an adder." Its venomous bite destroys the body, and plunges the soul into eternal death.

6330. ADMONITION, Benevolence of. Private admonition is rather a proof of benevolence than of malevolence. It was the saying of Austin, when his hearers resented his frequent reproofs—"Change your conduct, and I will change my conversation."

W. Secker.

6331. ADMONITION, Boldness in. A very bad man had been vexatious to the parish of Bünde, and no one could restrain him. When ever he pleased, he turned his horse into his neighbors' fields of sown or standing corn; and used to brawl and bluster as he passed along, so that no one dared to approach him. Rauschenbusch determined at length seriously to take him in hand. The small stream that ran through the place separated Rauschenbusch's glebe farm from the public road, along which this fellow came blustering on his way into the town. Rauschenbusch happened just then to hear him; but being on the other side of the stream, he came to the water's edge, within sight of him, and called out, "Muth (that was his name), I am coming," and the man was immediately quiet. Rauschenbusch met him directly in the wood just by; and though no one was secure of his life in meeting him there, Rauschenbusch went resolutely up to him, took hold of him with a firm hand, and said, "All Bünde is afraid of you; but I am not afraid of the devil; and I command you to come to me to-morrow, and to let me know whether you mean to be a different man!" The fellow actually came the next morning, and Rauschenbusch set before him the authority and sacredness of the law of God, and the judgment to come; and this he did with all the seriousness of his official character, and with all the importunity of an honest heart interested in him. And though he never could regard him as a converted man, yet he succeeded so far as to bind Satan within him, so that this person was constrained to cease from annoying his fellowmen.

P. B. Power.

6332. ADMONITION, Fable of. A very skillful bowman went to the mountains in search of game. All the beasts of the forest fled at his approach. The lion alone challenged him to combat. The bowman immediately let fly an arrow, and said to the lion, "I send thee my messenger, that from him thou mayest learn what I myself will be when I assail thee." The lion, thus wounded, rushed away in great fear; and on a fox exhorting him to be of good courage, and not to run away at the first attack, replied, "You counsel me in vain, for if he sends so fearful a messenger, how shall I abide the attack of the man himself?" Æsop.

6333. ADMONITION, Popular. A favorite method of admonishing the great and also the public in early times was the fable or allegory. By these the hearers were first pleased, and then warned, often being made to pronounce their own sentence as in the case of Nathan's parable of the ewe lamb. Æsop gained great popularity at the court of the voluptuous Cresus, though he often spoke unpleasant truths. Even then he paid the penalty for his enforcement of minor morals with his own blood, being murdered by the Delphians. In our time he who has pursued the direct method in plain language, calling a spade a spade, and not an implement of husbandry, has been the successful reformer.

6334. ADMONITION, Resentment at. It was the saying of a heathen, though no heathenish saying, that "he who would be good must either have a faithful friend to instruct him or a watchful enemy to correct him." Should we murder a physician because he comes to cure us, or like him worse because he would make us better? Truth is not always relished where sin is nourished. Light is pleasant, yet it may be offensive to sore eyes. Honey is sweet, though it cause the wound to smart. But we must not neglect the actions of friends, for fear of drawing upon ourselves the suspicion of being enemies. Most people are like restive horses, which no sooner feel the rowel than they strike with their heels; or like bees, which no sooner are angered than they put out their stings.

W. Secker.

6335. ADOPTION, Biblical. Luke 15: 22-24. The parable of the prodigal son serves beautifully to illustrate the dignities and privileges of the believer's adoption. It sets forth at once the grace of the Father, and the spirit and privilege of the accepted son. The kiss, the robe, the ring, the shoes, the feast, were favors not given to slaves. Among the Romans and earlier nations, slaves were not allowed to wear shoes. Among the Romans, the master's inviting a slave to sit down with him at table was in itself regarded as an act of manumission; from that time the slave was free. Gal. 4: 6. "Abba, Father." A beautiful word, used in his hour of suffering by Christ himself, Mark 14: 36, and now the privilege of all God's children, Rom. 8: 15; Gal. 4: 6. It is a word which belongs to children. No slave uses such language. It shows the likeness of spirit that Christ's members have to Christ. As he used it in the garden, it expressed his tender affection, his filial confidence, his undoubting trust, his earnest prayer, his entire submission to the Father's will. "Abba, Father,"—the Reformer Becon translated it as equivalent to "Dear Father." It is a word, also, which, being given both in Hebrew and Greek, is designed by the apostle to show that, whether we be Jew or Gentile, we are placed on the same footing by the gospel of Christ's grace.

Bowes.

6336. ADOPTION, Custom of. It is the custom in India, especially among the Mohammedans, that in default of children, and sometimes where there are lineal descendants, the master of the family adopts a slave, frequently a Haffshee Abyssinian of the darkest hue, for his heir; he educates him agreeably to his wishes, and marries him to one of his daughters. As a reward of superior merit or to suit the caprice of an arbitrary despot, this honor is also conferred on a slave recently purchased or already grown up in the family; to him he bequeaths his wealth in preference to his nephews or any collateral branches. This is a custom of great antiquity in the East, and prevalent among the most refined and civilized nations. In the earliest period of the patriarchal history we find Abraham complaining for want of children, and declaring that either Eleezer of Damascus, or one born from him in his house, was his heir, to the exclusion of Lot, his favorite nephew, and all other collateral branches of his family.

Forbes.

6337. ADOPTION, Examples of. Hosea 1: 10; Rom. 9: 25, 26. We have heard of hopeless foundlings entertained by miracle, as young Cyrus in a shepherd's house, a cottage not much above the ground—no likelihood of promotion there, yet exalted to a throne; of Moses among the bulrushes, taken up to be the son of Pharaoh's daughter; of David from the sheepfold advanced to the monarchy; but no example holds proportion to this. It is of Lo-ruhamah and Lo-ammi we speak, the bastard fruit of fornication. That these should be fetched from accursed thralldom, and estated in the glorious liberty of the sons of God, this transcends all admiration.

Thos. Adams

6338. ADOPTION, Knowledge of. I do not mean that God testifies this by an outward voice; no, nor always by an inward voice, although he may do this sometimes. Neither do I suppose that he always applies to the heart, though he often may, one or more texts of Scripture. But He so works upon the soul, by His immediate influence, and by a strong though inexplicable operation, that the stormy wind and troubled waves subside, and there is a sweet calm. The heart rests as in the arms of Jesus; and the sinner is clearly satisfied that God is reconciled.

John Wesley.

6339. ADOPTION, Human. Adoption among men is an act by which a man takes the child of another, and places it in the condition of his own child, to be in every respect from thenceforth as his own, with all the rights, and privileges, and obligations, and duties of a child.

M'Neile.

6340. ADOPTION, Spirit in. A gentleman much perplexed on the subject of the Spirit's witness, desired me to explain it to him; and, believing that he already possessed it, I asked him to describe his views and feelings on the subject, when he said, "I certainly feel that I have experienced a great change, and can now approach God with filial confidence and love." "Then, most assuredly," said I, "you have the very thing about which you are inquiring; for, according to the Apostle, the witness of the Spirit is the power given to believers to view God in His paternal character, and to draw nigh to Him with the simplicity, confidence, and affection of children. 'Because ye are sons, God hath sent forth the Spirit of His Son into your hearts, crying, Abba, Father.' It is the indwelling Spirit that enables us to approach God as our Father, and thus bears witness to our adoption into the Divine family."

Robert Young.

6341. ADORNMENT, Lesson of. A minister visiting a gay person, was introduced to a room near to that in which she dressed. After waiting some hours, the lady came in and found him in tears. She inquired the reason of his weeping. He replied, "Madam, I weep on reflecting that you can spend so many hours before your glass, and in adorning your person, while I spend so few hours before my God, and in adorning my soul." The rebuke struck her conscience. She put on the ornament of a meek and quiet spirit.

6342. ADORNMENT, True. Apelles, the famous painter of Greece, having observed that one of his scholars had painted Helena set out with much gold and embroidery, said unto him, "O adolescens, quum non possis pingere pulchram, fecisti divitem." Alas, poor young man! when thou couldst not draw her fair, thou hast made her rich." Thus many do set a fair outside on the body, and utterly neglect the inside of the soul; pamper the body, but starve the soul; trick up the body with gold and silver, whilst the soul is naked of all grace and goodness.

Jermyn.

6343. ADORNMENTS, Protest Against. Rev. T. Collins' heart ached, when, in chain and ring, bracelet and brooch, garland and plume, he thought he saw a murderer more fatal to trees in the garden of God than is the Matador to the forestry of Brazil, insidiously twining round the Churches committed to his care. Fox, Fletcher, Wesley, Bramwell, and if any find authority in venerable names, I may go earlier and say, Clement of Alexandria, Tertullian, and Cyprian, the martyr of Carthage, each was pained, and each, in his day, found, like Isaiah, a "burden of the Lord" against "the bravery of ornaments, the round tires like the moon, the mufflers, the mantles, the wimples, and the crisping pins." But spite of them all, Apostles and Prophets, Fathers and Martyrs, Quaker witnesses and Methodist worthies, there are still daughters of Zion that are haughty; who as the Scripture says, walk "mincing as they go."

S. Coley.

6344. ADULTATION, Penalty of. Publius Affranus was notorious for fawning around the great. When the Emperor Caligula was sick, he went to him and professed that he would willingly die if Caligula could but recover. The Emperor told him "That he did not believe him;" whereupon Publius Affranus confirmed it with an oath. Caligula soon after recovered, and caused that Publius Affranus should be slain, that he might be true to his word. Being a base flatterer, he was made to undergo in earnest that which he uttered in jest.

6345. ADVENT, Christ's Second. It is described by many figures and in many ways in the Bible. The Bridegroom going forth to meet the Bride, Matt. 25: 1-13. The Master returning to distribute his awards, Luke 19: 12; Matt. 24: 43-51; 25: 14-30. The Time of Harvest, Matt. 13: 30; Rev. 14: 15; and of Vintage, Rev. 14: 17-20. The Breaking forth and dawn of day, (Cant. 2: 17; 4: 6); 2 Pet. 1: 19. The Marriage Supper of the Lamb, Matt. 22: 1-14; Rev. 19: 6-9. The Times of Refreshing, Acts 3: 19. The Times of the Restitution of all things, Acts 3: 21. The Times of Separation—when the gospel net shall be brought to shore, Matt. 13: 47-50; and the Shepherd shall divide the sheep from the goats, Matt. 25: 31-46. "The day of our Lord Jesus Christ," 1 Cor. 1: 8, spoken of emphatically as the one great day ("the day for which all other days were made"). Hence described as "that day" three times in one epistle, 2 Tim. 1: 12-18; 4: 8; see also Mark 13: 32. "That hour," Mark 13: 32; John 5: 28. The very frequent recurrence of the expression "in that day," through the prophets, may be seen by the Concordance. It constantly refers to the great and final day. As an example see Zach. 12-14, where the expression occurs fifteen times. The day of the manifestation of the Son of God, Rom. 8: 19; 2 Cor. 5: 11 (Greek), when "the Chief Shepherd shall appear," and his saints shall appear with him in glory, 1 Pet. 5: 4; Col. 3: 4. The suddenness of Christ's coming is illustrated by the lightning flash, alike sudden, terrible, irresistible, Matt. 24: 27. A snare or trap, Luke 21: 35; surprising the secure and unsuspecting. A thief in the night, Matt. 24: 43; 1 Thess. 5: 2; Rev. 16: 15. It will be unlooked for by a gay and scoffing world. "As it was in the days of Noah," and "of Lot," Luke 17: 26-30. See also Luke 18: 8; 2 Pet. 3: 3-10. Nevertheless there is a waiting for it. The whole creation is earnestly expecting the great day of liberation, (expecting, as the Greek word imports, like one stretching out the neck with longing looks), Rom. 8: 19-22. The church of Christ is waiting—groaning for complete redemption, Rom. 8: 23. The members of Christ's Church are now, and will be, "looking," "watching," "praying," "waiting" for His appearance—loving the anticipation, and hasting towards it; like the wise virgins waiting for the Bridegroom, Matt. 25: 1-13; like the wise servant waiting for the Master, Matt. 24: 45; Luke 12: 35; 36; like patient laborers waiting for the earth's ripe fruits, Jas. 5: 7, 8; like those night watchers who keep their garments, and are not like watchmen sleeping at their posts, Rev. 16: 15. Bowes.

6346. ADVENT, Expected. It is a very remarkable fact, that God's prophecies respecting the Advent of His Son seem to have spread athwart the whole habitable globe, and in the shape of traditional echoes to have been dispersed over all the world. The great promise of a Messiah, which was the grand truth that the Jew clung to in his most desperate fortunes, found itself translated into heathen tongues, and accepted even by heathen men. For instance, the poet Virgil dedicates a poem to Pollis, his patron, in which he says that one would soon be born into the world who, it was expected, would bring in the golden age. Suetonius, an ancient historian, states, too, what is a remarkable proof of the spread of this idea, that a certain and settled persuasion prevailed in the East, that the cities of Judea would bring forth, about this time, a person who should obtain universal empire. And Tacitus, the eloquent historian, but the very incredulous one, who called the Christian religion execrabilis superstitio, states that it was contained in the ancient books of the Jewish priests that the East should prevail, and that a power should proceed from Judea that should possess universal dominion. These were scattered lights that went out from Judea, their reuniting centre, and gave the heathen an anticipation and persuasion that some great and illustrious deliverer was about to be born in the world. Trench.

6347. ADVENT, Faith in the. I die in the faith of the speedy accomplishment of those glorious things which are spoken concerning the city of God and of the kingdom of Christ. "Amen. Even so, Lord Jesus! Come quickly!" Increase Mather.

6348. ADVENT, Glory of the. There is an account come of the arrival of King George, and a great rejoicing for it in Edinburgh. I see the fires and illuminations of that city reflected on the skies. O, how will the heavens reflect and shine with illuminations, when the King of Kings, and Lord of Lords, shall erect his tribunal in the clouds, and come in his own glory, and his Father's glory, and in the glory of the holy angels! O, what a heartsome day will that be! When Christ, who is our life, shall appear, then shall we appear with him in glory. We shall then lift up our heads with joy, because it shall be a time of refreshment from the presence of the Lord.

Ebenezer Erskine.

6349. ADVENT, Joy at the. "I remember," says the writer of Mr. John Janeway's life, "once there was a great talk that one had foretold that doomsday should be on such a day. Although he blamed their daring folly that could pretend to know that which was hid, yet, granting their suspicion to be true, 'What then?' said he; 'what if the day of judgment were come, as it will most certainly come shortly? If I were sure the day of judgment were to come within an hour, I should be glad with all my heart. If, at this instant, I should hear such thunderings, and see such lightnings, as Israel did at Mount Sinai, I am persuaded my very heart would leap for joy. But this I am confident of, through infinite mercy, that the very meditation of that day hath even ravished my soul, and the thought of the certainty and nearness of it is more refreshing to me than the comforts of the whole world.'"

6350. ADVENT, Looking for the. I was told of a poor peasant on the Welsh mountains who, month after month, year after year, through a long period of declining life, was used every morning, as soon as he awoke, to open his casement window towards the east, and look out to see if Jesus Christ was coming. He was no calculator, or he need not have looked so long; he was no student of prophecy, or he need not have looked at all; he was ready, or he would not have been in so much haste; he was willing, or he would rather have looked another way; he loved, or it would not have been the first thought of the morning. His Master did not come, but a messenger did, to fetch the ready one home. The same preparation sufficed for both; the longing soul was satisfied with either. Often when, in the morning, the child of God awakes, weary and encumbered with the flesh, perhaps from troubled dreams, perhaps with troubled thoughts, his Father's secret comes presently across him, he looks up, if not out, to feel, if not to see, the glories of that last morning when the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall arise indestructible; no weary limbs to bear the spirit down; no feverish dreams to haunt the vision; no dark forecasting of the day's events, or returning memory of the griefs of yesterday. Fry.

6351. ADVENT, Prayers for the. The words "Come, Lord Jesus," have often been on the lips of departing believers. They were the last uttered by Burkitt. They were the closing prayer of Bishop Abbott, who died early in the seventeenth century. "It is death: It is death," exclaimed Robert Hall, "Oh, the sufferings of this body!" His wife then asked him, "But you are comfortable in your mind?" He answered, "Very comfortable," adding, "Come, Lord Jesus, come." He then hesitated, as if unable to utter the next word, and one of his daughters added, "Quickly;" whereupon her dying father gave her a look expressive of the utmost delight. Lady Colquhoun seemed to long for her release, and frequently repeated the words

"Come, Lord Jesus, come quickly." Dr. Andrew Eliot, of Boston, in his last sickness, expressed unshaken confidence in the doctrines of grace which he had preached, and would frequently breathe the ejaculation, "Come, Lord Jesus, come quickly." Under similar circumstances, the Rev. Dr. Joseph Sewall was sometimes heard to say, with great pathos, "Come, Lord Jesus, come quickly." The last words of the pious Henry Holmes, of Boston, were, "Lord Jesus, come quickly." In their primary sense, as referring to Christ's personal and glorious advent, these words have often dropped from the lips and pens of earnest believers. In a somewhat desponding mood, Martin Luther broke out, "May the Lord Jesus come at once! Let Him cut the whole matter short with the Day of Judgment; for there is no amendment to be expected." The martyr Ridley wrote: "The world, without doubt—this I do believe, and therefore say it—draws towards an end. Let us with John, the servant of God, cry in our hearts unto our Saviour, Christ, 'Come, Lord Jesus, come!'" Dr. A. C. Thompson.

6352. ADVENT, Welcoming the. No man rightly desires Christ's coming, but he that hath assurance of benefit at His coming. To him the day of Christ is as the day of harvest to the husbandman; as the day of deliverance to the prisoner; as the day of coronation to the king; the day of wedlock to the bride; a day of triumph and exultation, a day of freedom and consolation, a day of rest and satisfaction. To them the Lord Jesus is all sweetness, as wine to the palate, and ointment to the nostrils, saith Solomon; honey in the mouth, saith St. Bernard; music in the ear, and a jubilee in the heart. Get assurance of Christ's coming, as a ransom to redeem you, as a conqueror to subdue all your enemies under you, as a friend to comfort you, as a bridegroom to marry you, and then shall you with boldness and confidence, with joy and gladness, with vehement and holy longings, say, "Come, Lord Jesus."

Grosse.

6353. ADVERSITY, Bearing. It helps us to bear adversity to remember that the worst of our portion is better than we deserve.

6354. ADVERSITY, Effect of. I have read of a fountain that is cold at mid-day, and warm at mid-night. Thus are saints frequently cold in the mid-day of prosperity, and warm in the mid-night of adversity. Afflictions are not a consuming, but a refining fire to the godly. They are like the thorn at the nightingale's breast, which rouses and puts her upon her delightful notes.

Secker.

6355. ADVERSITY, Preferred. If adversity hath killed his thousands, prosperity hath killed his ten thousands; therefore adversity is to be preferred. The one deceives, the other instructs; the one miserably happy, the other happily miserable; and therefore many philosophers have voluntarily sought adversity, and so much commend it in their precepts. Demetrius, in Seneca, esteemed it a great infelicity that in his lifetime he had no misfortune.

Burton.

6356. ADVERSITY, Virtue in. A wise and vir-tuous man, when in adversity, may, like a dark lantern in the night, seem dull and dark to those who are about him; but within he is full of light and brightness; and when he chooses to open the door, he can show it.

Owen Feltham.

6357. ADVICE, Answer to. A very weak and puny man advised the Spartans to engage the enemy by sea and land. Pausanias, the son of Oleombrotus, said to him, "Pray, sir, will you strip and show what a man you are who advise us to engage."

6358. ADVICE, Liberality with. There is nothing with which men are so liberal as advice. It may benefit or blight a life, and save or ruin a soul forever. Good advice is better than gold. It should be given with wisdom and received with caution.

6359. ADVICE, Post facto. A swallow's nest fell from the eaves of a farm-house, and the barn-yard poultry and the hedge birds gathered about the ruins, and went into committee on them. "I knew it was going to fall; I felt sure it must the last time I went on the roof," chirped a sparrow. "Stupid thing—building its nest up there," hissed a goose. "I could have taught her how to lay her eggs without getting smashed, if she had only come to me," quacked a duck. "And I could have taught her how to hatch them—I have had to hatch yours, Neighbor Duck," clucked a hen. "Gobble, gobble, gobble—if people choose to be fools they must take the consequences," said a strutting turkey cock, puffing out his feathers. "My friends, you are very kind to take so much interest in my affairs," twittered the poor swallow; "but if you were so sure that my house was going to fall, isn't it a pity that you didn't tell me so a little sooner?"

Good Things.

6360. ADVICE, Too Late. A doctor had been for some time attending upon a sick man, who, however, died under his hands. At the funeral, the doctor went about among the relations, saying, "Our poor friend, if he had only refrained from wine, and attended to his inside, and used proper means, would not have been lying there." One of the mourners answered him, "My good sir, it is of no use your saying this now; you ought to have prescribed these things when your patient was alive to take them."

Æsop.

6361. ADVOCATE, Christ our. There is an old ploughman in the country I sometimes talk with, and he often says, though in uncouth words, some precious things. He said to me one day, "The other day, sir, the devil was tempting me, and I tried to answer him; but I found he was an old lawyer, and understood the law a great deal better than I did, so I gave over, and would not argue with him any more; so I said to him, 'What do you trouble me for?' 'Why,' said he, 'about your soul?' 'Oh!' said I, 'that is no business of mine; I have given my soul over into the hand of Christ; I have transferred everything to him; if you want an answer to your doubts and queries, you must apply to my Advocate.'"

Spurgeon.

6362. ADVOCATE, Faith in the. The little daughter of a great judge lay upon her death-bed, and by the short and quick gasps which proceeded from the white lips, it was evident the little life had nearly completed its earthly career. The anxious father, bending over his daughter's couch, whispered: "Nellie, are you not afraid to stand in the great tribunal, before the all-ruling God and Judge?" She answered, "No, papa! for Jesus will be my lawyer; he will argue my poor case—covering up my little sins with the mantle of mercy, and extolling my good deeds in a loud voice of praise."

6363. ADVOCATE, Faithful. A faithful advocate can never sit without clients. Nor do I believe that any man could lose by it in the end, that would not undertake a cause he knew not honest. A goldsmith may gain an estate as well as he that trades in every coarser metal. An advocate is a limb of friendship; and further than the altar he is not bound to go. And it is observed of as famous a lawyer as I think was then in the world, the Roman Cicero, that he was slain by one he had defended, when accused of the murder of his father. Certainly he that defends an injury is next to him that commits it. And this is recorded, not only as an example of ingratitude, but as a punishment for patronizing an ill cause.

Feltham.

6364. ADVOCATE, Responsibility of an. Lord Brougham said, in his defence of Queen Caroline, before the House of Lords: "An advocate, by the sacred duty which he owes his client, knows, in the discharge of that office, but one person in the world, that client and none other. To save that client by all means—to protect that client at all hazards and costs to all others, and among others to himself—is the highest and most unquestioned of his duties."

6365. ADVOCATES, Two. When any name is proposed for canonization in the Roman Catholic Church, two advocates are appointed, one to oppose the motion and one to defend it. The one, called Advocatus Diaboli (the Devil's Advocate), advances all he can rummage up against the person in question; the other, called Advocatus Dei (God's Advocate), says all he can in support of the proposal.

6366. AFFABILITY, Examples of. Alexander found a private soldier fainting with cold, and caused him to be carried and seated in his own royal seat in his tent before the fire. The soldier, coming to himself, sprang up amazed and began to apologize. Alexander smiled upon him and said, "Knowest thou not, my soldier, that your Macedonians live after another sort under your king than the Persians do under theirs; for unto them it is death to sit in the king's chair; but unto thee it hath been life." Alfonsus, King of Aragon, meeting a muleteer whose beast was pressed into the mire by a heavy load, dismounted and helped the poor man out of his difficulty.

6367. AFFABILITY, Importance of. Nothing renders a man so amiable in the sight of others, or so happy in himself, as affability and humility. They are the criteria of true greatness, and add lustre to the most brilliant qualifications, and exaltation to the highest rank. Nor in point of policy, are these virtues less important; for they never fail to create love and esteem, and those are ever the surest friends whom repeated civilities have made so. A vulgar and unrestrained indulgence of pride and petulance is sure to render men despised and hated by others, and uneasy to themselves.

6368. AFFECTATION, Folly of. Affectation in any part of our carriage, is lighting up a candle to our defects, and never fails to make us be taken notice of, either as wanting sense or wanting sincerity. All affectation is vain and ridiculous; it is the attempt of poverty to appear rich.

Lavater.

6369. AFFECTATION, Vanity and. I will not call Vanity and Affectation twins, because, more properly, Vanity is the mother, and Affectation is the darling daughter; Vanity is the sin, and Affectation is the punishment; the first may be called the root of self-love, the other the fruit. Vanity is never at its full growth, till it spreadeth into Affectation; and then it is complete.

Saville.

6370. AFFECTION, Beautiful. "What kind of a woman was your mother?" said a slave-master, to a fine African boy whom he had purchased. The boy hesitated. "Come, tell me," said the master: "What kind of a woman was she? Was she tall? Was she thin? Was she old? Was she beautiful?" The boy lifted up his glistening eyes, and in broken accents said: "How could a mother but be beautiful in the eyes of her child?"

6371. AFFECTION, Filial. When Sir Thomas More was being led forth under sentence of death, his daughter Margaret rushed through the guards, threw herself upon her venerable father's neck, and wept in woeful despair. The crowd melted into compassion at the scene. Sir Thomas said, "My dear Margaret, submit with patience; grieve no longer for me, it is the will of God." He embraced her and bade her farewell. After his execution his head was exposed upon London bridge for fourteen days according to his sentence. It was about to be cast into the Thames, when his daughter was allowed to purchase it. "She survived her father only nine years, and died in 1544, in her thirty-sixth year. In compliance with her desire, the head of her father was interred with her, in her arms, as related by some, or, according to others, deposited in a leaden box, and placed upon the coffin."

6372. AFFECTION, Instinctive. Louis XVI. took great pains to teach his son. When a boy he took him into the country, and handing him his compass directed him to try and find his way to the chateau in a certain direction, and he would go another. The boy got out of his way many times, and was four or five hours getting home. The king ran to meet him, and exclaimed, "I thought you were lost." "Oh! papa," said the boy, "how could I? Did not my heart incline towards you, as sure as the compass towards the north?"

as he accumulated sufficient money to send for her and her boy, he would do so. He was gone a long time before he was successful, and at last a letter arrived bringing money to take them to the Pacific coast. It was a joyful day for that mother and child. They went to New York and took passage in one of the Pacific steamers, and started for San Francisco. One day a cry was raised—a cry of fire! The pumps were set to work, water was thrown on the flames, but it did not stop their progress, and the Captain saw that there was no use to try and save it. He had a magazine of powder on board. The flames were advancing toward it, and he knew as soon they should reach that, all would perish. So they took to the life-boats, the strong and active jumping in first, and there remained on deck only this poor woman and her little boy. As the last life-boat was pushing away from the ship, she pleaded and prayed to these men to take herself and her boy, but the men were obdurate. They said they dare not take any more, and but one man said, "Let us take them." and the others said, "No, we dare not." At length they determined upon taking one of them, and they communicated their resolution to the mother. She caught her boy, gave him one affectionate embrace, and dropped him into the life-boat, exclaiming, "If you live to get to your father, tell him I died in your place." They boy escaped. The life-boat rowed on. The flames gradually encircled the fatal ship. It reached the powder magazine. A terrific explosion ensued, and that devoted mother met a watery grave. She died for the child she loved, but Christ died for his enemies.

6374. AFFECTION, Paternal. A profligate son resolved to kill his father to get possession of his property. This came to the father's knowledge, and he invited his son to walk with him. They went into the dense forest, and there the father said to him: "My son, I have been told, and have no doubt of the fact, that you have formed the desperate resolution of murdering me. Notwithstanding the many just grounds of complaint which I have against you, still you are my son, and I love you still, and wish to give you a last token of my tenderness. I have led you into this forest, and to this solitary place, where none are to witness our conduct, and where none can have the smallest knowledge of your crime." Then, drawing a dagger, which had been concealed, "There, my son," said he; "there is a dagger—take your will of me—execute the cruel design which you have formed against my life—put me to death according to your resolution—I shall, at least, in dying here, save you from falling into the hands of human justice; this shall be the last evidence of my tender attachment to you; in my extreme grief, this shall be some consolation to me, that I shall save your life, whilst you deprive me of mine." The son, astonished, could not refrain from crying; threw himself at his father's feet—implored the forgiveness of his foul offence, and prostrated before God, that he would change his conduct to the best and most benevolent of fathers. He kept his word—renouncing his ruinous irregularities, and causing consolation and joy somewhat proportioned to the grief and sorrows of soul which he had given to his father.

6375. AFFECTION, Promotion of. One remarkable effect of the gospel among the heathen has been the strengthening of all the natural affections. Cases in point are numerous. Mothers who had been guilty of infanticide mourn for their murdered children. The aged parents are no longer abandoned. The Christian child of heathen parents becomes solicitous for their souls. A missionary visited a woman who had been torn from her parents and sold in childhood. She became a true Christian. He found her in tears and inquired the cause. He said: "My child, what is the cause of your sorrow? Is the baby still unwell?" "No," she replied, "my baby is well." "Your mother-in-law?" I inquired. "No, no," she replied, "it is my own dear mother." Here she gave vent to her grief; and, holding out the gospel of Luke in a hand wet with tears, she exclaimed, "My mother will never see this Word; she will never hear this good news." She wept again and again, and said, "O, my mother and my friends, they live in heathen darkness; and shall they die without seeing the light which has shone on me, and without tasting that love which I have tasted?" Raising her eyes to heaven she sighed a prayer, and uttered the words again, "My mother, my mother!" She died not long after in the Christian faith, and the last words she was heard to utter were an ejaculatory prayer for her mother.

6376. AFFECTION, Proof of. In the French revolution, a young man was condemned to the guillotine, and shut up in one of the prisons. He was greatly loved by many, but there was one who loved him more than all put together. How know we this? It was his own father, and the love he bore his son was proved in this way: When the lists were called, the father, whose name was exactly the same as the son's, answered to the name, and the father rode in the gloomy tumbril out to the place of execution, and his head rolled from beneath the axe instead of his son's, a victim to mighty love. See here an image of the love of Christ to sinners; for thus Jesus died for the ungodly. Spurgeon.

6377. AFFECTION, Reward of. A Roman, called Titus Manlius, was extremely ill-treated by his father, for no other reason than a defect in his speech. A tribune of the people brought an accusation against the father before the people, who hated him for his imperious conduct, and were determined to punish him with severity. The young man came one morning very early from his father's country farm, where he was forced to live in the style of a slave, and finding out the house of the tribune who had impeached his father, compelled him to swear that he would immediately drop the prosecution. Oaths being at that time held inviolable in Rome, the tribune declared before the people that he withdrew his charge against old Manlius, because his son Titus had obliged him to promise upon oath that he would carry it no farther. The people, charmed with the filial piety of Titus to an unnatural father, not only forgave the old man, but next year advanced his generous son to the supreme honors of the state. Whitecross.

6378. AFFECTION, Test of. A rich merchant died, leaving a large fortune. He had but one son, who had been sent when quite a lad to an uncle in India. On his way home, after an absence of some years, the young man had been shipwrecked; and though it was believed he had been saved, still no certain tidings reached his father, who, meanwhile, died rather suddenly, leaving his large fortune to the care of an old friend, with strict injunctions not to give it up to any claimant until certain conditions had been complied with. At the end of a year, a young man appeared who said he was the heir; then a second, and finally a third. The guardian, who knew that two out of the three claimants must be impostors, made use of the following stratagem: He gave each rival a bow and arrow, and desired them to use the dead man's picture as the target, and to aim at the heart. The first nearly hit the mark; the second pierced the heart; but the third claimant burst into tears, and refused to dishonor his father's memory by injuring the portrait of one whom he venerated so highly. The guardian was quite satisfied with the result of his device, and at once welcomed him as the rightful heir and his old friend's son.

Anon.

6379. AFFECTIONS, Culture of the. It is not the method and custom of reason—in imitation either of the manner of the Thracians or of what Lycurgus ordered to be done to the vines—to destroy and tear up all the passions indifferently, good and bad, useful and hurtful together; but rather—like some kind and careful Deity who has a tender regard to the growth and improvement of fruit trees and plants—to cut away and clip off that which grows wild and rank, and to dress and manage the rest that it may serve for use and profit.

Plutarch.

6380. AFFECTIONS, Neglect of the. It appears unaccountable that our teachers generally have directed their instructions to the head, with very little attention to the heart. From Aristotle down to Locke, books without number have been composed for cultivating and improving the understanding; but few, in proportion, for cultivating and improving the affections.

Kames.

6381. AFFLICTION, Benefits of. An old Puritan said, "God's people are like birds; they sing best in cages." He said, "God's people sing best when in the deepest trouble." Said old Master Brooks, "The deeper the flood was, the higher the ark went up to heaven." So it is with the child of God: the deeper his troubles the nearer to heaven he goeth, if he lives close to his Master. Troubles are called weights; and a weight, you know, generally cloggeth and keepeth down to the earth; but there are ways, by the use of the laws of mechanics, by which you can make a weight lift you; and so it is possible to make your troubles lift you nearer heaven instead of making them sink you. Ah! we thank our God, he has sometimes opened our mouth when we were dumb; when we were ungrateful, and did not praise him, he has opened our mouth by a trial; and though when we had a thousand mercies we did not bless him, when he sent a sharp affliction, then we began to bless him. Spurgeon.

6382. AFFLICTION, Burden of. Nothing can render affliction so insupportable as the load of sin. Would you then be fitted for afflictions? Be sure to get the burden of your sins laid aside, and then what affliction soever you may meet with will be very easy to you.

Bunyan.

6383. AFFLICTION, Cure for. Crantor, a heathen, says, "To be innocent is the greatest comfort in affliction." He knew nothing of the blood of Christ, that washes whiter than snow, and prepares the dying for the enjoyments of a heaven of purity; but he saw the advantage of that condition.

6384. AFFLICTION, Design of. Rev. Richard Cecil was introduced into the chamber where the child of Thomas Williams, a very prosperous bookseller of London, lay dying. "You are a father," said the afflicted parent, "or I should not have allowed you to witness such a scene." "Thank God," fervently exclaimed the minister, comprehending at a glance the situation of his friend, "thank God, he has not forgotten you! I have been much troubled on your account, my dear sir. I have thought much about you lately. I have been much afraid for you. Things have gone on so well with you for so long a time, you have been so prosperous, that I have been almost afraid that God had forgotten you. But I said to myself, surely God will not forsake such a man as this—will not suffer him to go on in prosperity, without some check, some reverse! And I see he has not. No; God has not forgotten you."

6385. AFFLICTION, Exchanging. An English hermit was afflicted with a repulsive and painful disease from his childhood. He prayed that God, in His mercy, would exchange the torments of his malady for some lighter disease that should not make his body repulsive. Soon after he felt that he was healed, and that his disorder was entirely eradicated; but, strange to relate, another disease came upon him which tormented him incessantly, night and day, for twenty years.

6386. AFFLICTION, Figures of. It is a fact of deep significance, that of the many figures which abound in the Scriptures, those for affliction and trial are most numerous. The following are amongst the most common: Baptism (of suffering), bonds, broken, bruised, crushed, (like herbs, fruits, olives, etc.), a broken vessel, captivity and imprisonment, cross, cup, darkness, day of gloom, mourning, dove, fighting, fire, furnace, the friction of precious stones, the melting of precious metals, medicine, ploughshare, purging, pruning, rod, storm and tempest, thorns, deep waters, waves, billows, floods, rivers, valley, wormwood and gall.

Bowes.

6387. AFFLICTION, Frost of. There are some fruits, like the persimmon, that now seem fair and ready to eat, that are most bitter and disagreeable. But the coming frosts will somehow work to change all the acids and bitterness into a most luscious and wholesome fruit. So earthly trials work to change the sour, selfish, disagreeable spirits of some Christians into a genuine sweetness. And there are many who keep up the fair form of a Christian profession who need some like power to remove their disposition to bitterness of criticism and sourness of temper.

A. D. Vail.

6388. AFFLICTION, Graces from. When Munster lay sick, and his friends asked him how he did, and how he felt himself, he pointed to his sores and ulcers, whereof he was full, and said, "These are God's gems and jewels, wherewith he decketh his best friends, and to me they are more precious than all the gold and silver in the world." A soul at first conversion is but a rough cast; but God by afflictions doth square and fit and fashion it for that glory above, which doth speak them to flow from precious love; therefore the afflictions that do attend the people of God should be no bar to holiness, nor no motive to draw the soul to ways of wickedness.

Brooks.

6389. AFFLICTION, Happiness in. Rev. Henry Venn told his children that he would take them to one of the most interesting sights in the world. He led them to a miserable hovel, whose decayed walls and broken windows bespoke poverty and want. "Now," said he, "my dear children, can any one that lives in such a wretched place as this be happy? Yet this is not all; a poor young man lies on a miserable straw bed within, dying of a fever, and afflicted with nine painful ulcers." "Oh, how wretched!" they all exclaimed at once. Mr. Venn led them into the cottage, and, going up to the poor, dying young man, said, "Abraham Midwood, I have brought my children here to show them that people can be happy in sickness, in poverty, and in want; and now tell them if it is not so." The suffering youth immediately answered, "Oh, yes, sir; I would not change my state with the richest man on earth who had not the views which I have. Blessed be God, I have a good hope through Christ of going to heaven, where Lazarus now is. He has a great while ago forgotten all his miseries; soon I shall mine. Sir, this is nothing to bear while the presence of God cheers my soul. Indeed, I am truly happy, and I trust to be happy through all eternity; and I every hour thank God, who has given me to enjoy the riches of his goodness and his grace through Jesus Christ."

6390. AFFLICTION, Honor of. In the ancient times, a box on the ear given by a master to a slave meant liberty: little would the freedman care how hard was the blow. By a stroke from the sword the warrior was knighted by his monarch: small matter was it to the new-made knight if the hand was heavy. When the Lord intends to lift his servants into a higher stage of spiritual life, he frequently sends them a severe trial; he makes his Jacobs to be prevailing princes, but he confers the honor after a night of wrestling, and accompanies it with a shrunken sinew. Be it so: who among us would wish to be deprived of the trials, if they are the necessary attendants of spiritual advancement?

Spurgeon.

6391. AFFLICTION, Improvement of. Men that are wise, as the bees draw honey from the thyme, which is a most unsavory herb, extract something that is convenient and useful from the most bitter affliction.

Plutarch.

6392. AFFLICTION, Intention of. In Mexico a method of separating the silver from the dross is to pulverize the ore, and spread it out on a large platform. Great numbers of mules are driven over it. Quicksilver is poured over the mud, and the trampling is continued. When the metals have thoroughly amalgamated, the mass is cast into the furnace, and the silver runs off clear from the dross. So men are broken and trampled by afflictions. The quicksilver of truth is poured over them, they are cast into the furnace of tribulation, till the precious products of faith and purity are realized.

6393. AFFLICTION, Lesson of. Lokmân, the famous Oriental philosopher, while a slave, being presented by his master with a bitter melon, immediately ate it all. "How was it possible," said his master, "for you to eat so nauseous a fruit?" Lokman replied, "I have received so many favors from you, it is no wonder I should, for once in my life, eat a bitter melon from your hand." This generous answer of the slave struck the master so forcibly, that he immediately gave him his liberty. "With such sentiments," says Bishop Horne, "should man receive his portion of suffering at the hand of God."

6395. AFFLICTION, Profit of. Affliction is very useful and profitable to the godly. The prodigal son had no thought of returning to his father's house till he had been humbled by adversity. Hagar was haughty under Abraham's roof, and despised her mistress; but in the wilderness she was meek and lowly. Jonah sleeps on board ship, but in that whale's belly he watches and prays. Manasseh lived as a libertine at Jerusalem, and committed the most enormous crimes; but when he was bound in chains in the prison at Babylon, his heart was turned to seek the Lord his God. Bodily pain and disease have been instrumental in rousing many to seek Christ, when those who were in high health have given themselves no concern about him. The ground which is not rent and torn with the plough bears nothing but thistles and thorns. The vines will run wild, in process of time, if they be not pruned and trimmed. So would our wild hearts be overrun with filthy, poisonous weeds, if the true Vine-dresser did not often check their growth by crosses and sanctified troubles. "It is good for a man that he bear the yoke in his youth." Our Saviour says, "Every branch that beareth fruit He purgeth, that it may bring forth more fruit." There can be no gold or silver finely wrought without first being purified with fire, and no elegant houses built with stones till the hammers have squared and smoothed them. So we can neither become vessels of honor in the house of our Father till we are melted in the furnace of affliction, nor lively stones in the walls of New Jerusalem till the hand of the Lord has beaten off our proud excrescences and tumors with his own hammers.

Daniel Rowlands.

6396. AFFLICTION, Right View of. Our crosses are not made of iron, though painted sometimes with iron colors; they are formed of nothing heavier than wood. Yet they are not made of pasteboard, and will never be light in themselves, though our Lord can lighten them by his presence. The Papists foolishly worship pieces of wood supposed to be parts of the true cross; but he who has borne the really true cross and known its sanctifying power, will value every sliver of it, counting his trials to be his treasures, his afflictions argosies of wealth, and his losses his best gains.

Spurgeon.

6397. AFFLICTION, Sanctifying Power of. Afflictions are a crystal glass, wherein the soul hath the clearest sight of the ugly face of sin. In this glass the soul comes to see sin to be but a bitter-sweet; yea, in this glass the soul comes to see sin not only to be an evil, but to be the greatest evil in the world, to be an evil far worse than hell itself. Again, they shall contribute to the mortifying and purging away of their sins (Isa. 1: 15, and 27: 8, 9). Afflictions are God's furnace, by which he cleanses his people from their dross, and to make virtues shine; it is a potion to carry away ill humors, better than all the benedictum medicamentum, as physicians call them. Aloes kill worms; colds and frosts do destroy vermin; so do afflictions the corruptions that are in our hearts. The Jews, under all the prophets' thunderings, retained their idols; but after their Babylonish captivity, it is observed, there have been no idols found amongst them. . . . Augustine, by wandering out of his way, escaped one that lay in wait to mischief him. If afflictions did not put us out of our way, we should many times meet with some sin or other that would mischief our precious souls.

Brooks.

6398. AFFLICTION, Songs in. The children sometimes stretch a silver thread in the window, between the sashes, to make an Æolian harp. And while the air is calm and still, there is no music. But when the wind blows softly a faint murmur of music is heard; and the stronger the wind the louder and sweeter the melody becomes. It is so with many a human heart. The purest, sweetest, holiest joy I ever witnessed in mortal on earth was in one who for fourteen years had been sitting in her chair, unable to lift hand or foot. All these years her heart had been communing with God, and the sorrows that beat upon the chords of her soul struck out songs which might have fallen from an angel's tongue.

J. R. Miller.

6399. AFFLICTION, Stimulation of. There is an old story in the Greek annals of a soldier under Antigonus who had a disease about him, an extremely painful one, likely to bring him soon to the grave. Always first in the charge was this soldier, rushing into the hottest part of the fray, as the bravest of the brave. His pain prompted him to fight, that he might forget it; and he feared not death, because he knew that in any case he had not long to live. Antigonus, who greatly admired the valor of his soldier, discovering his malady, had him cured by one of the most eminent physicians of the day; but, alas! from that moment the warrior was absent from the front of the battle. He now sought his ease; for, as he remarked to his companions, he had something worth living for—health, home, family, and other comforts—and he would not risk his life now as aforesaid. So, when our troubles are many we are often by grace made courageous in serving our Lord; we feel that we have nothing to live for in this world, and we are driven, by the hope of the world to come, to exhibit zeal, self-denial, and industry. But how often is it otherwise in better times! for then the joys and pleasure of this world make it hard for us to remember the world to come, and we sink into inglorious ease.

Spurgeon.

6400. AFFLICTION, Superior to. Anaxarchus, a heathen, being thrown into a mortar and beaten with an iron pestle, cried out, "You do but beat the vessel, the husk of Anaxarchus; you do not beat me!" Socrates said of his enemies, "They may kill me, but they cannot hurt me."

6401. AFFLICTION, Support in. If you thoroughly exhaust a vessel of the air it contains, the pressure of the air on the outside will break that vessel into (perhaps) millions of pieces; because there is not a sufficiency of air within to resist and counteract the weight of the atmosphere from without. A person who is exercised by severe affliction, and who does not experience the Divine comforts and supports in his soul, resembles the exhausted receiver above described; and it is no wonder if he yields, and is broken to shivers, under the weight of God's providential hand. But affliction, to one who is sustained by the Holy Ghost, resembles the aerial pressure on the outer surface of an unexhausted vessel. There is that within which supports it, and which preserves it from being destroyed by the incumbent pressure from without.

Salter.

6402. AFFLICTION, Trust in. There is a young man in New England of fine capabilities, who, for years, has been so helpless that he would starve if left alone. A friend was commiserating his condition, when, with deep earnestness he exclaimed, as he slowly raised his withered hand, "God makes no mistakes."

6403. AFFLICTION, Use of. Thorns in the field, that prevented the soldiers from using their weapons, and thorns in the flesh, that acted as Satan's messengers to buffet God's saints, will both be acknowledged as instruments used by the Sovereign Spirit in preparing a people for the Lord. Let us endeavor to be patient when thorns prick us: they are the hedges which God has planted to keep us in the way of life; they will become a wreath of victory in the great day. Arnot.

6404. AFFLICTIONS, Challenging. Let fire and the cross, let companies of wild beasts, let breaking of bones and tearing of members, let the shattering in pieces of the whole body and all the wicked torments of the devil come upon me; only let me enjoy Jesus Christ. Ignatius.

6405. AFFLICTIONS, Christians in. Stars shine brightest in the darkest night; torches are better for beating; grapes come not to the press till they come to the press; spices smell best when bruised; young trees root the faster for shaking; gold looks brighter for scouring; juniper smells sweetest in the fire; the palm-tree proves the better for pressing; chamomile, the more you tread it, the more you spread it. Such is the condition of all God's children; they are then most triumphant when most tempted; most glorious when most afflicted; most in favor of God when least in man's and least in their own: as their conflicts, so their conquests; as their tribulations, so their triumphs; true salamanders, that live best in the furnace of persecution: so that heavy afflictions are the best benefactors to heavenly affections; and where afflictions hang heaviest, corruptions hang loosest; and grace, that is hid in nature, as sweet water in rose-leaves, is then most fragrant when the fire of affliction is put under to distil it out. Bogatzky.

6406. AFFLICTIONS, Consolations for. In afflictions men generally draw their consolations out of books of morality, which indeed are of great use to fortify and strengthen the mind against the impressions of sorrow. Monsieur St. Evremont recommends authors who are apt to stir up mirth in the minds of the readers, and fancies Don Quixote can give more relief to a heavy heart than Plutarch or Seneca, as it is much easier to divert grief than to conquer it. I should rather have recourse to authors of a quite contrary kind, that give us instances of calamities and misfortunes, and show human nature in its greatest distresses. Addison.

6407. AFFLICTIONS, Different Effects of. How different are summer storms from winter ones! In winter they rush over the earth with their violence; and if any poor remnants of foliage or flowers have lingered behind, these are swept along at one gust. Nothing is left but desolation; and long after the rain has ceased, pools of water and mud bear tokens of what has been. But when the clouds have poured out their torrents in summer, when the winds have spent their fury, and the sun breaks forth again in glory, all things seem to rise with renewed loveliness from their refreshing bath. The flowers, glistening with rainbows, smell sweeter than before; the grass seems to have gained another brighter shade of green; and the young plants which had hardly come into sight, have taken their place among their fellows in the borders, so quickly have they sprung among the showers. The air, too, which may previously have been oppressive, is become clear, and soft, and fresh. Such, too, is the difference when the storms of affliction fall on hearts unrenewed by Christian faith, and on those who abide in Christ. In the former they bring out the dreariness and desolation which may before have been unapparent. The gloom is not relieved by the prospect of any cheering ray to follow it; of any flowers or fruits to show its beneficence. But in the true Christian soul, "though weeping may endure for a night, joy cometh in the morning." A sweet smile of hope and love follows every tear; and tribulation itself is turned into the chief of blessings. Anon.

6408. AFFLICTIONS, Favor of. St. Theresa had a vision in which Christ said to her, "Dost thou think that merit consists in enjoying? No: but rather in working, in suffering, in loving. He is most beloved of my Father on whom He lays the heaviest crosses, if these sufferings are accepted and borne with love. By what can I better show my love for thee than by choosing for thee what I chose for myself?"

6409. AFFLICTIONS, Fitness of. The cook, by mistake, prepared a broth of wormwood for St. Francis Borgia, which he ate without a word of complaint. When the cook discovered his mistake he asked pardon of the saint. He said "I never ate anything fitter for me. May the Lord bless and reward you," said he to the cook, "you are the only person amongst all my brethren who knows what suits me best. Herein is a parable of the cup mingled by the All-father, who never makes mistakes, and which he sends to his children for their good."

6410. AFFLICTIONS, Need of. Christians have frequently more of these sufferings than others. The husbandman does not prune the bramble, but the vine. The stones designed for the temple above require more cutting and polishing than those which are for the common wall. Correction is not for strangers, but children. The Christian mourns over those infirmities which are not viewed by others as sins, such as wandering thoughts and cold affections in duty. It is said of that beautiful bird, the bird of Paradise, that if it is caught and caged, it never ceases to sigh till it is free. Just such is the Christian. Nothing will satisfy him but the glorious liberty of the sons of God. Jay.

6411. AFFLICTIONS, Rewards of. When the Christian's last pit is digged, when he is descended into his grave, and finished his state of sorrows and suffering, then God opens the river of abundance, the rivers of life and never-ceasing felicities. As much as moments are exceeded by eternity, and the sighing of a man by the joys of an angel, and a salutary frown by the light of God's countenance, a few groans by the infinite and eternal hallelujahs; so much are the sorrows of the saints to be undervalued, in respect of what is deposited for them in the treasures of eternity. Their sorrows can die, but so cannot their joys. . . . Every chain is a ray of light, and every prison is a palace, and every loss is the purchase of a kingdom, and every affront in the cause of God is an eternal honor, and every day of sorrow is a thousand years of comfort, multiplied with a never-ceasing numeration; days without night, joys without sorrow, sanctity without sin, charity without stain, possession without fear, society without envying, communication of joys without lessening: and they shall dwell in a blessed country, where an enemy never entered, and from whence a friend never went away.

Jeremy Taylor.

6412. AFFLICTIONS, Unsanctified. Trust not in any unsanctified afflictions. These cannot permanently and really change the condition of your heart. I have seen the characters of the writing remain on paper which the flames had turned into a film of buoyant coal; I have seen the thread that had been passed through the fire, retain, in its cold gray ashes, the twist which it had got in spinning; I have found every shivered splinter of the flint as hard as the unbroken stone; and let trials come, in providence, sharp as the fire, and ponderous as the crushing hammer, unless a gracious God send along with these something else, bruised, broken, bleeding, as your heart may be, its nature remains the same.

Dr. Guthrie.

6413. AGE, Comfort in Old. A cheerful, tottering, poor old man of eighty-one said, "Thank God, I have my wits and my limbs. I never was in prison, and I am not going to hell. I am the Lord's. So while I see everybody in this busy world looking keenly, as they do, after their own, the sight helps me to believe, and I am comforted in the faith, that Jesus is looking after me, and he will take me soon."

T. Collins.

6414. AGE, Computing. An old slave who could neither read nor write, was asked how old he was. He did not know, but said he could tell how long he had been the Lord's child. He brought out a bottle into which he had dropped a pebble every Christmas since his conversion. It contained fifty-one pebbles.

6415. AGE, Deception of. It is with most men's lives, as with the sand in a deceptive hour-glass; look upon its outward appearance, and it seems far more than it is, because it rises up upon the sides, whilst the sand is empty and hollow in the middle thereof, so that when it sinks down in an instant, a quarter of an hour is gone in a moment. Thus many men are mistaken in their own account, reckoning upon threescore and ten years, the age of a man, because their bodies appear strong and lusty. Alas! their health may be hollow, there may be some inward infirmity and imperfection unknown to them, so that death may surprise them on a sudden, and they be cut down like the grass.

Anon.

6416. AGE, Reverence for. Age naturally awakens our respect. A Greek historian tells how, in the pure and early, and most virtuous days of the republic, if an old man entered the crowded assembly, all ranks rose to give room and place to him. Age throws such a character of dignity even over inanimate objects, that the spectator regards them with a sort of awe and veneration. We have stood before the hoary and ivy-mantled ruin of a bygone age with deeper feelings of respect than ever touched us in the marbled halls, and amid the gilded grandeur of modern palaces; nor did the proudest tree which lifted its umbrageous head and towering form to the skies ever affect us with such strange emotion as an old, withered, wasted trunk that, though hollowed by time into a gnarled shell, still showed some green signs of life.

Dr. Guthrie.

6417. AGE, Softening Effects of. Men, like peaches and pears, grow sweet a little while before they begin to decay. I don't know what it is—whether a spontaneous change, mental or bodily, or whether it is thorough experience of the thanklessness of critical honesty—but it is a fact, that most writers, except sour and unsuccessful ones, get tired of finding fault at about the time when they are beginning to grow old. As a general thing I would not give a great deal for the fair words of a critic, if he is himself an author over fifty years of age. At thirty we are all trying to cut our names in big letters upon the walls of this tenement of life; twenty years later we have carved them or shut up our jack-knives. Then we are ready to help others, and care less to hinder any, because nobody's elbows are in our way. I just now spoke of the sweetening process authors undergo. Do you know that, in the gradual passage from maturity to helplessness, the harshest characters sometimes have a period in which they are gentle and placid as young children? I have heard it said, but I cannot be sponsor for its truth, that the famous chieftain, Lochiel, was rocked in a cradle like a baby in his old age. An old man, whose studies had been of the severest scholastic kind, used to love to hear little nursery stories read over and over to him. One who saw the Duke of Wellington in his last years describes him as very gentle in his aspect and demeanor. I remember a person of singularly stern and lofty bearing, who became remarkably gracious and easy in all his ways in the latter period of his life.

Holmes.

6418. AGE, Traits of Each. Each succeeding age and generation leaves behind it a peculiar character, which stands out in relief upon its annals, and is associated with it forever in the memory of posterity. One is signalized for the invention of gunpowder, another for that of printing; one is rendered memorable by the revival of letters, another by the reformation of religion; one is marked in history by the conquests of Napoleon, another is rendered illustrious by the discoveries of Newton. If we are asked by what characteristic the present age will be marked in future records, we answer, by the miracles which have been wrought in the subjugation of the powers of the material world to the uses of the human race. In this respect no former epoch can approach to competition with it.

Dr. Lardner.

6419. AGED, Conversion of the. Marcus Caius Victorius was converted from heathenism in old age. So unusual was it in those primitive times for the aged to be converted, that neither the minister nor the Church would trust him. After a long time such was the evidence of the change that they could no longer doubt. He was received with acclamations and singing of psalms, the people everywhere crying, "Marcus Caius Victorius is become a Christian."

6420. AGED, Decay of the. We have seen a sere and yellow leaf hang upon the tree all the winter through. There, tenacious of its hold, dancing and whirling in the playful wind, it appeared not beautiful or graceful, but out of place and season, and in humbling contrast with the young and green companions which budding spring had hung around it. Like that wrinkled and withered thing, some men hang on by this world. They live too long, and die too late, for themselves at least. Half dead and half alive, mind failed and memory faded, outliving their usefulness, but the melancholy wrecks of what once they were, they tax affection to conceal from strangers' eyes the ravages of time, and do for them the tender office of the ivy, when she kindly flings a green and glossy mantle over the crumbling ruin or old hollow tree.

Guthrie.

6421. AGED, Illusions of the. One dear old saint had become possessed by a singularly happy monomania. To her every day was Sunday. The little left of life was to be all worship. The only trouble the pleasant delusion caused was that her daughter was obliged to clean the cottage early, and on the sly; for pails, scrubbing brushes and mops seemed awful improprieties to her ever Sabbath-keeping mother. Another aged woman had gone blind; "All," said she, "around is dark. I see nothing there; but when I look right up towards heaven, for months past, I have always seen the letter W printed as if in pearls; I know what it means. I am going soon, and it means welcome."

T. Collins.

6422. AGED, Regard for the. It was anciently a proverb among the heathen, it is good to be an old man or woman only in Sparta. The ground of it was the strict laws among the Spartans to punish the rebellion and disobedience of children to their aged parents. And shall it not be good to be an old father and mother in this land, where the Gospel of Christ is preached?

6423. AGED, Paying Respect to the. A Russian princess of great beauty, in company with her father and a young French marquis, visited a celebrated Swiss doctor of the eighteenth century, Michael Scuppack; when the marquis began to pass one of his jokes upon the long white beard of one of the doctor's neighbors who was present. He offered to bet twelve louis' d'ors that no lady present would dare to kiss the dirty old fellow! The Russian princess ordered her attendant to bring a plate, and deposited twelve louis d'ors, and sent it to the marquis, who was too polite to decline his stake. The fair Russian then approached the peasant, saying, "Permit me, venerable father, to salute you after the manner of my country," and embracing, gave him a kiss. She then presented him the gold which was on the plate, saying, "Take this as a remembrance of me, and as a sign that the Russian girls think it their duty to honor old age."

6424. AGITATION, Use of. Dr. John Ritchie, of Scotland, replied to one who disapproved of his going up and down the country resorting to agitation. "Agitation!" said John, "what good in the world was ever done without agitation? We cannot make butter even without it!"

6425. AGREEMENTS, Legal. Persæus, being about to accommodate a friend with a sum of money, paid it publicly in the market, and made the conditions before a banker. But when his friend marveled and asked, "How now, so formally and according to law?" "Yea," quoth he, "because I would receive my money again as a friend, and not have to trouble the law to recover it." For many, out of bashfulness, not taking care to have good security at first, have been forced afterwards to break with their friends, and to have recourse to law for their money.

Plutarch.

6426. AGRICULTURE, Importance of. Agriculture is the foundation of manufactures, since the productions of nature are the materials of art.—Gibbon.—Agriculture not only gives riches to a nation, but the only riches she can call her own.

Dr. Johnson.

6427. AGRICULTURIST, Life of the. In a moral point of view, the life of the agriculturist is the most pure and holy of any class of men; pure, because it is the most healthful, and vice can hardly find time to contaminate it; and holy, because it brings the Deity perpetually before his view, giving him thereby the most exalted notions of supreme power, and the most fascinating and endearing view of moral benignity. The agriculturist views the Deity in His works; he contemplates the divine economy in the arrangement of the seasons; and he hails Nature immediately presiding over every object that strikes his eyes; he witnesses many of her great and beauteous operations, and her reproductive faculties; his heart insensibly expands, from his minute acquaintance with multifarious objects, all in themselves original whilst that degree of retirement in which he is placed from the bustling haunts of mankind, keeps alive in his breast his natural affections, unblunted by an extensive and perpetual intercourse with man in a more enlarged, and, therefore, in a more corrupt state of society.

Lord John Russell.

6428. AIM, Direct. Do not sow the world broadcast, but, as the Scotch would say, "Dibble it in!" Make a hole in the ground with your sharpened stick and push the seed into the earth with your heel. Let every sentence tell. Shoot with an aim. Take your arrow from your quiver, put it on the bow with your eye on the soul and on the throne, then let it go home. Do not pull it out. Let it be a distinct and felt impression. Do not talk to human beings who are asleep. I have no faith in somnambulism in the church. Let every eye be engaged as though he would look you through. Give the children something worth receiving, and send the truth home.

Dr. Ormiston.

6429. AIM, Effective. A sharp-shooter from one of the Vermont regiments in the battle of — fired ninety-six cartridges, three-fourths of which were effective. In the random shooting of common soldiers in battle it is estimated that not more than one bullet in four thousand does execution. The teacher or Christian worker who would save souls must make some particular heart his target and aim for it:—must select the best rifle and ammunition, and if he does not hit must try again, and again, till he has smitten the mark and secured the capitulation of the soul to Christ. So of every other object desired.

6430. AIM, Execution and. A gentleman calling on Thorwaldsen, found him, as he said, in a glow, almost in a trance, of creative energy. On his inquiring what had happened, "My friend, my dear friend," said the sculptor, "I have an idea, I have a work in my head, which will be worthy to live. A lad had been sitting to me some time as a model yesterday, when I bade him rest awhile. In so doing, he threw himself into an attitude which struck me very much. 'What a beautiful statue it would make!' I said to myself; 'But what would it do for?' It would do—it would do—it would do—exactly for Mercury drawing his sword, just after he has played Argus to sleep.' I immediately began modeling. I worked all the evening, till at my usual hour I went to bed. But my idea would not let me rest. I was forced to get up again. I struck a light, and worked at my model for three or four hours, after which I again went to bed. But again I could not rest; again I was forced to get up, and have been working ever since. O my friend, if I can but execute my idea, it will be a glorious statue." And a noble statue it is; although Thorwaldsen himself did not think that the execution came up to the idea. For I have heard of a remarkable speech of his, made some years after to another friend who found him one day in low spirits. Being asked whether anything had distressed him, he answered, "My genius is decaying." "What do you mean?" said the visitor. "Why! here is my statue of Christ: it is the first of my works that I have ever felt satisfied with. Till now, my idea has always been far beyond what I could execute. But it is no longer so, I shall never have a great idea again." The same, I believe, must have been the case with all men of true genius. While they who have nothing but talents may often be astonished at the effects they produce by putting things together, which fit more aptly than they expected, a man of genius, who has had an idea of a whole in his mind, will feel that no outward mode of expressing that idea, whether by form or color or words, is adequate to represent it.

Guesses of Truth.

6431. AIM, Want of. The French have recently published some statistics in regard to the recent war with Germany that are significant and instructive. They count now that during the war there came into France one million Germans, but there were only one hundred thousand Frenchmen killed; therefore, nine Germans in ten fired away for seven months and never hit any one, and the tenth fellow never fired but one effective shot. All this, too, in the age of needle-guns and most perfect military education!

W. F. Crafts.

6432. AIR, Benefits of. While the air of the atmosphere serves as the reservoir of that mass of water from whence clouds of rain, and consequently springs and rivers, are derived, at the same time it prevents, by the effect of its pressure on their surface, the unlimited evaporation and consequent exhaustion of the ocean, and other sources from whence that mass of water is supplied. And again, while the agitation of the air contributes to the health of man, by supplying those currents which remove or prevent the accumulation of local impurities, it, at the same time, facilitates that intercourse between different nations, in which the welfare of the whole world is ultimately concerned. And lastly, while in passing from the lungs in the act of expiration, it essentially forms the voice; it at the same time removes from the system that noxious principle, the retention of which would be incompatible with life.

Professor Kidd.

6433. ALARM, False. A shepherd boy, who tended his flock not far from a village, used to amuse himself at times in crying out, "Wolf! wolf!" Twice or thrice his trick succeeded. The whole village came running out to his assistance; when all the return they got was to be laughed at for their pains. At last one day the wolf came indeed. The boy cried out in earnest. But his neighbors, supposing him to be at his old sport, paid no heed to his cries, and the wolf devoured the sheep. So the boy learned, when it was too late, that liars are not believed even when they tell the truth.

6434. ALARM, A Sinner's. A preacher spoke of God's efforts to win man: first by wooing him, second by warning him. If these fail, the next voice may be that of the commissioned angel saying, "Come to judgment!" A soldier in the audience sprang to his feet in great excitement exclaiming, "Say not so—say not so—oh, stop." He had become alarmed at the prospect of meeting his own sins at the bar of the Omniscient Judge. The alarmed man explained that his mother's dying injunction was "Don't be a soldier." He disregarded her wish, and was led into gross sins. As he listened to the preacher, he heard his mother's voice saying, "Don't be a soldier." This, followed by the angel's call, "Come to judgment," so moved him that he could no longer keep silence.

6435. ALCOHOL, Effects of. It may seem strange, but it is nevertheless true, that alcohol, regularly applied to a thrifty farmer's stomach, will remove the boards from the fence, let cattle into his crops, kill his fruit trees, mortgage his farm, and sow his fields with wild oats and thistles. It will take the paint off his building, break the glass out of the windows and fill them with rags. It will take the gloss from his clothes and the polish from his manners, subdue his reason, arouse his passions, bring sorrow and disgrace upon his family, and topple him into a drunkard's grave. It will do this to the artisan and the capitalist, the matron and the maiden, as well as to the farmer; for, in its deadly enmity to the human race, alcohol is no respecter of persons.

Temperance Worker.

6436. ALCOHOL, Passion for. An old woman in London went into a dram-shop and called for a glass of gin, which she drank. She then drew a Bible from under her apron, saying she had no money, but would leave that in pledge, and redeem it in half an hour; she, however, never returned. A woman in Glasgow, in order to gratify her immoderate craving for ardent spirits, offered her own child for sale as a subject for dissection.

6437. ALLEGORIES, Advantage of. Allegories, when well chosen, are like so many tracks of light in a discourse, that make everything about them clear and beautiful.

Addison.

6438. ALLELUIA, Victory by. The ancient Britons, in the year 420, obtained a victory over an army of the Picts and Saxons, near Mold, in Flintshire. The Britons unarmed, having Germanus and Lupus at their head, when the Picts and Saxons came to the attack, the two commanders, Gideon-like, ordered their army to shout Alleluia three times over, at the sound of which the enemy, being suddenly struck with terror, ran away in the greatest confusion, and left the Britons masters of the field. A stone monument, to perpetuate the remembrance of this Halleluah victory, is said to remain to this day in a field near Mold.

6439. ALLOTMENT, God's. "Sir," said a boy, addressing a man, "do you want a boy to work for you?" "No," answered the man, "I have no such want." The boy looked disappointed,—at least the man thought so, and he asked, "Can't you succeed in getting a place?" "I have asked at a good many places," said the boy; "a woman told me you had been after a boy, but it is not so, I find." "Don't be discouraged," said the man in a friendly tone. "Oh no, sir," said the boy cheerfully, "I still hope on, because this is a very big world, and I feel certain God has something for me to do in it. I am only trying to find it." "Just so, just so," said a gentleman, who overheard the talk. "Come with me, my boy; I am in search of somebody like you." He was a doctor, and thought that a boy so anxious to find his work would be likely to do it faithfully when found. From that time the boy was in his place and his success was assured.

6440. ALLUREMENTS, Avoiding. When Araxes had commended the fair Panthea to Cyrus, as a beauty worth his admiration, he replied: "For that very reason I will not see her, lest if by thy persuasion I should see her but once, she herself might persuade me to see her often, and spend more time with her than would be for the advantage of my own affairs." So Alexander, upon like consideration, would not trust his eyes in the presence of the beautiful queen of Persia, but kept himself out of the reach of her charms, and treated only with her aged mother.

Plutarch.

6441. ALLUREMENTS, Fatal. Pliny tells us, that the mermaids delight to be in green meadows, into which they draw men by their enchanting voices; but, saith he, there always lie heaps of dead men's bones by them. A lively emblem of a bewitching world! Good had it been for many professors of religion, if they had never known what the riches, and honors, and pleasures of the world are.

John Flavel.

6442. ALLUREMENTS, Legend of. A story of the sixteenth century relates, that Leonard, the son of a tailor of Basle, Switzerland, one day entered a deep cave with a torch in his hand. He found an enchanted land. The queen of the place was a strange creature—a woman to the waist, and a snake below. She had wonderful fascination, and was said to be beautiful. On her head she wore a crown of gold. She entreated the young man to kiss her three times, and gave him gold and silver. He did so twice, but was filled with disgust at her writhing tail, and fled without giving her the third kiss. Ever after he prowled about the mountains, seeking the cave, having a constant desire for the society of the revolting creature. It was well for him that he was early frightened. Such is the fascination of evil over the hearts of men.

6443. ALMIGHTY, Shadow of the. Isaac Toms said, "I have heard of Dryden's contentment when sitting under the statue of Shakespeare; and that Buffon, the celebrated natural historian, felt himself happy at the feet of Sir Isaac Newton; but," pointing to a picture which hung over his desk, "here you find me under the shadow of good Richard Baxter. Yet, my dear, the most desirable situation in which we can be placed, is to be under the shadow of the Almighty—under the protection of the great Redeemer."

6444. ALTAR, Christ our. This brazen altar was a type of Christ dying to make atonement for our sins. The wood had been consumed by the fire from heaven, if it had not been secured by the brass; nor could the human nature of Christ have borne the wrath of God, if it had not been supported by a divine power. Christ sanctified himself for his Church, as their altar, John 17: 19; and by his mediation sanctifies the daily services of his people, who also have a right to eat of this altar, Heb. 13: 10; for they serve at it as spiritual priests. To the horns of this altar poor sinners fly for refuge when justice pursues them, and there they are safe in virtue of the sacrifice there offered.

M. Henry.

6445. ALTAR, Safety Only at the. Certain Athenian conspirators fled for their lives into the temple of Minerva, where they were safe so long as they remained. Megacles persuaded them to stand trial, but to retain their claim to the right of asylum by tying a string to the shrine of the goddess, and holding on to it. This they attempted to do, but as they were passing the temple of the Furies the thread broke. Thereby they lost their privilege, and the crowd rushed upon them, and stoned them or cut them to pieces. Thus perish those who maintain their connection with Christ, if at all, at the greatest possible distance from him, and by the smallest thread. There is safety only in close union with him.

6446. ALTARS, Jewish. They were, the one of gold, the other brazen. The brazen one stood in the outer court of the congregation. The other, the golden one, in the holy place, where none but the priests might enter. The outer court, with its brazen altar and laver, represents the earth and the work which is done in it to God-ward. The holy place, with the golden altar for incense, shows us the heavenly places and their appointed service. On the brazen altar were offered the sacrifices of Israel. Any Israelite, if clean, might draw nigh and offer there. But priests only might approach the golden altar, and nothing came on it except the perfumed incense. The position and use of these altars, and the references to them in the New Testament, unite to point out their typical meaning; the one leading us to the service of the church as on earth, the other to their service as priests in heavenly places. As to the sprinkling of blood, I need scarcely say it always refers to atonement by sacrifice: it signifies that the thing or person sprinkled is thereby brought from a state of distance from God to a state of nearness. The sprinkling of blood upon the incense altar implied that until this act was performed the altar was unapproachable; and, consequently, that all priestly service, and, therefore, all service of all kinds was stopped between God and Israel. In like manner, the sprinkling of blood on the brazen altar implied that till this was done that altar, too, was regarded as unapproachable. In each case sin is apprehended to have interrupted communion; in the one, the communion of priests; in the other that of Israel; while the sprinkling of blood declares that communion restored through the sin-offering, on the incense altar, to the priests, on the brazen altar to Israel. A. Jukes.

6447. AMBITION, Carnal. Ambition was one of the first temptations that assailed and overcame our first parents—"Ye shall be as gods." Ambition will be one of the most striking features that will mark the character of Antichrist, 2 Thess. 2: 4; Dan. 7: 25; 11: 36; Rev. 13: 5, 6. The disciples of Christ. It is surprising how repeatedly the disciples were guilty of this sin, and at times when it might have least been looked for. Luke 9: 46-48.—Just after Christ's transfiguration, which three of them had beheld, and of which the rest were most probably cognizant (as is probable from Mark 9: 15). Matt. 18: 1-6.—When the Lord a second time set a little child in the midst of them. Matt. 19: 27.—After the unadvised inquiry of Peter, not unmixed with ambition, for himself and his fellow apostles. Matt. 20: 20-28.—When James and John came, through their mother, with their bold request; and were justly reprov'd for their ambition and self-confidence. Luke 22: 24-27.—Before, or, according to others, just after the institution of the Lord's Supper. Jotham's parable, Judges 9: 8-15.—The most aspiring are frequently the most contemptible. Bowes.

6448. AMBITION, Christian. It is remarkable that the Greek word which corresponds to our word ambition occurs only three times in the New Testament. Our translators seem to have shrunk from expressing the full meaning, and render it by the three words, studying—striving—laboring. Thus St. Paul speaks of it as a holy ambition—1 Thess. 4: 11—to "study to be quiet." It might almost be rendered—to be ambitious to be unambitious. Rom. 15: 20.—To carry the gospel where no other laborer had carried it. In this he strove. He was ambitious of it. 2 Cor. 5: 9.—Whether present (in the body) or absent, to be accepted of Christ. Bowes.

6449. AMBITION, Conquered. Henry Martin, the saintly missionary, during his college life was very ambitious, and used every effort, never losing an hour, to gain all the honors possible for himself. He won them, but found them empty. His worldly prospects were bright, and his ambition for fame would doubtless have been realized. Grace came into his heart. He began to live for Christ, and not for self. He sacrificed self, home, friends, worldly prospects and life for the cause of the lost. He was as ambitious of his Master's honor as he had before been for himself.

6450. AMBITION, Defeat of. When Napoleon returned to his palace, immediately after his defeat at Waterloo, he continued many hours without any refreshment. One of the grooms of the chamber ventured to serve up some coffee in his cabinet by the hands of a child whom Napoleon had occasionally distinguished by his notice. The emperor sat motionless, with his hand spread over his eyes. The page stood patiently before him, gazing with infantine curiosity on the image which presented so strong a contrast to his own figure of simplicity and peace; at last the little attendant presented his tray, exclaiming, in the familiarity of an age which knows so little distinction, "Eat, sire; it will do you good." The emperor looked at him and asked, "Do you not belong to Gonesse?" (a village near Paris.) "No, sire, I come from Pierrefite." "Where your parents have a cottage and some acres of land?" "Yes, sire." "There is happiness," replied the defeated Emperor of France and King of Italy.

6451. AMBITION, Disappointed. I cannot more fitly resemble an ambitious man, than to one that should have a fancy to take a journey eastward, to the place where the sun seems in rising to touch and to be joined to the earth, in hope to arrive within reach of the same, always going forward, but not coming nearer to his desire; still progressive, never at an end, being impossible to finish it; but the further that he goes, the more earnest he is, and impatient of protraction and delays. So that I may conclude such natures to be punished with Tantalus' torture, of whom it is said, that which he desired ever seemed to be near him, yet never within his command.

Anon.

6452. AMBITION. Dream of. Napoleon I., referring to the siege of Acre, said: "I see that this paltry town has cost me many men, and occupies much time: but things have gone too far not to risk a last effort. If we succeed, it is to be hoped we shall find in that place the treasures of the pasha, and arms for three hundred thousand men. I will raise and arm the whole of Syria, which is already greatly exasperated by the cruelty of Djezzar, for whose fall you have seen the people supplicate Heaven at every assault. I advance upon Damascus and Aleppo; I recruit my army by marching into every country where discontent prevails; I announce to the people the abolition of slavery, and of the tyrannical government of the pashas; I arrive at Constantinople with armed masses; I overturn the dominion of the Mussulman; I found in the East a new and mighty empire, which shall fix my position with posterity; and perhaps I return to Paris by Adrianople or Vienna, having annihilated the house of Austria."

6453. AMBITION. End of. Alexander, journeying through a dreary desert, came to a small rivulet. In its unruffled peacefulness it seemed to say, "This is the abode of tranquillity. Come and partake of nature's bounty!" To a contemplative mind such a scene might have suggested a thousand delightful reflections; but to Alexander, whose breast was filled with schemes of ambition and conquest, it had no charms. Onward, therefore, he marched. Overcome by fatigue and hunger, he was, however, obliged to rest. He seated himself on the banks of the river, took a draught of water, which he found very refreshing, and of a very fine flavor. He then ordered some salt fish. These he dipped in the stream, in order to take off the briny taste, and was surprised to find them emit a fine fragrance. "Surely," said he, "this river, which possesses such uncommon qualities, must flow from some rich and happy country. Let us march thither." Following the course of the river, he at length arrived at the gate of Paradise. The gates were shut. He knocked, and with his usual impetuosity demanded admittance. "Thou canst not be admitted here," exclaimed a voice within; "this gate is the Lord's." "I am the lord, the lord of the earth," rejoined the impatient chief; "I am Alexander the Conqueror! will you not admit me?" "No," was the answer, "here we know of no conquerors, save such as conquer their passions; none but the just can enter here." Alexander attempted in vain to enter the abode of the blessed; neither entreaties nor menaces availed. Seeing all his attempts fruitless, he addressed himself to the guardian of paradise, and said: "You know I am a great king, a person who received the homage of nations. Since you will not admit me, give me at least something, that I may show an astonished and admiring world that I have been where no mortal has ever been before me." "Here, madman," said the guardian of paradise, "here is something for thee: it may cure the maladies of thy distempered soul; one glance at it may teach you more wisdom than thou hast hitherto derived from all thy former instructors. Now go thy ways." Alexander took it with avidity, and repaired to his tent. But what was his confusion and surprise to find, on examining the received present, that it was nothing but the fragment of a human skull! "And is this," exclaimed Alexander, "the mighty gift that they bestow on kings and heroes? is this the fruit of so much toil, danger, and care?" Enraged and disappointed, he threw it on the ground. "Great king," said a learned man who happened to be present, "do not despise this gift. Despicable as it appears in thine eyes, it yet possesses some extraordinary qualities, of which thou mayest soon be convinced if thou wilt order it to be weighed against gold and silver." Alexander ordered it to be done. A pair of scales were brought: the skull was placed in one, a quantity of gold in the other; when, to the astonishment of the beholders, the skull overbalanced the gold. More gold was added, still the skull preponderated. In short, the more gold there was put in the one scale, the lower sunk that which contained the skull. "Strange," exclaimed Alexander, "that so small a portion of matter should outweigh so large a mass of gold! Is there nothing that will counterpoise it?" "Yes," answered the philosophers, "a very little matter will do it." They then took some earth, covered the skull with it, when immediately down went the gold and the opposite scale ascended. "This is very extraordinary!" said Alexander, astonished: "can you explain this strange phenomenon?" "Great king," said the sages, "this fragment is the socket of a human eye, which, though small in compass, is yet unbounded in its desire. The more it has, the more it craves. Neither gold nor silver nor any other earthly possession can ever satisfy it. But when it once is laid in the grave, and covered with a little earth, there is an end to its lust and ambition."

Hurwitz.

6454. AMBITION to be First. Cæsar was passing through a little town among the Alps attended by his officers, when one of them said he wondered whether there were any contentions for office in that place. Cæsar replied, "I had rather be the first in this town than second in Rome."

6455. AMBITION. Fruitless. Demarethus, a proud Lacedæmonian, was granted the privilege of asking any favor he pleased. He asked to be escorted through Sardis, crowned as a king. One of the courtiers answered him, "Demaretus, this diadem does not carry brains along with it; nor would you be Jupiter though you should take hold of his thunder."

6456. AMBITION, Insatiable. Ambition is like the sea which swallows all the rivers and is none the fuller; or like the grave whose insatiable maw forever craves for the bodies of men. It is not like an amphora, which being full receives no more; but its fullness swells it till a still greater vacuum is formed. In all probability, Napoleon never longed for a sceptre till he had gained the bâton, nor dreamed of being emperor of Europe till he had gained the crown of France. Caligula, with the world at his feet, was mad with a longing for the moon, and could he have gained it the imperial lunatic would have coveted the sun. It is in vain to feed a fire which grows the more voracious the more it is supplied with fuel; he who lives to satisfy his ambition has before him the labor of Sisyphus, who rolled up hill an ever-rebounding stone, and the task of the daughters of Danaus, who are condemned forever to attempt to fill a bottomless vessel with buckets full of holes. Could we know the secret heart-breaks and wearinesses of ambitious men, we should need no Wolsey's voice crying, "I charge thee, fling away ambition," but we should flee from it as from the most accursed blood-sucking vampire which ever uprose from the caverns of hell.

Spurgeon.
6457. AMBITION, Little Field of. Seneca, after contemplating the beauty and greatness of the heavenly orbs, cast his eyes to the earth, exclaiming, "Is it this to which the great designs and vast desires of men are confined? Is it for this there is such disturbance of nations, wars, and shedding of blood? O folly, O fury of deceived men! to imagine great kingdoms in the compass of an atom, to raise armies, to divide a point of the earth with their sword! It is just as if the ants should conceive a field to be several kingdoms, and fiercely contend to enlarge their borders, and celebrate a triumph in gaining a foot of earth."

6458. AMBITION, Meanness of. Ambition, that high and glorious passion, which makes such havoc among the sons of men, arises from a proud desire of honor and distinction, and, when the splendid trappings in which it is usually caparisoned are removed, will be found to consist of the mean materials of envy, pride, and covetousness. It is described by different authors as a gallant madness, a pleasant poison, a hidden plague, a secret poison, a caustic of the soul, the moth of holiness, the mother of hypocrisy, and, by crucifying and disquieting all it takes hold of, the cause of melancholy and madness.

Burton.
6459. AMBITION, Political. Solon, the Athenian lawgiver, said of Pisistratus, that if he could but pluck out of his head the worm, ambition, and heal him of his greedy desire to rule, that then there could not be a man of more virtue than he.

6460. AMBITION, Tricks of. Ambition, a good enough thing within reasonable bounds, is a very Apollyon among men, when it gets the mastery over them. Have you ever seen boys climbing a greasy pole to reach a hat or a handkerchief? If so, you will have noticed that the aspiring youths for the most part adopt plans and tricks quite as slimy as the pole; one covers his hands with sand, another twists a knotted cord, and scarcely one climbs fairly, and he is the one boy whose chance is smallest. How plainly see we the politician's course in these young rascals; the Right Honorable Member for the town of Corruption vies with the equally Right Honorable Representative for the county of Bribery; the most noble Conservative place-hunter will not be outdone by the Liberal office-lover; a man must have done a world of planing and shaving, chopping and chiseling, before he can reach the Treasury Bench. Nor less so is it in the path of trade. Small dealers and great contractors eager to rise, are each in their measure to Satan what a covey of partridges are to a sportsman,—fair game if he can but reach them. Spurgeon.

6461. AMBITION, Unhappiness of. Ambition is a gilded misery, a secret poison, a hidden plague, the engineer of deceit, the mother of hypocrisy, the parent of envy, the original of vices, the moth of holiness, the blinder of hearts, turning medicines into maladies, and remedies into diseases. High seats are never but uneasy, and crowns are always stuffed with thorns.

T. Brooks.

6462. AMBITION, Youthful. A renowned teacher was accosted by a new student, and the following colloquy took place. "My parents have just given me leave to study the law, which is the thing I have been wishing for all my life, and I have now come to this University on account of its great fame, and mean to spare no pains in mastering the subject." The professor said: "Well, and when you have got through your course of studies—what then?" "Then I shall take my doctor's degree." "And then?" answered the doctor. "And then," continued the youth, "I shall have a number of difficult cases to manage, which will increase my fame, and I shall gain a great reputation." "And then?" repeated the man. "Why, then, there cannot be a question, I shall be promoted to some high office or other; besides, I shall make money, and grow rich." "And then?" the holy man interposed. "And then," replied the youth, "I shall live in honor and dignity, and be able to look forward to a happy old age." "And then?" was again asked. "And then—and then," said the youth, "I shall die." Here the holy man again inquired, "And then?" The young man could answer no more, but went away sorrowful.

6463. AMENDMENT, Real. Place not thy amendment only in increasing thy devotion, but in bettering thy life. This is the damning hypocrisy of this age: that it slights all good morality, and spends its zeal in matters of ceremony, and a form of godliness without the power of it.

Fuller.

6464. AMERICA, Future of. Agassiz says the American Continent was the first created; it will be the last in the fulfilment of the designs of the Creator. A cosmopolitan land—cosmopolitan in the intentions of its founders, in the bloody struggle of its defenders—God has in store for you who people it the accomplishment of admirable results. Northward are the Esquimaux; southward is Africa. You summon from walled China the unmoving people to dwell amid the moving nation, the stationary to mingle with the progressive; all impelled by the breath of you, the great humanitarian people. The foundation of your people is the Bible, the book that speaks of God, the living word of Jesus Christ. In an admirable manifesto from your President there shines through his words the Christian faith. A belief in Jesus is at the root of this nation; and when I return I shall tell Europe that I have found here liberty associated with Christianity, and have been among a people who do not think that to be free they must be parted from God.

Hyacinthe.

6465. AMEN, Legend of. One Easter Eve, St. Lietbert visited the chapel of the Holy Sepulchre in Combrai, adjoining which was a large graveyard. The moon shone over the scene. It was the night during which Christ's body lay in the tomb. St. Lietbert thought of the dead whose bones lay under the mold of the graveyard outside and under the flagstones of the church on which he stood. He poured out a solemn and earnest prayer for them, and at its end there came up a chorus of Amens from the tombs and graves.

6466. AMEN, Use of. This is a Hebrew word, properly signifying "firmness," and hence "truth," which has been adopted without alteration in various languages. In many churches of England, the word Amen is pronounced aloud by the people: this was the ancient practice of the Christian world, and St. Jerome relates that when the congregated people of Rome pronounced Amen, the sound was like a clap of thunder. They probably attributed great efficacy to the loudness of their voices, after the example of the Jews, who imagined that this word, shouted forth with great force, had power to open the gates of heaven.

6467. AMUSEMENTS, Charm of. The ill-fated Maximilian of Mexico, a man of gentle disposition, gives his emotions on attending a bull-fight. "On entering I felt uneasy and uncomfortable, and now a mania for the bloody spectacle possessed me. I could not turn my eyes away; each moment of the fight enchained me with irresistible force. The excitement produced by the sight of danger carries every mind away along the stream of enthusiasm. I was told of a stranger who expressed himself strongly as to the barbarism of this festival. His tender feelings made him abhor what he had not seen. A friend who knew from experience the charm of this pleasure, induced him, though filled with abhorrence, to visit the Corrida. At the sight of the combat he was seized with the wild intoxication, and eagerly asked his friend when the next bull-fight would take place." Similar was the effect of the old gladiatorial shows upon the spectators. See Vol. I., No. 195. The devotee of the theatre is similarly infatuated. Everything will be sacrificed to gratify the passion. All habitual pleasures seem to bind their votaries with chains of steel.

6468. AMUSEMENTS, Demoralizing. It is said that when Bonaparte put the Duke d'Enghien to death, all Paris felt so much horror at the event that the throne of the tyrant trembled under him. A counter revolution was expected, and would most probably have taken place, had not Bonaparte ordered a new ballet to be brought out, with the utmost splendor, at the Opera. The subject he pitched on was "Ossian, or the Bards." It is still recollected in Paris, as perhaps the grandest spectacle that had ever been exhibited there. The consequence was that the murder of the Duke d'Enghien was totally forgotten, and nothing but the new ballet was talked of. So Satan distracts the thoughts of men, drives away their moral convictions and binds their souls with the chains of pleasure for the fires of eternal wrath.

6469. AMUSEMENTS, Destructive. A troop of boys were playing at the edge of a pond, when, perceiving a number of frogs in the water, they began to pelt at them with stones. They had already killed many of the poor creatures, when one more hardy than the rest, putting his head above the water, cried out to them: "Stop your cruel sport, my lads; consider, what is play to you is death to us."

Æsop.

6470. AMUSEMENTS, Love of. Plato and Aristotle were not always seen in their long robes, dignified and serious. No, they were good natured fellows, who enjoyed a laugh with their friends like the rest of the world, and who loved and hoped, and listened to a good story with as much zest as the least learned. None ever decry play and fun but those who are strangers to their value. The love of them is one of the signs of a great nature. All true genius is, in its very essence, a joyous faculty; "wit" originally signifies the very highest efforts of mind. It is only by looking around, as well as upwards, that a large and just conception of life is attainable, and therefore that life is truly realized. A mind charged with vitality, and sustained by trust in God, will not only look cheerfully to the goal of its pilgrimage, but have ample stores of gladness to expend upon the journey.

Grindon.

6471. AMUSEMENTS, Need of. Though recreation, with science and literature, be the most solid and unfailing kind of play, it is not the only kind we need. With all his care, and toil, and penury of time, the man who devotes himself to learning, or science, or business, is no gainer in the end, if he do not take part sometimes in lively entertainments. For a while he may seem to suffer nothing; but the belief of his being able to dispense with such playing is only a delusion; there is a heavy reckoning going on against him, which sooner or later will have to be paid in suffering and premature exhaustion. Work and play are reciprocally advantageous. While without due play there is no effective working, on the other hand, in order to play heartily with the body, we must learn how to play heartily, in privacy, with the soul. No man thoroughly enjoys play, or knows what play really is, who cannot spend hours of solitude in comfort. Grindon.

6472. AMUSEMENTS, Rule for. "He that is not satisfied," says Bishop Wilson, "that plays are an unlawful diversion, let him, if he dare, offer up this prayer to God, before he goes, 'Lord, lead me not into temptation, and bless me in what I am now to be employed.' There are many other occupations and amusements, in which the same rule will apply.

6473. ANATHEMA, Effect of the. Rev. John Flavel, at Dartmouth, England, preached from these words, "If any man love not the Lord Jesus Christ, let him be Anathema Maran-atha." The discourse was unusually solemn, particularly the explanation of the words Anathema Maran-atha,—“cursed with a curse, cursed of God with a bitter and grievous curse.” At the conclusion of the service, when Flavel arose to pronounce the benediction, he paused and said, "How shall I bless this whole assembly, when every person in it who loveth not the Lord Jesus Christ is Anathema Maran-atha?" The solemnity of this address deeply affected the audience, and one gentleman was so overcome by his feelings that he fell senseless to the floor. In the congregation was a lad named Luke Short, then about fifteen years old, and a native of Dartmouth. Shortly after the event just narrated he entered into the seafaring line, and sailed to America, where he passed the rest of his life. Short's existence was lengthened much beyond the usual term. When a hundred years old, he had sufficient strength to work on his farm, and his mental faculties were very little impaired. Hitherto he had lived in carelessness and sin; he was now a "sinner a hundred years old," and apparently ready to "die accursed." But one day, as he sat in his field, he busied himself in reflecting on his past life. Recurring to the events of his youth, his memory fixed upon Flavel's discourse above alluded to, a considerable part of which he was able to recollect. The blessing of God accompanied his meditations; conviction was followed by repentance, and this aged sinner obtained peace.

6474. ANCESTORS, Boasting of. The man who has nothing to boast of but his illustrious ancestors is like a potato; the only good belonging to him is under ground. Overbury.

6475. ANCESTRY, Noble. Hermodius, the descendant of an ancient family of that name, railed at Iphrebrates, the son of a shoemaker, on account of his mean birth. That famous general replied, "My nobility begins in me, but yours ends in you."

6476. ANCESTRY, Pride of. A Lydian mule, viewing his own picture in a river, and admiring the bigness and beauty of his body, raises his crest; he waxes proud, resolving to imitate the horse in his gait and running; but presently, recollecting his extraction, how his father was but an ass at best, he stops his career and checks his own haughtiness and bravery. Æscop.

6477. ANCESTRY, Religious. Through my ancestors, so far I can trace them, I can claim to be the seed of the righteous:—a higher honor than the "blue blood" some boast of, though why noble blood should be called "blue," which is venous and polluted blood, I have yet to learn.

Dr. Guthrie.
6478. ANCHOR, Christ the. A dying sailor said, "I now take my cable, and fix it on my anchor, Jesus, and go through the storm."

6479. ANCHOR, Christian's. The iron anchor of the seaman is cast downwards into the deep of the sea; but the hope anchor of the Christian is thrown upward into the deep of heaven, and, passing through the super-celestial waters, finds its ground and fathoming there. Delitzsch.

6480. ANCHOR, Parable of the. On the margin of the ocean that surrounds and laves our island home, an object of absorbing interest may often be observed,—a ship riding at anchor near a lee shore in an angry sea. She has drifted, ere she was aware, too near a rockbound coast; the wind is blowing direct on shore; there is not room to tack; whether she should point her prow north or south, she will strike a projecting headland ere she can escape from the bay. One resource remains,—to anchor where she is till the wind change. There she lies. Stand on this height and look down upon her through the drifting spray. I scarcely know in nature a more interesting or suggestive sight. The ship is dancing on the waves; she appears to be in their power and at their mercy. Wind and water combine to make her their sport. Destruction seems near; for if the vessel's hull is dashed by these waves upon the rocks of the coast, it will be broken into a thousand pieces. But you have stood and looked on the scene a while, and the ship still holds her own. Although at first sight she seemed the helpless plaything of the elements, they have not overcome—they have not gained upon her yet. She is no nearer destruction than when you first began to gaze in anticipation of her fate. The ship seems to have no power to resist the onset of wind and wave. She yields to every blast and every billow. This moment she is tossed aloft on the crest of a wave, and the next she sinks heavily into the hollow. Now her prow goes down beneath an advancing breaker, and she is lost to view in the spray; but anon she emerges, like a sea-fowl shaking the water from her wings and rejoicing in the tumult. As she quivered and nodded giddily at each assault, you thought, when first you arrived in sight, that every moment would prove her last; but now that you have watched the conflict long, it begins to assume in your mind another aspect, and promise another end. These motions of the ship now, instead of appearing the sickly movements of the dying, seem to indicate the calm, confident perseverance of conscious strength and expected victory. Let winds and waves do their worst, that ship will meet them fearless, will hold her head to the blast, and maintain her place in defiance of their power. What is the secret of that ship's safety? No other ship is in sight to which she may cling; no pillar stands within reach to which she may be moored. The bond of her security is a line that is unseen. The ship is at anchor. The line on which she hangs does not depend on the waters, or anything that floats there; it goes through the waters, and fastens on a sure ground beyond them. The soul, considered as a passenger on the treacherous sea of Time, needs an anchor; and an anchor "sure and steadfast" is provided for the needy soul.

William Arnot.

6481. ANCHOR, Safe. A ship was overtaken by a fearful storm in a dangerous sea. The rudder had no power to direct the course of the vessel, and the wind drove her swiftly toward a rocky shore. An anchor was thrown out to stop the ship, but it did not hold. The steersman forsook the helm and ran about crying "O God, we are all lost—have mercy upon us!" Terror reigned. At this juncture, when total wreck seemed inevitable, the crew threw out another anchor which took firm hold of a rock beneath the raging waves, and at once checked the ship. The helmsman resumed his place and cried, "Thank God, we are all safe!" The passengers and crew joined in the chorus, "Thank God! Thank God!" The ship wore round and soon sailed away. O ye voyagers on life's sea, who know yourselves to be drifting upon a lee shore, your only safety lies in fixing the anchor of your hope in the Rock of Ages.

6482. ANCHOR, The Tested. In modern practice great importance attaches to the trying of an anchor. Many ships have been lost through accident or fraud in the manufacture. The instrument had a good appearance, but there was a flaw in its heart; and when the strain came, it snapped, and all was lost. For the security of the subject, the Government has erected an apparatus for testing anchors; and the royal seal is stamped on those that have been approved. When the merchantman purchases an anchor so certified, he has confidence that it will not fail him in his need. It is interesting, and even solemn work, to test anchors, and stamp them as approved. Beware! set not the seal on one that is doubtful, for many precious lives will yet be intrusted to its keeping. He who is now the anchor of the soul within the veil, was "made perfect through suffering."

William Arnot.

6483. ANECDOTES, Advantage of. The advantages of embodying in pictures of real life, the practical lessons of the Word of God, have long been apparent; and the writer can, to a great extent, corroborate, from his own experience, the opinion given by the late Rev. Richard Cecil, when he says that "stories fix children's attention." "The moment I begin," he adds, "to talk in anything like an abstract manner, the attention subsides. The simplest manner in the world will not make way to children's minds for abstract truths. With stories, I find, I could rivet their attention for two or three hours."

J. G. Wilson.

6484. ANECDOTES, How to use. To make illustrations tell it is needful to introduce them seasonably as well as sparingly, and always in subordination to the best and most important of all such matter—the facts of Holy Scripture. To repeat or read anecdotes indiscriminately, will assuredly fail of either arresting attention or conveying instruction. They must only be introduced, to illustrate some weighty point of indoctrination: to use them otherwise, would be like making "a dinner of the spices which are designed as a seasoning to the meat."

J. G. Wilson.

6485. ANECDOTES, Pleasure from. Those to whom any anecdote is old, will not be offended if it be well applied; and those to whom it may be new, will receive the double pleasure of novelty and illustration.

Colton.

6486. ANECDOTES, Using. Bede, Damiani, Ethelred, Thomas à Kempis, Vieyra, Segneri, Latimer, Whitefield, and many other popular preachers, were wont to tell anecdotes in their sermons, with good success. Only let them be told in the terse, lively, and pointed style which characterizes our Lord's parables, and faulty indeed must be the preacher's general diction, if they do not increase rather than diminish its vivacity and grace.

G. W. Hervey.

6387. ANGELS, Assistance of. Mohammed claims that his first battle with infidels, and signal victory, was a miracle. He threw a handful of gravel at the enemy with an imprecation at which they were filled with fear. They saw more fighting men than Mohammed had. It is said that Gabriel came to their assistance mounted upon his horse Hiazum, and attended by three thousand angels. These did the execution, though Mohammed's men fought stoutly, and imagined that they had won the victory.

6488. ANGELS, Attendant. Timothy, a preacher of Reims, near the close of the third century, was accused as a Christian before Lompadius, the governor, condemned to be beaten, and then rubbed with quicklime and vinegar. Among the crowd looking on was Apollinaris, and he saw two angels standing by, and supporting the martyr. Angels comforted the Master in his agony in the garden, and shall they not also comfort his faithful disciples? Then Apollinaris burst through the ring into the space where the martyr stood, surrounded by the rack and a fire of coals, and fell at his feet, and said: "Good Timothy, pray for me. I saw two in shining garments comforting thee. Gladly will I also die for the name of Christ." Then he was seized, and, by the order of the governor, boiling lead was poured into his mouth to silence his tongue. On the morrow, after a night in the prison, they were led outside of the city and executed with the sword.

6489. ANGELS, Charge of. One day a little boy asked his mother to let him lead his little sister out on the green grass. She had just begun to run alone, and could not step over anything that lay in the way. His mother told him that he might lead out the little girl, but charged him not to let her fall. I found them at play, very happy, in the field. I said, "You seem to be very happy, George. Is this your sister?" "Yes, sir." "Can she walk alone?" "Yes, sir, on smooth ground." "And how did she walk over these stones which lie between us and the house?" "O, sir, mother charged me to be careful that she did not fall, and so I put my hands under her arms, and lifted her up when she came to a stone, so that she need not hit her little foot against it." "That is right, George; and I want to tell you one thing. You see now how to understand that beautiful text, 'He shall give his angels charge concerning thee; and in their hands they shall bear thee up, lest at any time thou dash thy foot against a stone.' God charges his angels to lead and lift his people over difficulties, just as you have lifted little Annie over these stones. Do you understand it now?"

Anon.

6490. ANGELS, Doctrine of. The early Christians, as well as the Jews, held this belief in angels good and bad—the good our helpers, the bad our enemies and opposers. October 2d is the festival of the Angel Guardians in the Roman Church. Alban Butler says, "That particular angels are appointed and commanded by God to guard and watch over each particular person among his servants is an article of the Catholic faith, of which no ecclesiastical writer within the pale of the church in any age ever entertained the least doubt. That every man, even among sinners and infidels, has a guardian angel, is the doctrine of the most eminent among the fathers." This explains Peter's appearance after his deliverance from prison, when some said, "It is his angel."

6491. ANGELS, Nature of. Angels are spirits immaterial and intellectual, the glorious inhabitants of those sacred palaces where there is nothing but light and immortality; no shadow of matter for tears, discontentments, griefs, and uncomfortable passions to work upon; but all joy, tranquility, and peace, even forever and forever, do dwell. Hooker.

6493. ANGELS, Visits of. When angels have come, they have spoken to a patriarch in the door of his tent—to a distressed husbandman threshing his wheat under an oak—to persecuted apostles in prison. But can you think of an instance of divine or angelic visitation to a king on his throne—to a noble in his palace—to a rich man surrounded with splendors—to a sage amid his books? An angel once came to a seer who was trusting to his own wisdom, and trying hard to outwit omniscience; but it was with a drawn sword; and the far-seeing prophet or necromancer owed his salvation to an ass! An angel once came to a king on a throne; but it was to smite him with worms, so that he gave up the ghost.

Dr. Raleigh.

6494. ANGELS, Witnesses. In every apartment, in every closet, in every corner, pay a respect to your angel. Dare not do before him what you dare not do before others. Consider with how great respect, awe, and modesty, we ought to behave in the sight of the angels, lest we offend their holy eyes, and render ourselves unworthy of their company. Woe to us if they who could chase away our enemy be offended by our negligence, and deprive us of their visit. We must shun what grieves them, and practice that which gives them delight; as temperance, chastity, voluntary poverty, prayer with fervor and tears. Above all things, the angels of peace expect in us unity and peace. Should not they be most delighted with that in us which represents the form of their own holy city, that they may admire a new Jerusalem or heaven on earth? On the contrary, nothing provokes them so much as scandals and dissensions, if they discern any in us.

St. Bernard.

6495. ANGELS, Works of. A wicked angel came to Eve, in order that through her man might be separated from God. A good angel came to Mary, that through her God might be united to man.

Fulgentius.

6496. ANGER, Beholding one's. Had I a careful and pleasant companion, that should show me my angry face in a glass, I should not at all take it ill. Some are wont to have a looking-glass held to them while they wash, though to little purpose; but to behold a man's self so unnaturally disguised and disordered, will conduce not a little to the impeachment of anger.

Plutarch.

6497. ANGER, Benefit of. The only account we have of any good done by anger was in the case of Mucius Portia, who from his birth had an impediment in his speech. It was with great difficulty he spoke, until being overcome with extreme passion, he was so moved, and labored with such earnestness to speak, that forever after he spoke with great freedom.

6498. ANGER, Cessation of. John, Patriarch of Alexandria, had a controversy with Nicetas, a chief man of that city, which was to be decided in a court of justice. John defended the cause of the poor, and Nicetas refused to part with his money. A private meeting was held, to see if the affair could be adjusted, but in vain; angry words prevailed, and both parties were so obstinate that they separated more offended with each other than before. When Nicetas was gone, John began to reflect on his own pertinacity, and although his cause was good, "Yet," said he, "can I think that God will be pleased with this anger and stubbornness? The night draweth on, and shall I suffer the sun to go down upon my wrath? This is impious, and opposed to the Apostle's advice." He therefore sent some friends to Nicetas, and charged them to deliver this message to him, and no more: "O sir, the sun is going down!" Nicetas was much affected, his eyes were filled with tears; he hastened to the Patriarch, and saluting him in the most gentle manner, exclaimed, "Father, I will be ruled by you in this or any other matter." They embraced each other and settled the dispute instantly.

6499. ANGER, Cure of. The celebrated preacher and theologian, Dr. Hopkins, was afflicted with a very ungovernable temper. He had a brother-in-law, a member of the legal profession, who was an infidel. This man was accustomed to say to his family, "Dr. Hopkins is, at heart, no better than I am, and I will prove it to you some day." One evening Dr. Hopkins called upon his brother-in-law to adjust some business matters in which they were mutually concerned. The infidel knowing well the weak point in the Doctor's character, set up the most unjust claims for the purpose of exciting his anger. The attempt was a success. Dr. Hopkins left the house in a rage, closing the door behind him with much violence. "There!" exclaimed the infidel to his family, "you see now the truth of what I have told you, that Dr. Hopkins is, at heart, no better than I am; and now I have got my foot on his neck and I will keep it there." Dr. Hopkins, however, went immediately home to his closet, and spent the entire night there in prayer to God. As the morning dawned, an ineffable peace pervaded his whole being. Hastening to his brother-in-law's residence, he confessed with tears, to him and his family, the sin which he had committed in their presence, not saying one word about the graceless provocation which had occasioned the sin. As the man of God retired from the house, the infidel said within himself, "There is a spirit in my brother-in-law which I do not possess, and that spirit is undeniably divine." Thus convicted, he renounced his infidel principles, became a Christian, and ultimately a preacher of the gospel which he had once despised. Thirty years afterwards, Dr. Hopkins stated that since that memorable night no temptation or provocation that he had received had ever once stirred a motion of that evil temper within him.

Dr. A. Mahan.

6500. ANGER, Deaths from. Matthias Corvinus, king of Hungary, inquired for some fresh figs from Italy, for a second course. Finding they were already eaten up by his courtiers, he fell into such a passion as to bring on apoplexy, from which he died the day following. Victor Pisanus, a Venetian admiral, famous for his exploits, understanding that his vice-admiral, through cowardice, had suffered ten ships of the Genoese to escape out of the Sipontine haven, went into such a passion as to bring on a fever of which he died.

6501. ANGER, Effects of. Angry and choleric men are as ungrateful and unsociable as thunder and lightning; being in themselves all storm and tempest; but quiet and easy natures are like fair weather, welcome to all.

Ciarendon.

6502. ANGER, Folly of. Sinbad the Sailor, tells of being once on an island, half-famished with hunger, while overhead hung delicious cocoa-nuts, quite out of reach. In the branches were many chattering monkeys. So the sailors threw sticks and stones at them until they grew very angry. In return they pelted their enemies with cocoa-nuts with the greatest fury. The sailors kept up the war, in high spirits, until their wants were well supplied. By yielding to anger we always give the enemy the advantage and expose our own weakness.

6503. ANGER of God. Anger, we know, is the whetstone of strength; in an equality of other terms, it will make a man prevail. Nothing is able to stand before a fire which is once enraged. Now God's displeasure is kindled, and breaketh forth into a flame, against the sins of men; like a devouring lion, or a be-reaved bear, like the implacable rage of a jealous man; so doth the fire of the Lord's revenge break forth upon the enemies of His Son. Add hereunto our disposition and preparedness for the wrath of God. Strength itself may be tired out in vain upon a subject which is incapable of any injury therefrom. But if the paw of a bear meet with so thin a substance as the caul of a man's heart, how easily is it torn to pieces! Every action is then most speedily finished, when the subject on which it works is thereunto prepared. Far easier is it to make a print in wax than in an adamant; to kindle a fire in dry stubble than in green wood. Now, wicked men have fitted themselves for wrath, and are the procurers and artificers of their own destruction. They are vessels; and God is never without treasures of wrath; so that the confusion of a wicked man is but like the drawing of water out of a fountain, or the filling of a bag out of a heap of treasure.

Bishop Reynolds.

6504. ANGER, Heathen Treatment of. To cure anger the Grecian philosophers prescribe reason, but anger dethrones reason. Fundanus, in Plutarch, says it has been quieted by sprinkling cold water on its subject. Aristotle says it is extinguished by putting one into a fright. Homer says it is dissipated by sudden surprise or joy. A scoff, a jest, a laugh frequently drove it away. Fundanus' first rule is to give it no expression by action or words. Second, see how other men disgrace themselves by anger. Third, cultivate mildness and gentleness of manner and speech, just the opposite of what is felt at such a time.

6505. ANGER, Inconsistent with Devotion. EPHESIANS 4:26. "Let not the sun go down upon your wrath," we are told was an old Jewish saying, which the Apostle appropriated and stamped with the new authority of inspiration. Its ancient meaning was, "Let not your anger last till the time of the evening sacrifice, so as to destroy its acceptableness, for no true prayer can be offered in an angry spirit." When the mind is like an angry sea, the light of truth and the reflected face of God upon it will be like the shivered glory of the sun on a million breaking waves; there can be no clear thought, no defined and settled purpose. Before any other prayer is a possibility you must say with Robert Hall, "Lamb of God, calm my perturbed spirit."

C. Stanford.

6506. ANGER, Nourishing. Speech endeth anger, silence nourisheth it. Much malice and grudge would be avoided, and the very poison of it drawn out, did we but give it a vent at first, by reasoning with the party that wronged us, and expostulating the injury, which most times is but a mere mistake. Now many, on the contrary, harbor this viper in their bosoms till it hath eaten to their hearts; they not only let "the sun go down," but go its whole round, upon "their wrath," (Eph. 4: 26), and cannot find time from one end of the year to the other to utter their minds, and compound their discords. Not only Abraham, but Aristippus, shall rise up in judgment against such pseudo-Christians, and condemn them. For when Æschines and he had been at long debate, and there was I stout, and thou stout, and neither could find in their hearts to go to other, Aristippus went at length to Æschines, and said unto him, "Shall we not agree to be friends before we make ourselves a common scorn to the whole country?" Whereunto, when Æschines answered that "he was content to be friends with all his heart," Aristippus replied, "Remember then, that although I was the elder and better, yet I first sought unto thee." "In very deed," said Æschines, "thou art a far better man than I; for I began the quarrel, and thou hast been first in making up the breach;" and thus these two became fast friends for ever. Trapp.

6507. ANGER, Rebukes in. As Telephus, when he could find no physician that he could confide in as his friend, thought his adversary's lance would most probably heal his wound; so he that hath no friend to give him advice and to reprove him in what he acts amiss, must bear patiently the rebukes of an enemy, and thereby learn to amend the errors of his ways; considering seriously the object which these severe censures aim at, and not what the person is who makes them. For as he who designed the death of Prometheus, the Thessalian, instead of giving the fatal blow, only lanced a swelling that he had, which did really preserve his life free from the hazard of approaching death; just so the harsh reprehensions of enemies cure some distempers of the mind that were before either unknown or neglected, though these angry speeches do originally proceed from malice and ill-will.

Plutarch.

6508. ANGER Restrained. Pollok, when a boy, was exceedingly passionate. At the age of fifteen a marked change was visible in his temper. On being asked what had occasioned it, he answered: "While perusing the gospels, I was struck with the meekness and calm dignity of the Saviour under persecution, and I resolved thenceforward to command my temper; and since that time, though I may feel and express anger, nothing ever puts me into a passion."

6509. ANGER, Restraint of. Socrates was grossly abused and kicked by a profligate young man. The philosopher's friends ran after him to punish him. He recalled them and said, "What if an ass had kicked me, would you think it handsomely done to kick him again?" From that time the young man became known by the nickname of the kicker, which so annoyed him that he hung himself. Charillus, of Sparta, said to a quarrelsome slave with whom he was very angry, "I would kill thee if I were not angry."

6510. ANGER, Ruinous. When Philip destroyed the city of Olynthus it was said, "Philip is not able to build such another city." So says Plutarch it may be said of Anger, "Thou canst overthrow, and destroy, and cut down; but to restore, to save, and to bear with, is the work of gentleness and moderation."

6511. ANGER, Subduing. A monk of an irascible disposition came to Poemen for counsel. He advised him to journey far into the desert, and wrestle with his bad temper till he conquered it, and never to return to dwell among men till he was victor. "But, my father," said the monk, "how if I were to die without sacraments in the wild wastes?" "Do you not think God would receive you, coming from the battle-field where you have been striving against your passions, even should that happen?" he answered.

6512. ANGER, Subject to. A minister of the Reformed Church, at a session of his consistory, found his plans strongly opposed by one of the elders. He became greatly exasperated, and approaching his opposer, addressed him in violent language. Another elder remonstrated: "Dominie, you should restrain your temper!" "Restrain my temper! I'd have you know, sir, that I restrain more temper in five minutes than you do in five years!" retorted the enraged clergyman.

6513. ANGER, Suppressing. The Emperor Adrian commanded his crier to silence a tumultuous mob by ordering them to hold their tongues. The crier's adroitness won the emperor's especial thanks. He held out his hand only to the people. Having thus gained their attention, he said: "The emperor requires you to be silent." It was followed by the desired quiet.

6514. ANGER, Temptation to. Euthymius related the following story to his monks. There was in Egypt a man who had a very violent temper. So he ran away from his home into a monastery, where he thought he would be free from incentives to anger. But there he was frequently irritated by the other monks, who, unintentionally, gave him annoyance. So he determined to escape wholly from the society of men, and then, said he, "I cannot give way, for I shall never be tempted." So he took with him only an earthenware bowl, out of which to drink, and he hid himself in a remote desert. Now, one day, he was fetching water from the spring, and he upset the bowl, and the water fell; then he dipped the vessel again, and as he was going, his foot tripped and again the water was spilt; he dipped it once more but his hand shook, and he overturned the basin a third time. Then, flaming into a furious passion, he dashed the bowl against a stone and shivered it to fragments. And when his anger cooled down, he looked at his shattered bowl and said, "Oh, fool that I am! how can I escape the temptation which is in my nature! If I have not men to be angry with, I rage at an earthen bowl!"

6515. ANIMALS, Controlling. A deacon, naturally a high-tempered man, was accustomed to beat his oxen over the head, as all his neighbors did. When he became a Christian, his cattle became remarkably docile. A friend inquired into the secret. "Why," said the deacon, "formerly, when my oxen were a little contrary, I flew into a passion, and beat them unmercifully. This made the matter worse. Now, when they do not behave well, I go behind the load, and sit down, and sing Old Hundred. I don't know how it is, but the psalm tune has a surprising effect on my oxen."

6516. ANIMALS, Cruelty to. One day, when Mr. Hopper saw a man beating his horse brutally, he stepped up to him and said very seriously, "Dost thou know that some people think men change into animals when they die?" The stranger's attention was arrested by such an unexpected question, and he answered that he never was acquainted with anybody who had that belief. "But some people do believe it," rejoined Friend Hopper; "and they also believe that animals may become men. Now I am thinking if thou shouldst ever be a horse, and that horse should ever be a man, with such a temper as thine, the chance is thou wilt get some cruel beatings." Having thus changed the current of his angry mood, he proceeded to expostulate with him in a friendly way; and the poor beast was reprieved, for that time at least.

Life of Isaac T. Hopper.

6517. ANIMALS, Lesson from. A doctor found a little dog with a broken limb. He took him home, set the limb, and took such good care of him that he was soon well. The dog left his benefactor, who thought much upon the ingratitude of dogs and men. Sometime after, the doctor heard a whining outside his office-door, and opening it saw his former patient and another dog with a broken limb, which he had brought for treatment and cure. He was a true missionary.

6518. ANIMALS, Power over. The legends of the Irish saints frequently give them power over the animals. The horse of St. Finnian broke his leg, when St. Mochua summoned a stag from the forest, which he yoked to the vehicle in place of the horse. It is further related of this saint, that he was a great builder of churches. To bring together the materials for these he called twelve wild stags to his aid, who wrought as tractably as oxen. St. James of the fifth century, was with his monks, cutting and hauling timber for a church. A bear attacked and killed one of his oxen. The monks were terrified and fled, but James said, "I command thee, cruel beast, to bow thy stubborn neck to the yoke in place of the ox thou hast slain." The bear obeyed.

6519. ANIMALS, Worship of. Divine homage is paid to various kinds of animals and reptiles by the deluded natives of Western Africa, from an idea that they are possessed with the spirits of departed chiefs, relatives, or friends, by a mysterious process of transmigration. Hence, there are sacred monkeys, crocodiles, serpents, etc., which are fed and attended to with the greatest possible care. Under such kind treatment they become quite tame, and woe be to any one who dares to molest these living idols of the people.

6520. ANSWER, A Thoughtless. A young consumptive was going abroad to seek relief. As he entered the depot a porter taking his luggage, said, "Where are you going?" He answered, "To hell; away with you." A minister overheard the answer and was startled. Seated near the young man in the carriage, he entered into a conversation with him, and at length said, "When do you expect to arrive at your journey's end?" He answered that he did not know, as it was beyond the sea. The minister said, "I mean the place to which you told the porter you were going, on entering the carriage." He answered, "Perhaps it may be so." "Perhaps it may, but there is a way of escape," said the minister, and he expounded to him the way of salvation as Philip did to the Eunuch. A deep impression was made. The minister saw the young man on board ship for a distant land, furnished him a Bible, and parted from him feeling that his wayside seed would bear fruit in eternity.

6521. ANSWER TO PRAYER, Exact. It was necessary that a minister should undertake a journey, for which, however, he had not a sufficiency of funds. Special prayer was made to the Lord to supply the means, and on retiring to rest at a friend's house, which was on the way, the person in question saw an envelope on his looking-glass, which on being opened was found to contain a ten-pound note, and a line saying it was for "traveling expenses." The minister's hostess said "she could not go to rest until she put it there; she felt constrained to do it." Everything which is not sinful we may bring to God; the minuteness of His love will always make Him condescend to the minuteness of our need.

Power.

6522. ANSWER TO PRAYER, Healing in. A mother of my acquaintance had a child taken alarmingly ill. She sent for the physician. The child was in convulsions. The doctor began at once vigorously to apply the customary remedies—cold water to the head, warm applications to the feet, chafing of the hands and limbs. All was in vain. The body lost nothing of its dreadful rigidity. Death seemed close at hand, and absolutely inevitable. At length he left the child, and sat down by the window, looking out. He seemed to the agonized mother to have abandoned her darling. For herself she could do nothing but pray. And even her prayer was but an inarticulate and unvoiced cry for help. Suddenly the physician started from his seat, "Send and see if there be any jimson weed in the yard," he cried. His order was obeyed; the poisonous weed was found. The remedies were instantly changed. Enough of the seeds of this deadly weed were brought away by the medicine to have killed a man. The physician subsequently said that he thought that in that five minutes every kindred case he had ever known in a quarter century's practice passed before his mind. Among them was the one case which suggested the real but before hidden cause of the protracted and dreadful convulsions. And the child was saved.

Lyman Abbott.

6523. ANSWERS TO PRAYER, Exact. A New York City missionary advanced ten dollars to a poor family and prayed the Lord to replace it. The next day a stranger met him and handed him the exact sum. Public prayer was offered for the inmates of a State prison. Soon after a reformation began there in which one hundred and sixty-five convicts were converted. A young lady said to her host, "I don't want you to talk to me about religion. I don't want to be a Christian." That day public prayer was offered for her. The next morning she was entirely changed, and said, "Last night I resolved to give my heart to the Saviour. A change come over me as I entered my chamber which I could not account for. I believe it was in answer to prayer."

6524. ANTIPATHIES, Examples of. Germanicus could not endure the sight or voice of a cock. The whim of a certain person of noble family was, that he could not endure the gaze of an old woman. By way of a joke, he was brought into the presence of one, when he fell down and died immediately. A nun fainted away, and did not recover health for a long time, the effect of having a beetle thrown into her bosom, by some girls who knew of her weakness. A nobleman of Mantua was thrown into fits by the sight of a hedge-hog. A certain German could detect the presence of a cat in a room, even when carefully concealed, and was thrown into great suffering by it. A strong healthy man named Hasnia, brave in all other cases, was convulsed with fear as often as he saw even the smallest dog.

6525. ANTIPATHIES, Restraint of. Inveterate antipathies against particular nations or persons, and passionate attachment to others, are to be avoided.

Washington.

6526. ANXIETY, Bane of. Anxiety is the poison of human life. It is the parent of many sins, and of more miseries. In a world where everything is doubtful, where you may be disappointed, and be blessed in disappointment—what means this restless stir and commotion of mind? Can your solicitude alter the cause or unravel the intricacy of human events? Can your curiosity pierce through the cloud which the Supreme Being hath made impenetrable to mortal eye? To provide against every important danger by the employment of the most promising means is the office of wisdom; but at this point wisdom stops.

Blair.

6527. ANXIETY, Prevention of. We may consider the year before us a desk containing three hundred and sixty-five letters addressed to us—one for every day, announcing its trials, and prescribing its employments, with an order to open daily no letter but the letter for the day. Now, we may be strongly tempted to unseal beforehand some of the remainder. This, however, would only serve to embarrass us, while we should violate the rule which our Owner and Master has laid down for us. "Take, therefore, no thought for the morrow. for the morrow shall take thought for the things of itself."

William Jay.

6528. ANXIETY, Removal of. "Leave thy fatherless children; I will preserve them alive; and let thy widows trust in me." When I was in England I knew an eminent minister, who a few months afterward died. And for a while before he died he was troubled for fear his wife and children might come to want. He carried the burden of that fear for days. A little while before he died he was lying on his sofa, and a little bird came and pecked at the window; the bird had a worm in its mouth, and afterward it flew away. The man said to himself, "Dear me! God takes care of that bird; He feeds it, yet here am I troubled about my family!" And there and then the burden was laid on the Lord. He had been one of those liberal men, and had given his money to others all through his life. Well, when he died, the people in the town raised £5,000 for his widow. God took care of them.

D. L. Moody.

6529. ANXIETY, Sufferings from. This fear of any future difficulties or misfortune is so natural to the mind, that were a man's sorrows and disquietudes summed up at the end of his life, it would generally be found that he had suffered more from the apprehension of such evils as never happened to him, than from those evils which had really befallen him. To this we may add, that among those evils which befall us, there are many which have been more painful to us in the prospect than by their actual pressure.

Addison.

6530. ANXIETY, Useless. The generality of mankind create to themselves a thousand needless anxieties, by a vain search after a thing that never was, nor ever will be, found upon earth. Let us, then, sit down contented with our lot, and in the meantime be as happy as we can in a diligent preparation for what is to come.

T. Adams.

6531. APOLOGY, Sufficient. Le Clerc was walking in the streets of Paris, and accidentally trod on the foot of a young man, who immediately raised his hand and struck him in the face. Le Clerc said, "Sir, you will be sorry for what you have done when you know that I am blind."

6532. APOSTASY, Act of. Julian was no sooner proclaimed emperor than he declared himself the restorer of the old religion, that is, of heathenism. To purge himself from the waters of Christian baptism, which he received ten years before, he immersed himself in a bath of bulls' blood. He sought to cleanse his hands from the touch of the bloodless emblems of the Eucharist, by holding in them the entrails of the victims offered to his gods.

6533. APOSTASY, Condemnation of. Liberatus, a physician of Carthage, suffered persecution for his faith. Being torn from his family, his wife encouraged him, saying, "Think no more of thy children. Jesus Christ will be their guardian." Both himself and wife were incarcerated, but in different prisons. Her persecutors came and told her, "Thy husband has submitted to the orders of the king; therefore do thou yield also." She demanded to see him. He was brought to her, when she condemned and reproached him for his apostasy. She was rejoiced to learn from him, that she had been deceived, and praised the Lord that he was no apostate. Our best friends approve our Christian fidelity and condemn our defections.

6534. APOSTASY, Deed of. The legend of Theophilus of Cilicia is not without its lesson. He was a priest noted for his austerity, liberality, eloquence and devotion. On the death of the bishop he was elected to fill the diocese by popular acclamation. His deep humility led him to decline the office, and another was elected. Evil-minded persons circulated slanders against him which, coming to the ears of the new bishop, without investigation he acted upon and deprived Theophilus of his offices. It would seem that he who could refuse a mitre could stand up under a slander; but he could not. He constantly meditated how to clear his character. He tried every means to refute the slanders. But slander is a hydra, and when one of its heads is cut off another will grow. In his despair and weakness he sought aid of a necromancer, who led him to meet Satan at the junction of four cross roads. He promised to clear his character and reinstate him in his offices, in consideration of which Theophilus signed a deed with a pen dipped in his own blood, giving his soul to Satan and forever abjuring Jesus Christ. The next day the bishop having discovered his mistake and the falseness of the reports, publicly reinstated Theophilus, and asked his pardon. For a few days, in the joy of vindication and the return of popular favor, all went well with him. Then the awful reality of the compact he had made with Satan came over him. He prayed, fasted, grew pale and hollow-eyed, like one doomed. At length, says the story, the Virgin appeared to him and rebuked him. He implored her pardon and intercession. She promised this, and returned to him the deed by which he made over his soul to Satan. He made public confession, and died at the expiration of three days.

6535. APOSTASY, Example of. The associations of Dr. Dodd in early life were with such men as Bishop Horn, Jones of Nayland, and other religious persons. But he became gradually drawn away from them by the allurements of the world, sought popular favor, and royal preferments, until he was a stranger to them. Meeting a lady who belonged to the relinquished party, he inquired what they thought of him. She replied, "Demas has forsaken us, having loved this present world." The reply at the time affected him, but he went on in his sins, and while endeavoring to defraud Lord Chesterfield, his former pupil, he was arrested, convicted and executed.

6537. APOSTASY, Memento of. In the long line of portraits of the Doges, in the palace at Venice, one space is empty, and the semblance of a black curtain remains as a melancholy record of glory forfeited. Found guilty of treason against the state, Marino Falieri was beheaded, and his image as far as possible blotted from remembrance. As we regarded the singular memorial we thought of Judas and Demas, and then, as we heard in spirit the Master's warning word, "One of you shall betray me," we asked within our soul the solemn question, "Lord, is it I?" Every one's eye rests longer upon the one dark vacancy than upon any one of the many fine portraits of the merchant monarchs; and so the apostates of the church are far more frequently the theme of the world's talk than the thousands of good men and true who adorn the doctrine of God, our Saviour, in all things. Hence the more need of care on the part of those of us whose portraits are publicly exhibited as saints, lest we should one day be painted out of the church's gallery, and our persons only remembered as having been detestable hypocrites.

6538. APOSTASY, Possible. One of Augustine's three wishes was, that he had seen Christ in the flesh. Flavel says, "Judas not only saw him, but dwelt with him, traveled with him, and ate and drank with him. Such was the condescension of Christ to this wretched man, that he washed his feet only a little before he betrayed him." A man might have seen Christ in person upon the earth and yet become a castaway.

6539. APOSTASY, Punishment of. Rev. John Wesley, believing in the possibility of final apostasy, warned all the members of his societies to beware of it. In his sermon on the Loss of the Soul, he relates the following. "Some years since, one who had turned back as a dog to his vomit, was struck in his mad career of sin. A friend who prayed with him said, 'Lord, have mercy on those who are just stepping out of the body, and know not who shall meet them at their entrance into the other world, an angel or a fiend.' The sick man shrieked out, with a piercing cry, 'A fiend! a fiend!' and expired. Just such an end, unless he die like an ox, may any man expect who loses his own soul." "Let him that thinketh he standeth take heed lest he fall."

6540. APOSTASY, Result of. What led to Solomon's apostasy? And what, again, was the ulterior effect of that apostasy on himself? As to the origin of his apostasy the Word of God is explicit. He did not obey his own maxim. He ceased to rejoice with the wife of his youth; and loving many strangers, they drew his heart away from God. Luxury and sinful attachments made him an idolater, and idolatry made him yet more licentious; until, in the lazy enervation and languid day-dreaming of the Sybarite, he lost the perspicacity of the sage and the prowess of the sovereign; and when he woke up from the tipsy swoon, and out of the kennel picked his tarnished diadem, he woke to find his faculties, once so clear and limpid, all perturbed, his strenuous reason paralyzed, and his healthful fancy poisoned. He woke to find the world grown hollow, and himself grown old. He woke to see the sun bedarkened in Israel's sky, and a special gloom encompassing himself. He woke to recognize a sadder sight than winter—a blasted summer. Like a deluded Samson starting from his slumber, he sought to recall that noted wisdom which had signalized his Nazarite days; but its locks were shorn; and, cross and self-disgusted, wretched and guilty, he woke up to the discovery which awaits the sated sensualist: he found that when the beast gets the better of the man, the man is abandoned by his God. Like one who falls asleep amidst the lights and music of an orchestra, and who awakes amidst empty benches and tattered programmes—like a man who falls asleep in a flower-garden, and who opens his eyes on a bald and locust-blackened wilderness—the life, the loveliness, was vanished, and all the remaining spirit of the mighty Solomon yawned forth that verdict of the tired voluptuary: "Vanity of vanities! vanity of vanities! all is vanity!"

Dr. James Hamilton,

6541. APOSTASY, Temptation to. In the Arian persecution two brothers in the city of Tombala were hung up by their wrists with heavy weights attached to their feet. At the end of a day of intolerable agony one of them weakened and asked to be released. The other said to him, "Do not so, brother, or I will accuse thee at the judgment seat of Christ. Have we not sworn to suffer together for him?" Then the temptation was overcome. The weak brother received strength to hold out a little longer. The Vandals, enraged at their obstinacy, burned them with hot irons and gashed them with iron rakes, and sent them speedily to receive their crowns.

6542. APOSTASY, Yielding to. Sir Francis Drake was overtaken by a storm in the Thames which threatened destruction. He exclaimed, "Must I, who have escaped the rage of the ocean, be drowned in a ditch!" Will you, who have outridden many a storm, despair in sight of port? Alas, that those who have overcome in hard battles should be overcome in some slight skirmish.

6543. APOSTATE, Fate of the. A soldier who had served his country for a time in the army, by deception had his name returned on the roll as dead. He was so reported from his company to his regiment, and from his regimental headquarters to the general government. In the great records of the nation, against his name "Dead" was written. After the war was over, and peace restored, the government began to dispense its bounties and pensions to those who had fought its battles and borne its burdens. This runaway soldier, that had deserted from the service and caused a false report to be returned, appeared for a reward at the hands of government. The books were examined, the name was found, but Dead was written against it. The government settles by its official records, and in the knowledge of the government he is a dead man, and not a living claimant. In Christian warfare there is like danger. Christ has enlisted a great many soldiers that have not answered to the roll-call for years. They deserted in time of danger, and the angel scribe has written against their names—Dead. The books of the last day will show erasures as well as entries; and almost the last words of the Bible warn us of the blotting out of names from the Book of Life.

William Jones.

6544. APPETITE, Resisting. An inebriate affirmed that he could not resist his appetite for whisky. His neighbor said to him, "Suppose I should put a sufficient quantity of arsenic into your jug of rum to produce certain death by the use of a tablespoonful, and you knew it, and there was no other liquor in a hundred miles of you, how long would your jug stand by you untasted?" He saw the absurdity of his assertion, and confessed that the only thing necessary to his reform was resolution.

6545. APPEARANCE, Man's. A man's look is the work of years. It is stamped on the countenance by the events of his life; nay, more, by the hand of Nature; and it is not to be got rid of easily. There is, as it has been remarked repeatedly, something in a person's appearance, at first sight, which we do not like, and which gives it an odd tinge, but which is overlooked in a multitude of other circumstances, till the mask is thrown off, and we see this lurking character verified in the plainest manner in the sequel. We are struck at first, and by chance, with what is peculiar and characteristic; also with permanent traits and general effects. These afterwards go off in a set of unmeaning and commonplace details. This sort of prima facie evidence, then, shows what a man is, better than what he says or does; for it shows us the habit of his mind, which is the same under all circumstances and disguises.

Hazlitt.

6546. APPEARANCES, Evil. There is a curious Chinese proverb which says: "In a cucumber field do not stop to tie your shoe, and under a plum tree do not stop to settle your cap or your head;" which means, if you do some one may think you are stealing the cucumbers or the plums. The Apostle says, "Abstain from all appearance of evil."

6547. APPEARANCES, Regard for. A divine of the 17th century says: "Thou must not only refuse to commit broad sins, but shun the appearance of sin also: this is to walk in the power of holiness. The dove doth not only fly from the hawk, but will not smell so much as a single feather that falls from the hawk; it should be enough to scare the holy soul from any enterprise, if it be but 'male coloratum;' we are commanded to hate the garments spotted with the flesh. A cleanly person will not only refuse to wallow in the dunghill, but is careful also that he doth not get so much as a spot on his clothes as he is eating his meat. The Christian's care should be to keep, as his conscience pure, so his name pure; which is done by avoiding all appearance of evil."

6548. APPLAUSE, Effect of. Once, when a great fire broke out at midnight, and people thought that all the inmates had been taken out, way up there in the fifth story was seen a little child crying for help. Up went a ladder, and soon a fireman was seen ascending to the spot. As he neared the second story the flames burst in fury from the windows, and the multitude almost despaired of the rescue of the child. The brave man faltered, and a comrade at the bottom cried out, "Cheer," and cheer upon cheer arose from the crowd. Up the ladder he went and saved the child because they cheered him. If you cannot go into the heat of the battle yourself; if you cannot go into the harvest field and work day after day, you can cheer those that are working for the Master.

6549. APPLAUSE, Self. He that talks big and arrogantly of himself, Hercules, is universally condemned as a troublesome and ill-bred companion. Those who are crowned for mastery in the games or in the learned combats have others to celebrate their victories, that the people's ears be not grated with the harsh noises of self-applause. And Timotheus is justly censured as unskillfully and irregularly setting forth his conquest of Phrynis, when he thus proudly boasted it in writing: "Happy man wast thou, Timotheus, when the crier proclaimed, 'The Milesian Timotheus hath vanquished the son of Carbo, the soft Ionian poet.'" Plutarch.

6550. APPLICATIONS, Biblical. Nathan applied the parable of the ewe lamb to David, saying, "Thou art the man." 2d. Sam. 12: 7. Bowes says: "One feature is observable in our blessed Lord's teachings, his pointed questions and personal applications. 'He that hath ears to hear, let him hear.' 'Take heed how ye hear.' 'Dost thou believe?' 'How is it that ye have no faith?' 'Where is your faith?' 'Are ye also yet without understanding?' 'Have ye understood all these things?' 'Do ye not err?' &c. It was one of Christ's modes of teaching to turn the remarks of others into pointed and personal appeals directed to themselves;

—see Luke 8: 19-21; 11: 27, 28; 13: 1-5 23, 24.

6551. ARGUMENT, Blindness to. Robert Hall was conversing with a clergyman who had obtained a lucrative living by a change of religious opinions. Mr. Hall pressed him hard upon the subject of Church reform. The gentleman's constant answer to the argument addressed to him was, "I can't see it." "I don't see it." "I can't see that at all." At last Mr. Hall took a letter from his pocket and wrote on the back of it with his pencil, in small letters, the word "God." "Do you see that?" "Yes." He then covered it with a piece of gold. "Do you see it now?" "No." "I wish you good morning, sir," said Mr. Hall, and left him to his meditations.

6552. ARGUMENTS, Decisive. A converted infidel narrating his experience said, "I could always bear sermons, and was ball-proof to argument, but I could not resist the Christian life of my wife."

6553. ARGUMENT, Gentleness in. I walked into the village, where the boat stopped for the night, and found the worshippers of Cali by the sound of their drums and cymbals. I did not think of speaking to them on account of their being Bengalese. But being invited by the Brahmins to walk in, I entered within the railing, and asked a few questions about the idol. The Brahmin, who spoke bad Hindoostanee, disputed with great heat, and his tongue ran faster than I could follow; and the people, who were about one hundred, shouted applause. But I continued to ask my questions, without making any remarks upon the answers. I asked, among other things, whether what I had heard of Vishance and Brahma were true, which he confessed. I forbore to press him with the consequences, which he seemed to feel, and then I told him what was my belief. The man grew quite mild, and said it was chula-bat (good), and asked me seriously, at last, what I thought—"Was idol worship true or false?" I felt it a matter of thankfulness that I could make known the truth of God, though but a stammerer, and that I had declared it in the presence of the devil. And this also I learned, that the power of gentleness is irresistible. I never was more astonished than at the change in the deportment of this hot-headed Brahmin. Henry Martyn.

6554. ARGUMENT, Rule for. Lord Cockburn's method at the bar was,—“When I was addressing a jury, I invariably picked out the stupid-looking fellow of the lot, and addressed myself specially to him—for this good reason: I knew that if I convinced him, I would be sure to carry all the rest!”

6555. ARK, Import of the. We have first an old world to be destroyed, with one faithful family upon it, or rather one family who are saved for the faithfulness and piety of their head, as it is said,—“Come thou, and all thy house into the ark: for thee have I seen righteous.” Then we have a new world coming forth in beauty, after destruction has passed on the old; while the chosen family are brought from the one world to the other in the ark, the only place of safety. Christ is the ark, taking the chosen family from the world judgment to the new heavens and the new earth. This is clear; but look at the detail. May I not say the microscope may be used here? The ark, with all its burden, rests on the mountains of the new world, months before any portion of that new world could be seen. Christ, as our ark, has rested in resurrection, with all the redeemed family in him; for in him we are already "risen," while as yet the waters of judgments (for "now is the judgment of this world") are resting on the world. A. Jukes.

6556. ARK, Import of the. The Fathers observe the allegory that Peter maketh, in comparing Noah's ark unto the church; and observe, moreover, that as the dove brought the olive-branch into the ark, in token that the deluge had ceased, and the world had become habitable again; even as the dove, that lighted upon Christ, brought the glad tidings of the gospel. Bp. Lake.

6557. ARK, Refusing to Enter the. The Koran relates that Noah had a son who was numbered with the unbelievers in his father's message. Noah expostulated with him, "Embark with us, my son, and stay not with the unbelievers." He answered, "I will get on a mountain, which will secure me from the water." He refused to enter the ark, and shared the fate of the doomed race.

6558. ARK, Safety in the. There was one minute when Noah was exposed to the wrath that was to come over the whole world; but when he went through the door-way of the ark, that moment he was safe. There are many who are trying to make an ark for themselves out of their feelings, out of their own good deeds. But God has provided an ark. If Noah had had to build himself an ark when the flood came, he would have been lost like the rest. A good many of those men who perished when that flood came tried to make arks for themselves, but they all perished helplessly. They tried to make boats and rafts, and tried every way they could to save themselves, but they perished because they were not in the ark that God had appointed. So, to-day, every man and every woman must perish that is not in the ark which God has appointed for their salvation. A knowledge about the ark is not going to help you. A great many persons flatter themselves they are going to be saved because they know a great deal about Jesus Christ. But your knowledge of Him will not save you. Noah's carpenters probably knew as much about the ark as Noah did, and perhaps more. They knew that the ark was strong. They knew it was built to stand the Deluge. They knew it was made to float upon the waters. They had helped to build it. But they were just as helpless when the flood came as men who lived thousands of miles away. Men who lived right in sight of the ark, that knew all about it, perished like the rest, because they were not in the ark. I know something about the different lines of steamers, and

I have crossed the Atlantic. Here is another man that has never heard there was such a line of steamers. We both want to go to Europe. My knowledge of a line of steamers does not help me a bit if I do not take the means to go there. You may hear about Christ, but if you do not believe in Christ you cannot be saved. Your knowledge is not going to help you to your salvation. What you want to do is just to make Christ your ark, and then to step into that ark and be saved. Moody.

6559. ARK, Saved by the. When I was in Manchester, in one of the inquiry meetings, I went up into the gallery to talk with a few men who were standing together, and who were inquirers of the way of life. And while they were standing in a little group around me there came up another man and got on the outside of the audience, and I thought by the expression of his face that he was skeptical. I did not think he had come to find Christ. But as I went on talking I noticed the tears trickling down his cheeks. I said, "My friend, are you anxious about your soul's salvation?" He said "Yes, very." I asked him what was the trouble, and I kept on talking to that one man, thinking that if he could understand me perhaps the others would. He said he wanted to feel right about it. I explained to him by means of an illustration, and asked him, "Do you see it?" He said "No." I used another, and asked him, "Do you see it yet?" and he said "No" again. I gave still another and still he said he did not see. I then said, "Was it Noah's feelings that saved him, or was it his ark? Was what saved Noah his righteousness? was it his life, was it his prayers, was it his tears, was it his feelings, or was it the ark?" He came immediately and grasped me by the hand, and said, "I see it now; it is all right now; I've got to go away on the next train, and I'm in a hurry, but you have made it plain to me; good bye." And he went off. I thought it was so sudden that he could not have understood it. But the next Sunday afternoon he came and tapped me on the shoulder, and smiled, and asked me if I remembered him. I said no, that I remembered his face, but could not tell who he was or where I'd seen him before. He said, "Do you remember a man that came up into the inquiry-room the other day, and you explained to him how it was Noah's ark that saved him? I did not see any illustration until you used that one, and then I saw it all." I asked him how he was, and he said he had been all right ever since, and that the ark had saved him. I afterward learned that he was one of the best business men of Manchester. His feelings did not save him. The ark saved him. Moody.

6560. ARMOR, Pasteboard. Do you recollect the scene in Don Quixote in which the immortal knight put upon himself a helmet made of pasteboard? That helmet being smitten and pierced by a sword, he sewed it up again, and would not part with it, but in his insanity wore it, and felt that he had an all-sufficient helmet on his head. Are there not many Don Quix otes among men, who put on armor that looks very well till some sword or spear is thrust into it, but which then is found to be like the pasteboard helmet that went to pieces the moment it was touched? If we are to have a piety that shall sustain us in the flood and in the fire; if we are to have a faith that shall be an all-sufficient armor by day and by night, the year round, and from year to year, we must have one that is made up of something better than mere pasteboard instruction or a paper belief.

Beecher.

6561. ARMY, Gideon's. If we don't expect a blessing we don't get it. Look at Gideon. He had 30,000 men. God said that that was too many. They would all take their share of the glory of the victory, and there was no need of dividing it up so small. We must take our place in the dust, and give God the glory, if we want to do any good. "You've got too many," said God; "let all who are afraid step out." Twenty-two thousand stepped out! Poor Gideon! I'd like to have seen him then. His faith must have been a little shaky. It was like a meeting I once attended, when some persons went out. The others, attracted by the noise, stood up, and it looked as if all were going. "Ten thousand left," said God; "that's still too many." Then 9,700 more stepped out, leaving but 300; but they were 300 such men as Caleb and Joshua. There was no power that could stand against them. I think it was John Wesley who once said that if he had 300 believing Christians he would shake the gates of hell and set God up in the world. I believe he could have done it.

Moody.

6562. ARROGANCE, Growth of. Arrogance is a weed which grows upon a dunghill. It is from the rankness of the soil that she has her height and spreadings.

Feltham.

6563. ARROGANCE, Import of. Arrogance is the proclamation which some men make of their own littleness.

6564. ARROGANCE, Ridiculous. The petty sovereignty of an insignificant tribe in North America every morning stalks out of his hovel, bids the sun good-morrow, and points out to him with his finger the course he is to take for the day. Is this arrogance more contemptible than ours when we would dictate to God the course of his providence, and summon him to our bar for his dealings with us? How ridiculous does man appear when he attempts to argue with his God!

Spurgeon.

6565. ARROGANCE, Selfishness of. An arrogant person, if he join in the performance of any laudable action, with men of modest natures, deals with them in the sharing of the praise, as the lion in the fable did with the other beasts, dividing the prey they had taken; who making of the whole, four parts, pleads a title to three of them at least, and if they yielded him not the fourth of their own good-will, he would be no longer friends. If he write or speak a discourse of any length, he cannot forbear but he must make known somewhat of his own custom, or humor, or life, with I was this, or did this, or like this, or thus am, or was wont; belike supposing that all men would be glad to make him the pattern of their life and actions.

Anon. 1620.

6566. ARROW, A Barbed. A fast young man, with a companion, was on his way to a theatre, when a little boy handed him a letter in which was written: "Sir, remember the day of judgment is at hand." He left his company, and returning homeward entered a church. He heard the text announced, "This is the finger of God." His impression deepened, and he became a Christian.

6567. ARROW, Gospel. The chief battles fought by the English Plantagenets were with the long-bow. They would take the arrow of polished wood, and feather it with the plume of a bird, and then it would fly from the bowstring of plaited silk. The broad fields of Agincourt and Solway Moss and Neville's Cross heard the loud thrum of the archer's bowstring. Now, my Christian friends, we have a mightier weapon than that. It is the arrow of the Gospel; it is a sharp arrow; it is a straight arrow; it is feathered from the wing of the dove of God's Spirit; it flies from a bow made out of the wood of the cross. As far as I can estimate or calculate, it has brought down three hundred millions of souls. Paul knew how to bring the notch of that arrow on to the bowstring, and its whirl was heard through the Corinthian theatres, and through the court-room until the knees of Felix knocked together. It was that arrow that stuck in Luther's heart when he cried out, "O my sins! O my sins!" If it strike a man in the head, it kills his skepticism; if it strike him in the heel, it will turn his step: if it strike him in the heart, he throws up his hands, as did one of old when wounded in the battle, crying, "O Galilean! thou hast conquered!"

Talmage.

6568. ARROW, The Pestilence God's. The Arabs thus describe the pestilence. A traveler says: "I desired to remove to a less contagious air. I received from Solyman, the emperor, this message—that the emperor wondered what I meant, in desiring to remove my habitation. Is not the pestilence God's arrow, which will always hit his mark? If God would visit me herewith, how could I avoid it? 'Is not the plague,' said he, 'in my own palace? and yet I do not think of removing.'" Another remarks: "What," say they, "is not the plague the dart of Almighty God, and can we escape the blow he levels at us? Is not his hand steady to hit the persons he aims at?"

6569. ARROWS, The Sharpest. A Bowman took aim at an eagle and hit him in the heart. As the eagle turned his head in the agonies of death, he saw that the arrow was winged with his own feathers. "How much sharper," said he, "are the wounds made by weapons which we ourselves have supplied!"

Æsop.

6570. ART, Necessity for. In no circumstance whatever can man be comfortable without art. The butterfly is independent of art, though it is only in sunshine that it can be happy. The beasts of the field can roam about by day, and couch by night on the cold earth, without danger to health or sense of misfortune. But man is miserable and speedily lost so soon as he removes from the precincts of human art, without his shoes, without his clothes, without his dog and his gun, without an inn or a cottage to shelter him by night. Nature is worse to him than a stepmother—he cannot love her; she is a desolate and a howling wilderness. He is not a child of nature like a hare. She does not provide him a banquet and a bed upon every little knoll, every green spot of earth. She persecutes him to death, if he do not return to that sphere of art to which he belongs, and out of which she will show him no mercy, but be unto him a demon of despair and a hopeless perdition.

Ruskin.

6571. ART, Poetry of. The written poem is only poetry talking, and the statue, the picture, and the musical composition, are poetry acting. Milton and Goethe, at their desks, were not more truly poets than Phidias with his chisel, Raphael at his easel, or deaf Beethoven bending over his piano, inventing and producing strains which he himself could never hope to hear. The love of the ideal, the clinging to and striving after first principles of beauty, is ever the characteristic of the poet, and whether he speak his truth to the world through the medium of the pen, the perfect statue, or the lofty strain, he is still the sharer in the same high nature. Next to blind Milton describing Paradise, that same Beethoven composing symphonies and oratorios is one of the finest things we know. Milton saw not, and Beethoven heard not; but the sense of beauty was upon them, and they fain must speak. Arts may be learned by application—proportions and attitudes may be studied and repeated—mathematical principles may be, and have been, comprehended and adopted; but yet there has not been hewn from the marble a second Apollo, and no measuring by compasses will ever give the secret of its power. The ideal dwelt in the sculptor's mind, and his hands fashioned a statue which yet teaches it to the world.

Ruskin.

6572. ART, Religiousness of. It is the duty of religion not to eject, but to cherish and seek fellowship with every beautiful exhibition which delights, and every delicate art which embellishes human life. So, on the other hand, it is the duty of art not to waste its high capabilities in the imitation of what is trivial, and in the curious adornment of what has only a finite significance. The highest art is always the most religious; and the greatest artist is always a devout man. A scoffing Raphael or Michael Angelo is not conceivable. Blackie.

6573. ASCENSION, Christ's. Christ's offering himself on earth, answered to the killing of the sacrifice without the vail; and his entering into heaven, there to intercede, answered to the priest's going with blood and his hands full of incense within the vail. So that this is a part, yea, a special part, of Christ's priesthood; and so necessary to it, that if he had not done this, all his work on earth had been ineffectual; nor had he been a priest, that is, a complete and perfect priest, if he had remained on earth, Heb. 8: 4; because the very design and end of shedding his blood on earth had been frustrated, which was to present it before the Lord, in heaven. So that this is the perfective part of the priesthood: he acted the first part on earth in a state of deep abasement, in the form of a servant; but he acts the second part in glory, whereto he is taken up, that he may fulfill his design in dying, and give the work of our salvation its last completing act.

John Flavel.

6574. ASCENSION, Fable of. The body of Romulus disappeared suddenly, and no remnant of it or of his clothing could be discovered by the most diligent search. One report is that he disappeared from the temple of Vulcan; another that he was holding an assembly outside the city when there was great darkness, fearful thunderings, and a resistless tempest, which terrified and scattered the people. When this had subsided, the people came together again, but Romulus could not be found. It was thence reported by the patricians, that Romulus had been caught up to heaven, and would be to the Romans a propitious god. Thus Romulus became one of the gods of Rome. This was confirmed by the oath of his devoted and famous friend, Julius Proclus, who swore that he met Romulus while traveling on the road, clad in the most dazzling armor. Astonished at the sight, he cried out, "For what misbehavior of ours, or by what accident, O King, hast thou so untimely left us?" He answered, "It pleased the gods, my good Proclus, that we should dwell with men for a time, and having founded a city which shall be the most powerful and glorious in the world, return to heaven, from whence we came. Farewell, then! Go, tell the Romans that by the exercise of temperance and fortitude they shall attain the highest pitch of human greatness, and I, the god Quirinus, will ever be propitious to you."

6575. ASCENSION, Need of Christ's. The Apostle makes a priest's exaltation so necessary a part of his priesthood, that without it he could not have been a priest. "If he were on earth he should not be a priest." Heb. 8: 4; that is, if he had continued here, and had not been raised again from the dead, and taken up into glory, he could not have been a complete and perfect priest. For just as it was not enough for the sacrifice to be slain without, and his blood left there; but it must be carried within the vail, into the most holy place before the Lord, Heb. 9: 7; so it was not sufficient that Christ shed his own blood on earth, except he carry it before the Lord into heaven, and there perform his intercession work for us.

John Flavel.

6576. ASCETICISM, Example of. In the reign of Elizabeth there was born in London a man of the name of John Martin. In the tenth year of his age he was kidnapped by a Portuguese merchant, apparently for the purpose of preserving him in the Catholic faith; and this merchant, seven years afterwards, took him to Brazil, where, being placed under the care of the Jesuits, he soon after became a member of that fraternity, by the name of Joam de Almeida. Anchieta was his superior, then an old man, broken down with exertion and austerities, and subject to frequent faintings. No voluptuary ever invented so many devices for pampering the senses as Joam de Almeida did for mortifying them. He looked upon his body as a rebellious slave, who, dwelling within his doors, eating at his table, and sleeping in his bed, was continually laying snares for his destruction; he, therefore, regarded it with the deepest hatred, and, as a matter of justice and self-defence, persecuted, flogged, and punished it in every imaginable way. For this purpose, he had a choice assortment of scourges, some of whip-cord, some of cat-gut, some of leathern thongs, and some of wire. He often wore an under-waistcoat of the roughest hair, having on the inside seven crosses made of iron, the surface of which was covered with sharp points, like a coarse rasp or a nutmeg-grater. It is recorded among his other "virtues," that on his journeys he put pebbles or grains of maize in his shoes. His daily course of life was regulated in conformity to a paper drawn up by himself, and consisted of abstinence, sometimes relieved by bread and water, and castigating his body with scourges. The great object of his most thankful meditations was to think that having been born in England, and in London, in "the very seat and heart of heresy," he had been led to this happy way of life. In this extraordinary course of self-torment, F. Joam de Almeida attained the great age of eighty-two.

6577. ASCETICISM, Varieties of. Three forms of asceticism have existed in this weak world. Religious asceticism, being the refusal of pleasure and knowledge, as was supposed, for the sake of religion, seen chiefly in the middle ages. Military asceticism, being the refusal of pleasure and knowledge for the sake of power; seen chiefly in the early days of Sparta and Rome. And monetary asceticism, consisting in the refusal of pleasure and knowledge for the sake of money, seen in the present days of London and Manchester.

Ruskin.

6578. ASP, Poison of the. The asp is extremely venomous. Describing its bite, Dioscorides says,—"The sight became dim immediately; a swelling followed, and pain was felt in the stomach, which ended in convulsions and death." Death ensues about twenty-four hours after the person has been bitten. The whole body becomes of a blackish color, and mortification speedily follows. The asp is about one foot long and two inches round; oviparous, spotted with black and white. The common people of Cyprus called it kophe (deaf); and in Ps. 58, 4, deafness is ascribed to the pethen. It is commonly believed that Cleopatra died from the bite of an asp, but the manner of her death was not certainly known; "no marks, either of violence or of the action of poison, were found upon the corpse." The story of the asp was adopted by Octavian, in whose triumph there was borne a waxen figure of Cleopatra sinking into the last sleep upon her couch, with the snake clinging to her arm.

6579. ASSOCIATES, Choice of. In all societies it is advisable to associate, if possible, with the highest; not that the highest are always the best, but because if disgusted there, we can at any time descend; but if we begin with the lowest, to ascend is impossible. In the grand theatre of human life, a box ticket takes us through the house.

Colton.

6580. ASSOCIATES, Damage of Bad. Not long ago a young man of Springfield had a most favorable opportunity to enter a business house at a large increase over his present salary, with a prospect of soon getting a place in the firm. His recommendations were first-class, and the officers of the institution were decidedly pleased with his appearance. They, however, made him no proposals, nor did they state their favorable impressions. A gentleman of that city was requested to ascertain where the young man spent his evenings and what class of young men were his associates. It was found that he spent several nights of the week in a billiard-room, and Sunday afternoon drove a hired span into the country, with three other young men. For this reason he failed to obtain the coveted position.

6581. ASSOCIATION with Christ. "I am not the rose," says the Eastern proverb, "but I have been with the rose, and therefore I am sweet;" and he who has the Rose of Sharon in his bosom will diffuse its fragrance.

6582. ASSOCIATION, Dangerous. A mouse in an evil day made acquaintance with a frog, and they set off on their travels together. The frog, on pretence of great affection, and of keeping his companion out of harm's way, tied the mouse's hind foot to his own hind leg, and thus they proceeded for some distance by land. Presently they came to some water, and the frog bidding the mouse have good courage, began to swim across. They had scarcely, however, arrived midway, when the frog took a sudden plunge to the bottom, dragging the mouse after him. But the struggling and floundering of the mouse made so great a commotion in the water that it attracted the attention of a kite, who, pouncing down, and bearing off the mouse, carried away the frog at the same time in its train.

Asop.

6583. ASSOCIATION, Effect of. Mr. Moody frequently tells the story of how he carried in his pocket a gold chain. Into the same pocket he carelessly placed a lead bullet. After several days he took out the chain, and found it covered all over with a coating of lead. The contact of the two had brightened the worthless bullet, but it had greatly tarnished the gold. So a debasing thought, an unworthy motive, a bad book, an evil companion, may tarnish the pure gold of the best and noblest character. So a man may carelessly carry in his heart some doubt or ambition that may do him greatest harm.

A. D. Vail.

6584. ASSOCIATION, Honorable. An English soldier, on account of merit, had been pro moted to a captaincy in the army. In my country across the ocean, unlike it is in yours, soldiers never rise except by purchase or by birth. The newly-made captain, feeling ill at ease in his new position, requested his commanding officer to restore him again to the private ranks. The officer, surmising the cause of this apparently strange request, ordered a grand review of the army, and when about to pass along in front of the long drawn up lines, he requested the captain to give him his arm, and together they walked up and down before the rank and file of soldiers as they stood upon the field. The captain was reassured. He was honored with the association of the commander himself. "Thou shalt be with me." Newman Hall.

6585. ASSOCIATIONS, Circle of. "To love the little platoon we belong to in society is the germ of all public affections." True, most true! The innocent associations of childhood, the kind mother who taught us to whisper the first faint accents of prayer, and watched with anxious face over our slumbers, the ground on which our little feet first trod, the pew in which we first sat during public worship, the school in which our first rudiments were taught, the torn Virgil, the dog-eared Horace, the friends and companions of our young days, the authors who first told us the history of our country, the songs that first made our hearts throb with noble and generous emotions, the burying-place of our fathers, the cradles of our children, are surely the first objects which nature tells us to love. Philanthropy, like charity, must begin at home. From this centre our sympathies may extend in an ever-widening circle. Lamb.

6586. ASSUMPTION, Danger of. A jackdaw, as vain and conceited as jackdaw could be, picked up the feathers which some peacocks had shed, stuck them amongst his own, and despising his old companions, introduced himself with the greatest assurance into a flock of those beautiful birds. They, instantly detecting the intruder, stripped him of his borrowed plumes, and falling upon him with their beaks, sent him about his business. The unlucky jackdaw, sorely punished and deeply sorrowing, betook himself to his former companions, and would have flocked with them again as if nothing had happened. But they, recollecting what airs he had given himself, drummed him out of their society, while one of those whom he had so lately despised, read him this lecture: "Had you been contented with what nature made you, you would have escaped the chastisement of your betters and also the contempt of your equals." Æsop.

6587. ASSUMPTION, Failure of. In the reign of Adrian, the Jews, under the lead of Benchochab, organized a powerful revolt against the Romans. This leader was one of the false Christs of whom there were many about that time. He called himself the Messiah, and from the prophecy of Moses, Num. 24—"A star shall arise out of Jacob," etc.—he took his name, which in Hebrew signifies the son of a star. Jean Baptiste says that this impostor gained possession of fifty castles in Judea, and nine hundred and eighty towns and villages. He shut himself up in Bethoron, and endured a siege of three years and a half, making many sallies, and shedding much blood. It is said that three hundred thousand Jews were killed, besides many who perished by plague and famine. At last Adrian in person led the attack upon the city. Benchochab, the false Messiah, was slain in a sally, and Bethoron was taken. The Jews, undecieved by his death, called him Benscosba, the son of a lie, instead of Benchochab, the son of a star. He was only one of many who have imposed upon the credulity of mankind. This occurred A. D. 121. As late as 1656, James Naylor of Yorkshire, England, a leader among the Quakers, declared himself to be Christ the Saviour, and gained many followers. He made a triumphal entry into Bristol, in imitation of Christ's entry into Jerusalem; his followers crying "Hosanna" before him, and strewing flowers in his path. For this he was branded with the letter B, for Blasphemer, upon his forehead, whipped through the streets of Bristol, and imprisoned for life.

6588. ASSUMPTION, Oriental. A traveler says: That in Tartary, after the Great Cham had dined, his trumpeters sounded their trumpets before his palace gate, to give notice to all the kings of the earth that now that the Great Cham had dined, they were at liberty to go to dinner.

6589. ASSUMPTION, Oriental Proverb. "You have become proud, and conduct yourself like the upstart who must 'carry his silk umbrella to keep off the sun at midnight!'"

6590. ASSURANCE, Abiding. I was once expounding the seventh and eighth of Romans to a class of colored Bible-women, deeply experienced as to their hearts, but very ignorant, as I supposed, in their heads. After I had been talking for a little while, an old colored woman interrupted me with—"Why, honey, 'pears like you don't understand them chapters." "Why not, auntie?" I asked; "what is the matter with my explanation?" "Why, honey," she said, "you talks as if we were to live in that miserable seventh chapter, and only pay little visits to the blessed eighth!" "Well," I answered, "that is just what I do think; don't you?" "Laws, honey," she exclaimed, with a look of intense pity for my ignorance, "why, I lives in the eighth." I knew it was true, for I had often wondered at the holiness of her lowly life, and for a moment I was utterly bewildered. But then I thought, "Oh! it is because she is colored and poor, that God has given her such a grand experience, to make up." And I almost began to wish I was colored and poor, that I also might have the same experience. But, I rejoice to say to-day, that even if you are white and not poor, you yet may know what it is to abide in Christ, and to rejoice in all the blessedness of such abiding.

Mrs. H. Pearsall Smith.

6591. ASSURANCE, Absence of. While the heaviest strokes fall on believers, their souls are ravished with the sweetest joy and exultation. Yet 'tis not thus always with the saints; for though sin be pardoned, yet the apprehensions of guilt may remain, as old wounds, though cured, yet are felt in change of weather. When a stream is disturbed, it does not truly represent the object; when the affections are disordered, the mind does not judge aright of the Christian's state. A serpent may hiss when it has lost its sting. I doubt not but some of the saints, whom death brings safely, yet not comfortably, to heaven, have often been in anxieties to the last, till their fears were dispelled by the actual fruition of blessedness; as the sun sometimes sets in dark clouds, and rises in a glorious horizon. Salter.

6592. ASSURANCE, Certain. It is one thing for a man to have his salvation certain, another thing to be certain that it is certain. Even as a man fallen into a river, and like to be drowned as he is carried down with the flood, espies the bough of a tree hanging over the river, which he catcheth at and clings unto with all his might to save him, and seeing no other way of succor but that, ventures his life upon it—this man, so soon as he has fastened on this bough, is in a safe condition, though all troubles, fears, and terrors are not presently out of his mind, until he comes to himself and sees himself quite out of danger. Then he is sure he is safe; but he was safe before he was sure. Even so it is with a believer. Faith is but the spying of Christ as the only means to save, and the reaching out of the heart to lay hold on him. Usher.

6593. ASSURANCE, Faith and. Faith, let us remember, is the root, and assurance is the flower. Doubtless you can never have the flower without the root; but it is no less certain you may have the root and not the flower. Faith is that poor trembling woman who came behind Jesus in the press, and touched the hem of his garment, (Mark 5, 25); Assurance is Stephen standing calmly in the midst of his murderers, and saying, "I see the heavens opened, and the Son of man standing on the right hand of God" (Acts 6, 56). Faith is the penitent thief, crying, "Lord, remember me" (Luke 23, 42); Assurance is Job sitting in the dust, covered with sores, and saying, "I know that my Redeemer liveth" (Job 19, 25); "Though he slay me, yet will I trust in him" (Job 13, 15). Faith is Peter's drowning cry, as he began to sink, "Lord, save me!" (Matt. 14, 30); Assurance is that same Peter declaring before the council, in after-times, "This is the stone which was set at naught by you builders, which is become the head of the corner. Neither is there salvation in any other; for there is none other name under heaven given among men whereby we must be saved" (Acts 4, 12). Faith is the anxious, trembling voice, "Lord, I believe; help thou mine unbelief" (Mark 9, 24); Assurance is the confident challenge, "Who shall lay anything to the charge of God's elect? Who is he that condemneth?" (Rom. 8, 33, 34). Faith is Saul praying in the house of Judas at Damascus, sorrowful, blind, and alone (Acts 9, 11); Assurance is Paul, the aged prisoner, looking calmly into the grave, and saying, "I know whom I have believed. There is a crown laid up for me" (2 Tim. 1, 12; 4, 8). Faith is life. How great the blessing! Who can tell the gulf between life and death? And yet life may be weak, sickly, unhealthy, painful, trying, anxious, worn, burdensome, joyless, smileless to the very end. Assurance is more than life. It is health, strength, power, vigor, activity, energy, manliness, beauty. Ryle.

6594. ASSURANCE, Firm. Philip de Mornay, Prime Minister to Henry IV. of France, a great statesman, brave officer, and exemplary Christian, being asked a little before his death, if he still retained the same assured hope of future bliss which he had so comfortably enjoyed during his illness, answered, "I am as fixed in my confidence of an assured hope of future bliss from the incontestable evidence of the Spirit of God, as ever I was of any mathematical truth from all the demonstrations of Euclid."

6595. ASSURANCE, Happiness of. This assurance is the manna in the golden pot, the white stone, the wine of Paradise which cheers the heart. How comfortable is God's smile. The sun is more refreshing when it shines out than when it is hid in a cloud. It is a prelibation and a foretaste of glory, and puts a man in heaven before his time. None can know how delicious and ravishing it is, but such as have felt it; as none can know how sweet honey is but those who have tasted it. T. Watson.

6596. ASSURANCE, Joy of. Bilney, who suffered martyrdom in 1531, wrote: "I met with these words of the Apostle, 'This is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptance, that Jesus Christ came into the world to save sinners, whereof I am the chief.' O most sweet and comfortable sentence to my soul! This one sentence, through God's instruction and inward working, did so exhilarate my heart, which before was wounded by the guilt of my sins, and almost in despair, that immediately I found marvelous comfort and quietness in my soul, so that my bruised bones did leap for joy."

6597. ASSURANCE, Question of. Spangenberg, one of the Moravian pastors in Georgia, once inquired of John Wesley, "Does the Spirit of God bear witness with your spirit that you are a child of God?" Wesley was surprised at the inquiry, and knew not how to answer it. Spangenberg then asked, "Do you know Jesus Christ?" "I know him to be the Saviour of the world," responded Wesley. "True," said the Moravian; "but do you know he has saved you?" "I hope he has died for me," rejoined Wesley. Spangenberg added, "Do you know yourself?" "I do," answered Wesley. In a subsequent notice of his answer Wesley says "I fear they were mere words." The question left him no rest till from his own experience he could say, "The Spirit answers to the blood, and tells me I am born of God."

6598. ASSURANCE, Type of. Assurance is like the sunflower, which opens with the day and shuts with the night. It follows the motion of God's face: if that looks smilingly on the soul, it lives; if that frowns or hides itself, it dies. But faith is a plant that can grow in the shade,—a grace that can find the way to heaven in a dark night. It can walk in darkness, and yet trust in the name of the Lord.

Anon.

6599. ASSURANCE, Uncertain of. Rev. J. C. Ryle supposes two English emigrants in New Zealand or Australia. He says, "Give each of them a piece of land to clear and cultivate. Let the portions allotted to them be the same both in quantity and quality. Secure that land to them by every needful legal instrument; let it be conveyed as freehold to them and theirs forever; let the conveyance be publicly registered, and the property made sure to them by every deed and security that man's ingenuity can devise. Suppose then that one of them shall set to work to bring his land into cultivation, and labor at it day after day without intermission or cessation. Suppose in the meanwhile that the other be continually leaving his work, and going repeatedly to the public registry, to ask whether the land is really his own, whether there is not some mistake—whether, after all, there is not some flaw in the legal instrument which conveyed it to him. The one shall never doubt his title, but just work diligently on. The other shall hardly ever feel sure of his title, and spend half his time in going to Sydney or Auckland with needless inquiries about it. Which now of these two men will have made most progress in a year's time? Who will have done the most for his land, got the greatest breadth of soil under tillage, have the best crops to show, be altogether the most prosperous?"

6600. ASTRONOMY, Discoveries in. The succession of noble discoveries made by Galileo, the most splendid, probably, which it ever fell to the lot of one individual to make, in a better age would have entitled its author to the admiration and gratitude of the whole scientific world; but they were viewed at the time with suspicion and jealousy. The ability and success with which Galileo had labored to overturn the doctrines of Aristotle and the schoolmen, as well as to establish the motion of the earth, and the immobility of the sun, excited many enemies. The Romish Church itself was roused to action by reflecting that it had staked the infallibility of its judgments on the truth of the very opinions which were now in danger of being overthrown. The Dialogues of Galileo contained a full exposition of the evidence of the earth's motion, and set forth the errors of the old as well as the discoveries of the new philosophy with great force of reasoning, and with the charms of the most lively eloquence. They are written with such singular felicity, that we read them at the present day, when the truths contained in them are known and admitted, with all the delight of novelty, and feel carried back to the period when the telescope was first directed to the heavens, and when the earth's motion, with all its train of consequences, was proved for the first time. The author of such a work could not be forgiven. Galileo, accordingly, was twice brought before the Inquisition. The first time a council of seven cardinals pronounced a sentence, which ought never to be forgotten: "That to maintain the sun to be immovable, and without local motion, in the centre of the world, is an absurd proposition, false in philosophy, heretical in religion, and contrary to the testimony of Scripture. That it is equally absurd and false in philosophy to assert that the earth is not immovable in the centre of the world, and considered theologically, equally erroneous and heretical." Galileo was threatened with imprisonment unless he would retract his opinions, and a promise was at length extorted from him that he would not teach the doctrine of the earth's motion either by speaking or writing. To this promise he did not conform. In the year 1663, Galileo, now seventy years old, was again brought before the Inquisition, forced solemnly to disavow his belief in the earth's motion, and condemned to perpetual imprisonment, though the sentence was afterwards mitigated, and he was allowed to return to Florence. The sentence appears to have pressed heavily on Galileo's mind, and he never afterwards either talked or wrote upon the subject of astronomy.

Anon.

6601. ASTRONOMY, Study of. The contemplation of celestial things will make a man both speak and think more sublimely and magnificently when he descends to human affairs.

Cicero.

6602. ASYLUM, The Lunatic. I recollect, as all do, the story of the Hall of Eblis, in "bathek," and how each shape, as it lifted its hand from its breast, showed its heart, a burning coal. The real Hall of Eblis stands on yonder summit. Go there on the next visiting-day, and ask that figure crouched in the corner, huddled up like those Indian mummies and skeletons found buried in the sitting posture, to lift its hand, and look upon its heart, and behold, not fire, but ashes.

Holmes.

6603. ATHEISM, Conversion from. A Griqua, in South Africa, stated that the first thing which led him to think of religion was observing the Hottentots, who belonged to the Zak River Mission, giving thanks when eating. "I went," said he, "afterwards to that settlement, where I heard many things, but felt no interest in them. But one day, when alone in the fields, I looked very seriously at a mountain, as the work of that God of whom I had heard; then I looked to my two hands, and for the first time noticed that there was the same number of fingers on each. I asked, Why are there not five on this hand and three on that? It must be God that made them so. Then I examined my feet, and wondered to find my soles both flat; not one flat and the other round. God must have done this, said I. In this way I considered my whole body, which made a deep impression on my mind, and disposed me to hear the Word of God with more interest, till I was brought to believe that Jesus died for my sins." Cyclo. of Missions.

6604. ATHEISM, Cultivation of. When people come to me, tell me they can't believe, and ask what they shall do, I tell them to do as I once knew a man do. He went and knelt down and told God honestly he could not believe in him, and I advise them to go off alone and tell it right out to the Lord. But if you stop to ask yourselves why you don't believe in him, is there really any reason? People read infidel books and wonder why they are unbelievers. I ask why they read such books. They think they must read both sides. I say that book is a lie; how can it be one side when it is a lie? It is not one side at all. Suppose a man tells right down lies about my family, and I read them so as to hear both sides; it would not be long before some suspicion would creep into my mind. I said to a man once, "Have you got a wife?" "Yes, and a good one." I asked: "Now, what if I should come to you and cast out insinuations against her?" And he said, "Well, your life would not be safe long if you did." I told him just to treat the devil as he would treat a man who went round with such stories. We are not to blame for having doubts fitting through our minds, but for harboring them. Moody.

6605. ATHEISM, Father of. Three young men were executed in Edinburgh. Immediately after committing the crimes for which they suffered, one evening they heard the family with whom they lodged employed in the worship of God. This suggested the question, Whether there is a God, and a world to come? After some discussion, they came to this conclusion, "That there is no God, and no world to come!"—a conclusion, as they themselves acknowledged, to which they came on this sole ground, that they wished it to be so.

6606. ATHEISM, Inexcusable. As the Lord Verulam observes, God never wrought a miracle to convince an atheist, because his ordinary works may convince him; and unless men will be willfully and stubbornly blind, they must needs subscribe to that of St. Paul (Acts 14, 17): "God hath not left himself without witness, in that he doth good, and gives us rain from heaven, and fruitful seasons, filling our hearts with food and gladness." And (Rom. 1, 20): "The invisible things of God are clearly seen from the creation of the world, being understood by the things that are made, even his eternal power and Godhead: so that they are without excuse." When we see foot-steps evidently imprinted on the earth, shall we not easily collect that certainly some one hath passed that way? When we see a stately fabric built according to all the rules of art, and adorned with all the riches and beauty that magnificence can expend about it, must we not presently conclude, that certainly there was some skillful architect that built it? Truly, every creature is quoddam vestigium Dei: we may observe his footsteps in it; and see how his attributes, his wisdom, his goodness, and his power have passed along that way. And the whole world is a stately fabric; a house that God hath erected for himself: the magnificence and splendor of it are suitable to the state of the Great King: it is his palace built for the house of his kingdom and the honors of his majesty; and we may easily conclude that so excellent a structure must needs have an excellent architect, and that the builder and maker of it is God. Bp. Hopkins.

6607. ATHEISM, Refutation of. One dandelion seed would seem to be enough to cut up all atheism by the roots. Its finely-spread balloon with its seed hanging like a miniature car as it floats through the air is certainly a piece of mechanism perfect for the end in view. Prof. Chadbourne.

6608. ATHEISM, Unsatisfactory. There was a celebrated poet who was an atheist, or at least professed to be so. According to him there was no God. So he held when sailing over the unruffled surface of the Ægean sea. But the scene changed; and, with the scene, his creed. The heavens began to scowl upon him; and the deep uttered an angry voice, and, as if in astonishment at this God-denying man, "lifted up his hands on high." The storm increased, till the ship became unmanageable. She drifted before the tempest. The terrible cry, "Breakers ahead!" was soon heard; and how they trembled to see death seated on the horrid reef, waiting for his prey! A few moments more, and the crash comes. They are whelmed in the devouring sea? No! They are saved by a singular providence. Like apprehended evils, which in a Christian's experience, prove to be blessings, the wave, which flung them forward on the horrid reef, came on in such mountain volume as to bear and float them over into the safety of deep and ample searoom. But ere that happened, a companion of the atheist, who, seated on the prow, had been taking his last regretful look of heaven and earth, sea and sky, turned his eyes down upon the deck, and there, among papists who told their beads and cried to the Virgin, he saw the atheist prostrated with fear. The tempest had blown away his fine-spun speculations like so many cobwebs: and he was on his knees, imploring God for mercy. In that hour—in that terrible extremity—Nature rose in her might, asserted her supremacy, vindicated the claims of religion, smote down infidelity by a stroke, and bent the stubborn knees of atheism in lowliest prayer. Dr. Guthrie.

6609. ATHEIST, Challenge to an. A New England minister was in the midst of a great revival, which was boldly opposed and ridiculed by an influential physician in the place, who claimed to be an atheist. One evening in his discourse he proposed to submit the issue between himself and the infidels to the test of experiment, agreeing, that if any one would do as he should direct, and fail to find religion to be a divine reality, he would renounce the Bible and become an infidel. Then, raising his voice, and looking the troublesome doctor square in the face, he asked, "Does any gentleman accept my challenge?" Upon this the doctor stepped out into the aisle and answered, "I accept it." "Well," said the preacher, "then come forward to the altar," which he did. "Now," said the preacher, "I will state my proposition again, that there may be no misunderstanding between us." Having done so the doctor assented to it. Every thing being ready, and the thronged assembly in painful anxiety, the preacher demanded of the doctor to kneel down. He did so. "Now," said he, with awful solemnity, "Doctor, call upon God Almighty to have mercy on your soul." The doctor, looking up into his face, replied, "I don't believe there is any such being." "There," said the preacher, "he breaks the contract at the start—he was to do as I directed." He modified the prayer to accommodate his unbelief, saying, "Well, doctor pray this way, 'If there be a God, have mercy on my soul.'" There was no getting away from this, and the doctor commenced and proceeded with perfect deliberation until he reached the petition, when he cried at the top of his voice, and from the deep of his heart, "Have mercy on my soul!" and went on to pray without further direction. The explanation is, that having reached that point in utter unconcern, God sent the spirit of awakening upon him as he did upon Saul of Tarsus. Of course the experiment was a success and the renewed doctor came to know the doctrine to be of God, and to defend it. Dr. James Porter.

6610. ATHEIST, Confusion of an. Dr. Mackay, of Hull, said in a meeting recently, "Once a skeptic in Dr. Bonar's church said: 'Sir, I do not believe there is a God.' It was ten P. M., and no time for argument. I cast the burden on the Lord in prayer, and looked so happy, that he said, 'Are you laughing at me?' No; but I was thinking if all the grasshoppers on earth were to say there is no sun, it would not alter the matter. The Bible says, 'The fool hath said in his heart, There is no God.' 'Well, that is so,' he said. I then showed him that God calls every man who does not believe in him a liar. The man went home seeming much impressed; and when I met him some months afterwards he said, 'I found out that I was a fool and a liar, and have come to Christ.'"

6611. ATHEIST, Folly of the. He that acts wisely, and is a thoroughly prudent man, will be provided against all events, and will take care to secure the main chance, whatever happens; but the atheist, in case things should fall out contrary to his belief and expectation, hath made no provision for this case. If, contrary to his confidence, it should prove in the issue that there is a God, the man is lost and undone for ever. If the atheist, when he dies, should find that his soul remains after his body, and has only quitted its lodging, how will this man be amazed and blanked when, contrary to his expectation, he shall find himself in a new and strange place, amidst a world of spirits, entered upon an everlasting and unchangeable state! How sadly will the man be disappointed when he finds all things otherwise than he had stated and determined them in this world!

When he comes to appear before that God whom he hath denied and against whom he hath spoken as despicable things as he could, who can imagine the pale and guilty looks of this man, and how he will shiver and tremble for the fear of the Lord, and for the glory of his majesty? How will he be surprised, with terrors on every side, to find himself thus unexpectedly and irrevocably plunged into a state of ruin and desperation! And thus things may happen for all this man's confidence now. For our belief or disbelief of a thing does not alter the nature of the thing. We cannot fancy things into being, or make them vanish into nothing, by the stubborn confidence of our imaginations. Things are as sullen as we are, and will be what they are, whatever we think of them. And if there be a God, a man cannot by an obstinate disbelief of him make him cease to be, any more than a man can put out the sun by winking. Tillotson.

6612. ATHEIST, Reform of an. Napoleon Bonaparte put a man by the name of Charney into prison. A little flower grew within the enclosure of the prison yard; above it, on the wall, was written, "All things come by chance." But day by day, as he took his lonely walk, the flower was teaching him lessons of trust, and he made a frame to support it and a shelter to protect it from pelting rains. He felt that all things could not come by chance; there is one who made this flower so wonderfully beautiful and keeps it alive. He brushed the lying words from the wall, while his heart felt "he who made all things is God." But other blessings came to the prisoner. The Empress Josephine, hearing of Charney's love for the flower, became interested in him. She thought "a man that loves and tends a flower cannot be a bad man." She persuaded the Emperor to set him at liberty. Charney carried his flower home, and carefully tended it in his own greenhouse. It had taught him to believe in God, and had also delivered him from prison.

6613. ATONEMENT, Accepting the. When a sacrifice under the law was brought to be slain, he that brought it was to put his hand upon the head of the sacrifice, and so it was accepted for him, to make an atonement (Lev. 1, 4), not only to signify that now it was no more his but God's, the property being transferred by a kind of manumission, nor yet merely that he voluntarily gave it to the Lord as his own free act; but principally it signified the putting off his sins, and the penalty due for them, upon the head of the sacrifice; and so it implied in it an execration as if he had said, "Upon thy head be the evil." So the learned observe, the ancient Egyptians were wont expressly to imprecate when they sacrificed, "If any evil be coming upon us or upon Egypt, let it turn and rest upon his head," laying their hand, at these words, on the sacrifice's head. And upon that ground, says Herodotus, the historian, none of them would eat of the head of any living creature. You must also lay the hand of faith upon Christ your sacrifice, not to imprecate but to apply and appropriate him to your own souls, he having been made a curse for you.

John Flavel.

6614. ATONEMENT, Applying the. Canst thou look upon Jesus as standing in thy room, to bear the wrath of God for thee, canst thou think on it and not melt? That when thou, like Isaac, wast bound to the altar, to be offered up to justice, Christ, like the ram caught in the thicket, was offered in thy room. That when thy sins had raised a fearful tempest, threatening every moment to bury thee in a sea of wrath, Jesus Christ was thrown over to appease that storm! Can thy heart dwell one hour upon such a subject as this? Canst thou, with faith, present Christ to thyself, as he was taken down from the cross, drenched in his own blood, and say, These were the wounds that he received for me; this is he that loved me, and gave himself for me; out of these wounds comes that balm that heals my soul, out of these stripes my peace?

Flavel.

6615. ATONEMENT, Appropriating the. Now we may say, "Lord, the condemnation was thine, that the justification might be mine; the agony thine, that the victory might be mine; the pain was thine, and the ease is mine; the stripes thine, and the healing balm issuing from them mine; the vinegar and the gall were thine, that the honey and sweet might be mine; the curse was thine, that the blessing might be mine; the crown of thorns was thine, that the crown of glory might be mine; thou paidst the price, that I might enjoy the inheritance."

John Flavel.

6616. ATONEMENT by the Cross. Let us no more admire the enormous moats and bridges of Caligula across to Baira, or that of Trajan over the Danube (stupendous work of stone and marble) to the adverse shores, whilst our timber and our trees, making us bridges to the furthest Indies and antipodes, land us into new worlds. In a word (and to speak a bold and noble truth), trees and woods have twice saved the whole world; first by the ark, then by the cross; making full amends for the evil fruit of the tree in paradise, by that which was borne on the tree in Golgotha.

Evelyn.

6617. ATONEMENT, Effects of the. It is said of Zeleucus, a king of the ancient Locri, that he enacted a law, the penalty of which was that the offender should lose both his eyes. One of his sons became a transgressor of that law. The father had his attachment to his son, and the law he himself had promulgated as righteous in its requirements and in its penalty. The lawgiver, it is said, ordered his son into his presence, and required that one of his eyes should be taken out; and then, in order to show mercy to his son, and at the same time maintain the penalty of the law, he sacrificed one of his own eyes as a ransom for the remaining eye of his child. The king was the lawgiver; he therefore had the power to pardon his son, without inflicting the penalty upon him, and without enduring any sacrifice himself. Every mind, therefore, would feel that it was a voluntary act on the part of the king; and such an exhibition of justice and mercy, maintaining the law and saving his son by his own sacrifice, would impress all minds with the deepest reverence for the character of the lawgiver, and for the sacredness of the law. But another effect, deep and lasting in its character, would be produced upon the son who had transgressed the law. Every time that he looked upon his father, or remembered what he had suffered for his transgression, it would increase his love for him, increase his reverence for the law, and cause an abhorrence of his crime to rise in his soul. His feelings would be more kind towards his sire, more submissive to the law, and more averse to transgression. Now, this is precisely the effect necessary to be produced, in order that pardon may be extended to transgressors, and yet just and righteous government be maintained.

Walker.

6618. ATONEMENT, Jewish Custom of. The following is a report made by a committee of the Church of Scotland of their observations among the Jews: "We spread our mats on the clay floor at Jassy, and attempted to sleep, but in vain. We cared less for this, however, because it was the night preceding the day of atonement, and we had thus an opportunity of seeing the curious ceremony which then takes place. On the eve of that solemn day it is the custom of the Jews to kill a cock for every man, and a hen for every woman. During the repetition of a certain form of prayer, Jews or Jewesses move the living fowl round their head three times, then they lay their hands on it, as the hands used to be laid on the sacrifices, and immediately after give it to be slaughtered. We rose before one in the morning, and saw the Jewish Shochet or 'slayer' going round to the Jewish houses, waking each family, and giving them a light from his lantern, in order that they might rise and bring out their 'Chipporah' or 'atonement,' namely, the appointed cock and hen. We walked about the streets; everywhere the sound of the imprisoned fowls was to be heard, and a light seen in all the dwellings of Israel. In two houses the fowls were already dead and plucked. In another we came to the window, and saw distinctly what was going on within. A little boy was reading the prayers and his widowed mother standing over him, with a white hen in her hands. When he came to a certain place in the prayer, the mother lifted up the struggling fowl, and waved it round her head, repeating these words, 'This be my substitute, this be my exchange; this fowl shall go to death, and I to a blessed life.' This was done three times over, and then the door of the house opened, and out ran the boy carrying the fowl to the Shochet, to be killed by him in the proper manner."

6619. ATONEMENT, Illustrating the. A deaf and dumb boy was taught by a kind friend. This kind lady could speak to him only by signs and pictures. She drew upon a paper a picture of a great crowd of people, old and young, standing near a wide, deep pit, out of which smoke and flames were issuing. She then drew the figure of One who came down from heaven, and this was to represent Jesus Christ the Son of God. She explained to the boy that when this person came, he asked God not to throw the people into the pit, if he himself agreed to be nailed to a cross for them, and how, as soon as he bowed his head on the cross and died, the pit was shut up and the people saved. The deaf and dumb boy wondered much, but he made signs that the person who died on the cross was but one, and the crowd very many. How could God be contented to take one for so many? The lady took off her gold ring and put it beside a great heap of withered leaves of flowers, and asked the boy which was the best, the one gold ring, or the many, many dry leaves. The boy clapped his hands with delight, and spelt the "One! one!" And then to show that he knew what this meant, and that Jesus was the one who was worth all the rest, he ran and got his letters, and looking up, spelt the words, "Good, good one!" He had learned that day that Jesus alone had saved the crowd of people, or sinners, and he stood wondering at his love. A. A. Bonar.

6620. ATONEMENT, Pagan. There is a record of an ancient Hindoo custom, in which the offender brought a horse to a priest, and confessed his sins over the head of the animal, with certain religious rites. The horse was then turned into the wilderness and supposed to bear away the sins of the offender. This custom was similar to the scapegoat of the Israelites.

6621. ATONEMENT, Reliance on the. Thomas, Earl of Kinnoul, a short time before his death, said: "I have always considered the atonement to be characteristic of the gospel, as a system of religion. Strip it of that doctrine, and you reduce it to a scheme of morality, excellent indeed, and such as the world never saw; but to man, in the present state of his faculties, absolutely impracticable. The atonement of Christ, and the truths immediately connected with that fundamental principle, provide a remedy for all the wants and weaknesses of our nature. They who strive to remove those precious doctrines from the word of God, do an irreparable injury to the grand and beautiful system of religion which it contains, as well as to the comforts and hopes of man. For my own part, I am now an old man, and have experienced the infirmities of advanced years. Of late, in the course of severe and dangerous illness, I have been repeatedly brought to the gates of death. My time in this world cannot now be long; but, with truth I can declare that, in the midst of all my past afflictions, my heart was supported and comforted by a firm reliance upon the merits and atonement of my Saviour; and now, in the prospect of entering upon an eternal world, this is the only foundation of my confidence and hope."

6622. ATONEMENT, Voluntary. A sacrifice that struggled, and came not without force to the altar, was reckoned ominous and unlucky by the heathen; our sacrifice dedicated himself, he died out of choice, and was a free-will offering.

John Flavel.

6623. ATTAINMENTS No Atonement. However right our experiences or attainments or walk or service may be in their place, they are not the offering for atonement, nor can they ever be the ground of peace. And indeed, for a Christian to seek his food in these things is as though an Israelite were to take his garments to feed on. In truth the man who seeks satisfaction in his own attainments just does this: what should be his raiment, he makes his meat. The garments of the Israelite are the appointed symbol of a man's deportment and manifested character. So the New Testament interprets the type: "The fine linen is the righteousness of saints." This garment might be easily defiled. But let us suppose it clean—are garments to be fed on? The type answers at once: it is the meat of the altar, the sweet savor alone, which satisfies. Our prayers, our love, our service: these things, like the leavened cake at Pentecost, though accepted for the sake of what accompanies them, are one and all in themselves blemished. A. Jukes.

6624. ATTENTION, Holding. A ship-builder was asked what he thought of Mr. Whitefield's preaching. "Think!" he replied. "I tell you, sir, that every Sunday I go to my parish church I can build a ship from stem to stern under the sermon, but were it to save my soul I could not under Mr. Whitefield's preaching lay a single plank."

6625. ATTENTION, Selfish. There was a certain brazier who had a little dog. While he hammered away at his metal, the dog slept; but whenever he sat down to his dinner the dog woke up. "Sluggard cur!" said the brazier, throwing him a bone; "you sleep through the noise of the anvil, but wake up at the first clatter of my teeth."

Æsop.

6626. ATTRACTION, Method of. The surest way of turning a person from one pleasure is to give him a greater pleasure on the opposite side. A weeping willow planted by a pond in a pleasure garden turns all to one side in its growth, and that the side on which the water lies. No dealing with its roots or with its branches will avail to change its attitude; but place a larger expanse of water on the opposite side, and the tree will turn spontaneously and hang the other way. So must man's heart be won.

William Arnot.

6627. ATTRACTIONS, Personal. King Philip so far doted on a fair Thessalian lady that she was suspected to have used some private arts of fascination towards him. Wherefore Olympias labored to get the supposed sorceress into her power. But when the queen had viewed her well, and duly examined her beauty, beheld the graces of her deportment, and considered her discourse, bespake her no less than a person of noble descent and education: "Hence, fond suspicions, hence vainer calumnies!" said she, "for I plainly find the charms which thou makest use of are in thyself."

Plutarch.

6628. AUSTERITY, Monkish. No more conspicuous example is found than Simeon Stylites, the pillar saint. The monks of his monastery ate once a day. He made but one meal a week, and that on Sundays. He took a rough rope of twisted palm-leaves and tied it tightly around his body underneath his clothes. It cut into his flesh and made running wounds, which become offensive and revealed his self-mortification. When cut from his body in which it had become imbedded he was left as one dead. For this he was turned out of his monastery. He passed twenty-six Lents without eating or drinking anything, according to Theodoret. He built an enclosure by piling together a few rough stones on the top of Mt. Thelonissa, and bolted his right leg to a rock with an iron chain. He passed thirty-seven years on the top of pillars; four years on one six cubits high, three years on the second twelve cubits high, ten years on a third twenty-two cubits high, twenty years on the fourth forty cubits high. His fame was very great. Throngs gathered to receive his blessing; great numbers of heathen are reported to have been converted by him. He was clad in skins and wore an iron collar. He could not lie down on the top of his pillar, and had no seat. He was known to pray as many as twelve hundred times a day. Twice daily he exhorted the people. At last he bowed himself in prayer and so remained for three days. Then, one of his disciples went up to the top of his pillar and said, "Master, arise and bless us, for the people have been waiting three days and nights for a blessing from thee." It was then discovered that he was dead. He died A. D. 460, and is enrolled in the calendar for January 5.

6629. AUTHOR, Advice to an. Samuel Foote, the comedian, was much annoyed by a pompous physician of Bath, who told him he had a mind to publish his own poems, but that he had so many irons in the fire he did not know what to do. Foote replied, "Take my advice, doctor, and put your poems where your irons are."

6630. AUTHOR, Empire of the. That man has an empire beyond that of the highest monarch that now lives. It has been said that the Queen of this great empire has a kingdom upon which the sun never sets; yet her empire, great as it is, is neither so wide nor so deep as that of the man who rules in the empire of your affections and in the kingdom of thought. Dixon.

6631. AUTHOR, Influence of the. An author may influence the fortunes of the world to as great an extent as a statesman or a warrior; and the deeds and performances by which this influence is created and exercised, may rank in their interest and importance with the decisions of great Congresses, or the skillful valor of a memorable field. It is certainly not too much to maintain, that the exploits of Homer, Aristotle, Dante, or Lord Bacon, were as considerable events as any that occurred at Actium, Lepanto, or Blenheim. A book may be as great a thing as a battle, and there are systems of philosophy that have produced as great revolutions as any that have disturbed even the social and political existence of our centuries. I. Disraeli.

6632. AUTHORITY, Deference to. The Emperor

Adrian, not content with being the first in power, was ambitious to be the first in letters, He once corrected Favorinus for employing an improper word. He submitted with patience, though he was convinced that he was correct. When his friends objected to his compliance, he answered, "Shall not I easily suffer him to be the most learned of all men who has thirty legions at his command?"

6633. AUTHORITY, Private Judgment and. True it is that differences amongst Protestants are the great boast and great strength of the Church of Rome. And just so, contests between Whigs and Tories are matter of scornful exultation, no doubt, to the Russian autocrat. He has no members of Parliament making speeches against each other: all being under one despotic monarchy. And true it is that in all questions, religious or political, where there is a right and a wrong, several different parties cannot be all right. When all are forced into agreement or outward submission, what they submit to may conceivably be right. But suppose it is not? Then all are in the wrong; and truth and right have no chance at all, to the end of time. When Bonaparte was, with his attendants, overtaken in Egypt by the tide of the Red Sea, out of sight of the shore, the whole party were in danger of being drowned; and if he had given orders to proceed in some one direction, if that had chanced not to be the right one, all must have perished. He told them each to ride in the direction he judged best; and if the water was found to deepen, to turn back; if to grow shallower, to shout out to his comrades. Thus, the one who hit on the right course saved both himself and the rest. But if some of the rest had been (as in religion, politics, and other matters) too perverse to follow the proved right course, at least some would have been saved.

Archbp. Whately.

6634. AUTHORSHIP, Pride of. "I am going to fly," cried the gigantic ostrich; and the whole assembly of birds gathered round in earnest expectation. "I am going to fly," he cried again; and stretching out his immense pinions he shot, like a ship with outspread sails, away over the ground, without, however, rising an inch above it. Thus it happens, when a notion of being poetical takes possession of unpoetical brains; in the opening of their monstrous odes they boast of their intention to soar over clouds and stars, but nevertheless remain constant to the dust. Lessing.

6635. AUTOBIOGRAPHY, Difficulty of. It is a hard and nice subject for a man to write of himself; it grates his own heart to say anything of disparagement, and the reader's ears to hear anything of praise from him. Cowley.

6636. AUTUMN, Harvest of. However constant the visitations of sickness and bereavement, the fall of the year is most thickly strewn with the fall of human life. Everywhere the spirit of some sad power seems to direct the time: it hides from us the blue heavens, it makes the green wave turbid; it walks through the fields, and lays the damp ungathered harvest low; it cries out in the night wind and the shrill hail; it steals the summer bloom from the infant cheek; it makes old age shiver to the heart; it goes to the churchyard, and chooses many a grave; it flies to the bell, and enjoins it when to toll. It is God that goes his yearly round; that gathers up the appointed lives; and, even where the hour is not come, engraves by pain and poverty many a sharp and solemn lesson on the heart.

James Martineau.

6637. AUTUMN, Moral of. A moral character is attached to autumnal scenes; the leaves falling like our years, the flowers fading like our hours, the clouds fleeting like our illusions, the light diminishing like our intelligence, the sun growing colder like our affections, the rivers becoming frozen like our lives—all bear secret relations to our destinies. Chateaubriand.

6638. AVARICE, Absorption of. A New Hampshire farmer, stricken with mortal illness, was advised to make any business arrangements necessary before his death. He sent his son to find a stocking filled with gold under the barn, and another in the garret. They were brought and the glittering eagles poured upon the bed within his reach. He was repeatedly reminded that haste was necessary if he had any other business. In silence he handled the gold upon which his heart was set, till death stiffened his fingers, and his sordid soul entered his Maker's presence bankrupt.

6639. AVARICE, Claim of. Some Turks freighted a ship from Alexandria for Constantinople. On the voyage a storm arose, which made it necessary to throw overboard the cargo to save the lives of the passengers who were owners of the freight. The alternative of the loss of all or of the cargo was laid before them by the captain, and they consented to the loss of their freight to save their lives. Arrived safely in Constantinople, the freighters commenced an action against the captain of the vessel for the value of the goods. The judge decided that the law required that the master should pay the true value of those goods at the moment the goods were thrown into the sea. Witnesses were required, but none could be obtained save those who had in the emergency consented to give the goods for their lives. Decision was given for the defendant. Many sacrifice in peril but recall the offering as soon as safety is gained.

6640. AVARICE, Conquering. Shortly after conversion, a chimney sweep attended a Missionary meeting. He was the possessor of one shilling and two-pence. His heart was drawn out to give, and as the collector was coming up the aisle, a question of some difficulty arose, "Which shall I give? Copper, silver; which is to go? Those poor Pagans are in awful case;—but then: a shilling is a good lump;—it is my last; and where the next is to come from I don't see. Mammon has it, on goes two-pence. The closing prayer commenced. The petitions were too big for my gift. I felt mean. So quietly going up the aisle, I stealthily dropped my shilling on the plate. Then I could say 'Amen,' as lustily as the best of them.

But, I lost my two-pence. So I learned stinginess to be a losing game. When old Satar has tempted me to it, since then I've often thrown that two-pence in his face; and I don't believe he likes it."

6641. AVARICE, Cupidity of. When Dr. Vanderkemp was in Kafirland, a Pagan Chief sent him a present of two milch cows with their calves, in a time of great drouth, to induce him to procure rain, the Pagan rain-makers having failed. The doctor refused to accept the present, and assured the chief that he could not make rain, but that he would pray to his God for it. He did so, and his prayer was abundantly answered. Some English adventurers then residing there, criticised Dr. Vanderkemp's rejection of the gift, and one of them named Buys, sent to the Chief in the missionaries' name, saying the gift was not enough for the service. The present was largely increased and the covetous European appropriated it to his own use. His crime was detected and so fully exposed that the missionary influence was not injured. Buys was afterward murdered. This case parallels the account of Gehazi in cupidity.

6642. AVARICE, in Death. A minister relates that one of his parishioners, a faithful attendant upon the services of the church, and a man of considerable wealth, could never be induced to give anything to any benevolent object. On his death-bed he sent for the minister and asked him what he thought would become of him. He exhorted him to repent, and renounce the world if he would be saved. The miser gazed at his admonisher in amazement. Give up the world, his treasures, he would not. Even then, within a few moments of death, he was grasping the keys to the cabinet which contained his treasures, and held them in his hands concealed under the bed-clothes. He could not give them up, but death opened his hand. He passed into eternity clutching his keys. Such is the power of avarice, as it sometimes develops when it supplants the love of God in the professor's heart.

6643. AVARICE, Evil of. Avarice isolates man from the great universe and the holy God, deadens the sensibilities to the highest joys, and shuts the soul up in its own dark self, the victim of a thousand miserable suspicions, and the subject of attributes that every generous heart must loathe. Dr. Thomas.

6644. AVARICE, Expedient of. An avaricious man will proceed to any lengths of crime that his desires may be satisfied. An instance of this is given us in the story of the death of Caius Gracchus. To any one who would bring his head a reward was offered of its weight in gold. A dastardly wretch snatched it from the hand of him who had been his executioner, that he might himself procure the prize. But before he delivered up the head it is said that he took out its brains and filled the cavity with molten lead, that when it was weighed his prize might be the larger.

Anon.
6645. AVARICE, Folly of. Can anything be more senselessly absurd than that, the nearer we are to our journey's end, we should still lay in more provisions for it? Cicero.

6646. AVARICE, Greed of. Among Mohammed's revelations was the following: "If a son of Adam had two rivers of gold he would covet yet a third; and if he had three he would covet yet a fourth."

6647. AVARICE, Growth of. An indolent Oriental, says the fable, had a nice garden of leeks, but was not satisfied, and complained of the labor required to till it. Fortune favored him with the gift of a beautiful villa and two slaves to wait on him. He was delighted, and promised to crave nothing more. Not long after he coveted a neighboring garden adorned with statues and fountains, which was given him. Then he took a great fancy to the meadow beyond; this also was granted him. Then he wanted the park adjoining on the other side, and it was bestowed on him. Then like Ahab he wanted to rob a poor man of his little vineyard which lay next to the park. Avarice is an insatiable monster; the more he is fed the more he craves.

6650. AVARICE, Madness of. The ship Britannia, which struck on the rocks off the coast of Brazil, had on board a large consignment of Spanish dollars. In the hope of saving some of them, a number of barrels were brought on deck, but the vessel was sinking so fast that the only hope for life was in taking at once to the boats. The last boat was about to push off, when a midshipman rushed back to see if any one was still on board. To his surprise, there sat a man on deck with a hatchet in his hand, with which he had broken open several of the casks, the contents of which he was now heaping up about him. "What are you doing?" shouted the youth. "Escape for your life! Don't you know the ship is fast going to pieces?" "The ship may," said the man. "I have lived a poor wretch all my life, and I am determined to die rich." His remonstrances were answered only by another flourish of the hatchet; and he was left to his fate. In a few minutes, the ship was engulfed in the waves. We count such a person a madman; but he has too many imitators. Many men seem determined to die rich at all hazards. Least of all risks do they count the chance of losing the soul in the struggle. And yet the only riches we can hug to our bosom with joy in our dying hour are the riches of grace, through faith in our only Saviour, Jesus Christ. Let us make these riches ours before the dark hour comes. Anon.

6651. AVARICE, Mistake of. In the ruins of Pompeii there was found a petrified woman, who, instead of trying to fly from the city, had spent her time in gathering up her jewels. Multitudes are making the same mistake.

6652. AVARICE, Oriental Proverbs. "My friend, why are you so anxious after this world? How much did you bring into it? How much will you take out?" "Ah, my son! be charitable to all; recollect you brought nothing into the world, and be assured you will take nothing out." "That wretch would like to carry his money and lands into the other world." "Tambly, did you bring these fields into the world with you? No, and they will remain when you are gone." Roberts.

6653. AVARICE, Power of. In Mediæval Rome, I know not where, There stood an image with its arm in air, And on its lifted finger, shining clear, A golden ring with the device, "Strike here!" Greatly the people wondered, though none guessed The meaning that these words but half expressed, Until a learned clerk, who at noonday With downcast eyes was passing on his way, Paused, and observed the spot, and marked it well, Whereon the shadow of the finger fell; And, coming back at midnight, delved, and found A secret stairway leading under ground, Down this he passed into a spacious hall, Lit by a flaming jewel on the wall; And opposite a brazen statue stood With bow and shaft in threatening attitude. Upon its forehead, like a coronet, Were these mysterious words of menace set: "That which I am, I am; my fatal aim None can escape, not even yon luminous flame!" Midway the hall was a fair table placed, With cloth of gold, and golden cups enshased With rubies, and the plates and knives were gold— And gold the bread and viands manifold. Around it, silent, motionless and sad, Were seated gallant knights in armor clad, And ladies beautiful with plume and zone, But they were stone, their hearts within were stone: And the vast hall was filled in every part With silent crowds, stony in face and heart.

Long at the scene, bewildered and amazed, The trembling clerk in speechless wonder gazed; Then from the table, by his greed made bold, He seized a goblet and a knife of gold, And suddenly from their seats the guests up-sprang, The vaulted ceiling with loud clamors rang. The archer sped his arrow, at their call, Shattering the lambent jewel on the wall, And all was dark around and overhead:— Stark on the floor the luckless clerk lay dead!

The writer of this legend then records Its ghostly application in these words: The image is the Adversary old, Whose beckoning finger points to realms of gold; Our lusts and passions are the downward stair That leads the soul from a diviner air; The archer, Death; the flaming jewel, Life; Terrestrial goods, the goblet and the knife;

The knights and ladies, all whose flesh and bone By avarice have been hardened into stone; The clerk, the scholar whom the love of pelf Tempts from his books and from his nobler self.

The scholar and the world ! The endless strife,
The discord in the harmonies of life !
The love of learning, the sequestered nooks,
And all the sweet serenity of books ;
The market-place, the eager love of gain,
Whose aim is vanity, and whose end is pain !
H. W. Longfellow.

6654. AVARICE, Penalty of. In one of the houses of Pompeii the skeleton of a man was found "Who apparently for the sake of sixty coins, a small plate, and a saucepan of silver, had remained in his house till the street was already half filled with volcanic matter. He was found as if in the act of escaping from the window."

6655. AVERSIONS, A Bundle of. Some people's sensibility is a mere bundle of aversions, and you hear them display and parade it, not in recounting the things they are attached to, but in telling how many things and persons they "cannot bear." John Foster.

6656. AWAKENING, Simile of. Carl Steinman, who visited Mount Hecla, Iceland, just before the last great eruption in 1845, after a repose of eighty years, narrowly escaped death by venturing into the smoking crater against the earnest entreaty of his guide. On the brink of the yawning gulf he was prostrated by a convulsion of the summit, and held there by blocks of lava upon his feet. He graphically writes: "Oh, the horrors of that awful realization! There, over the mouth of a black and heated abyss, I was held suspended, a helpless and conscious prisoner, to be hurled downward by the next great throes of trembling Nature! 'Help, help, help!—for the love of God, help!' I shrieked in the very agony of my despair. I had nothing to rely upon but the mercy of Heaven; and I prayed to God as I had never prayed before for a forgiveness of my sins, that they might not follow me to judgment. All at once, I heard a shout; and, looking around, I beheld, with feelings that can not be described, my faithful guide hastening down the sides of the crater to my relief. 'I warned you!' said he. 'You did!' cried I: 'but forgive me and save me; for I am perishing!' 'I will save you, or perish with you!' The earth trembled, and the rocks parted; one of them rolling down the chasm with a dull, booming sound. I sprang forward; I seized a hand of the guide; and the next moment we had both fallen, locked in each other's arms, upon the solid earth above. I was free, but still upon the verge of the pit." We do not know of a more vivid illustration of the deepest spiritual experience in the transition of the soul from impenitence to pardon. The incautious sinner ventures among the very flames of Sinai, over the crumbling verge of eternal death. If awakened to see his guilt and peril, how consciously helpless, and how hopeless his condition so far as his self-reliance is concerned! But, when the cry of distress for help goes up, lo! Jesus, the sinner's only guide, hastens through the gloom to the very sides of the flaming pit to his relief. Soon, in rapturous embrace, the rescued soul looks back to see the danger, and hear the thunder of its unsounded horrors, with thanksgiving which shall find expression for ever upon the golden harp and in the melody of the new song.

Am. Messenger

6657. BABEL, Tower of. According to Herodotus, the Tower of Babel, which was constructed of bricks of bitumen, was a furlong on each side at the base; and Strabo adds, a furlong in height. It consisted of eight towers built one above another, which, if proportionally high, would make the elevation exactly one mile. The ascent to the top, Rollin informs us, was by stairs winding round it on the outside; that is, there was an easy sloping ascent in the side of the outer wall, which turning by very slow degrees in a spiral line, eight times round the tower, from the bottom to the top, had the same appearance as if there had been eight towers placed upon one another. In these different stories were many large rooms with arched roofs, supported by pillars. Over the whole, on the top of the tower was an observatory, by the benefit of which the Babylonians became more expert in astronomy than all other nations. Whitcross.

6658. BABY, God's Care of. An infant had been taught to say,—"God will take care of baby." It was taken sick and given up to die. Its parents were themselves recovering from sickness, and came into the apartment after the child was supposed to have taken its heavenward flight. The mother's voice recalled the child's spirit. It opened its eyes and whispered, "God will take care of baby," then closed its eyes to earth. God took the child to the heavenly mansions, and gave it the care of angels, in his own glorious palace.

6659. BABY, Remarkable Death of a. The youngest child of Rev. Dr. Olin, aged two years, was ill, but not supposed to be dangerously so. The doctor was in the room with the child when the babe suddenly called, "Papa! papa, take baby!" Dr. Olin took the child, and walked up and down the room. The child said, "Pa, kiss baby! Mamma, kiss baby!" and when this was done, looked up and exclaimed, "Now God take baby!" and immediately expired in his father's arms.

6660. BACKBITING, Excused. How like a wild beast would it glare upon us, were there lying on our conscience the "damned spot" of murder! It would not "out." The "red cincture" would "clasp our wrists." But let it take the form of "evil speaking," by which a reputation is stabbed, a character murdered—and then it is only a "small sin," a be-furred, be-combed, be-scented, be-ribboned, be-lady-loved, a "little fox!" Grosart.

6661. BACKBITING, Injury of. Most of you have heard of the Freischütz, and a very instructive opera it is, if you will only keep an eye to the allegory, instead of thinking of the story. A huntsman, to forward his own purposes, seeks the devil, and together they cast seven bullets: six of these are to strike where ever the caster wills, but the seventh is to be the devil's, and is to recoil and strike the caster, who throughout the whole piece is never certain which of them all he is putting into his rifle, and at last is struck down by his own shot. These seven bullets are evil speaking; and when we use the devil's weapons, we get the devil's wages; sooner or later we hurt ourselves by our own efforts, and what is more, injure our own cause, however good and righteous in itself that cause may be. Newland.

6662. BACKBITING, Silenced. Dr. Johnson silenced a notorious female backbiter, who was condemning some of her friends for painting their cheeks, by the remark that "It is a far less harmful thing for a lady to redden her own complexion than to blacken her neighbor's character."

6663. BACKSLIDER, Death of a. A society of infidels were in the practice of meeting together on Sabbath mornings, to ridicule religion, and to encourage each other in all manner of wickedness. At length they proceeded so far as to meet, by previous agreement, to burn their Bibles! They had lately initiated a young man into their awful mysteries, who had been brought up under great religious advantages, and seemed to promise well; but on this occasion he proceeded the length of his companions, threw his Bible into the flames, and promised with them never to go into a place of religious worship again. He was soon afterwards taken ill. He was visited by a serious man, who found him in the agonies of a distressed mind. He spoke to him of his past ways. The poor creature said, "It all did well enough while in health, and while I could keep off the thoughts of death;" but when the Redeemer was mentioned to him he hastily exclaimed, "What's the use of talking to me about mercy?" When urged to look to Christ, he said, "I tell you it's of no use now; 'tis too late, 'tis too late. Once I could pray, but now I can't." He frequently repeated, "I cannot pray; I will not pray." He shortly afterwards expired, uttering the most dreadful imprecations against some of his companions in iniquity who came to see him, and now and then saying, "My Bible! oh, my Bible!"

6664. BACKSLIDER, Emblem of a. Maundrell says, "In the Valley of Salt, near Gebul, there is a small precipice, occasioned by the continual taking away of salt. In this you may see how the veins of it lie. I broke a piece of it, of which the part that was exposed to the rain, sun, and air, though it had the sparks and particles of salt, had perfectly lost its savor. The innermost, which had been connected with the rock, retained its savor, as I found by proof." The truth, then, which our Lord inculcated on his first disciples, and through them upon all his disciples in after ages, was that if they, the salt of the earth, the living depositaries of true wisdom and holiness among men, lost the power and savor of vital godliness, they would not only be worthless so far as the enlightening and sanctification of others were concerned, but would also be cast out themselves. A professing Christian may have the sparks and glittering particles of true wisdom, like this savorless salt, but be without its pungency and power. Wilson.

6665. BACKSLIDER, Hope for a. A backslider endured great distress of mind for five years, during which he took no comfort in his food nor any pleasure in life. If he ate, it was not from any appetite, but with a view to defer his damnation, thinking within himself that he must be lost so soon as his breath was out of his body. Yet, after all this, he was set at liberty, received great consolation, and afterwards lived altogether a godly life.

6666. BACKSLIDER, Recalled. In Mariposa, Cal., there lived a large-eyed, beautiful little prattler—Mary Cannon. One evening, when all was silent, she looked up anxiously into the face of her backslidden father—who had ceased to pray in his family—and said, "Pa, is God dead?" "No, my child. Why do you ask me such a question as that?" "Why, pa, you never talk to him as you used to do." These words haunted him till he was reclaimed. He related the incident to me while I was traveling that circuit. Life Boat.

6667. BACKSLIDER, Reclaiming a. A young woman named Pasea, noted for her character and piety, fell into poverty and led an abandoned life. St. John, the dwarf, was solicited by the monks of Scete to undertake her reformation. He went to her house but could not gain an entrance. At length she thought she could have no cause of regret for admitting so good a man, and opened the door to him. He sat down beside her and said, "What reason can you have to complain of Jesus, that you thus abandon him, and plunge yourself in such a deplorable abyss?" She was filled with conviction, and beholding the streaming tears of the saint, she said, "Why do you weep so bitterly?" He answered, "How can I refrain from weeping when I see Satan in possession of your heart?" She asked, "Is the gate of penitence yet open to me?" "The treasures of divine mercy are inexhaustible," he answered. "Conduct me whither you will," said she. The monk arose, saying, "Let us go." She at once left all—her house and servants and treasures,—absorbed entirely with the work of saving her soul. Her recovery was complete. She died happily not long after, at her hermitage in the wilderness.

6668. BACKSLIDER, Works of a. One mechanic was asked about another, "Is Mr. B—a Christian?" "Well, yes," said he, "I believe he used to be, but he doesn't work much at it, of late."

6669. BACKSLIDING, Biblical. Expressed in various ways: Sliding back, Hos. 4: 16; Jer. 8: 5. Going back, Isa. 1: 4; Jer. 7: 24; 15: 6; John 6: 66, 67. Leaving the first love, Rev. 2: 4. Falling from steadfastness, 2 Pet. 3: 17. Erring from the faith, 1 Tim. 6: 10, 21. Drawing back, Heb. 10: 38. Turning away, Jer. 3: 19; 2 Tim. 4: 4; aside to crooked ways, Ps. 125: 5; 1 Tim. 5: 15; again to folly, Ps. 85: 8. Bewitched, as by the power of fascination, Gal. 3: 1. Corrupted from the simplicity of Christ, 2 Cor. 11: 3. Tripping or stumbling (as the word "offend" means), Jas. 3: 2; Ps. 17: 5. Surprised or overtaken in a fault, Gal. 6: 1. Swerving, 1 Tim. 1: 6 (the word means, like an arrow missing the mark). Wandering, Jer. 14: 10; like blind men, Lam. 4: 14; like lost sheep, Isa. 53: 6. Withdrawing the shoulder from the yoke, Zech. 7: 11 (marg.). Illustrated by many figures: A deceitful bow, Ps. 78: 57; Hos. 7: 16. A backsliding heifer, Hos. 4: 16. A treacherous wife departing from her husband, and following after other men, Jer. 3: 2; Ezek. 16; Hos. 1—3. A branch not abiding in the true vine, John 15: 6. Salt losing its savor, Matt. 5: 13. A lost and wandering sheep, Jer. 50: 6; Ezek. 34: 6; 1 Pet. 2: 25. Smoking flax, Matt. 12: 20. One putting his hand to the plough, and looking back, Luke 9: 62. A noble vine become degenerate, Jer. 2: 21. The dog turned to his vomit, and the sow that was washed, to her wallowing in the mire, 2 Pet. 2: 22. Four books of the Bible seem especially addressed to backsliders: Canticles—See chap. 3 and 5, where two periods of declension are described, with the mournful results and consequent humbling of the Bride. It is especially observable how much longer the Bride was in finding her Beloved the second time, and how much more she suffered, than at the first. Jeremiah—The plaintive address of the weeping prophet. The word “backsliding” occurs most frequently in this book, of all the books of the Bible. Hosea—Sometimes called the Gospel of backsliders. The same argument is pursued as in Jeremiah. Galatians—St. Paul’s address to a church noted for its fickleness, “so soon removed” (1: 6); “bewitched,” “driven back” (5: 7, marg.). Note also that the Epistle to the Hebrews is especially aimed against apostasy. It is remarkable how many saints who are spoken of in Scripture as “perfect,” fell into grievous sin;—Noah—Job—David—Asa—Hezekiah. How many proved weak in their strongest points: Abraham, the man of faith, in unbelief; Moses, pre-eminent for meekness, overcome by anger; Job, the pattern of patience, became impatient; Solomon, renowned for wisdom, turned to folly; John, the apostle of gentleness and love, proposed revenge; Peter, the boldest in the hour of danger, turned coward at last.

6670. BACKSLIDING, Effects of. “Two years since three young Englishmen, brothers, climbed Mont Blanc to its summit without a guide. On their return over the frozen snow, tied to each other, that if one slipped the others might hold him, the foremost fell at the top of a long slope, and dragged the others down with him. They slid gently and scarcely unpleasantly at first, but with an ever-increasing speed, till suddenly they went over a precipice of twenty or thirty feet, at the foot of which one lay dead and the other two insensible.” Thus the backslider frequently draws his associates with him down to ruin.

6671. BACKSLIDING, Flattery of. Backsliding is a disease that is exceedingly secret in its working. It is a flattering distemper; it works like a consumption, wherein persons often flatter themselves that they are not worse but something better, and in a hopeful way of recovery, till a few days before they die.

Jonathan Edwards.

6672. BACKSLIDING, Possibility of. There are weeds in almost every soil. If you throw up the soil from ten or twenty feet deep there will be found the seeds from which they grow. Now, those seeds cannot germinate until they are put in a convenient place; then let the sun shine and the dews fall, and the weeds begin to show themselves. There may be many weeds in our nature, deep down, out of sight; but should they be thrown up by some change of circumstances, we shall find in ourselves evils we never dreamed of. Oh, let no man boast; let no man say, “I should never fall into that particular sin.” How knowest thou, my brother? thou mayest never have been in that position in which such a sin would have allured you. Beware! perhaps where thou thinkest thou art iron, thou art clay; and when thou thinkest that the gates are closed with bars of brass, it may be but rotten wood. With respect to none of us, even the holiest, is there reason to trust his best faculties, his best desires, his best resolutions; we are utter weakness through and through, and to transgression prone, notwithstanding all that God’s grace has done for us. The sin which is in us as a taint in our constitution, might easily break out as a loathsome distemper, spreading over the entire man from head to foot, and spoiling all the character. I pray God it never may. Spurgeon.

6673. BACKSLIDING, Process of. Near Mauch Chunk, Pennsylvania, you are drawn up a very steep mountain side in a railroad car, by a stationary engine, to the very summit in a few minutes. The prospect is magnificent. Now your car begins its descent by another track eighteen miles long, and after running this distance by the mere force of gravity, you find yourself at the starting point. So conversion takes a man in a moment up the heights. But he may be months or years in backsliding to the starting point.

A. D. Vail

6674. BACKSLIDING, Repeated. A man that had fallen time after time, came to Sisoës, the hermit, as often, and was bidden by him every time, not to be discouraged but to arise and go forward. At last the man grieved with himself, said, “My father, is there to be no end of this? How often am I to be bidden to rise after a fall?” “Ever, till death finds you fallen or struggling to rise.” He was asked if one who had fallen ought to be put to penance for a whole year. “That is a very long time,” said he. “Well, then, for six months?” “That too seems to me very long.” “Well, then, forty days?” “That is too long.” After more questions similar in kind, he answered, “I think God is so loving that one bitter pang of conscience may avail with him.” It is not the length of time, but the condition of penitence which is required.

6675. BACKSLIDING, Repenting of. Bishop Jewel was suddenly presented with a declaration of adherence to Romanism by the Popish inquisitors. In a moment of weakness he took the pen and subscribed it, saying jocosely, "Have you a mind to see how well I can write?" He had only multiplied his enemies, for the Papists were not satisfied, and his own conscience raged against him. He fled to Germany for his life, and at Frankfort, after having preached a most penitent sermon, solemnly recanted his subscription. He bewailed his fall most bitterly with sighs and tears, and was received as a brother in Christ by the congregation.

6676. BACKSLIDING. Sadness of. It is a miserable thing to be a backslider. Of all unhappy things that can befall a man, I suppose it is the worst. A stranded ship, a broken-winged eagle, a garden overrun with weeds, a harp without strings, a church in ruins—all these are sad sights, but a backslider is a sadder sight still. Ryle.

6677. BACKSLIDING. Simile of. "There was a well near here," said a bystander, "and very good water used to come from it; but it has been filled up for a long time." "Indeed! I never knew there was a well here, much less tasted the water. How did it get filled up?" "Neglect, sir. Some rubbish got in, then part of the surrounding soil; and as it was not cleared out at once, it got worse and worse till it is as you see it—quite choked up. I wonder if there is any water at the bottom?" These last words set me thinking. I wonder if there is any water at the bottom? I thought how much this old well was like some Christians. The Lord Jesus spoke of the life he gives to the believer as "a well of water" unto him (John 4, 14); but are there not many who are supposed to be Christians in whom we do not see any water; and of whom we can say, as of this old well, "I wonder if there is any water at the bottom?" Anon.

6678. BACKSLIDING. Treatment of. An anchorite said to the famous hermit Poemen, "When a brother comes to see me who is a pious man, I receive him with joy; but if one comes who has fallen away from his high profession, I shut the door in his face." "You do wrong," said Poemen; "the sick soul needs the gentle hands of the nurse and the tender care of the hospital; throw open thy door, and spread your arms to the sinner."

6679. BALANCE. Weighed in the. Dan. 5: 27: "Thou art weighed in the balances, and art found wanting." Roberts remarks that this striking form of speech is much used in the East at this day. Thus, should two men be disputing respecting the moral character of a third person, one will say, "I know the fellow well; I have weighed him, and he is found wanting." "He found wanting! you are much lighter than he." "What, miscreant! do you wish to weigh against me?" "Thou art but as one part in a thousand." "Begone, fellow, or I will soon weigh thee." "Yes, yes, there is no doubt about it; you have weighed me; I am much lighter than you." "What kind of times are these? the slaves are weighing their masters." "Yes, the low castes have become very clever; they are weighing their superiors." "What, woman! do you call in question the authority of your husband? are you qualified to weigh him?" "The judge has been weighing the prisoners, and they are all wanting."

6680. BALLS. Opposition to. A ball was to be held at Long Branch, and it was deemed desirable to secure the patronage of a young, beautiful and accomplished lady, by securing her service as manager. A member of Congress was selected to do this. All his influence of position, flattery and argument was lost upon her. She steadily refused the proffered honor, and declined the invitation to attend the ball. "Would you be kind enough to give me your reason for refusal?" said the Congressman. "Certainly, sir; I am a Christian, and I cannot attend without violating what I consider my religious obligations." He replied, "I have heard before of religious principle, but I never saw it exemplified till now. From this hour I shall have a higher respect for Christian character." Let our fashionable professors take note of this.

6681. BANQUET. Invitation to the. It was fixed at the end of August. Ameen-ad-Dowlah, or second vizier, was to give an entertainment to the ambassador and suit; and on the day appointed as is usual in Persia, a messenger came to us about five o'clock in the evening, to bid us to the feast, in strict accordance with the scriptural narrative. The difficulty which infidels have made to the passage, of which this is the commencement, arises from the apparent harshness of asking people to an entertainment, and giving them no option; by punishing them in fact, for their refusal. Whereas, all the guests to whom, when the supper was ready, the servant was sent, had already accepted the invitation, and were therefore already pledged to appear at the feast at the hour when they might be summoned: they were not taken unprepared, and could not in consistency or decency, plead any prior engagement.

Morier

6682. BANQUET. An Oriental. The various items of which an Oriental banquet consists—bread, flesh, fish, fowls, melted butter, honey, and fruits—are in many places set on the table at once, in defiance of all taste. They are brought in upon trays—one, containing several dishes, being assigned to a group of two, or at most three persons, and the number and quality of the dishes being regulated according to the rank and consideration of the party seated before it. In ordinary cases four or five dishes constitute the portion allotted to a guest; but if he be a person of consequence, or to whom the host is desirous of showing more than ordinary marks of attention, other viands are successively brought in, until every vacant corner of the tray is occupied. Dr. Knox.

6683. BAPTISM. Enforced. When the Jesuit missionaries were engaged in Romanizing the Huron tribe of Indians, they found them slow to accept or comprehend their teachings. They listened to their words looked at their pictures, their altars and crucifixes, and went on in their old way. The bloody Iroquois were their hostile foes, and often burst in upon their villages to spread fire and slaughter. At such times the missionary would take a vessel of holy water and go through the streets baptizing all he met. How easy it would be if the world could be converted in this way, but it cannot.

6684. BAPTISM, Notion of. An old colored Methodist of fair repute, suddenly joined the Baptists to the surprise of his friends, who demanded an explanation. He said, "I am sick and tired of the Methodists who preach nothing but 'Work, work, work,' but the Baptists preach, 'Be dipped and be done with it.'"

Dr. Holme.

6685. BAPTISM Not Regeneration. Nor will being baptized do you any good. Yet you hear people say, "Why, I have been baptized, and I was born again when I was baptized." They believe that because they are baptized into the church, they are baptized into the Kingdom of God. I tell you that is utterly impossible. You may be baptized into the visible church, and yet not be baptized into the Son of God. Baptism is all right in its place. God forbid that I should say anything against it. But if you put that in the place of regeneration—in the place of new birth—it is a terrible mistake. You cannot be baptized into the Kingdom of God. If I thought I could baptize men into the Kingdom of God, it would be a good deal better for me to do that than to preach. I should get a bucket of water, and go up and down the streets, and save men that way. If they would not let me do it while they were awake, I would do it while they were asleep.

Moody.

6686. BARRENNESS, Spiritual. Illustrations of barrenness, which may aptly be used as figures of the ungodly world, or fruitless professors—alike barren of spiritual fruit unto God: The vast wilderness, the very symbol of drought and desolation, Deut. 8: 15; 32: 10; Jer. 2: 31; 4: 26; 12: 10. A salt land, Deut. 29: 23; Judges 9: 45; Jer. 17: 6. Barren earth, Heb. 6: 8. "The wayside," ground, Matt. 13: 4-19. Eunuchs, Isa. 56: 3. The barren fig-tree, Luke 13: 6-9. Jericho, 2 Kings 2: 19-21. Ebal—the mountain of the curses. The word "Ebal," according to Gesenius, means "void of leaves"—bare and blasted. Ephraim. Strange that one whose name means fruitful is spoken of as being barren of fruit to God—bringing forth fruit, but "unto himself," Hos. 10: 11. It is sad to observe how, in many cases, the guilt of barrenness is aggravated by the enjoyment of much privilege; The barren fig-tree, it is expressly said, was planted in "a vineyard"—a place where it had every advantage of soil and special care; and yet it remained unfruitful, Luke 13: 7! The degenerate vine, in like manner, was planted in "a very fruitful hill"—well cleared, and fenced, and cared for, Isa. 5: 1-7; Jer. 2: 21; and yet it brought forth no good fruit. Could a sentence pronounced against such barrenness be unjust?

Reveries.

6687. BATTLE, Prayer before. During the awful moments of preparation for the battle of Camperdown, Admiral Duncan called all his officers upon deck, and in their presence, prostrated himself in prayer before the Lord of Hosts, committing himself and them, with the cause they maintained, to his sovereign protection, his family to his care, his soul and body to the disposal of his providence. Rising then from his knees, he gave command to make an attack, and achieved one of the most splendid victories in the annals of England. Whitecross.

6688. BATTLES, Indecisive. According to a new biography of Gen. Lee, all of his plans for his raid into Pennsylvania and Maryland fell into the hands of Gen. McClellan by a mere accident. Hence, to Lee's surprise, he found himself met at every point by superior numbers, and he was obliged to fight the battle of Antietam under the very greatest disadvantages. Had McClellan's energy and courage been equal to the emergency and opportunity, he might have made Antietam the crowning victory of the war, instead of letting Lee and his army escape to recuperate for other and greater battles. God has placed in our hands the plans of Satan, and on every battle-field we are superior in numbers and position. We ought to fight on to complete victories, instead of having so many drawn battles that we must needs fight over and over again. A. D. Vail.

6689. BEAM, Dangerous. A monk went to his abbot, Poemen, and complained of his cell, because it was in the vicinity of another monk of whom scandalous stories were in circulation. The complainant said he supposed they were true, as another monk had told him. Poemen decried the authority for them, saying, "A monk who tells such tales has fallen from his profession, and is unworthy of belief. But are the stories be true?"—Poemen picked up a straw and then looked up at a large beam over his head. "This straw is my neighbor's sin which I trample on with scorn; that log is my sin which I rarely notice, but which may one day fall and crush me."

6690. BEATITUDES, The Eight. Those of us who have traveled in mountain countries know how one range of hills rises behind another, one ever seeming the highest, till yet a higher appears behind it; each has its own beauty, each its own peculiarity. So is it with those various kinds of lesser happiness of which I before spoke. But in mountain countries there is one range, one line of lofty summits, which always conveys a new sense of beauty, of awe, of sublimity, which nothing else can give—the range of eternal snow. High above all the rest, we see the white peaks standing out in the blue sky, catching the first rays of the rising sun, and the last rays of the sun as it departs. So is it with this range of high Christian character which our Lord has set before us in the Sermon on the Mount. High above all earthly lower happiness, the blessedness of those eight beatitudes towers into the heaven itself. They are white with the snows of eternity; they give a space, a meaning, a dignity to all the rest of the earth over which they brood.

Stanley.
6691. BEAUTY, Attraction of. "Fair and wise," as it was said of Aspasia Milesia. Here beauty was not ill-bestowed, as a gold ring in a swine's snout, but (as the history reports of the Lady Jane Grey), adorned with all variety of moral virtues, as a clear sky with stars, as a princely diadem with jewels. Beauty is of itself very attractive, as the poet hath it. For which cause Heraclonas, the young emperor of Constantinople, being sent into banishment, together with Martina, his mother, had his nose cut off, lest his beauty should move the people to pity.

Trapp.
6692. BEAUTY, Blindness to. Beauty is an all-pervading presence. It unfolds into the numberless flowers of the spring. It waves in the branches of the trees and the green blades of grass. It haunts the depths of the earth and sea, and gleams out in the hues of the shell and the precious stone. And not only these minute objects, but the ocean, the mountains, the clouds, the heavens, the stars, the rising and setting sun, all overflow with beauty. The universe is its temple; and those men who are alive to it cannot lift their eyes without feeling themselves encompassed with it on every side. Now this beauty is so precious, the enjoyments it gives are so refined and pure, so congenial to our tenderest and noblest feelings, and so akin to worship, that it is painful to think of the multitude of men as living in the midst of it, and living almost as blind to it as if, instead of this fair earth and glorious sky, they were tenants of a dungeon. An infinite joy is lost to the world by the want of culture of this spiritual endowment. Suppose I were to visit a cottage, and to see its walls lined with the choicest pictures of Raphael, and every spare nook filled with statues of the most exquisite workmanship, and that I were to learn that neither man, woman, nor child ever cast an eye at these miracles of art, how should I feel their privation! how should I want to open their eyes, and to help them to comprehend and feel the loveliness and grandeur which in vain courted their notice! But every husbandman is living in sight of the works of a diviner Artist; and how much would his existence be elevated, could he see the glory which shines forth in their forms, hues, proportions, and moral expressions!

Channing.
6693. BEAUTY, Examples of. Beauty is said to be nature's letter of recommendation. Its great power has been recognized in the hovel and the palace, in the forum and on the battle field. Xerxes was noted for extraordinary beauty and noble stature. Cleopatra of Egypt was endowed with resistless charms, which she had art enough to display to the best advantage. Four noble Romans, Pompey, Julius Caesar, Augustus, and Antony, were enchained by her. Zenobia, Queen of Palmyra, was noted for her singular beauty. She had sparkling black eyes and teeth of such brilliant whiteness that they were reported to be of pearl. Aspasia was a poor girl of elegant form; a voice like the music of the Syrens; remarkable beauty; and as good as she was beautiful. She captivated Cyrus the younger, and became his wife, and after his death married Artaxerxes. Phryne and Laïs were celebrated for their beauty, with which they bewitched all Greece. Laïs was drawn into the Temple of Venus by the women, and there stoned to death.

6694. BEAUTY, Key to Moral. The problem of restoring to the most original internal beauty, is solved by the redemption of the soul. The ruin or the blank that we see in nature is in our own eye. The axis of vision is not coincident with the axis of things, and so they appear not transparent, but opaque. The reason why the world lacks unity is, that man is disunited himself. A life in harmony with nature, the love of truth and virtue, will purge the eyes to understand her text, so that the world shall be to us an open book, and every form significant of its hidden life and final cause.

Emerson.
6695. BEAUTY, Marrying for. Olympias having heard that a young courtier had married a very beautiful lady with a bad reputation, said, "Sure, the hotspur had little brains, otherwise he would have never married with his eyes." It is an honor to any wife to be more loved for the qualities of her mind than the beauty of her person.

6696. BEAUTY, Offset to. How seldom do we see combined beauties both of body and soul upon earth. The fairest jewels are sometimes enclosed in poor unsightly cases; and many a time the loveliest face and most gracefully rounded form are the handsome setting off of a distorted soul.

Power.
6697. BEAUTY, Promoting. I have come to the conclusion, if man, or woman either, wishes to realize the full power of personal beauty, it must be by cherishing noble hopes and purposes; by having something to do, and something to live for, which is worthy of humanity, and which, by expanding the capacities of the soul, gives expansion and symmetry to the body which contains it.

Professor Upham.
6698. BEGGAR, Freedom of the. The ups and downs of the world concern him no longer. He alone continueth in one stay. The price of stock or land affecteth him not. The fluctuations of agricultural or commercial prosperity touch him not, or at worst but change his customers. He is not expected to become bail or surety for any one. No man troubleth him with questioning his religion or politics. He is the only free man in the universe. He is never out of the fashion, or limpet awkwardly behind it. He is not required to put on court mourning. He weareth all colors, fearing none. His costume hath undergone less change than the Quaker's. He is the only man in the universe who is not obliged to study appearances.

Lamb.
6699. BEGGARS, Accommodating the. The beggars in Japan are very honest. Dr. Prime, in his "Travels" says, "Passing through a street and seeing some forty or fifty coppers hanging on as many nails at the front of a shop (the copper coin has a hole in the center) I inquired what they were for, and was told they were placed there by the shop-keeper to save time and trouble in answering the calls of the mendicants. When one came along he simply took a copper and passed on, never abusing the charity of the shopkeeper by taking two."

6700. BEGGING, Chinese. In the streets of Peking I one day found a man in a sort of wooden sentry box; large nails had been driven into it, so that their points projected through. This prevented the man from leaning against the sides, and the only rest he had was from sitting on a board within. He was a monk, and never seemed to sleep, for he had a string with which he, night and day, sounded a large, sonorous bell every few minutes, as a sort of advertisement of his purpose. This was that the benevolent should come forward with money; each nail represented a sum. When any paid that sum his name was stuck up on a bit of paper, and the nail was pulled out, making it more comfortable for the hermit within. All the nails represented the necessary amount for the repair of a temple which was close behind. This is a common proceeding for raising the wind for such purposes. I was told that this monk had been two years shut up, and that he would likely be another year before he got out of his cocoon of nails.

W. Simpson.

6701. BEGGING, Contrast of. A young lady accepted the post of missionary collector for a certain district. In twenty-four applications twenty-three were rejected. She became disheartened and returned to her pastor to resign the position. He asked her if she had first gone to her closet, and asked God to crown her efforts with success. She confessed that she had not. He advised her to try this plan, and renew the canvass. She did so with remarkable success, this time succeeding in twenty-three applications, and failing in only one.

6702. BEGGING, Eloquent. Leitch Ritchie, traveling in Ireland, passed a painful spectacle of pallor, squalor, and raggedness. His heart smote him and, turning back, he said, "If you are in want, why don't you beg?" "Sure it's begging I am, yer honor." "You didn't say a word." "Ov course not, yer honor; but see how the skin is speakin' through the holes of me trousers, and the bones cryin' out through me skin! Look at me sunken cheeks, and the famine that's starin' in me eyes! Man alive! isn't it beggin' I am with a hundred tongues?"

6703. BEGGING, Home. A minister was about to leave his own congregation for the purpose of visiting London, on what was by no means a pleasant errand—to beg on behalf of his place of worship. Previous to his departure, he called together the principal persons connected with his charge, and said to them, "Now I shall be asked whether we have conscientiously done all that we can for the removal of the debt; what answer am I to give? Brother so-and-so, can you in conscience say that you have given all you can?" "Why, sir," he replied, "if you come to conscience I don't know that I can." The same question he put to a second, and a third, and so on, and similar answers were returned, until the whole sum required was subscribed, and there was no longer any need for their pastor to wear out his soul in going to London on any such unpleasant excursion. Hood.

6704. BEGGING, Oriental. A late writer from Damascus says: "A singular custom prevails here during the hours of public prayers on Sabbath mornings, and frequently during the week. It is that of the poor, diseased, lame and blind being gathered about the church doors to solicit alms. They present a very strange appearance, sitting together along the walls, or standing in groups, with the hand extended for charities, and remind one of the account given in Acts 3: 2, of the laying of the lame man at the 'gate of the Temple which is called Beautiful.' The feeble and blind are often led to these public places, and the lame sometimes literally 'carried' on the shoulders of some good Samaritan friend. A most pitiable-looking man is thus often laid near the door of our school-house, where his voice may be heard the entire day, imploring blessings upon the passers, in the hope of receiving a pittance from some of the many who throng the street. My sympathies are always excited for his helplessness and deformity, as well as for his moral pollution. Bartimeus-like, blind persons are often seen by the wayside begging, and in some instances occupying the same place from year to year."

6705. BEGGING, Professional. In Japan begging is a profession, and a certain portion of the people follow it for a living. They are organized, and sometimes there is a strife among the leaders as to who shall be elected "Chief of the Beggars." Children follow the calling of their parents, and so from father to son the race of beggars continues. They are on all the high-ways, and plead with the traveler to give them cash.

Dr. J. P. Newman.

6706. BEGGING, Public. While I was at Djidda, a Yemen beggar mounted the minaret daily, after mid-day prayer, and exclaimed loud enough to be heard through the whole bazar, "I ask from God fifty dollars, a suit of clothes, and a copy of the Koran; O faithful, hear me; I ask of you fifty dollars," etc. This he repeated for several weeks, when at last a Turkish pilgrim, struck by the singularity of the beggar's appeal, desired him to take thirty dollars and discontinue his cries, which reflected shame upon the charity of all the hadjis present. "No," said the beggar, "I will not take them, because I am convinced that God will send me the whole of what I beg of him so earnestly." After repeating his public supplication for some days more, the same hadji gave him the whole sum he asked for, but without being thanked. I have heard people exclaim in the mosques at Mecca, immediately after prayers, "O brethren, O faithful, hear me! I ask twenty dollars from God to pay for my passage home; twenty dollars only. You know that God is all-bountiful, and may send me a hundred dollars; but it is twenty dollars only that I ask. Remember that charity is the sure road to Paradise." There can be no doubt that this practice is sometimes attended with success.

Pilgrimages to Mecca.
6707. BEGINNING, Delayed. It was said of Alfred De Vigny that he proposed making a great poem, and he had the capacity and genius to make it; but he spent his life in gathering materials for that poem. Sometimes his friends used to say to him, "Why don't you begin? You are getting on in life, and after awhile you will be too old to write the poem." And he would keep saying, "To-morrow I will begin." One morning the papers in Paris announced his death, his work all undone; he lay dead amid the magnificent materials he had with which to begin the poem. Talmage.

6708. BEGINNING, Evil. That temptation that at first is but a little cloud as big as a man's hand, may quickly overspread the whole heaven. Our engaging in sin is as the motion of a stone down, vires acquirit eundo, "it strengthens itself by going;" and the longer it runs the more violent. Beware of the smallest beginnings of temptation. No wise man will neglect or slight the smallest spark of fire, especially if he see it among barrels of gunpowder. You carry gunpowder about you. Oh, take heed of sparks. John Flavel.

6709. BEGINNING OF EVIL, Biblical. Like the letting out of water, Prov. 17:14. A little leaven, 1 Cor. 5: 6. A root of bitterness, Heb. 12:15. The outbreak of evil comes by looking as Eve, Achan, David, Ahaz, and listening like Eve and Rehoboam.

6710. BEGINNING, Examples of. Spencer says that the heathen began from their oracles. The style of the civil law is "A Deo optimo maximo." The old Saxon laws were prefaced by the ten precepts of the Decalogue. The most eminent heathen began any work by prayer and vows to their gods. Vol. I. 4550. David sought counsel of God in all his enterprises. Let every work of the Christian be spread out before God, that his blessing may favor and crown it with success.

6711. BEGINNING, Fable of. The trees of the forest held a solemn parliament, wherein they consulted of the wrongs the axe had done them. Therefore they enacted that no tree should hereafter lend the axe wood for a handle, on pain of being cut down. The axe travels up and down the forest, begs wood of the cedar, ash, oak, elm, even of the poplar. Not one would lend him a chip. At last he desired so much as would serve him to cut down the briars and bushes, alleging that these shrubs did suck away the juice of the ground, hinder the growth, and obscure the glory of the fair and goodly trees. Hereon they were content to give him so much; but, when he had got the handle, he cut down themselves too. These be the subtle reaches of sin. Give it but a little advantage, on the fair promise to remove thy troubles, and it will cut down thy soul also.

Therefore resist beginnings. Trust it not in the least.

Adams.

6712. BEGINNING, Faulty. Some workmen were lately building a large brick tower, which was to be carried up very high. In laying a corner, one brick, either by accident or carelessness, was set a very little out of line. The work went on without its being noticed, but as each course of bricks was kept in line with those already laid, the tower was not put up exactly straight, and the higher they built the more insecure it became. One day, when the tower had been carried up about fifty feet, there was a tremendous crash. The building had fallen, burying the men in the ruins. All the previous work was lost, the materials wasted, and, worse still, valuable lives were sacrificed, and all from one brick laid wrong at the start. The workman at fault in this matter little thought how much mischief he was making for the future. Do you ever think what ruin may come of one bad habit, one brick laid wrong, while you are now building a character for life? Remember, in youth the foundation is laid. See to it that all is kept STRAIGHT.

Teacher's Treasury.

6713. BEGINNING, Good. When the ancients said that a work well begun was half done, they meant that we ought to take the utmost pains in every undertaking to make a good beginning.

Polybius.

6714. BEGINNING, Prayerful. Victoria was aroused at midnight and informed that she was Queen of England. She asked her informer to pray, and they knelt down in prayer together. Thus began the prosperous reign of England's worthy queen.

6715. BEGINNING, Sin's. I have seen the little pearls of a spring sweat through the bottom of a bank, and penetrate the stubborn pavement, till it hath made it fit for the impression of a child's foot; and it was dispersed like the descending dews of a misty morning, till it had opened its way, and made a stream large enough to carry away the rains of the undermined strand, and to invade the neighboring gardens; but then the despised drops were grown into an artificial river, and an intolerable mischief. So are the first entrances of sin, stopped with the antidote of a hearty prayer, and checked into sobriety by the eye of a reverend man, or the counsel of a single sermon; but when such beginnings are neglected, and our religion hath not in it so much philosophy, as to think anything evil so long as we can endure it, they grow up to ulcers and pestilential evils; they destroy the soul by their abode, which at their first entry might have been killed by the pressure of a little finger.

Jeremy Taylor.

6716. BEGINNING, Small. "Robin Redbreast's corn" is an expression used in Brittany to represent small beginnings crowned with large success. It refers to a tradition of St. Leonore and his monks, who had established themselves far in the wilds. They cleared a space and prepared the ground for the wheat. When all was ready it was discovered that the seed wheat was forgotten. No supply was to be had. Then a robin redbreast visited them, having in his beak a heavy wheat ear. The monks picked it up, sowed the seed, and in autumn reaped a surprising harvest.

6717. BEGINNING, Unpromising. When the balloon first came to notice, a practicalist sneeringly asked Dr. Franklin what was the use of it. The doctor replied, "What is the use of a new-born infant? It may become a man." From small to large is nature's law.

6718. BEHAVIOR, Contrast of. How lovely, and how happy, an open and ingenuous behavior! An honest, unsuspicious heart diffuses a serenity over life like that of a fine day, when no cloud conceals the blue ether, nor a blast ruffles the stillness of the air; but a crafty and designing bosom is all tumult and darkness, and resembles a misty and disordered atmosphere in the comfortless climate of the north. The one raises the man almost to the rank of an angel of light; the other sinks him to a level with the powers of darkness. The one constitutes a terrestrial heaven in the breast; the other deforms and debases it till it becomes another hell.

Dr. Knox.

6719. BEHAVIOR, Good. During a time of famine in France, a rich man invited twenty of the poor children in the town to his house, and said to them, "In this basket is a loaf for each one of you; take it, and come back every day at this hour till God sends us better times." The children pounced upon the basket, wrangled, and fought for the bread. Each wished to get the largest loaf, and at last went away without thanking their friend. Francesca alone, a poor but neatly-dressed girl, stood modestly apart, took the smallest loaf which was left in the basket, gracefully kissed the gentleman's hand, and went away to her home in a quiet and becoming manner. On the following day the children were equally ill-behaved, and Francesca this time received a loaf that was scarcely half the size of the others. But when she got home her sick mother cut the loaf, and there fell out of it a number of bright silver coins. The mother was alarmed, and said, "Take back the money this instant, for it has no doubt got into the bread by some mistake." Francesca carried it back, but the benevolent gentleman declined to receive it. "No, no," said he, "it was no mistake. I had the money baked in the smallest loaf simply as a reward for you, my good child. Always continue thus contented, peaceable, and unassuming. The person who prefers to remain content with the smallest loaf, rather than quarrel for the larger one, will find throughout life blessings in this course of action still more valuable than the money which was baked in your loaf of bread."

Anon.

6720. BELIEF, Derivation of. It is said that Dr. Johnson could not find the origin of this word. It is derived from the Gothic Belifian, that by which a person lives, the theory of doctrine and morals to which he conforms his life. Without this conformity a man's acts show that his faith is mere notion or opinion, which Plato calls the "half-way house between ignorance and knowledge."

6721. BELIEVER, A Dying. As the setting of the sun appears of greater magnitude, and his beams of richer gold, than when he is in the meridian; so a dying believer is usually richer in experience, stronger in grace, and brighter in his evidences for heaven, than a living one.

Salter.

6722. BELIEVERS, Support of. A kite soaring on high is in a situation quite foreign to its nature; as much as the soul of man is, when raised above this lower world to high and heavenly pursuits. A person at a distance sees not how it is kept in its exalted situation; he sees not the wind that blows it, nor the hand that holds it, nor the string by whose instrumentality it is held. But all of these powers are necessary to its preservation in that preternatural state. If the wind were to sink, it would fall. It has nothing whatever in itself to uphold itself: it has the same tendency to gravitate to the earth that it ever had, and, if left for a moment to itself, it would fall. Thus it is with the soul of every true believer. It has been raised by the Spirit of God to a new, a preternatural, a heavenly state; and in that state it is upheld by an invisible and almighty hand, through the medium of faith. And upheld it shall be, but not by any power in itself. If left for a moment, it would fall as much as ever. The whole strength is in God alone; and its whole security is in the unchangeableness of his nature, and in the efficacy of his grace. In a word, "it is kept by the power of God, through faith, unto salvation."

Salter.

6723. BELLS, Influence of. The following account is given of the conversion of a hardened old woman living alone in an attic near Dr. Guthrie's church. "And how did he awaken you from your state of spiritual death?" "By Dr. Guthrie's bells," replied the old woman. "When they rang on Sundays, I used to wish they would leave off—they troubled me. They seemed calling to me, till at last I could not bear it any longer; so one day I put on my shawl and went into the church, just to get peace, as it were, from the bells." "Well, and how did you like what you heard?" "Not at all. I came home very angry with Dr. Guthrie, for, as I stood in the crowded aisle, he preached all his sermon about me, and I determined never to go and hear him again. But when the next Sunday came, the bells tormented me more than ever. I was forced to go; and again I came home feeling what a great sinner I was; and thus I continued from week to week, and then I had a dream, which cut down all my hopes. I seemed to be in a square place, where a number of flowers in pots were standing, and in the middle of them I saw Dr. Guthrie with a watering-pot. He went round and watered every plant until he came to one, which I thought meant me; and then he stood still, and said, in a solemn voice, 'It is no good watering this, for it has no roots,' and he passed me by. And when I awoke, I felt what a dreadful state I was in." And thus the arrow of conviction entered this poor sinner's heart, till he who had wounded her in love was pleased to heal her wound with the atoning blood of Jesus Christ.

6724. BENEFICENCE, Advantage of. A good man, famous for his charities, received an invitation to call at a certain place. He found it a miserable room, and on the bed lay a poor sufferer. He asked for five dollars with which to get to the country. The man said, "I have but five dollars, and that I was going to spend on my family. I will give it to you, and think the Lord will return it to me." He gave the needed money to the sufferer, and prayed, "O Lord! if it is thy will, return me the money to meet my necessities to-night!" From this place he went to a prayer-meeting, and the first man he met there handed him five dollars, saying, "You must see a great deal of suffering, and have many calls for aid. Here is a little to help you on your way." It was the exact sum he had given away, for the return of which he had prayed, and he regarded it as the direct answer to his prayer.

6725. BENEFICENCE, Appropriate. Goldsmith had studied medicine in his youth, and a poor woman, hearing of his great humanity, solicited him in a letter to send her something for her husband, who had lost his appetite, and was reduced to a most melancholy state. The good-natured poet waited on her instantly, and, after some discourse with his patient, found him sinking in sickness and poverty. The doctor told him they should hear from him in an hour, when he would send them some pills, which he believed would prove efficacious. He immediately went home and put ten guineas into a pill-box, with the following label: "These must be used as necessities require; be patient, and of good heart," and sent his servant with it to the patient, who found it contained a remedy superior to drugs and potions. Cyc. of Anecdote.

6726. BENEFICENCE, Call to. The whole world calls for new work and nobleness. Subdue mutiny, discord, widespread despair, by manfulness, justice, mercy, and wisdom. Chaos is dark, deep as hell; let light be, and there is instead a green flowery world. O it is great, and there is no other greatness! To make some nook of God's creation a little fruitfuller, better, more worthy of God; to make some human hearts a little wiser, manfuller, happier, more blessed, less accursed! It is work for a God! Sooty hell of mutiny, and savagery, and despair, can, by man's energy, be made a kind of heaven; cleared of its soot, of its mutiny, of its need to mutiny; the everlasting arch of heaven's azure overspanning it too, and its cunning mechanisms and tall chimney-steeples, as a birth of heaven; God and all men looking on it well pleased. Carlyle.

6727. BENEFICENCE, Contrast of. At the outbreak of the plague at Alexandria, the heathen forgot all natural affection, drove out their friends, cast them into the streets, and left them half dead, and their bodies unburied. But the Christians, as Dionysius says, "did not spare themselves, but mutually attending to each other, they would visit the sick without fear, and ministering to each other, for the sake of Christ, cheerfully gave up their lives with them. Many died after their care had restored others to health. Many who took the bodies of their Christian brethren in their hands and bosoms, and closed their eyes, and buried them with every mark of attention, soon followed them in death."

6728. BENEFICENCE, Example of. Lady Huntingdon lived very economically that she might have the more to give for the promotion of religion. With an income of only £1,200 a year, she maintained the college she had erected, at her sole expense; she erected chapels in most parts of the kingdom; and she supported ministers who were sent to preach in various parts of the world. A minister of the Gospel, and a person from the country, once called on her. When they came out, the countryman turned his eyes towards the house, and, after a short pause, exclaimed, "What a lesson! Can a person of her noble birth, nursed in the lap of grandeur, live in such a house, so meanly furnished—and shall I, a tradesman, be surrounded with luxury and elegance? From this moment I shall hate my house, my furniture, and myself, for spending so little for God, and so much in folly."

6729. BENEFICENCE, Haste to. A lady of New York who had adopted the rule to give a tenth of all her income in charities, found it easy to execute it with her usual profits, but on coming suddenly into possession of five thousand dollars was tempted to violate her rule. She took alarm and cried, "Quick, quick, let me appropriate the tenth before my heart grows hard." She kept her purpose, and is an example to all. Give quickly! before you lose the money, or the inclination, or death robs you of all.

6730. BENEFICENCE, Howard's Rule for. The great philanthropist kept his own rule: "That our superfluities should give way to other men's conveniences; that our conveniences give way to other men's necessities; and that even our necessities sometimes give way to other men's extremities."

6731. BENEFICENCE, Hundred-fold Reward of. St. John, the alms-giver, ordered his treasurer to give a poor nobleman fifteen pounds. The treasurer, thinking it too much, reduced it to five. Immediately after a wealthy lady sent him a draft for five hundred pounds. John expected more from her and sought an explanation. She said she had written the draft for fifteen hundred pounds, but when it came back to her the ten had disappeared from it. John concluded it was God's doing, and sent to his treasurer to ascertain how much he had given the poor nobleman. On his neglect to tell, the nobleman was sent for, when it was learned that only five pounds had been given him. "The Lord restores an hundred-fold," said John. "I knew that five pounds only could have been given when he returned me only five hundred."

6732. BENEFICENCE, Increase of. An old colored man, speaking at a missionary meeting in the West Indies, said: "My dear friends, we shall increase my subscription this time. Last year we gave one dollar; this year we shall give four dollars: one dollar for every quarter of the world. No, stop! Perhaps somebody will say, 'Old Sandy no lub Africa more dan other country;' so we shall give one dollar for Europe, one dollar for Asia, one dollar for America, and two dollars for Africa. My subscription is five dollars this year."

6733. BENEFICENCE, Ingratitude for. Stephen, King of Hungary, in the eleventh century, was celebrated for his benevolence. He considered the poor of his realm especially committed to his care. He was accessible to all ranks, listened to their complaints, but always gave the preference to the poor, considering that in serving them he served Christ. He declared himself the patron and father of all the helpless orphans and widows in his kingdom, and provided for their subsistence. He frequently disguised himself, and went out among the poor to see that his officers overlooked none. One day he laid off his royal robes, and went forth in disguise, with a king's purse, to distribute alms among the most needy. A troop of beggars set upon him, knocked him down, plucked his beard, beat him, and robbed him. He rejoiced in this treatment as being like that which his Master received. Nor did he abate his attentions or charities to the poor on this account. He was, indeed, like the Divine Master.

6734. BENEFICENCE, Instructions in. A church was much embarrassed by a debt of three thousand dollars, which successive pastors tried to raise but failed, because of the insufficient subscription of the leading rich member. A new pastor, knowing the key of the situation, took "Systematic Benevolence," by Rev. J. Ashworth, to this man and secured his promise to read it. The result was that the rich man came to his pastor and said: "I feel as though I had not done all I ought to do about that church debt; if you will write a subscription paper, I will sign, and will go around with you, and I guess we can remove it from the property." The minister drew up the subscription, and he, who had on former occasions put down one hundred dollars, now subscribed one thousand. With this example twenty-five hundred was soon raised, and the rich man increased his gift to fifteen hundred dollars, the result of instruction in duty.

6735. BENEFICENCE, Patron of. St. John of Alexandria was worthy to be accounted the patron saint of charity. His whole life was one of self-denial and alms-giving. His house, food, apparel and furniture was always the plainest, that he might have the more to give. A man of wealth, learning that he had only an old tattered blanket on his bed, sent him a very fine one. He slept under it one night, and thought of some poor wretches who had no blanket. So the next day he sold it, and gave its price to them. His friend, hearing of it, bought the blanket and returned it to the alms-giver. It was again sold and again returned, John receiving quite a revenue thereby. "We shall see," he said, "who will be tired first, he of buying or I of selling the blanket."

6736. BENEFICENCE, Profit of. A poor widow, having charge of a lighthouse on the southern coast of England, had resolved to devote the receipts of a certain day in the year to the missionary cause. On that day, a lady and a little girl, in deep mourning, visited the lighthouse. The lady left behind her a sovereign. The unusually large gratuity immediately caused a conflict in the breast of the poor woman, as to whether she was absolutely bound to appropriate the whole to the missionary box or not. At length she compromised by putting in half-a-crown; but conscience would not let her rest. She went to bed, but could not sleep. She rose, took back the half-crown, put in the sovereign, returned to bed, and slept comfortably. A few days afterwards, to her great surprise, she received a double letter, franked; and, on opening it, she was not more astonished than delighted, to find £20 from the lady, and £5 from the little girl. The visitors were her royal highness the Duchess of Kent, and the present English sovereign, Queen Victoria.

6737. BENEFICENCE, Posthumous. An old man, of the name of Guyot, lived and died in the town of Marseilles; he amassed a large fortune by the most laborious industry and the severest habits of abstinence and privation. The populace pursued him, whenever he appeared, with hootings and execrations. In his will there were found the following words:—"Having observed, from my infancy, that the poor of Marseilles are ill supplied with water, which can only be purchased at a great price, I have cheerfully labored the whole of my life to procure for them this great blessing; and I direct that the whole of my property shall be laid out in building an aqueduct for their use."

Thoughts on Laughter.

6738. BENEFICENCE, Return for. Tiberius II. was liberal to the poor. His wife accused him of wasting her treasures by this means. He told her that he should never want money so long as in obedience to Christ's command he supplied the necessities of the poor. Soon after this, he found a great treasure, and news was also brought him of the death of a very rich man, who had left his whole estate to him.

6739. BENEFICENCE, Reward of. A poor woman in Wales was observed, by a rich man, always to give something at the church collections. He gave her a sovereign. She said, "A sovereign? I never had so much money in all my life? what shall I do with it?" "I dare say you will find means of spending it," said he, "if your heart is devoted to the Lord's cause." Soon after this a man came round to solicit subscriptions for some benevolent object. He went to one of the elders, who gave him half-a-sovereign, and another gave him five shillings, both of which were regarded as very liberal donations. Not liking to pass by any member of the church, he asked this poor woman what she would do. "Put my name down for a sovereign." "A sovereign!" said he; "why, where did you get a sovereign?" "Oh, sir," said she, "I got it honestly; put my name down for a sovereign." She gave him the sovereign, and in about two weeks from that time she received a letter from Doctors' Commons informing her that a friend had just left her one hundred pounds.

6740. BENEFICENCE, Royal. Alexander was blamed for giving so largely to an unworthy applicant. He replied, "When I give I must remember not only his deserts but my rank, and give like Alexander." So Christ gives, not regarding our merit, but his own character.

6741. BENEFICENCE, Safety of. Two men I knew very well, some years ago, on the streets of New York, were talking about the matter of benevolence. One said to the other, "You give too much. I will wait till I get a large pile of money, and then I will give." "No," said the other, "I will give as God prospers me." Hear the sequel. The former lives in New York city to-day dollarless; the latter gathered two hundred and fifty thousand dollars. I believe that the reason why many people are kept poor is because they do not give enough. If a man gives in a right spirit to the Lord Jesus and to the church, he is ensured for time and for eternity. The bank of England is a weak institution compared with the bank that any Christian man can draw upon. The man who stands by Christ, Christ will stand by him.

Talmage.

6742. BENEFICENCE, Trifling. A very popular picture in England has for its subject the young Princess of Wales distributing flowers to the sick soldiers. She entered the hospital one day having in her hand a superb bouquet, the gift of Queen Victoria. As she passed along a flower fell out of it, which was seized by a soldier and kissed with delight. The Princess saw the act, and beginning at the head of the ward, distributed a bud or a flower to each invalid. The soldiers prized the gift and kept the flower to be put in their coffins. As the Princess passed out the soldiers did their best to give her a hearty cheer. This is the initial of the "Flower Charity."

6743. BENEFICENCE, True. A city mission-school superintendent, whose scholars were of the very poorest class, requested each one to bring something for the missionary collection, narrating the story of the widow and her "two mites." As a result, a great variety of articles of no value, except in the minds of the poorest, were brought. One very little girl, hardly four years old, barefooted, unwashed and unkempt, handed the superintendent a basket. "What have you here, Susie?" "Our contribution, sir; but you must not let them get out." "Is there anything alive in the basket?" "Yes, sir, I caught 'em. We've got lots of 'em at our house." "Two mice! What do you suppose we can do with mice? We are overrun with them now." Disappointed that her offering was not welcomed, she said, while the tears filled her eyes, "If the Saviour had been here, he'd a took 'em!" "Two mice! What do you mean?" "You told us the other day that a poor woman brought two mice to Jesus, and he said it was more than any of 'em." Dear, simple child! She had followed the example of the world's most famous donor as she understood it, and her gift shall be accepted of the Master.

6744. BENEVOLENCE, Unexpected. A rich English gentleman subscribed a guinea a year to the Bible Society. When the collector called for the money, the gentleman threw guinea after guinea upon the table till the collector, becoming impatient, asked him to stop. He continued till he had counted out eighty guineas. "There," cried the old man, "I promised you a subscription of a guinea a year. I am eighty years old, and there are the eighty guineas."

6745. BENEVOLENCE, Voluntary. It has been frequently wished by Christians, that there were some rule laid down in the Bible, fixing the proportion of their property which they ought to contribute to religious uses. This is as if a child should go to his father, and say, "Father, how many times in the day must I come to you with some testimonial of my love? How often will it be necessary to show my affection for you?" The father would of course reply, "Just as often as your feelings prompt you, my child, and no oftener." Just so Christ says to his people, "Look at me, and see what I have done and suffered for you, and then give me just what you think I deserve. I do not wish anything forced."

Payson.

6746. BENEVOLENCE, Criticising. A gentleman noted for liberal gifts to the cause of Christian missions was met by a wealthy man, who censured him for such profuse giving to such a cause, where the unemployed were starving all about them. "I will give fifty pounds to the poor of — if you will give an equal sum," said the Christian friend. "I did not mean that," replied the objector; "but," continued he, "if you must go from home, why so far? Think of the miserable poor of Ireland." "I will give fifty pounds to the poor of Ireland, if you will give the same." "I do not mean that either," was the reply. The gifts of the liberal are a censure upon the penurious, which they would fain prevent. They who give most liberally to missions are most liberal in all benevolent enterprises.

6747. BENEVOLENCE, Dubious. A common female beggar once asked alms of Dr. Goldsmith as he walked with his friend up Fleet street. He gave her a shilling. His companion, who knew something of the woman, censured the bard, adding that the shilling was much misapplied, for she would spend it in liquor. "If it makes her happy in any way," replied the doctor, "my end is answered." Being much pressed by his tailor for a bill of forty pounds, a day was fixed for payment. Goldsmith procured the money; but Mr. Glover calling on him, and relating a piteous tale of his goods being seized for rent, the thoughtless doctor gave him the whole of the money. The tailor called, and was told that if he had come a little sooner he would have received the money, but he had just parted with every shilling of it to a friend in distress, adding, "I should have been an unfeeling monster not to have relieved distress when in my power."

6748. BENEVOLENCE, Proxy. Fox, the author of the "Book of Martyrs," was once leaving the palace of Aylmer, the Bishop of London, when a company of poor people importunately begged him to relieve their wants. Fox, having no money, returned to the Bishop, and asked the loan of five pounds, which was readily granted. He immediately distributed it among the poor by whom he was surrounded. Some months afterwards, Aylmer asked Fox for the money he had borrowed. "I have laid it out for you," was the answer, "and paid it where you owed it—to the poor people who lay at your gate." Far from being offended, Aylmer thanked Fox for being his steward.

6749. BENEVOLENCE, Useless. Henry the IV. wished there was a fowl stewing in every poor man's pot throughout France, but did nothing to place the luxury in the poor man's reach. Such good wishes are popular, cheap, and useless, without such action as our ability allows, to convert the wish into fact.

6750. BENEVOLENCE, Verbal. Near Fua, on my way to Cairo, when we sailed near the shore eight or ten naked boys ran along after us, begging alms; and, before I could throw them some bread, my Reis (captain of the vessel) repeatedly called to them, "May God help you; may God help you"—a most common custom in Egypt, when a man will give nothing. I never was so much struck with this custom as now, when it brought to my recollection the practices which St. James so strikingly censures. Leider.

6751. BEREAVED, Consolation for the. Bishop Heber related the following beautiful apologue to a lady, who was bitterly lamenting the death of an infant child: "A shepherd was mourning over the death of his favorite child, and in the passionate and rebellious feeling of his heart, was bitterly complaining, that what he loved most tenderly, and was in itself most lovely, had been taken from him. Suddenly, a stranger of grave and venerable appearance stood before him, and beckoned him forth into the field. It was night, and not a word was spoken till they arrived at the fold, when the stranger thus addressed him: 'When you select one of these lambs from the flock, you choose the best and most beautiful among them; why should you murmur, because I, the good shepherd of the sheep, have selected from those which you have nourished for me, the one which was most fitted for my eternal fold?' The mysterious stranger was seen no more, and the father's heart was comforted."

6752. BEREAVEMENT, Fable of. I asked Death what he had done with the beautiful flowers which he had stolen from our earthly garden, for he had done that thing to me, and I felt that I had a right to ask. He replied very calmly: "You should not say stolen, for I am not a thief. There is one that owns all the flowers upon your broad, green earth, and he has a right to transplant them when and where he pleases. He sends me to your gardens." "But why," I asked, "do you snatch them so rudely, and leave hearts all torn and bleeding?" "Alas!" replied Death, "why do not mortals let them go? Little children are the flowers of paradise; of such is the kingdom of heaven. But be the world ever so bleak and desolate, mortals would keep them here; so they bind them with chords lest they be taken away, and these chords are twined with their own heart-strings. How can I loosen the one without breaking the other?" Anon.

6753. BEREAVEMENT, Heathen. Chronicles tell us, that when an express came out of the field to Xenophon, the Socratic, as he was sacrificing, which acquainted him that his son perished in the fight, he pulled the garland from his head, and inquired after what manner he fell. It being told him that he died gallantly, making a great slaughter of his enemies, after he had paused awhile to recollect his thoughts and quiet his first emotion of concern with reason, he adorned his head, finished the sacrifice, and spoke thus to the messengers: "I did not make it my request to the gods, that my son might be immortal or long-lived, for it was not manifest whether this was convenient for him or not, but that he might have integrity in his principles and be a lover of his country; and now I have my desire."

6754. BEREAVEMENT, Lessons of. Baby is now one of my lesson-books. I read a word in it for you as I was playing with her the other day. She had hid her flowers between my hands, and when she tried to open them, I kept them closed, not because I wished to deprive her of her treasures, but for the pleasure of trying her little strength; and when I yielded to it her laugh was so merry. I thought it was thus with thee, Fan. Your flowers are hid in God's hand. You have asked for them and he will not open it, but not because he means to deprive you of them, but to try your childish strength. How joyful the shout of triumph will be when he yields to it. My baby found only the broken pieces of stalk she had hidden; but you will find your broken flowers transformed into a wreath of heavenly glory.

E. H. Birks.

6755. BEREAVEMENT, Pagan. The heathen priests in Africa make little wooden images, which they anoint and consecrate for their votaries, when bereaved of their children or friends, persuading them that they have brought back the spirits of the departed to inhabit the said wooden images. One of these is now before the writer, which was given to a poor woman who had lost her only child, and which she caressed with all parental fondness, believing that the spirit of her babe was thus restored to her, till she was brought to a saving knowledge of the truth, and taught to look to the only real source of comfort in trouble, when she gave up her idol to the missionary. It stands about nine inches high, is of a very uncommon countenance, and bears evident marks of its consecration.

6756. BESETTING SIN, Emblem of. In the far East there is a beautiful flower that is very dangerous. The petals are long and stout, and they bend outward and downward, leaving a platform in the centre of the flower so large and strong that a man can stand there. We are told that the cruel natives at a certain time in the year gather around that strange flower, and they compel one of their number to mount the centre of it, and no sooner does he stand there than the petals that were bending down move up gradually until they are erect, and then they curve at the tips and bend downward and compress and contract until there is strangulation, and the man's body is left a shapeless pulp, and the cruel natives come around with their chalices and catch the running gore and drink it, and dance with infernal glee over the massacre. How like this is the flower of sin. A man likes it so much he gets into it, and says, "How beautiful; how safe." But the petals begin to rise, and keep on rising until they overspan him, and begin to compress and contract, and after a while he finds himself dying amid the redolence and the radiance, and under the crush and the strangulation he perishes, while devils damned with chalices of fire catch the running gore, dancing the saturnalia of eternal darkness.

6757. BESETTING SINS, Treachery of. For many years after its course has been changed, and the art that triumphs over nature has turned its waters into a new cut, the river needs careful watching; else, swollen by winter snows or summer flood, it bursts our barriers, and, in the pride of victory, foaming, roaring, raging along its old accustomed channels, sweeps dyke and bulwark to the sea. And when he that sitteth upon the flood, and turneth the hearts of men like the rivers of water, has sent the current of our tastes and feelings in a new direction, alas! how apt are they, especially when some sudden outburst of temptation comes sweeping down like a thunder-spout, to flow back into the old and deep-worn channels of a corrupt nature.

Dr. Guthrie.

6758. BEST, Do Thy. "When I was a little boy," said a gentleman one evening, "I paid a visit to my grandfather, a venerable old man, whose black velvet cap and tassel, blue breeches and huge silver knee-buckles, filled me with great awe. When I went to bid him good-by, he drew me between his knees, and, placing his hand on my head, said: 'Grandchild, I have one thing to say to you: will you remember it?' I stared into his face and nodded; for I was afraid to promise aloud. 'Well,' he continued, 'whatever you do, do the best you can.' This, in fact, was my grandfather's legacy to me; and it has proved better than gold."

6759. BEULAH, Description of. Now, I saw in my dream, that by this time the pilgrims were got over the Enchanted Ground, and entering into the country of Beulah (Sol. Song 2: 10, 12; Isa. 62: 4, 12), whose air was very sweet and pleasant; the way lying directly through it, they solaced themselves there for a season. Yea, here they heard continually the singing of birds, and saw every day the flowers appear in the earth, and heard the voice of the turtle in the land. In this country the sun shineth night and day; wherefore, this was beyond the Valley of the Shadow of Death, and also out of the reach of Giant Despair; neither could they from this place so much as see Doubting Castle. Here they were within sight of the city they were going to; also, here met them some of the inhabitants thereof, for in this land the shining ones commonly walked, because it was upon the borders of heaven. In this land, also, the contract between the bride and the bridegroom was renewed; yea, here, "as the bridegroom rejoiceth over the bride, so did their God rejoice over them." Here they had no want of corn and wine, for in the place they met with abundance of what they had sought for in all their pilgrimage. Here they heard voices from out of the city, loud voices, saying, "Say ye to the daughter of Zion, Behold, thy Salvation cometh! Behold, his reward is with him!"

Bunyan.

6760. BEULAH, Land of. After this I beheld until they were come into the land of Beulah, where the sun shineth night and day. Here, because they were weary, they betook themselves awhile to rest; and because this country was common for pilgrims, and because the orchards and vineyards that were here belonged to the King of the Celestial Country, therefore they were licensed to make bold with any of his things. But a little while soon refreshed them here; for the bells did so ring, and the trumpets continually sound so melodiously, that they could not sleep; yet they received so much refreshing as if they had slept their sleep ever so soundly. Here, also, all the noise of them that walked the streets was, "More pilgrims are come to town." And another would answer saying, "And so many were let in at the golden gates to-day." They would cry again, "There is now a legion of shining ones just come to town, by which we know that there are more pilgrims upon the road, for here they come to wait for them, and to comfort them after all their sorrow." In this land was a record kept of the names of all that had been pilgrims of old, and a history of the famous deeds they had done. It was here discoursed how to some the river had had its flowings, and what ebblings it had had while others had gone over. It has been in a manner dry for some, while it has overflowed its banks for others. In this place the children of the town would go into the King's gardens, and gather nosegays for the pilgrims, and bring them to them with much affection. Here also grew camphire, with spikenard and saffron, calamus and cinnamon, with all the trees of frankincense, myrrh, and aloes, with all chief spices. With these the pilgrims' chambers were perfumed while they stayed here, and with these are their bodies anointed to prepare them to go over the river when the time appointed was come.

6761. BIBLE, Advantage of the. It is an armory of heavenly weapons, a laboratory of infallible medicines, a mine of exhaustless wealth. It is a guide-book for every road, a chart for every sea, a medicine for every malady, a balm for every wound. Rob us of our Bible, and our sky has lost its sun, and in the best of other books we have naught but the glimmer of twinkling stars. It is the wealth of the poor, blessing poverty with the contentment which makes it rich. It is the shield of wealth, protecting the few that are rich against the many that are poor. It may be compared to the skies, which hold at once the most blessed and the most baneful elements—soft dews to bathe the opening rose, and bolts that rend the oak asunder.

Guthrie.

6762. BIBLE, Analogies of the. God's Word is as full of analogies as his works. The histories, offerings, and prophecies of the Old Testament are figures of better things which have been brought to light by the gospel. The lessons of the Lord and his apostles teem with types. Almost every doctrine is given in duplicate: the spirit is provided with a body; a body clothes the spirit. Every fruitful vine has a strong elm to which it clings; every strong elm supports a fruitful vine.

Arnol.

6763. BIBLE, Attachment to the. The poet Collins, in the latter part of his life, withdrew from his general studies, and traveled with no other book than an English New Testament, such as children carry to school. A friend was anxious to know what companion such a man of letters had chosen; the poet said, "I have only one book, and that book is the best."

6764. BIBLE, Benefit of the. A Roman Catholic priest in Belgium rebuked a young woman and her brother for reading the Bible. She replied, "A little while ago my brother was an idler, a gambler, a drunkard, and made such a noise in the house that no one could stay in it. Since he began to read the Bible, he works with industry, goes no longer to the tavern, no longer touches cards, brings home money to his poor old mother, and our life at home is quiet and delightful. How comes it, that a bad book produces such good fruits?"

6765. BIBLE, Care for the. The inhabitants of the South Sea Islands were much rejoiced when copies of the Bible were first given to them. One old native preacher held up his Bible before the whole congregation and said, "My brethren and sisters, this is my resolve; the dust shall never cover my Bible, the moth shall never eat it, the mildew shall never rot it. My light! My joy!"

6766. BIBLE, Charms of the. A little boy was born blind. An operation was performed; the light was let in slowly. When, one day, his mother led him out of doors and uncovered his eyes, and for the first time he saw the sky and earth, "Oh, mother!" he cried, "why didn't you tell me it was so beautiful?" She burst into tears, and said, "I tried to tell you, dear, but you could not understand me." So it is when we try to tell what is in the Bible. Unless the spiritual sight is opened, we cannot understand.

Anon.

6767. BIBLE, Child's View of the. A little boy in a Sabbath-school wished to put a penny into the Missionary-box, and was asked why he wished to do so. "I want to send it to the heathen," he replied. "Do you know," it was said, "who the heathen are?" "They are folks who have not got any Bible, and live a great way off." "What is the Bible?" "The word of God." "Of what use would it be to the heathen, if they had it?" "It would tell them to love God and be good." "Where did the Bible come from?" "From heaven." "Was it written in heaven?" "No; the prophets and good men wrote it." "If good men wrote it, how then is it the word of God, and come from heaven?" "Why, the Holy Ghost told them how to write it." "Did they see the Holy Ghost, and did he speak to them?" "No; but he made them think it."

6768. BIBLE, Comfort of the. Dr. Gregory relates the case of an indigent and afflicted man whose infirmities were such that he was unable even to occupy a chair without being supported by bands and braces attached to the ceiling of his poor cottage. In this helpless condition had he been for several years, unable to move a limb, while suffering the whole time extreme bodily anguish. "As soon," says Dr. Gregory, "as I recovered a little from my surprise at beholding an object which appeared a living image of death, I asked, 'Are you left alone, my friend, in this deplorable situation?' 'No, sir,' replied he, in a tone of mild and touching resignation, while nothing but his lips and eyes moved as he spoke; 'I am not alone, for my God is with me!' On advancing, I discovered the secret of this man's unspeakable comfort; a Bible lay on his knees, open at a favorite portion of the Psalms. In this way he was enabled daily to read for himself the words of eternal life, partaking of the heavenly manna, which imparted life and strength to his soul. In the midst of pain and poverty he had learned from that blessed book in whom to believe; and as he expressed his confidence that his Father would never forsake him, his eyes sparkled with faith, which beamed in celestial radiance upon his pallid cheek."

6769. BIBLE, Companionship of the. A Scotch minister was visiting among the poor, and a hovel in which dwelt alone an aged Christian woman who was feeble and nearly blind. In her poverty and feebleness he found her very happy. "How do you manage to spend your long days here all alone?" asked the minister. "I am not alone," she said, "because Jesus is with me, and thinking about him makes the time pass pleasantly. My neighbors are kind, and when they come in to help me I love to talk to them about Jesus. But there is one hour in the day which is the most pleasant of all to me. Do you see that little window?" she asked, pointing across the room. "For about one hour every day, when it is not cloudy, the sun shines in there. Then I take my large printed Bible and sit down in the sunshine, where I can see well enough to read. And oh! sir, that is a blessed hour to me!" Her case illustrates the illumination of the spirit necessary to make the Bible good company.

6770. BIBLE, Correct Interpretation of the. The progressive elucidation of the Scriptures, whether by the expository labors of critics, the researches of travelers, or the fulfillments of prophecy, may be compared to the gradual rolling away of the morning mist from a splendid landscape. As the sun advances, the shades retire, and new and interesting features of the scenery are continually opening upon the delighted eye of the spectator; or it may be said to resemble the slow but momentous process of unfolding the ancient papyri, which the ravages of time and fire have spared among the ruins of Pompeii and Herculaneum. Here, as every successive word and letter which can be redeemed from the crisp and crumpling texture of the blackened parchment is noted down with the most scrupulous care, as forming a part of the continuous record, and going to make out its entire sense; so the sense of the sacred volume is gradually elicited, item by item, and needs only to be collected and treasured up with equal solicitude, in order to constitute a possession of infinitely more value than the choicest literary relics of antiquity. Perhaps it may be safely affirmed that the materials are at this moment in existence for the satisfactory solution of nearly every doubtful passage of holy writ; but the great desideratum is to have them brought together—to collect them from their wide dispersion over a countless multitude of writings, in various languages, which the great majority of Christians can neither procure nor understand. Bush.

6771. BIBLE, Criticising the. A prison visitor gave a convict a Bible. He employed himself in raising questions on difficult passages to ask the donor at every visit. Seeing that the study was of no profit to the convict the visitor said, "What would you think of a hungry man, who had not eaten a morsel of food for the last twenty-four hours, and was asked by a charitable man to come in and sit down at a richly-covered table, on which were large dishes of choice meat, and also covered ones, the contents of which the hungry man did not know. Instead of satisfying his exhausted body with the former, he raises one cover after another, and insists on finding out what these unknown dishes are composed of. In spite of all the advice of the charitable man to partake first of the more substantial dishes, he dwells with obstinate inquiry on nicer compounds, until, overcome with exhaustion, he drops down. What do you think of such a man?" "He is a fool," said the convict; "and I will be one no longer. I understand you well."

6772. BIBLE, Daily Reading. The venerable Rev. Henry Boehm, whose death in his one hundred and first year we recorded a few weeks ago, loved his Bible to the end. It was his habit to read it through at least once every year. His friends assure us that he read the Bible through over seventy times, and that when he died the book-mark was found at the first page, showing that he had just finished the year's reading, and was preparing to begin anew. At the funeral that Bible was significantly placed upon his coffin—a touching remembrance of his great love for the book of books. Christian Advocate.

6773. BIBLE, Defiance of the. Walid Ebu Yazid, an Arabian infidel, treated the Koran with great contempt. Opening it at random one day his eyes fell upon the passage, "Every rebellious, perverse person shall not prosper." Thereupon he stuck it on a lance and shot it to pieces with arrows, saying, "Dost thou rebuke every rebellious, perverse person? Behold I am that rebellious, perverse person. When thou appearest before thy Lord on the day of resurrection, say, O Lord, Al Walid has torn me thus." A Mohammedan idea of the Koran was that it was an embodiment of the Divine Spirit. This case can be paralleled in the treatment of the Christian's Bible.

6774. BIBLE, Delight in the. Lady Jane Grey was a great Bible reader, and while her parents were attending the chase, she would remain at home studying its pages. Her friends were surprised, and inquired her reason for doing so. She replied, "All amusements of that description are but a shadow of the pleasure which I enjoy in reading this book."

6775. BIBLE, Devotion to the. Matthew Hale Smith, in his book, Marvels of Prayer, tells of a shipwreck and rescue, by Captain Judkins, and the crew of the Scotia. Among the rescued was a lad, about twelve years, who had lost everything. "Who are you, my boy?" said Captain Judkins. "I am a little Scotch boy; my father and mother are dead and I am going to America to find my uncle, who lives in Illinois." "What is this?" said the captain, as he took hold of a rope that was tied around the boy's breast. "It is a piece of cord, sir." "What is that tied under your arm?" "My mother's Bible; she told me never to lose it." "That's all you saved?" "Yes, sir." "Could'n't you have saved something else?" "Not and save that." "Didn't you expect to be lost?" "I meant, if I went down, to take my mother's Bible down with me." "All right," said the captain, "I'll take care of you." Having reached the port of New York, Captain Judkins took the boy to a Christian merchant to whom he told this story. "I'll take the lad," said the merchant, "I want no other recommendation; the boy that holds on to his mother's Bible in such perils will give a good account of himself."

6776. BIBLE, Dying for the. In the persecution of 303, special effort was made to destroy the sacred books of the Christians. All who had them or knew of them were required to bring them forth to be burned or turn informers. Many did so, and thousands of volumes of the Scriptures were destroyed. Felix, bishop of Thibara, Africa, refused to comply. He was arrested, confessed that he had the books, but would not give them up. He was treated cruelly, and finally gave his life rather than his Bible to executioners at Venosa, in Apulia.

6777. BIBLE, Effect of a. Dr. Nast once met one of his infidel fellow-Germans, who sold whisky in the day-time and played the violin at night. The Doctor gave him a Bible, and asked him to read it. The man was ashamed to be seen with such a book in his hands, so he placed it under his coat and carried it home. But when he got there he was ashamed to be seen with it, and could find no place to hide it so his family would not see it. After awhile he decided to put it down the cellar on the whisky barrel; and so he went down the cellar time after time to read his Bible, till he became deeply interested; and at length he began to pray, and God filled his soul, and he began to shout glory to God, and his wife and neighbors heard the noise in the cellar, and they ran down to see what was the matter, supposing he was drunk. And so he was, with the wine of the kingdom. He gave up drinking whisky, and continued to drink of the new wine of the kingdom.

Good News.

6778. BIBLE, Effect of the. When Naimbana, a black prince, arrived in England from the neighborhood of Sierra Leone, the gentleman to whose care he was entrusted took great pains to convince him that the Bible was the Word of God, and he received it as such with great reverence and simplicity. When asked what it was that satisfied him on this subject, he replied, "When I found all good men minding the Bible, and calling it the Word of God, and all bad men disregarding it, I then was sure that the Bible must be what good men call it, the Word of God."

Moister.

6779. BIBLE, Elevating Effect of the. Chemistry never silenced a guilty conscience. Mathematics never healed a broken heart. All the sciences in the world never smoothed down a dying pillow. No earthly philosophy ever supplied hope in death. No natural theology ever gave peace in the prospect of meeting a holy God. All these things are of the earth, earthy, and can never raise a man above the earth's level. They may enable a man to strut and fret his little season here below with a more dignified gait than his fellow-mortals, but they can never give him wings, and enable him to soar towards heaven. He that has the largest share of them will find at length that without Bible knowledge he has got no lasting possession. Death will make an end of all his attainments, and after death they will do him no good at all.

Ryle.

6780. BIBLE, Exalt the. A late writer says: "We cannot too much honor the Bible, whether in the pulpit, or family, or in school. It is said that at the coronation of the boy King of England, Edward VI., three swords were brought, and laid before him as emblems of his power. 'Bring another,' said he, 'I need most of all the sword of the Spirit.' The Bible was brought, and has retained its place in subsequent coronations. It is the only symbol used at the inauguration of our Republican Presidents."

6781. BIBLE, Excellence of the. When in Paris, some years ago, I received an account of a French infidel, who happened to find in a drawer of his library some stray leaves of an unknown volume. Although in the constant habit of dencuncing the Bible, like most infidel writers he had never read any part of it. These fugitive leaves contained the prayer of Habakkuk (Hab. 3). Being a man of fine literary taste, he was captivated with its poetic beauty, and hastened to the club-house to announce the discovery to his associates. Of course they were anxious to know the name of the gifted author, to which inquiries the elated infidel replied, "A writer by the name of HAB-BA-KOOK, of course a Frenchman!" Judge of the infidel's surprise when informed that the passage he was so enthusiastically admiring was not produced by one of his own countrymen, nor even by one of his own class of so-called free-thinkers, but was penned by one of God's ancient prophets, and was contained in that much-despised book, the Bible. This I regard as one of the sublimest passages of inspired literature; and often have I wondered that some artist, equal to the task, has not selected the prophet and his scene of desolation as the subject of a painting.

Daniel Webster.

6782. BIBLE, Experience of the. A gentleman met an old Christian slave, who could neither read nor write. After starting some of the common objections of infidels against the authenticity of the Scriptures, in a way calculated to confound an ignorant man, he said to him, "When you cannot even read the Bible, nor examine the evidence for or against its truth, how can you know that it is the Word of God?" After reflecting a moment, the negro replied, "You ask me, sir, how I know that the Bible is the Word of God? I know it by its effect upon my own heart."

6783. BIBLE, Faithful to the. Euplius was arrested as a Christian in Sicily in 304. He appeared before the governor with the book of the gospels in his hand. He was told that he ought not to keep such writings contrary to the edicts of the emperors, and was asked where he kept them. He answered that he had the book about him. He was asked to read something out of it, and opening it read, "Blessed are they that are persecuted for righteousness' sake, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven," and again, "If any man will be my disciple, let him deny himself, and take up his cross and follow me." "What does that mean?" "It is the law of my Lord, which hath been delivered to me." "By whom?" "By Jesus Christ, the Son of the living God." Then the judge, Calvisianus, said, "Since his confession makes his disobedience manifest, let him be delivered to the executioners, and examined upon the rack." In the midst of painful tortures he was again questioned. He answered, "I declare again that I am a Christian, and read the Holy Scriptures." His tortures were increased and he was repeatedly urged to apostatize. At last the judge said, "Sacrifice now if you would be delivered." He answered, "I sacrifice myself to Jesus Christ my God." He endured great agony, praying and thanking God till his strength failed. Ther the sentence of death by the sword was pronounced against him, for "despising the edicts of the emperors, blaspheming the gods, and not repenting." The Gospel was hung about his neck, and a herald cried before him as he was led to execution, "Euplius, a Christian, the foe of the gods and of the emperors." The martyr, most joyful, cried continually, "Thanks be to Christ my God," till his head was cut off.

6785. BIBLE, Follow the. A boy in a printing-office received from his master a list of Scripture questions and answers to be set up and printed. In the progress of the work, he asked the foreman if he should "follow copy"—that is, set up just as it is written. "Certainly," said the foreman. "Why not?" "Because this copy is not like the Bible." "How do you know that?" "Why, I learned some of these proofs at Sunday-school, and I know that two of them are not like the Bible." "Well, then, do not follow copy, but set them up as they are in the Bible." The boy took the Bible and made it his copy, guide, and pattern. That is the true and only standard. Follow it.

6786. BIBLE, Harmony of the. As when you see wheels, shafts, pins, bands, lying apart, each finished in itself, yet each adapted to others, you know that some machine is contemplated by the founder, though you may not see how to put it together; but when you see the machine put together and in action, you perceive new fitness in every part, and the grand combination of all for one end; so in the several books of the Bible you discover an adaptation to the same end, but in the completed volume you behold the grand harmony of all the books in one object—the restoration of a sinful race to its Paradise in God! The mind that conceived such a plan, and slowly unfolding it, part by part, through the ages, brought it together finished in this book, must be divine.

Dr. J. P. Thompson.

6787. BIBLE, Ignorance of the. A Roman Catholic priest in Ireland was one day passing by some men and boys who were engaged in breaking stones for a new road. He said that the road there would be of great use; "and it is a long time," said he, "since there was a road in this place." "Not since Adam was a boy," remarked one of the men. "And when was that? Can you tell me?" said the priest. "No, sir, I cannot," replied the man. The same question was asked of several persons, and a similar reply given. At length the priest turned to a young boy, and said, "Can you tell me, my lad, when Adam was a boy?" "Sir, Adam never was a boy. God created him man, and made him perfect also." "Are ye not ashamed," said the priest, "to be excelled by a young boy like this?" "No," answered one of them appealed to, "we are not; that boy reads the Scriptures, and has them explained to him; that is what is not done for us, and we are prevented from reading them ourselves." The priest rode away without making any reply.

6788. BIBLE, Ignorant of the. A young man was boasting of his infidelity at a camp-meeting a number of years ago, and desiring very earnestly to draw some one into a controversy. Father Gruber, an eccentric old German preacher, found his way into the presence of the young man, and said, "I understand you want to have a discussion on some of these questions." "Yes, sir," replied the young man. "Well," said Father Gruber, "it is not lawful to discuss questions of that kind on the campground. Will you go outside?" And they passed out into the woods. "Now," said Father Gruber, "I am not willing to discuss with any body that does not understand the scriptures. Have you read the Bible carefully and thoroughly through?" "O yes," said the young man; "again and again. I have been in the habit of reading it from early childhood, and am perfectly familiar with it." "Well," said the old gentleman, "can you tell me where is the Epistle of Peter to Paul?" "O yes," said the young man, "don't think I am such a fool as not to know that it is in the New Testament, not in the Old." "Well," said the old gentleman, "I wish you would find it." He hunted for some time, and, as you know, did not find it, as there is no such epistle. That ended the controversy. Bp. Bowman.

6789. BIBLE, Ignorant Criticism of. An aged clergyman was traveling in a stage coach with three young men who were amusing themselves and others by trifling conversation. One of the number suggested "he would rather believe the Koran than the Bible." The minister, on interrogating him, found that he knew nothing of either the Koran or the Bible. "Surely," said the minister, "it is not too much to ask men to read what they condemn; and if you will take my advice, you will apply yourself to the prayerful study of the Word of God. You will then have no occasion to inquire which book is entitled to your belief, for you will know and be assured which is the Word of God."

6790. BIBLE, Imprinting the. You cannot read the Bible as you do other books. I visited Mr. Prang's chromo establishment in Boston and saw the process of printing a picture of some public man. The first stone made hardly an impression on the paper. The second stone showed no sign of change. The third no sign. The fifth and sixth showed only outlines of a man's head. The tenth, the man's face, chin, nose and forehead appeared. The fifteenth and twentieth looked like a dim picture. The twenty-eighth impression stood forth as natural as life. It looked as though it would speak to you. So, carefully and prayerfully read the Word of God—read the same chapter again and again—and the twenty-eighth time Christ Jesus will shine forth.

6791. BIBLE, Indestructibility of the. Moody. A lady asked a laborer if he would accept a Bible. He answered, "No, and if you leave one I will throw it into the fire." She laid it on his table. He seized and threw it upon the burning coals, where all was consumed save a single leaf, which was blown out. His wife picked it up and read on it, "Heaven and earth shall pass away, but my word shall not pass away." This passage was a two-edged sword in the furious man's heart. He could not sleep and was filled with terror. He sought the donor of the burned Bible, confessed his sins, and asked for pardon from herself and from God, and found the Saviour. We may burn the sacred pages, but its truths will survive to condemn or crown us.

6792. BIBLE, Infidels and the. A member of the French Academy went to see Diderot, an able champion of infidelity, and found him explaining a chapter of the Gospel to his daughter as seriously as a Christian parent. The visitor expressed his surprise. "I understand you," said Diderot, "but, in truth, what better lesson could I give her?"

6793. BIBLE, Influence of the. Robert Aitkin, a bookseller, was called upon by a gentleman, who confessed himself to be an infidel, for Paine's "Age of Reason." Not having it, Mr. Aitkin told him he would give him a better book if he would engage to read it. He assented and evinced surprise when a Bible was put in his hand, but said his word was passed and he would keep it. After a time he returned to thank the bookseller, saying the book had made him what he was not before—a happy man.

6794. BIBLE, Inspiration of the. Mr. John Williams, the Martyr of Erromanga, gave the following account of the reasons of a few converted South Sea Islanders for their belief in the Bible. They were startled when asked, "Do you believe the Bible to be the word of God?" having never had a doubt about it. After a moment's pause, one answered, "Most certainly we do." It was asked, "Why do you believe it? Can you give any reason for believing the Bible to be the word of God?" He replied, "Why, look at the power with which it has been attended, in the utter overthrow of all that we have been addicted to from time immemorial. What else could have demolished that system of idolatry which had so long prevailed amongst us? No human arguments could have induced us to abandon that false system." This question being put to another, he replied, "I believe the Bible to be the word of God, on account of the pure system of religion which it contains. We had a system of religion before; but look how dark and black a system that was compared with the bright system of salvation revealed in the word of God! Here we learn that we are sinners; and that God gave Jesus Christ to die for us, and by that goodness salvation is given to us. Now, what but the wisdom of God could have produced such a system as this presented to us in the word of God? And this doctrine leads to purity." A third reply to this question was, "When I look at myself I find I have got hinges all over my body. I have hinges to my legs, hinges to my jaws, hinges to my feet. If I want to take hold of anything, there are hinges to my hands to do it with. If my heart thinks, and I want to speak, I have got hinges to my jaws. If I want to walk, I have hinges to my feet. Now here," continued he, "is wisdom, in adapting my body to the various functions it has to discharge. And I find that the wisdom which made the Bible, exactly fits with this wisdom which has made my body; consequently, I believe the Bible to be the word of God." Another replied, "I believe it to be the word of God, on account of the prophecies which it contains, and the fulfillment of them."

6795. BIBLE, Intention of the. "The Bible is a strange book," said an infidel objector to an aged minister. "A wonderful book," was the reply. "It has some strange characters among its saints," said the objector; "such as David and Solomon. If such men lived in our day we would say that they deserved to be sent to state prison for life." "Worse than that," replied the minister. "If they got what they deserved they would be sent to hell forever. But you probably are mistaken as to the object of the Bible. It is not meant to show how good men are, but to show how the grace of God brings salvation to the very worst of men, and makes saints out of the vilest sinners."

6796. BIBLE, Interpreters of the. A learned Oriental, having been to visit the library of a French convent, writes thus to his friend in Persia, concerning what has passed—"Father," said I to the librarian, "what are these huge volumes which fill the whole side of the library?" "These," said he, "are the interpreters of the Scriptures." "There is a prodigious number of them," replied I; "the Scriptures must have been very dark formerly, and be very clear at present. Do there remain still any doubts? Are there now any points contested?" "Are there?" answered he with surprise—"are there! There are almost as many as there are lines." "You astonish me," said I; "what then have all these authors been doing?" "These authors," returned he, "never searched the Scriptures for what ought to be believed, but for what they did believe themselves. They did not consider them as a book wherein were contained the doctrines which they ought to receive, but as a work which might be made to authorize their own ideas."

6797. BIBLE, Key to the. Let me suppose a person to have a curious cabinet, which is opened at his pleasure, and not exposed to common view. He invites all to come and see it, and offers to show it to any one who asks him. It is hid, because he keeps the key, but none can complain, because he is ready to open it whenever he is desired. Some, perhaps, disdain the offer, and say, "Why is it locked at all?" Some think it is not worth seeing, or amuse themselves with guessing at the contents. But those who are simply desirous for themselves, leave others disputing, go according to appointment, and are gratified. These have reason to be thankful for the favor, and the others have no just cause to find fault. Thus the riches of Divine grace may be compared to a richly-furnished cabinet to which "Christ is the door." The Word of God likewise is a cabinet generally locked up, but the key of prayer will open it. The Lord invites all, but he keeps the dispensation in his own hand. They cannot see these things, except he shows them; but then he refuses none that sincerely ask him. The wise men of the world can go no further than the outside of this cabinet; they may amuse themselves and surprise others with their ingenious guesses at what is within; but a child that has seen it opened can give us satisfaction, without studying or guessing at all. If men will presume to aim at the knowledge of God, without the knowledge of Christ, who is the way and the door; if they have such a high opinion of their own wisdom and penetration as to suppose they can understand the Scriptures without the assistance of his Spirit; or, if their worldly wisdom teaches them that those things are not worth their inquiring, what wonder is it that they should continue to be hid from their eyes?

Newton.

6798. BIBLE, Love in the. A converted African went to Mr. Moffat, the missionary, and told him that his dog had torn his copy of the New Testament, and swallowed some leaves of it, and that he was grieved about it, for the dog was very valuable. "But," said the missionary, "why do you grieve so? You can get another Testament, and the leaves will not hurt the dog." "Ah!" said he, "that's what I fear. He is a good hunter, and a good watchdog, and the New Testament is so full of gentleness and love that I am afraid he will never be of any service again!"

6799. BIBLE, Marked with the. A Scotch preacher, being inducted into a church, told the people the relation that was to be between him and them, in the following words: "Sirs, I am come to be your shepherd, and you must be my sheep, and the Bible will be my tar bottle, for I will mark you with it."

6800. BIBLE, Modern Discovery and the. Lieutenant Lynch has floated down the Jordan, and explored the Dead Sea; and his sounding-line has fetched up from the deep physical confirmation of the catastrophe which destroyed the cities of the plain. Robinson, and Wilson, and Bartlett, and Bonar, have taken pleasure in the very dust and rubbish of Zion; and they come back declaring that the Bible is written on the very face of the Holy Land. Since Laborde opened up the lost wonders of Petra, its stones have cried aloud, and many a verse of Jehovah's word stands graven there with a pen of iron in the rock forever. Skepticism was wont to sneer, and ask, Where is Nineveh, that great city of three days' journey? But since Botta and Layard have shown its sixty miles of enclosing wall, skepticism sneers no longer. Hidden in the sands of Egypt, many of God's witnesses eluded human search till within the last few years; but now, when Bibles increase, and are running to and fro through the earth, and when fresh confirmations are timely, God gives the word, and there is a resurrection of these witnesses; and from their sphinx-guarded sepulchres old Pharaohs totter into court, and testify how true was the tale which Moses wrote three thousand years ago. "In my youth," said Caviglia, when Lord Lindsay found him in the East, "I read Jean Jacques and Diderot, and believed myself a philosopher. I came to Egypt, and the Scriptures and the Pyramids converted me." And even so, a visit to Palestine, the reading of Keith's "Fulfillment of Prophecy"—nay, the mere sight of the Assyrian antiquities, has given faith to many a doubter; just as we could scarcely imagine any one reading Dr. Stroud on the "Physical Cause of Christ's Death," or Mr. Smith on the "Shipwreck of St. Paul," without carrying away the firmest conviction of these historical facts, and, consequently, of all those vital truths which the facts by implication involve. Dr. J. Hamilton.

6801. BIBLE, Mohammedan. The Mohammedans believe that the Koran is eternal and uncreated, remaining, as some express it, in the very essence of God; that the first transcript has been from everlasting by God's throne, written on a table of vast bigness, called the preserved table, in which are recorded the divine decrees, past and future; that a copy from the tables, in one volume on paper, was by the ministry of the Angel Gabriel sent down to the lowest heaven in the month of Ramadân on the night of power; from whence Gabriel revealed it to Mohammed by parcels, some at Mecca, and some at Medina, at different times, during the space of twenty-three years, as the exigency of affairs required; giving him, however, the consolation to shew him the whole (which they tell us was bound in silk, and adorned with gold and precious stones of Paradise) once a year; but in the last year of his life he had the favor to see it twice.

George Sale.

6802. BIBLE, Moral Influence of the. When I visited Mexico, a year since or so, I found this: that in various places congregations had been formed and held together that no living preacher had addressed; but the soldiers had left copies of the New Testament, the people had read them, they forsook their grosser sins, and they met together to talk and read and pray. One day I went up into a mountain or high hill-side where was a cave, a kind of amphitheatre in a fort, where the people had met by one and two hundred to avoid the persecutions of the government, and there they read the Scriptures and sang and prayed. The same thing occurs in Syria and among the Mohammedans in Arabia. Wherever God's word is circulated it stirs the hearts of the people, it prepares for public morals. Circulate that word, and you find the tone of morals immediately changed. It is God speaking to man.

Bp. Simpson.

6803. BIBLE, Need of the Whole. The Burman Missionary tells of an old and blind man, who thirty years ago came into possession, through a countryman stopping over-night at his house, of a book printed in Burmese, and containing only the Psalms and a part of the Prophets. Before he had finished the Psalms he cast away his idols and Buddhism, and believed in a living God—Creator, Preserver, and Judge of men; and from that time he has worshiped and prayed to the Eternal God. He committed many of the Psalm-prayers to memory, and daily offered them, especially the 51st. For twenty years he lived in this way before ever hearing of Christ and the atonement. Coming then from the interior to Prome, he heard of a foreign teacher residing there, and from him received a copy of the New Testament. He says that if a man should go about and attend to his business twenty years by starlight, and the sun should then rise on him in all its glory, he thinks it would produce about such a change in his eyes and vision as the Gospel of Matthew produced on his mind; that then the long night of praying to God and hoping for mercy without a mediator or an atonement came to an end, and for the past ten years his hope has been firmly fixed on Christ.

6804. BIBLE, Power of the. A missionary in France offered a Bible in an humble dwelling. The man took it, tore out a dozen pages, and with them began to light his pipe. Some years after the missionary happened in the same house. The family had just lost their son in the Crimean war, and his Bible had been sent back home. The missionary took it up, and saw that it was the very same Bible that he had left in the house, and from which the leaves had been torn. The dying soldier had written on one of the leaves of the Bible: "Rejected and scoffed at, but finally believed in and saved." The Bible may be used to light the pipe of witticism by some, but for us it is a staff in life, a pillow in death, and our joy for eternity.

Talmage.

6805. BIBLE, Practicing the. I have here a music-book, one used by singers. The object of this book is to teach and promote vocal music, and also instrumental music, to be employed in worship, commonly called sacred music. Now, how does this music-book teach music? Simply by being studied? Not at all. Suppose a person previously unacquainted with the science and art of music, who has never sung a strain, and has no ear for melody, takes this book and commits it to memory, will that make him a musician? He might almost as well swallow the book, and would derive about as much benefit from it! He must reduce the book to practice. He must make the sounds indicated, or the book is a dead letter to him. Precisely so is it with the Bible.

Dr. E. O. Haven.

6806. BIBLE, Readers of the. To some the Bible is uninteresting and unprofitable, because they read too fast. Amongst the insects which subsist on the sweet sap of flowers there are two very different classes. One is remarkable for its imposing plumage, which shows in the sun beams like the dust of the gems; and as you watch its jaunty gyrations over the fields, and its minuet dance from flower to flower, you cannot help admiring its graceful activity, for it is plainly getting over a great deal of ground. But in the same field there is another worker, whose brown breast and business-like, straightforward flight may not have arrested your eye. His fluttering neighbor darts down here and there, and sips elegantly wherever he can find a drop of ready nectar; but this dingy plodder makes a point of alighting everywhere, and wherever he alights he either finds honey or makes it. If the flower-cup be deep, he goes down to the bottom; if its dragon-mouth be shut, he thrusts its lips asunder; and if the nectar be peculiar or recondite, he explores all about till he discovers it, and then having ascertained the knack of it, joyful as one who has found great spoil, he sings his way down into its luscious recesses. His rival of the painted velvet wing has no patience for such dull and long-winded details. But what is the end? Why, the one died last October along with the flowers; the other is warm in his hive to-night, amidst the fragrant stores which he gathered beneath the bright beams of summer. Reader, to which do you belong—the butterflies or bees?

Dr. J. Hamilton.

6807. BIBLE, Reading the. Erasmus laughs at the man who attaches a benefit to the mere possession of the Bible. He likens him to one whom he calls Cyclops, who wears in his belt on this side a goodly bottle of sack, and on the other side a richly ornamented copy of the word of God, and he says in his swaggering style, "In truth, I am as good a saint as any!" Erasmus tries to disprove this, and in his witty way, "Prithee serve thy sack bottle as thy Bible. There are many virtues in a bottle of sack; it warms you when you are cold, it gets your valor up when you are half afraid. But do not take it; never take the cork out of it, and then see what its virtues are." Of course, our friend objects. He admires the bottle of sack; but he likes it better when the cork is out, and most of all when it is against his lips, and the stream is flowing merrily. "Ay," says he, "but what do you say to this book? Begin to read and study it." "Ah," he replies, "it is all dry matter that does not concern me." "Verily," then adds the other, "I see thou art indeed a true disciple of the sack, but a false disciple of the book." There is much truth in that wit. If people carry their Bibles as Erasmus wished this man to carry his sack, they will get no good out of it. We may scatter Bibles by millions, and reduce the price to two-pence or nothing; but we have done nothing but add to men's responsibility, unless we pray earnestly that God will lead men to study it, and by his Spirit bless it to their conversion, their edification, their sanctification in righteousness.

Spurgeon.

6808. BIBLE, Reasons for Believing the. A good old Highlander gave Claudius Buchanan the following reason for believing the Bible to be from God: "I know nothing about what the learned men call the external evidences of revelation; but I will tell you why I believe it to be from God: I have a most depraved and sinful nature; and, do what I will, I find I cannot make myself holy. My friends cannot do it for me, nor do I think all the angels in heaven could. One thing alone does it—the reading and believing what I read in that blessed book: that does it. Now, as I know that God must be holy, and a lover of holiness, and as I believe that book to be the only thing in creation that produces and increases holiness, I conclude that it is from God, and that he is the author of it."

6809. BIBLE, Reposing in Death on the. Here we find that knowledge which gives a feeling of firm ground below us—firm if there be terra firma in the universe—and on which have reposed, in death, the wisest of mankind. Newton laid not his dying head on his "Principia," but on his Bible; Cowper, not on his "Task," but on his New Testament; Hall, not on his wide fame, but his "humble hope;" Michael Angelo, not on that pencil which alone coped with the grandeurs of the "Judgment," but on that grace which for him shore the judgment of its terrors; Coleridge, not on his limitless genius, but on "Mercy for praise, to be forgiven for fame." G. Gilfillan.

6810. BIBLE, Respect for the. I remember years ago when a great man of this nation fell in the national capital—a man whom I admired—and I exceedingly desired to learn something of the end of that man, and especially to know if his death was happy, triumphant, and if, in all probability, he had gone to enjoy a blessed reward in the kingdom of heaven. I looked in the newspapers for a week, and at last all I could fix my hopes upon was a solitary expression like this, "He had a profound respect for the Bible!" And I said, "Is that all that can be said of that man?" Why, there is not one in this house that has not a profound respect for the Bible! Huxley has it, with all his scepticism and infidelity; and within the last few years has affirmed, as have thousands of other great men, that the Bible must be in the public schools in London, because it is the only book that gives a pure morality. He respects the Bible, and yet rejects it as the word of God—as inspired from heaven. And is that all a good man does—respects the Bible? When I go to my home, as frequently I do after weeks of labor, and see my little daughter run to meet me, do I pause and fold my hands and say, "O how I admire you, how I respect and reverence you, my child!" No, but I throw wide open my arms and say, "Come to my heart, precious one, I love you; I delight in you!" Bp. Bowman.

6811. BIBLE, Resting on the. "Do you believe in Christ?" said an infidel to John Jay. "I do, and I thank God that I do;" was the statesman's noble reply. Two years before his death, when eighty-two years of age, he was down by disease, and his recovery despaired of. When urged to tell his children on what foundation he rested his hopes, and from what source he drew his consolation, his brief reply was, "They have the book."

6812. BIBLE, Result of Searching the. A gentleman was asked what led him to embrace the Gospel, which formerly he was known to have despised. He said, "A person put into my hands Paine's 'Age of Reason.' I read it with attention, and was much struck with the strong and ridiculous representation he made of many passages in the Bible. I confess, to my shame, I had never read the Bible through; but from what I remembered to have heard at church, and accidentally on other occasions, I could not persuade myself that Paine's report was quite exact, or that the Bible was quite so absurd a book as he represented it. I resolved, therefore, that I would read the Bible regularly through, and compare the passages when I had done so, that I might give the Bible fair play. I accordingly set myself to the task, and as I advanced, I was struck with the majesty which spoke, the awfulness of the truths contained in it, and the strong evidence of its Divine origin, which increased with every page, so that I finished my inquiry with the fullest satisfaction of the truth as it is in Jesus, and my heart was penetrated with a sense of obligation I had never felt before. I resolved henceforth to take the sacred word for my guide, and to be a faithful follower of the Son of God."

6813. BIBLE, Rules for Reading the. Take one book at a time. Don't be in a hurry. Read a book over, over and over. God will give light. The sixty-six books are sixty-six battering rams for Christians to conquer Satan with. So we shall slay and conquer. Try different ways of studying the Bible till you succeed. My wife wanted me to like tomatoes. I tried them raw, with vinegar, with sugar, and cooked, but I could not eat them. At last she thought of another way, and succeeded, and I thought it the best vegetable in the world. Moody.

6814. BIBLE, Romanism and the. La Capitale, an infidel paper of large circulation, printed at Rome, thus comments on Signor Ribbetti's Wednesday lectures: "We do not at all agree with him, that every thing in the Bible is genuine; but it must be confessed there is no weapon so terrible as the Bible for fighting the Roman Catholic priesthood. In fact it lies crushed beneath these quotations. This is not a book; it is a millstone, grinding all the Lent preachers to powder."

6815. BIBLE, Salvation in the. The life-boat may have a tasteful bend and beautiful decoration, but these are not the qualities for which I prize it; it was my salvation from the howling sea! So the interest which a regenerate soul takes in the Bible, is founded on a personal application to the heart of the saving truth which it contains. If there is no taste for this truth, there can be no relish for the Scriptures. Dr. J. W. Alexander.

6816. BIBLE, Silent Effects of Reading the. Do not think you are getting no good from the Bible, merely because you do not see that good day by day. The greatest effects are by no means those which make the most noise and are most easily observed. The greatest effects are often silent, quiet, and hard to detect at the time they are being produced. Think of the influence of the moon upon the earth, and of the air upon the human lungs. Remember how silently the dew falls, and how imperceptibly the grass grows. There may be far more doing than you think in your soul by your Bible-reading.

6817. BIBLE, Touch-stone of the. A woman entered a book-store to purchase a psalm book, and tendered a bank note in payment. It was in the days when the variety of these was great, and Thompson's Bank-Note Detector was a necessity of every merchant. The seller took the note, and looked in the detector to see if it was genuine. It was soon ascertained to be a counterfeit. The purchaser burst out in ejaculation, "Ah, man, it win na stan a book, it win na stan a book!" To such test must all human opinions be brought. If they will not stand the Bible they are false, and anathema.

Dr. J. S. Holme.

6818. BIBLE, Treasure hid in the. On the banks of the Wabash, the effects of a poor widow, who had been left comparatively destitute at the death of her husband, had been seized by a sheriff for debt, and were being sold at auction; and among other things an old family Bible was put up for sale. She begged the constable to spare this memento of her dear and honored parents, but he was inexorable. The good book was about going for a few shillings, when the widow suddenly snatched it, and declaring she would have some relic of those she loved, cut the thread that held the brown linen cover, with the intent of retaining it. The covers fell into her hands, and with them two flat pieces of thin dirty paper. Surprised at the circumstance, she examined them, and what was her joy and delight to find that each called for £500 on the Bank of England. On the back of one, in her mother's hand-writing, were the following words, "When sorrow overtakes you, seek your Bible." And on the other, in her father's hand, "Your Father's ears are never deaf." The sale was immediately stopped, and the family Bible given to the faithful owner.

6819. BIBLE, Treasures in the. A poor shepherd, near Yoetot, bought an old Bible in 1848. One Sunday he discovered that several of the leaves were pasted together. Having separated them, he found a bank bill for five hundred francs. Accompanying it was this will and testament: "I gathered together this money with very great difficulty; but having none as natural heirs except those who have absolutely need of nothing, I make thee who-soever shall read this Bible my heir."

6820. BIBLE, Truth of the. Lord Rochester was an avowed infidel, and a large portion of his time was spent ridiculing the Bible. He was described as a great wit, a great sinner, and a great penitent. He was converted by the Holy Spirit in the use of the word. In reading the fifty-third chapter of Isaiah, he was convinced of the truth and inspiration of the Scriptures and the divinity of Christ. He trusted in the atonement, and died in expectation of heavenly happiness.

6821. BIBLE, Unity of the. The waters of the sea have many different shades. In one place they look blue, and in another green. And yet the difference is owing to the depth or shallowness of the part we see, or to the nature of the bottom. The water in every case is the same salt sea. The breath of a man may produce different sounds, according to the character of the instrument on which he plays. The flute, the pipe, and the trumpet have each their peculiar note. And yet the breath that calls forth the notes is in each case one and the same. The light of the planets we see in heaven is very various. Mars and Saturn and Jupiter have each a peculiar color. And yet we know that the light of the sun, which each planet reflects, is in each case one and the same. Just in the same way, the books of the Old and New Testaments are all inspired truth, and yet the aspect of that truth varies according to the mind through which the Holy Ghost makes it flow. The handwriting and style of the writers differ enough to prove that each had a distinct individual being; but the Divine Guide who dictates and directs the whole is always one. All is alike inspired. Every chapter and verse and word is from God.

6822. BIBLE, Unsealed. A Gottingen professor narrated the following to two gentlemen from London, in the course of their tour through Germany:—"Some years ago I was in great danger of losing my sight, which had become so bad that I could scarcely distinguish anything. The prospect of passing the last days of my life in blindness made me so melancholy that I resolved to make a tour to Bremen to recover my spirits. On this tour I came to Hanover, where some friends took me into the Duke of Cambridge's library, and showed me some Bibles, lately sent by the Bible Society in London as a present to the Duke. Wishing to try whether in my blindness I could distinguish the paper and print of those from the common ones, I took one up merely for that purpose, without the least intention of selecting any particular passage; and now see what I read." He here opened the Bible, and recited Isa. 42: 16: "And I will bring the blind by a way that they knew not; I will lead them in paths that they have not known: I will make darkness light before them, and crooked things straight. These things will I do unto them, and not forsake them." I read this verse, and received spiritual sight." At these words he was so much affected that the tears ran down his cheeks. "With a cheerful mind I now journeyed back to Gottingen, and my greatest desire was to possess a Bible in which this verse stood on the same page and in the same place. Shortly afterwards, I was visited by a friend from London, to whom I related the occurrence, and immediately received his promise to send me a Bible as soon as possible, which he did."

6823. BIBLE, Valuing the. King George of the Friendly Islands, a noble man, who had been converted from cannibalism, met with what to him was a great loss. On hearing of the wreck of his vessel, instead of yielding to immoderate grief, he said he was sorry to lose the schooner; "But," said he, as he held up his Testament in his hand, and looked upon the messengers with a smile, "that is only a temporal loss, and may be repaired; so long as we have the word of God we are rich indeed, and have cause to be thankful."

6824. BIBLE, Value of the. Luther entered into orders, and discovered a Bible, 1507. The ignorance of the Scriptures at that time was astonishing. Conrad of Heresbach, a grave author of that age, relates the following words from the mouth of a monk: "They have invented a new language, which they call Greek; you must be carefully on your guard against it: it is the matter of all heresy. I observe in the hands of many persons a book written in that language, and which they call the New Testament. It is a book full of daggers and poison. As to the Hebrew, my brethren, it is certain that whoever learns it becomes immediately a Jew." It was in 1507, May 2, and in Luther's twenty-fourth year, that he entered into orders, and celebrated his first mass. This date is the more remarkable, because he discovered about the same time a Latin copy of the Bible lying in the library of the monastery. He eagerly laid hold of this neglected book, and persevered in studying it with so much diligence that he was able in a short time to refer with ease and promptitude to any particular passage. In the present day, we can with difficulty conceive how a copy of the Bible could remain unnoticed by the whole of a religious fraternity, or that a person so respectfully educated as Luther should be unapprised that the whole of the Scriptures was not read to the people in the public service of the Church. It was with no small surprise that he discovered that there were many passages in the New Testament that were not thus read. The most striking of these Luther committed to memory, and treasured up with equal diligence many parts of the prophetic Scriptures. What a happy contrast do these days form to those of Luther! Who is without a Bible now? If any, at least in our own country, is it not their own fault? Buck.

6825. BIBLE, Versions of the. Four hundred years ago, including detached portions as well as complete transcripts, the whole world did not contain more than a few thousand copies of the word of God; and, although they were rapidly multiplied by the art of printing, at the beginning of the present century it is supposed that the entire amount fell short of four millions of copies. Since then the increase is amazing. The Bible Society alone has called into existence well-nigh fifty millions of copies, in one hundred and forty-eight languages or dialects, of which one hundred and twenty-one are translations never before printed. Many of these languages were never reduced to rule, had no grammar, no lexicon, had never been seen in print, had never been written down, till Bible translators undertook the arduous task; and altogether it may be presumed that the Gospel story can now be read in the speech of three-fourths of our earth's inhabitants.

Dr. J. Hamilton.

6826. BIBLE, Why Papists Withhold the. The true reason why the Papists forbid the Scriptures to be read is not to keep men from errors and heresies, but to keep them from discovering those which they themselves impose upon them. Such trash as they trade in would never go off their hands if they did not keep their shops thus dark; which made one of their shavelings so bitterly complain of Luther for spoiling their market, saying that but for him they might have persuaded the people of Germany to eat hay. Anything, indeed, will go down a blind man's throat. Gurnal.

6827. BIGOTRY, Danger of. I recollect, on one occasion, conversing with a marine, who gave me a good deal of his history. He told me that the most terrible engagement he had ever been in was one between the ship to which he belonged, and another English vessel, when, on meeting in the night, they mistook each other for a French man-of-war. Several persons were wounded, and both vessels sustained serious damage from the firing. But when the day broke, great and painful was their surprise to find the English flag hoisted from both ships, and that through mistake they had been fighting, the previous night, against their own countrymen. They approached and saluted each other, and wept bitterly together. Christians sometimes commit the same error in this present world—one denomination mistakes another for an enemy; it is night, and they cannot see to recognize one another. What will be their surprise when they see each other by the light of another world, when they meet in heaven, after having shot at one another in the mist of the present state! How will they salute each other when better known and understood, after having wounded one another in the night? But they should wait till daybreak, at any rate, that they may not be in danger, through any mistake, of shooting at their friends. Williams.

6828. BIGOTRY, Monstrous. For wolves to devour sheep is no wonder; but for sheep to devour one another is monstrous and astonishing. Salter.

6829. BIGOTS, Bondage of. Bigots are stiff, straitened, and confined; like Egyptian mummies, which are bound round with thousands of yards of ribbon. Salter.

6830. BIGOTS, One-sided. Bigots are like some trees that grow by the seashore, which do not spread their branches equally on all sides, but are blown away, and stand entirely one way. Salter.

6831. BIOGRAPHIES, Useful. Biographies of great, but especially of good men, are most instructive and useful as helps, guides, and incentives to others. Some of the best are almost equivalent to gospels—teaching high living, high thinking, and energetic action for their own and the world's good. British biography is studded over as with "patines of bright gold," with illustrious examples of the power of self-help, of patient purpose, resolute working, and steadfast integrity, issuing in the formation of truly noble and manly character; exhibiting, in language not to be misunderstood, what it is in the power of each to accomplish for himself; and illustrating the efficacy of self-respect and self-reliance in enabling men of even the humblest rank to work out for themselves an honorable competency and a solid reputation.

6832. BIRDS, Miracle of the. In a certain season of the year, there is a revolution in nature which certainly claims our attention. It is the time the birds lay and hatch their young. This annual miracle passes in a manner before our eyes. What little we know of the generation of birds is sufficient to prove the wisdom of the Creator, as it can neither be attributed to a blind chance nor to art assisting nature. God had the wisest reasons for ordaining that certain animals should not arrive at perfection till after they came from their mother's womb, whilst others reach their full maturity in it. And it may be allowed, that whoever does not discover the hand of God in the production of birds, will not see it anywhere; for if the profoundest wisdom is not visible in this, it will appear so in nothing. O man! spectator of the wondrous works of God, adore with me the all-wise Being. Do not disdain to seek, in apparently small objects, the impression of his goodness, his power, and his ineffable wisdom.

Sturm.

6833. BIRTHDAYS, Ancient Commemoration of. The Greeks and Romans celebrated the annual return of their birthdays with music, feasting, sports, presents, and general rejoicing.

6834. BIRTHDAYS, Deathdays. Alexander the Great died on the same day of the same month in which he was born. Julius Cæsar was born on the fifteenth of March, and was slain on the same day, though warned to beware of the Ides of March. Plato died on his birthday in the same chamber in which he was born. Philip Melancthon died on his birthday, May 13, 1560, aged sixty-three.

6835. BIRTHDAYS, Fortunate. Timoleon, the successful general, gained his greatest victories on his birthdays, and his countrymen, the Syracusans, celebrated them as national holidays. Philip of Macedon counted his birthdays as the most fortunate of his life.

6836. BIRTH, Place of. Shortly after Summerfield came to this country, the young and beautiful preacher on some public occasion met a distinguished doctor of theology, who said to him,—"Mr. Summerfield, where were you born, sir?" "I was born," said he, "in Dublin and in Liverpool." "Ah, how can that be?" inquired the doctor. The boy preacher paused a moment, and answered, "Art thou a master in Israel and understandest not these things?"

6837. BISHOP, Example of a. Several hamlets belonging to the village of Alêt, are both remote and difficult of access. A poor woman, who was exceedingly ill, desired her husband to go to the curate, and request him to come and administer the sacrament immediately. It was very late in the evening, and quite dark. As the roads were besides covered with snow and exceedingly dangerous, the curate did not like to go at such an hour. "My good friend," said he, "perhaps your wife may not be so ill as you imagine. You see the weather; besides, at this late hour consider the imminent danger of falling over the precipices. I will wait on your wife early to-morrow, but it is out of the question to-night." The poor man, almost in despair, ran to the episcopal palace, and stated his case. The bishop had gone to bed, but immediately rose, and looking out of the window and seeing that the weather was really bad, he ordered torches to be lighted, and prepared to go himself. The grand vicar, astonished, asked if he had not better order the curate to go, and do what was in fact his duty. "No," said the bishop, "not for this once; a bishop, a Christian overseer at the head of his flock, like Cæsar at the head of his legions, should, if he mean to succeed, oftener say Venite (come) than Ite (go)."

6838. BISHOP, Responsibility of a. Adelbert, who lived in the 10th century, was appointed Archbishop of Prague. He was never seen to smile after his ordination, and, being asked the reason, he replied, "It is an easy thing to wear a mitre and a cross, but an awful thing to give an account of a bishopric before the Judge of quick and dead."

6839. BLAME, Reception of. A man takes contradiction and advice much more easily than people think, only he will not bear it when violently given, even though it be well-founded. Hearts are flowers; they remain open to the softly-falling dew, but shut up in the violent downpour of rain.

Richter.

6840. BLASPHEMY, Bold. A Florentine was to fight with a young man by the name of Forchebene, named thus because he but seldom spoke. A great company went to the place of meeting, and one of the number said to the Florentine, "God give you the victory." With blasphemy he replied, "How shall he choose but give it to me?" Forchebene, as if the minister and instrument of God, gave him a thrust in his mouth with a sword that fastened his tongue down, and he fell dead, the sword remaining in his mouth. The member that had so grievously offended was apparently doomed to endure punishment even in this world.

6841. BLASPHEMY, Prize for. Some profligate young men offered a prize to the one who should be adjudged most expert in blasphemy. A sailor won the hellish honor. After the debauch he started for home. Failing to reach it, search was made for him. His body was found. He had fallen upon a scythe and severed the main artery. He won the prize for blasphemy for time and eternity.

6842. BLASPHEMY, Punishment of. In 1812, at a public house in Rochester, England, two wicked sailors meeting at a tavern began to curse and swear, when one, in a tempest of passion, swore that he would kill the other. The landlord said to the sailor who made the threat, "What if God of a sudden should strike you dead, and sink you into hell with his curse upon you?" The sailor replied with a terrible oath, "The Almighty cannot do that—give me the tankard of beer—if God can do it, I'll go to hell before I drink it up." With an awful oath he seized the tankard, but instantly fell down and expired!

6843. BLASPHEMY, Temptation to. A young hermit came to Poemen greatly distressed by temptations to blasphemy. "Do you take pleasure in these thoughts?" asked the Abbot, "I hate and detest them," answered the hermit. "Be of good cheer," said Poemen; "if you cast them out without giving them consent, they cannot hurt though they may distress you."

6844. BLESSED, Condition of the. The condition of the blessed in a better world is not likely to be a state of mere repose—of total inactivity, in which they will be occupied in mere contemplation, without having, properly speaking, anything to do; as if "peace" and "rest" necessarily implied utter indolence. On the contrary, there seems every reason to believe that, though exempted from painful toils and distressing anxieties, as well as from every other kind of suffering—and though, in that sense, they will "rest from their labors"—yet they will still be employed in doing good offices to the children of their Heavenly Father.

Abp. Whately.

6845. BLESSEDNESS, Discovery of. The furthest that any of the philosophers went in the discovery of blessedness, was to pronounce that no man could be called blessed before his death; not that they had found what kind of better blessedness they went to after death, but that till death they were sure every man was subject to new miseries. The Christian philosophy goes further; it shows a more perfect blessedness than they conceived for the next life, and it imparts that blessedness to this life also.

Dr. Donne.

6846. BLESSING, Condition of. When the sun rises there is light. Why, I do not know. There might have been light without the sun, and there might have been a sun that gave no light, but God has been pleased to put these two things together—sunrise and light. So, whenever there is prayer, there is a blessing. I do not know why. There might have been prayer without a blessing, for there is in the world of wrath; and there might have been a blessing without prayer, for it often is sent to some who sought it not. But God has been pleased to make this a rule for the government of the moral and spiritual universe, that there shall be prayer first, and that then there shall be the answer to prayer.

Spurgeon.

6847. BLESSING, A Father's. When Dr. Bel-frage, of Scotland, was on his death-bed, he desired to have his infant son brought to him. The dying father placed his hands upon his son's head, and pronounced the blessing of Jacob upon him, "The God before whom my fathers did walk, the God who fed me all my life long to this day, the angel who redeemed me from all evil, bless the lad." He then gave charge that the child should be told of his blessing, and his father's earnest desire that he might become early acquainted with his father's God.

6848. BLESSING, Greatest. Coleridge, the poet, in a letter written a fortnight before his death, addressed to his god-child, says: "On the eve of my departure, I declare to you, that health is a great blessing; competence, obtained by honorable industry, a great blessing; and a great blessing it is to have kind, faithful, and loving friends and relatives; but that the greatest blessing, as it is the most ennobling of all privileges, is to be, indeed, a Christian."

6849. BLESSINGS, Balance of. Think you the sorrows of life ever outnumber its joys? Suppose that you take your pencil and open an account with God's providence, just as merchants do with their customers. On one side put down all the troubles, difficulties, sorrows, and losses of your life, and on the other all the blessings, comforts, benefits, hopes and joys. And how will the account stand? On the one side there are a few sorrows, a few losses, a few pains, a few tears, a few disappointments, a little pinching poverty, may be. On the other there are life, health, provision, sunshine, friends, the Bible, heaven, eternal life. Oh, how the column of blessings outruns the column of sorrows!

J. R. Miller.

6850. BLESSINGS, Obstructed. When our spiritual supplies fail, the channel is sometimes at fault, and not the stream; the hindrance to their coming lies with us and not with our heavenly Father. The supply of fuel to our city in midwinter sometimes fails, not because the coal-fields are exhausted, but because the weather has frozen our rivers, detained our colliers in the Channel, and blocked up our railways. The supply of water or of gas to our houses is sometimes insufficient, not because the reservoirs are low, but because the pipes which connect our dwellings with the main service are choked up or broken. News fails to reach us, not because our correspondent has neglected to write, but because the means of transmission have been imperfect.

Samuel Martin.

6851. BLESSINGS, Transformed. Even the best things, ill used, become evils, and contrarily, the worst things, used well, prove good. A good tongue, used to deceit; a good wit, used to defend error; a strong arm to murder; authority to oppress; a good profession to dissemble; are all evil. Even God's own word is the sword of the Spirit, which, if it kill not our vices, kills our souls. Contrariwise (as poisons are used to wholesome medicine), afflictions and sins, by a good use, prove so gainful as nothing more. Words are as they are taken, and things are as they are used. There are even cursed blessings.

Bishop Hall.

6852. BLESSINGS, Transient. When I see leaves drop from their trees in the beginning of autumn, just such, think I, is the friendship of the world; just such are the comforts and joys of this life. While the sap of maintenance lasts, my friends will swarm in abundance, my joys and comforts will abide with me; but when the sap ceases, the spring which supplies them fails, in the winter of my need they leave me naked. And those few leaves which I see falling, remind me of the coming winds and rains, when those trees shall be wholly stripped of their leaves; and of that season, that evil day, when all that administers to the gaiety and comfort of life shall fall from under me. Happy he who has that "Friend" which, saith the Scriptures, "sticketh closer than a brother," and that peace, and those pleasures, which are at God's right hand, and which shall never fade away!

Salter.

6853. BLIND, Groping in Darkness. Rabbi Jose says, "All my days did I feel pain at not being able to explain it; for what difference can it be to the blind man, whether he walketh in the light or in the dark? And yet," he adds, "the sacred penman would not have put down a word unnecessarily. What then does it mean?" Still the question remained unanswered, and that to the distress of the Rabbi. But "one night," he continues, "as I was walking in the road, I met a blind man with a lighted torch in his hand. 'Son,' said I, 'why dost thou carry that torch? thou canst not see its light!' 'Friend,' replied the blind man, 'true it is I cannot see, but others can: as long as I carry this lighted torch in my hand, the sons of men see me, take compassion on me, apprise me of danger, and save me from pitfalls, from thorns and briers.'" Thus was the mind of the Rabbi greatly relieved; he felt that the apparently superfluous word was meant to predict the greatness of the calamities that were to befall the Jewish people. Even at noonday they were to grope as the blind do in darkness, without a ray of light to exhibit their distress, and to appeal to the compassion of those who pass by.

Biblical Treasury.

6854. BLIND Leading the Blind. In the school-room of the American mission in Cairo, I found two persons reading the Bible in Arabic. One was a little girl, and she was sightless physically; both eyes were covered. But the other was a hard-looking old Mohammedan, hired to teach her to read with her fingers. She was a Christian child; he was a heathen. There was an instance of "blind leading the blind" in exact meaning of our Lord, both ways. He could see with his eyes, but only she could see with her heart, what Jesus had written for them both. And I leave it to all thoughtful Sabbath-school boys and girls to say which of those seemed to us the worst off—which was the blindest.

Dr. C. S. Robinson.

6855. BLIND, Opening the Eyes of the. Describing the school for the blind under the care of Mr. Mott at Beirut, Mr. Macgregor says:

"Only in February last, that poor blind fellow who sits on the form there was utterly ignorant. See how his delicate fingers run over the raised types of his Bible; and he reads aloud, and blesses God in his heart for the precious news, and for those who gave him this remarkable avenue to his heart. 'Jesus Christ will be the first person I shall see,' he says; 'for my eyes will be opened in heaven.' Down in that dark room again, below the printing press of the American mission (for he needs no sunlight in his work), you will find him actually printing the Bible in raised type, letter by letter, for his sightless brethren. This is one of the most important wonders I have ever looked at." At the annual examination of this school, one of the scholars said: "I am a little blind boy. I once could see; but then I fell asleep—a long, long sleep—I thought I should never awake. And I slept till a kind gentleman, called Mr. Mott, came, and opened my eyes—not these eyes," pointing to his sightless eyeballs; "but these," lifting up his tiny fingers—"these eyes; and oh! they see such sweet words of Jesus, and how he loved the blind."

6856. BLIND, Teaching the. The Rev. T. Collins tells of a poor blind man he taught to read. While doing so one day, as sentence after sentence of sweet promise revealed itself to the scholar's touch, the man suddenly exclaimed, "O this Bible is a treasure. Thank you, sir; thank you much, and thank God more; for I can now, for myself, in these holy words, feel the way to heaven with my finger tips!"

6857. BLINDNESS Cured. The legend of St. Frodobert of the seventh century, is that he was inspired with love of God from his earliest childhood. His mother was blind. He loved her greatly, and pitied her on account of her affliction. In an outburst of affection he kissed her darkened eyes, and they were miraculously opened. Love opens the eyes of the blind.

6858. BLINDNESS, Discovery of. I was in the Eye Infirmary the other day, when a woman came in with a beautiful babe. The woman said to the doctor; "Doctor, my child has not had its eyes open for a few days, and I have come to see if there can be something done for him. I did not like to open them, for it seemed to hurt him." The doctor, thereupon, pulled down the eyelids of the child, and the child gave a loud scream of pain. But he went on and made an examination, and then, turning to the poor woman, said: "Your child is blind of that eye." He then opened the other and said, "Yes, and this one too; your child will never see again." And it seemed to burst upon the woman so suddenly and so unexpectedly, that she screamed out at the top of her voice: "Oh, will my darling child never see me again? Oh, my darling child! oh, my darling child!" She pressed the child to her bosom, and I had to weep, too. Don't you sympathize with that poor mother? Don't you suppose I sympathize with her? Yes; but if I know my heart, I would rather lose my sight—have my eyes dug out as Samson's were—than to lose my soul. What is sight to the soul? Yes, I would a thousand times rather lose my sight on earth and see God in heaven than have my light here and darkness beyond the grave. Moody.

6859. BLINDNESS, Double. Mr. Nathaniel Partridge, one of the ejected ministers, having once preached at St. Alban's, upon the words, Rev. 3: 18, "Anoint thine eyes with eye-salve that thou mayest see," a poor man who was as blind in mind as he was in body went afterward to his house, and asked him very gravely, "Where he might get that ointment to cure his blindness?"

6860. BLINDNESS, Gratitude for Deliverance from. A poor laborer in France, blind from his birth, was a very skillful groom. A team was driven up to the hostelry which he attended, and directions given that especial care should be taken of the horses. Late in the evening their owner went to the stables and found the faithful groom still at work upon this favorite team. He was pleased with the service, and pitied his blindness, and resolved to give him a franc on leaving. During the night he thought whether he could not do something better for the blind man. In the morning he said to him, "Step out into the sunshine. You are forty. Earlier, I could have relieved you. I can perform an operation, and the chances are even that you can see or die under my hand. Come to Paris. I will pay your expenses, and the experiment shall cost you nothing." The poor man was glad to try a possibility that he might look upon the faces of his wife and children, which he had never seen. The experiment was made with entire success. He looked upon his wife, and called his children by name. Then he turned from them to the surgeon, saying, "Let me look on my friend, the surgeon, who has opened all this beautiful world to me. He is better than wife, or children, or anything else." For his vision he owed all to him, and was grateful. How much greater debt does the sinner owe to Christ!

6861. BLINDNESS, Removal of. Not long since an oculist called in a friend to witness the removing of the bandages from the eyes of a boy upon whom he had been operating, and to whom he had restored sight. The child had been blind from infancy, and this was the first moment that he was to be allowed to use his eyes and really to see. When the bandage was taken off, and the boy saw the pictures and faces of friends, he stood in silent wonder until he heard the familiar voice of his mother calling him, "Willie, can you see?" As he rushed into her arms he said, "O, mamma, is this heaven?" Such is the joy of the soul that passes from darkness to God's marvelous light.

A. D. Vail.

6862. BLINDNESS, Selfish. The poets feign concerning Lamia, that upon her going to bed she lays aside her eyes among the attirements of her dressing-box, and is at home for the most part blind and drowsy too, and puts on her eyes only when she goes abroad a-gadding; so it is with most men, who, through a kind of affected ignorance and artificial blindness, commonly blunder and stumble at their own threshold, are the greatest strangers to their own personal defects, and of all others least familiarly acquainted with their own domestic ills and follies. Plutarch.

6863. BLOOD, Accusing. Abel's blood, and so Christ's, cry unto God, as the hire of the laborers unjustly detained, James 5: 4; or as the whole creation, which is in bondage through our sins, is said to cry and groan in the ears of the Lord, Rom. 8: 22, not vocally but efficaciously. How sad is the case of those that have no interest in Christ's blood; but instead of pleading for them, it cries to God against them, as its despisers and abusers! Every unbeliever despises it; the apostate treads it under foot. To be guilty of a man's blood is sad; but to have the blood of Jesus accusing and crying to God against a soul, is unspeakably terrible. John Flavel.

6864. BLOOD, Cleansing. A poor tempted Scotchman in great distress of mind proceeded to put himself in order for church, and while washing his hands, no one by, he heard a voice say, "Cannot I in my blood as easily wash your soul as that water does your hands?" "Now, Minister," he said, in telling me this, "I do not say there was a real voice, yet I heard it distinctly, word for word, as you now hear me. I felt a load taken off my mind, and went to the table and sat under Christ's shadow with great delight." Dr. Guthrie.

6865. BLOOD, Purification by. A custom of purifying by blood, practiced in ancient Phrygia, is thus explained: "When a person desired to be purified, he was placed by the priests in a pit prepared for the purpose, which was covered by a platform. This platform was perforated with many small holes; then a beast for sacrifice was brought and slain on this platform, so that its blood might flow through these perforations upon the person beneath. As the blood came down upon the head, the hands, the feet, the limbs, and the whole person, he was considered purified."

6866. BLOOD, Unity of. From Peter the Hermit's time to Bonaparte's, and from his to the earliest despot after, the human race, in concert with every fiendish spirit that hated God and man, have waged a perpetual crusade against that great truth which Paul uttered on Mars hill. But did they succeed? Did the dark passions of their alienated hearts, or all their crimson issues, put out that light? Nations fell in the struggle; crowns fell like stars in the Apocalypse; but did the angel flying through the midst of heaven, with the everlasting gospel, did he suspend his flight and rest upon his folded wings? No! had we but ears to hear anything but the din of this noisy world, we might even now catch the sound of his trumpet, proclaiming as he flies—"God hath made of one blood all nations of men!"

Burritt.

6867. BLOOD OF CHRIST, Comfort from the. The commentator Bengel, during an illness, sent for a theological student and requested him to give him a word of consolation. The youth replied, "Sir, I am but a pupil, a mere learner; I don't know what to say to a teacher like you." "What!" said Bengel, "a divinity student, and not able to communicate a word of scriptural comfort!" The student, abashed, contrived to utter the text, "The blood of Jesus Christ, the Son of God, cleanseth us from all sin." "That is the very word I want," said Bengel, "it is quite enough," and taking him affectionately by the hand, dismissed him.

6868. BLOOD OF CHRIST, Experience of the. During the war a New York minister went among the soldiers in the hospital, and preached to them the way to Christ. He found one man whose eyes were closed and who was muttering something about "blood, blood," and the old doctor thought he was thinking of the carnage of the battle-field and the blood he had seen there, and going to him, he tried to divert his mind; but the young man looked up and said, "Oh, Doctor, it was not that that I was thinking of; I was thinking how precious the blood of Christ is to me now that I am dying. It covers all my sins."

6869. BLOOD OF CHRIST, Equality of the. Just before the war came on, during the days of slavery, I was in Boston. They were very exciting times there then, and Dr. Kirk was preaching on the subject of the cross. It was during the great strife, when there was a great deal of hatred and suspicion against foreigners then in our country. It was in the time of the Know-Nothing party, and there was a great deal of feeling against the blacks, and a great deal of feeling against the Irish. Dr. Kirk said when he came up to the cross to get salvation, he found a poor black man on the right and an Irishman on the left, and the blood came trickling down from the wounded side of the Son of God and made them all brothers, and all alike, and equal. That is what the blood does. It makes us all one kindred, and brings us all into the family of God. Moody.

6870. BLOOD OF CHRIST, Hope in the. Rev. J. Brown, of Haddington, on his death-bed said: "The Gospel is the only source of my comfort, and every sinner is as welcome as I. How pleasant that neither great sins nor great troubles can alter these consolations. Ever since God dealt savingly with my heart I have never had any comfort in the thought that my sins were small, but in the belief that the blood of Christ cleanseth from all sin."

6871. BLOOD OF CHRIST, Legend of the. The Israelites were delivered from a cruel bondage of two centuries in a single night. On the evening before their deliverance every house-keeper was commanded to kill a kid and sprinkle the door-posts with the blood. This was to be a sign to the destroying angel to pass by. There is a legend that on that night of the Exodus a young Jewish maiden—the first-born of the family—was so troubled on her sick-bed that she could not sleep. "Father," she anxiously inquired, "are you sure that the blood is there?" He replied that he had ordered it to be sprinkled on the lintel. The restless girl would not be satisfied until her father had taken her up and carried her to the door, to see for herself; and lo! the blood was not there! The order had been neglected, and before midnight the father made haste to put on his door the sacred token of protection. The legend may be false; but it teaches a very weighty and solemn admonition to the sinful soul who may be near eternity and is not sheltered under the atonement of Christ. Christ our passover has been sacrificed for us; and just as death came to every home in Egypt on that terrible night, so death is upon every soul not sprinkled with the blood of Christ.

6872. BLOOD OF CHRIST, Meditating upon the. Five persons were studying what were the best means to mortify sin. One said, to meditate on death; the second, to meditate on judgment; the third, to meditate on the joys of heaven; the fourth, to meditate on the torment of hell; the fifth, to meditate on the blood and sufferings of Jesus Christ; and certainly the last is the choicest and strongest motive of all. If ever we would cast off our despairing thoughts, we must dwell and muse much upon, and apply this precious blood to our own souls; so shall sorrow and mourning flee away.

Brooks. 6873. BLOOD OF CHRIST, Relying on the. An old herdsman of Dartmoor, Eng., was taken to a London hospital to die. There his grandchild used to visit and read to him. One day, she was reading to him the first chapter of the first epistle of John, when she reached the seventh verse, "And the blood of Jesus Christ, his Son, cleanseth us from all sin," the old man raised himself and stopped the little girl, saying with great earnestness: "Is that there, my dear?" "Yes, grandpa." "Then read it to me again; I never heard the like before." The little girl read again: "And the blood of Jesus Christ, his Son, cleanseth us from all sin." "You are quite sure that is there?" "Yes, quite sure." "Then take my hand and lay my finger on the passage, for I should like to feel it." So she took the old blind man's hand and placed his bony finger on the verse, when he said, "Now read it to me again." The little girl read, with her soft, sweet voice: "And the blood of Jesus Christ, his Son, cleanseth us from all sin." "You are quite sure that is there?" "Yes, quite sure." "Then if any one should ask how I died, tell them I died in the faith of these words: 'And the blood of Jesus Christ, his Son, cleanseth us from all sin.'" And with that, the old man withdrew his hand, his head fell softly back on the pillow, and he silently passed into the presence of him whose "blood cleanseth us from all sin."

6874. BOASTING, Fable of. A rushlight that had grown fat and saucy with too much grease, boasted one evening before a large company, that it shone brighter than the sun, the moon, and all the stars. At that moment, a puff of wind came and blew it out. One who lighted it again said, "Shine on, friend Rushlight, and hold your tongue; the lights of heaven are never blown out."

Æsop. 6875. BOASTING, Folly of. Now go and brag of thy present happiness, whosoever thou art; brag of thy temperature, of thy good parts; insult, triumph and boast; thou seest in what a brittle state thou art, how soon thou mayest be dejected, how many several ways, by bad diet, bad air, a small loss, a little sorrow or discontent, an ague, &c., how many sudden accidents may procure thy ruin, what a small tenure of happiness thou hast in this life, how weak and silly a creature thou art. Humble thyself, therefore, under the mighty hand of God, know thyself, acknowledge thy present misery, and make right use of it. "Let him that standeth take heed lest he fall." Thou dost now flourish, and hast goods of body, mind, and fortune; but thou knowest not what storms and tempests the evening may bring with it. Be not secure, then; be sober and watch, if fortunate and rich; if sick and poor, moderate thyself. Burton.

6876. BOASTING Fulfilled. There was continual dissension between Nicias and Cleon, in the joint administration of the Commonwealth of Athens. Nicias was considered the most experienced and successful. The Lacedemonians were defeated by the Athenians, and four hundred Spartans fled to the island of Stagyra. The Athenians besieged them for a long time without success. Cleon declared that if he had the management of the business he would have them in his hands dead or alive within twenty days; and that if the supreme command in that expedition should be given to him alone, he would give a good account of it. He made good his boast, within the time specified; the place was seized, many of the Lacedemonians were slain, and those remaining were brought prisoners to Athens.

6877. BOASTING, Groundless. When Mendoza was ambassador in France, he often declared, "God's power is in heaven and king Philip's on earth; he can command both sea and land, with all the elements to serve him," yet that invincible monarch was overcome at last by insignificant vermin and died like Herod, eaten of worms.

6878. BOASTING, Unsafe. "Nothing," says Bishop Horne, "can be got, but much may be lost, by triumphing before a battle. When Charles V. invaded France, he lost his generals and a great part of his army by famine and disease; and returned baffled and thoroughly mortified from an enterprise which he began with such confidence of its happy issue, that he desired Paul Jovius, the historian, to make a large provision of paper sufficient to record the victories which he was going to acquire."

6879. BOASTING, Vain. Sigismund, king of Hungary, looking at his own vast army as he went out to meet Bajazet and his Turks, said proudly, "What need we fear the Turks, who need not fear the falling of the heavens, which if they should fall we are able to hold up with the points of our spears and halberets." This boaster was driven like another Xerxes to fly for his life at the battle of Nicopolis.

6880. BODY, Biblical. Man's body is compared to—A house of clay, "whose foundation is in the dust," Job 4: 19;—mean and mouldering. See also 13: 12. A curiously embroidered garment, Ps. 139: 13-16. "Curiously wrought," like tapestry interwoven with many colored threads. "Wrought as with a needle" (Lowth); "fashioned" in the secret place, into the most beautiful fabric; every member carefully noted in God's book. A temple, designed to be the shrine and abode of Deity, 1 Cor. 6: 15, 19. A tent or tabernacle,—frail and easily overturned, in contrast to a fixed and strong house, 2 Cor. 5: 1. A frail vessel, 1 Thess. 4: 4. St. Peter's words—"the weaker vessel," 1 Pet. 3: 7, imply that both are weak. Grass—the flower of the field; the flower perhaps more delicate and beautiful than the grass, but both alike when beneath the mower's scythe. Both, left to themselves, are born to wither and pass away, Isa. 40: 6-8; 1 Pet. 1: 24. The sheath of the spirit, Dan. 7: 15 (marg.), the scabbard concealing the bright sword within. Bowes.

6881. BODY, Constituents of the. Of the sixty-two primary elements known in nature, only eighteen are found in the human body, and of these seven are metallic. Iron is found in the blood, phosphorus in the brain, limestone in the bile, lime in the bones, and dust and ashes in all. Not only these eighteen human elements, but the whole sixty-two, of which the universe is made, have their essential basis in the four substances—oxygen, hydrogen, nitrogen, carbon—representing the more familiar names of fire, water, saltpetre, and charcoal. And such is man, the lord of the earth—a spark of fire, a drop of water, a grain of gunpowder, an atom of charcoal. Phren. Jour.

6882. BODY, Corruptibility of the. We cannot keep our bodies long here: they are corruptible bodies, and will tumble into dust; we must part with them for awhile; and if ever we expect and desire a happy meeting again, we must use them with modesty and reverence now. Sherlock.

6883. BODY, Death of the. We all know that every night is the day's funeral; and what is the morning but the day's resurrection again? or like the setting of the sun at evening, which the next morning shall rise again? And we all know, that when we set or put a root into the ground, that it must lie all the winter, and appear as dead; but, in the spring-time, we hope to see it revive, and show itself by virtue of the sun. Just so will it be with us at the day of our resurrection; for it is a most certain argument, that he who can do the greater work can also do the lesser; for God, who did make the world and also man at first of nothing, can, at the day of our resurrection, make us perfect bodies again of something. S. Smith.

6884. BODY, Exposure of the. Our bodies only lie exposed to the necessities of the common lot of nature, which we offer as a handle to fortune; but the fort-royal is still secure, where our strength lies and our most precious things are treasured up. Plutarch.

6885. BODY, Mechanical Perfection of the. The human body, considered simply as an engine to be worked by a superior agent—as a system of combined and organized matter, to be actuated and controlled by a living spirit—is a most wonderful instance of creative power and plastic skill. It may be considered as a world in miniature, as an epitome of all the sciences, as an abridgment of the great book of nature. To whatever part of it we direct our attention, we discover a most remarkable exemplification of the general laws of physics. In its optics, as expressive of the functions of the eye, we have mathematics of the highest order. In the formation of the bones, and in the arrangement of its various joints and ligaments, we have the principles of mechanics most strikingly exhibited to our view. In the circulation of its fluids, the heart, the arteries, and the veins, may be regarded as an hydraulic apparatus. The process of respiration is an example of pneumatic action. In the gradual formation of its general substance—in the precipitation of the various elements which constitute its specific parts—we have chemistry in some of its finest and most beautiful combinations. Over and above all these subordinate agencies, however, there is a master principle—there is life, the grand chemist, the mighty engineer, who superintends and regulates the whole. And although he is invisible to the keenest eye, and baffles the strongest microscope, the effects which he works are too palpable to admit a rational doubt of his separate and distinct existence, and the very obscurity of his retreat tends only to raise our admiration of the power and wisdom of that Being by whom he was originally created, and by whose will he has been attached to our frame. Truly then may we say, in the view of this mysterious union of body and soul—of matter and spirit—in the present condition of our nature, that we are “fearfully and wonderfully made.” This is, therefore, doubtless the just and legitimate method of studying the science of physiology—to regard it as exhibiting throughout a most remarkable illustration of the “manifold wisdom of God.” So forcibly was the celebrated heathen philosopher and physician, Galen, struck with this fact, that he remarked, that if there was no other proof of it, the examination of the human eye alone would be sufficient to demonstrate the existence of a Supreme Being.

6886. BODY, Mind and. Body and mind must be exercised, not one, but both, and that in a mediocrity; otherwise it will cause a great inconvenience. If the body be overtaxed, it tires the mind. The mind oppresseth the body, as with students it oftentimes falls out, who, as Plutarch observes, have no care of the body, but compel that which is mortal to do as much as that which is immortal; that which is earthly as that which is ethereal. But as the ox, tired, told the camel, both serving one master, that refused to carry some part of his burden, before it were long he should be compelled to carry all his pack, and his skin to boot, which by and by, the ox being dead, fell out; so the body may say to the soul that will give it no respite or remission. A little after, an ague, vertigo, or consumption seizeth on them both; all his study is omitted, and they must be compelled to be sick together. He that tenders his own good estate and health, must let them draw equal yoke both alike, that so they may happily enjoy their wished health.

Burton.

6887. BODY, Mutiny in the. In former days, when all a man's limbs did not work together as amicably as they do now, but each had a will and way of its own, the members generally began to find fault with the belly for spending an idle luxurious life, while they were wholly occupied in laboring for its support, and ministering to its wants and pleasures; so they entered into a conspiracy to cut off its supplies for the future. The hands were no longer to carry food to the mouth, nor the mouth to receive the food, nor the teeth to chew it. They had not long persisted in this course of starving the belly into subjection, ere they all began, one by one, to fail and flag, and the whole body to pine away. Then the members were convinced that the belly also, cumbersome and useless as it seemed, had an important function of its own; that they could no more do without it than it could do without them; and that if they would have the constitution of the body in a healthy state, they must work together, each in his proper sphere, for the common good of all.

Æsop.

6888. BODY, Misuse of the. St. Francis, of Assisi, who lived early in the thirteenth century, practiced many of the austerities common to the ascetics. He called his body “Brother Ass,” as he conceived it only fit to carry burdens, be beaten, and fare poorly. Later in life his ideas became modified, and before he died he asked pardon of his own body for having treated it with too great rigor. His excuse was that he meant thereby to secure the purity of his soul. He counseled moderation, but not the luxurious indulgence of these times.

6889. BODY, Resurrection. Phil. 3: 20, 21. “The body is here called vile, or the body of our vileness.” Not as God made it, but as sin hath marred it. Not absolutely, and in itself, but relatively, and in comparison with what it will be at the resurrection. Then those scattered bones and dispersed dust, like pieces of old broken, battered silver, will be new-cast, and wrought in the best and newest fashion, even like to Christ's glorious body.

John Flavel.

6890. BODY, Resurrection of the. I have stood in a smith's forge and seen him put a rusty, cold, dull piece of iron into the fire, and, after a while, he hath taken the very same numerical individual piece of iron out of the fire, but bright, sparkling. And thus it is with our bodies: they are laid down in the grave, dead, heavy, earthly; but, at that general conflagration, this dead, heavy, earthly body shall arise living, lightsome, glorious.

Dr. Fuller.

6891. BODY, Unity of the Organs of the. Every organ of the body is in league with every other organ. Every one of them has its own pecu liar province and vocation, but is in treaty at the same moment, offensive and defensive, with every other. Nothing is proper to any member in this unique and truly royal society that does not go forth in turn for the interest and advantage of that society. Local benefits immediately become public ones; what injures in one part is as a calamity to the whole.

Grindon.

6892. BODY, Veneration for the. What an incentive to holiness, to purity of life and conduct, lies in the fact that the body of a saint is the temple of God—a truer, nobler temple than that which Solomon dedicated by his prayer, Jesus consecrated by his presence? In popish cathedral, where the light streamed through painted windows, and the organ pealed along lofty aisles, and candles gleamed on golden cups and silver crosses, and incense floated in fragrant clouds, we have seen the blinded worshiper uncover his head, drop reverently on his knees, and raise his awe-struck eye on the imposing spectacle; we have seen him kiss the marble floor, and knew that he would sooner be smitten dead upon the floor than be guilty of defiling it. How does this devotee rebuke us! We wonder at this superstition; how may he wonder at our profanity! Can we look on the lowly veneration he expresses for an edifice which has been erected by some dead man's genius, which holds but some image of a deified virgin, or bones of a canonized saint, and which time shall one day cast to the ground and bury in the dust—can we, I say, look on that, and if sensible to rebuke, not feel reproved by the spectacle? In how much more respect, in how much holier veneration should we hold this body! The shrine of immortality, and a temple dedicated to the Son of God, it is consecrated by the presence of the Spirit—a living temple, over whose porch the eye of piety reads what the finger of inspiration has written: "If any defile the temple of God, him shall God destroy; for the temple of God is holy, which temple ye are."

Dr. Guthrie.

6893. BODY AND SOUL, Judgment of the. A dispute will arise between the soul and the body, to which of them their guilt ought to be imputed; the soul saying, "O Lord, my body I received from thee; for thou createdst me without a hand to lay hold with, a foot to walk with, an eye to see with, or an understanding to apprehend with, till I came and entered into this body; therefore punish it eternally, but deliver me." The body on the other hand will make this apology: "O Lord, thou createdst me like a stock of wood, having neither hand that I could lay hold with, nor foot that I could walk with, till this soul, like a ray of light, entered into me, and my tongue began to speak, my eye to see, and my foot to walk; therefore punish it eternally, but deliver me." But God will propound to them the following parable of the blind man and the lame man, which, as well as the preceding dispute, was borrowed by the Mohammedans from the Jews. A certain king, having a pleasant garden, in which were ripe fruits, set two persons to keep it, one of whom was blind and the other lame; the former not being able to see the fruit, nor the latter to gather it; the lame man, however seeing the fruit, persuaded the blind man to take him upon his shoulder and by that means he easily gathered the fruit, which they divided between them. The lord of the garden coming some time after and inquiring after his fruit, each began to excuse himself. The blind man said he had no eyes to see with; and the lame man, no feet to approach the tree. But the king ordering the lame man to be set on the blind man, passed sentence on and punished them both. And in the same manner will God deal with the body and soul.

George Sale.

6894. BOLDNESS, Christian. The Emperor Otho III., visiting Rome, went also to Mt. Gargano, to see St. Nilus. He was much pleased, and exclaimed, as he saw the huts of the monks, "These men are true citizens of heaven, who live in tents as strangers on the earth." The Emperor desired Nilus to accept a present of land for his monastery, but he refused. Taking his leave, the Emperor said, "Ask what you please, as if you were my son; I will give it you with joy and pleasure." St. Nilus answered, "The only favor I ask of you is that you will save your own soul. Though an Emperor, you must die and give an account to God like other men."

6895. BOLDNESS, Clerical. Rev. Samuel Wesley, the father of John Wesley, being strongly importuned by the friends of James the Second to support the measures of the court in favor of popery, with promises of preferment, absolutely refused even to read the king's declaration; and though surrounded with courtiers, soldiers and informers, he preached a bold and pointed discourse against it from these words: "If it be so, our God whom we serve, is able to deliver us out of thy hand, O king. But if not, be it known unto thee, O king, that we will not serve thy gods, nor worship the golden image which thou hast set up."

Whitecross.

6896. BOLDNESS, A Martyr's. St. Basil suffered martyrdom in the persecution of Julian, known as the apostate, A. D. 363. Julian had given orders for the restoration of the heathen worship. Basil was very bold in denouncing the effort, and was soon charged with stirring up the people against the established religion. Macarius, a heathen priest, drew him before the magistrate, Saturninus. Macarius said, "What meanest thou, going to and fro in the city, agitating the people against the religion established by the Emperor?" Basil answered, defiantly, "God break thy jaws, thou bond-slave of Satan! It is not I who ruin thy religion, but he who is in heaven confounds thy counsels and dissipates thy lies!" Macarius then made the charge of sedition in defiance of the Emperor. The judge asked, "Who art thou, so audacious as to do these things?" Basil replied, "The best of everything—a Christian." "Then why, if thou art a Christian, dost thou not behave as a Christian?" said the judge. Basil responded, "I do; it becomes every Christian to make bare all acts." "Why dost thou make revolt, transgress good laws, and blaspheme the Emperor?" "God is my emperor, and he will bring your established religion to naught in no time." "So the religion of the Emperor is not true?" "How can I regard that religion as true whose worship consists in men running and howling about the streets like rabid dogs with raw flesh in their mouths?" "Hang him up, and scrape him!" ordered the judge. He was suspended by his wrists and ankles, and his flesh gashed with iron rakes, he in the meantime thanking God that he was counted worthy to receive these torments. Afterwards he was cast into prison, and word of his arrest was sent to the Emperor. Every effort was made to induce him to apostatize, but he was immovable. Julian himself came to Ancyra on his way to Persia, and Basil was summoned before him. There his zeal blazed forth in indignation against the apostate. He cried, "Thou, renegade, hast abdicated the throne prepared for thee in heaven. Verily, I believe that Christ, whom thou hast adjured, will take thee and pluck thee out of thy dwelling, that thou mayest know how great is that God whom thou hast offended. Thou hast not thought of his judgments, nor venerated his altars; thou hast not kept his laws, which thou didst declare often with thy lips; wherefore, great Emperor, Christ will not remember thee, but will take from thee speedily thy earthly empire, and thy body shall be deprived of a sepulchre, and thou shalt breathe forth thy soul in greatest anguish!" At this, Julian ordered him away, and that seven things should be cut daily from his skin. After this had been done once, he picked up one of the strips and asked to be taken before the Emperor. This was granted, as it was thought he was ready to apostatize. When he stood before Julian, he cried, "Dumb, and deaf, and blind are thy idols, Apostate! To me to live is Christ, and to die is gain. He is my helper, in whom I trust, and for whom I suffer." He threw the strip of skin before the Emperor, exclaiming, "Here is meat for thee, Julian!" He had no words of submission, and was quickly removed. On the morrow he was cast upon a bed of red-hot iron spikes, and there prayed, saying, "Receive my spirit. Amen!" and conquered. Julian died soon after, exclaiming, "Thou hast conquered, O Galilean!"

6897. BOLDNESS, Ministerial. Oliver Millard, a popular preacher of the reign of Louis XI., attacked the vices of the court in his sermons, and did not spare even the king himself, who, taking offence at it, sent the priest word that if he did not change his tone, he would have him thrown into the Seine. "The King," replied Oliver, "is the master, to do what he pleases; but tell him that I shall reach Paradise by water sooner than he will with his post-horses." The establishment of traveling post was instituted by Louis XI. This bold answer at once amused and intimidated the king, for he let the priest continue to preach as he pleased, and what he pleased.

Cyclo. of Anecdote.

6898. BOLDNESS, Required. A boy playing in the fields got stung by a nettle. He ran home to his mother, telling her that he had but touched that nasty weed, and it had stung him. "It was your just touching it, my boy," said the mother, "that caused it to sting you; the next time you meddle with a nettle, grasp it tightly, and it will do you no hurt." Anon.

6899. BONDAGE, Biblical. Slavery, Exod. 1: 13, in Egypt, "the house of bondage," and in the iron furnace, Deut. 4: 20. In later times, like the slavery of Greece and Rome, no less severe; when the slave (often a captive taken in war) was regarded as wholly the property of his master, liable to be beaten, chained, or even killed at the master's will and pleasure. The figure is aptly applied to the cruel and relentless slavery of sin; and the word "servant" would be more forcibly translated slave; so cf. John 8: 34; Rom. 6: 16; Titus 3: 3, "serving divers lusts and pleasures" (the slave and drudge of many masters); 2 Pet. 2: 19, "the servants of corruption." Still worse is the case, when the sinner sells himself into slavery like Ahab, 1 Kings 21: 20; and Israel 2 Kings 17: 17; Isa. 50: 1. See also St. Paul's expression, Rom. 7: 14, "sold under sin." Captivity, Rom. 7: 23; Isa. 61: 1; Luke 4: 18.—Probably alluding to the ancient custom of putting out the eyes of captives, and then keeping them bound in chains with cruel rigor.—See 2 Tim. 2: 26. Foke, Isa. 9: 14; Lam. 1: 14; 2 Cor. 6: 14.—Like the yoke of Israel's bondage in Egypt, under which the people were bowed and bent down, and unable to "go upright," Lev. 26: 13. THAT POOR WOMAN, bound by Satan for eighteen years, Luke 13: 11-16. THE WEARINESS AND TOIL OF SIN.—How hard blind sinners toil for their destruction, Isa. 67: 10; Jer. 9: 5; Hab. 2: 13. "AGAIN ENTANGLED therein and overcome," 2 Pet. 2: 20; like silly sheep, no sooner freed from the thorns and briars, than ready to wander and be caught and torn again. "TIED AND BOUND with the chain of sin," Prov. 5: 22; Rom. 7: 24 (like a living man condemned to be tied to a loathsome corpse). Sin comes easily, but binds strongly. "The bond of iniquity," Acts 8: 23. THE JEWS boasted of their national liberty, as they once said to Christ, "We were never in bondage to any man," John 8: 34. It was a saying manifestly untrue: but Christ's answer is very striking—"Whoever committeth sin is the servant (slave) of sin," verse 35. Bowes.

6900. BOOK, A Powerful. According to a story in Sanscrit, the poet Gunadhya wrote with his own blood a massive book containing seven hundred thousand slokas. He sent the book by two pupils to the king Satavahana, who rejected it because it was written in the Pisacha dialect. The poet then ascended a mountain, lighted a great fire, read aloud his stories, and as he finished a page he cast it into the flames. As he read all the beasts of the forests gathered about him, and wept tears of delight over the tales. At that time the king fell ill, and his doctors ordered a supply of game for him, but it could not be obtained, for every creature of the forest was listening to Gunadhya. This fact was reported to the king, and he hastened to the scene and desired to buy the wonderful book. Alas! on his arrival only one of the seven hundred thousand slokas remained. This opens up a new field for disappointed authors. Let them try the effect of their productions on the beasts of the forest.

6901. BOOK OF LIFE, Enrolled in the. Some people say they can't tell down here, but must wait till they get to heaven to know whether their names are written in the Book of Life. I believe it is the privilege of every Christian to know it here. Men in China tell me that the greatest honor that can be paid them there is to write their name in one of their joss houses, in the house of Confucius. Christ says, "Rejoice that your names are written in heaven." I was coming into Liverpool one night with a party of friends, and we found the Northwestern Hotel full, and they told me it had been full for days. I said to my friends, "Let us go over to the Adelphi." "No," they said, "we have a room engaged." "Why," I said, "they told me the house had been full for days, and now you say you have got a room." They said, "We sent our names on ahead and secured a room." "How wise," thought I. Many of you are laying in wood for the bleak winter, and food and clothing. Oh, prepare for the long, bleak night that is coming! See that your names are written in heaven; send your names on ahead and secure a room. And when sure that our names are written there we should see that those of our children are. A friend said to me, "Why talk of books being kept in heaven." I said, "The Bible has a good deal to say about it." In Daniel, 12: 1, "every one was saved whose name was found written in the book." In Philippians, 4: 3, Paul speaks of those whose names were written in the book. We ought to live so that not only we but others would know our names are on the record.

Moody.

6902. BOOK OF LIFE, Example of the. In the public registers all that were born of a particular tribe were entered in the list of their respective families under that tribe. This was the book of life; and when any of these died, his name might be considered as blotted out of the list. "In China, the names of the persons who have been tried on criminal processes are written in two distinct books, which are called the book of life, and the book of death; those who have been acquitted, or who have not been capitally convicted, are written in the former; those who have been found guilty, in the latter. These two books are presented to the emperor by his ministers, who, as sovereign, has a right to erase any name from either: to place the living among the dead, that he may die: or the dead, that is, the person condemned to death, among the living, that he may be preserved. Thus he blots out of the book of life, or the book of death, according to his sovereign pleasure, on the representation of his ministers, or the intercession of friends."

6903. BOOK OF LIFE, Legend of the. St. Julian and his wife, Basilissa, resolved to live chaste lives, as if they had not been married. Their bridal chamber became illuminated, and Jesus, standing by them, said, "Thou hast conquered, O Julian!" Then two angels, clothed in white robes, girded with golden zones, having crowns, stood beside their couch. Thereon lay a book seven times brighter than silver, wherein were various names in letters of gold. Julian read there his name and that of his wife, Basilissa. And one of four witnessing elders, who were also there, said, "In that book are written the chaste and the sober, the truthful and the merciful, the humble and the gentle, those whose love is unfeigned, bearing adversities, patient in tribulation, and those who, for the love of Jesus Christ, have given up father, and mother, and wife, and children, and lands for his sake, lest they should impede the progress of their souls to perfection, and they who have not hesitated to shed their blood for his name, in the number of whom you also have merited to be written."

6904. BOOKS, Advantages of. The writers who despise books may be original perhaps, but they may pass their lives without being original to any purpose of interest or utility. Whereas, true talent will become original in the very act of engaging itself with the ideas of others; nay, will often convert the dross of previous authors into the golden ore that shines forth to the world as its own peculiar creation. From a series of extravagant and weak Italian romances, Shakspeare took the plots, the characters, and the major part of the incidents of those dramatic works which have exalted his name, as an original writer, above that of every other in the annals of literature.

Dr. Cromwell.

6905. BOOKS, Communion of. It is chiefly through books that we enjoy intercourse with superior minds; and these invaluable means of communication are in the reach of all. In the best books great men talk to us, give us their most precious thoughts, and pour their souls into ours. God be thanked for books. They are the voices of the distant and the dead, and make us heirs of the spiritual life of past ages. Books are the true levelers. They give to all, who will faithfully use them, the society, the spiritual presence, of the best and greatest of our race. No matter how poor I am; no matter though the prosperous of my own time will not enter my obscure dwelling; if the sacred writers will enter and take up their abode under my roof; if Milton will cross my threshold to sing to me of Paradise, and Shakspeare to open to me the worlds of imagination and the workings of the human heart, and Franklin to enrich me with his practical wisdom, I shall not pine for want of intellectual companionship, and I may become a cultivated man though excluded from what is called the best society in the place where I live.

Channing.

6906. BOOKS, Destruction of Bad. A French lady who kept a book store in Paris heard Father Beauregard preach against the danger of immoral books, and was deeply convinced. She sent for the father to come and examine her stock. He rejected books to the value of 6,000 livres, and she burned them in his presence, glad to make the sacrifice.

6907. BOOKS, Devotee of. Magliabechi, the celebrated librarian of Florence, lived, ate, drank, and slept among his books; he lived in the most sequestered and philosophical manner, scarcely ever leaving the city. His house was but one continued pile of books; his lower rooms were crowded with them, not only along the wainscot, but in piles to a considerable height, and so spread on the floor that there was not the least place for sitting down, much less for walking, except a long narrow passage leading from one room to the other. The porch of his house was, in the same manner, everywhere stuffed with books, as far as the projecting awning would secure them from rain. The staircase was lined all the way up with this library furniture, as were all the upper rooms. Magliabechi generally shut himself up all the day, and opened his doors in the evening to the men of letters who came to converse with him. His attention was so absorbed with his studies that he often forgot the calls of nature. He was negligent in his person, and was usually dressed in black, with a waistcoat reaching to his knees. His cloak, which was also black, served him for a morning gown in the day and for bedclothes at night; it was generally much patched, in consequence of the holes he burnt in it. He wore a large hat and a Florentine band round his neck. On one arm he carried a pan, in which was a constant fire for warming his hands, and his clothes bore evidence of their being often too nearly connected with it. His linen he usually wore until it fell to pieces. He always slept on his books; bound volumes served him for a mattress, those in boards for a pillow, and he covered himself with such as were merely stitched, throwing his cloak over all. His sole diet was eggs, bread, and water.

Disraeli.

6908. BOOKS, Judging. Many readers judge of the power of a book by the shock it gives their feelings, as some savage tribes determine the power of their muskets by their recoil, that being considered best which fairly prostrates the purchaser.

Longfellow.

6909. BOOKS, Need of More. The apt reply of a distinguished scholar of our own country to a benefactor of the institution of learning with which he was connected, when an increase of the library was the subject of discussion, deserves perpetual remembrance: "We need more books," said the professor. "More books!" said the merchant; "why, have you read through all you have already?" "No, I never expect to read them all." "Why, then, do you want more?" "Pray, sir, did you ever read your dictionary through?" "Certainly not!" "Well, a library is my dictionary."

6910. BOOKS, Repositories. Books are faithful repositories, which may be awhile neglected or forgotten, but when they are opened again, will again impart their instruction. Memory once interrupted, is not to be recalled; written learning is a fixed luminary, which after the cloud that had hidden it has passed away, is again bright in its proper station. Tradition is but a meteor, which, if it once falls, cannot be rekindled.

Johnson.

6911. BOOKS, Society of. I no sooner come into the library but I bolt the door to me, excluding lust, ambition, avarice, and all such vices whose nurse is idleness, the mother of ignorance and melancholy. In the very lap of eternity, amongst so many divine souls, I take my seat with so lofty a spirit, and sweet content, that I pity all our great ones and rich men, that know not this happiness. Hensius.

6912. BOOKS, Value of. To tell a good book is not really perplexing, any more than to distinguish a wholesome food. A good book, like a great nature, opens out a fine foreground, wherever we may open it, and like the breath of a summer's morning, invites us onward. It may be known by the number of fragmentary aphoristic sayings which may be gleaned from it, full of grace and pleasing truth, as flowers on that summer morning's walk. Bacon and Shakspeare have multitudes of such sayings. The Bible has more than all other books together. Books that soon perish, die because void of them. They make the difference between books of ideas, and books of mere words. The value of a book consists not in what it will do for our amusement, but in what it will communicate. Whether dealing with fancy or with fact, all books in their kind are dictionaries, and those are the best which yield most material for reflection. It is not fine writing, as many suppose, that makes fine books. Books are fine only in so far as they flow from sound and abundant knowledge, a picturesque and unobtrusive presentation of which is their infallible characteristic.

Grindon.

6913. BORROWING, Conditions of. If thou hast of thine own, borrow not, since thou hast no need of it; and if thou hast nothing, borrow not, because thou wilt not have any means to pay.

Plutarch.

6914. BOTTLES, Oriental. In oriental countries skin bottles, made by extracting the flesh of an animal and leaving the skin whole, except where the head and legs were cut off, were sometimes used. To these Christ refers in speaking of new wine in old bottles (Luke 5: 37). These became worn and rotten with age, and would not stand the pressure of the fermentation of new wine. Christ taught the impracticability of mingling Christianity and Judaism by this expressive figure, also by that of mending an old garment with new cloth.

6915. BOUNTY, Divine. Perillus, a friend of Alexander, besought of him portions for his daughters. The conqueror immediately ordered fifty talents to be given him. Perillus said, "Ten talents are enough." Alexander replied, "Enough for you to receive, but not enough for me to give." God gives "exceeding abundantly above all that we can ask or think."

6916. BOUNTY, Rule for. He that spends to his proportion is as brave as a prince; and a prince exceeding that is a prodigal: there is no gallantry beyond what is fit and decent. A comely beauty is better than a painted one. Unseemly bounty is waste both of wealth and wit.

Feltham.

6917. BOY, A Converted. I knew a boy some years ago, whose father was a miserable drunken wretch and infidel, and he would not allow a praying man under his roof, for he said a man that prayed was nothing but a black-hearted hypocrite. Somebody got hold of his little boy and got him into the Sabbath-school, and he was converted. One day afterward the old man caught him praying, and he caught him by the collar and jerked him to his feet, commanding him with oaths never to be caught doing that again or he would have to leave home forever. Twice after that he caught him in the act of praying, and the last time told him to leave his house forever. The little fellow packed up his things in a handkerchief, went down into the kitchen where his mother was and bade her good-by, then went and bade his little brother and sisters good-by, and as he passed his father on his way to the door, he reached up his arms to put them around his father's neck, and said: "Good-by father. As long as I live I will pray for you," and he went down the street, but he had not gone a great while before his father came after him and said, "If that is Christianity, I want it." And the boy went back and prayed with his father and led him to Christ.

Moody.

6918. BOY, Heroic. A boy who had been trained by the missionaries in the Loyalty Islands, set sail in a fishing boat with three other persons. A little way out they were capsized, but clung to the keel for support. After being sixteen hours in the water they drifted ashore, upon Woody Island, where neither water nor provisions of any kind could be procured. Their long exposure and exhaustion made it necessary that something should be done at once. The boy called Billy proposed to swim to another island, three and a-half miles away. In his exhaustion it was a most hazardous enterprise. On starting he said: "Suppose me catch the land, me see you again; suppose me die, good by." He reached the island, obtained aid and rescued his companions. All were full of gratitude and praise for him. He said, "Don't think of me. Thank God; it is God who has done it."

6919. BOYS, Danger to. We once saw the sentence "Perishable, don't switch off," chalked on a car belonging to a freight train. Careless conductors sometimes leave freight cars on side tracks for a day. Here was one that could not be left even one day off the main track. It had fruit, or something else, on board, which must be gotten to market at once.

A day lost might bring the fruit in a day late. Those boys in your class are "perishable property." Don't lose your hold of them an hour. Don't "switch" them off the track by any carelessness or irregularity, or dullness or severity of yours. Hold them firmly and steadily.

J. H. Vincent.

6920. BOYS, Dull. Sir Isaac Newton was a great dunce in his early boyhood. One day the "bright boy" of the school gave him a kick in the stomach, which caused him severe pain. The insult stung him to the quick, and he resolved to make himself felt and respected by improved scholarship. He applied himself diligently to study, and, ere long, stood in his classes above the boy who had kicked him, and ultimately became the first scholar in the school. Oliver Goldsmith was a stupid child, and the teacher who taught him the alphabet was thought to have wrought a miracle. After he had written the "Traveler," people hardly believed him to be the author. Sir Walter Scott was known at the University of Edinburgh as "the great blockhead." His intense application and industry changed the title into that of "The Wizard of the North." His teacher once said to him, "Dunce you are and dunce you shall remain," but he nobly belied the prophecy.

6922. BRAVERY, Inconstant. Some are brave one day, and cowards another, as great captains have often told me, from their own experience and observation.

Temple.

6923. BRAVERY, Influence of. Antalcides said, "The youth are the walls of Sparta, and the points of their spears its bounds." To one inquiring why the Lacedæmonians fought with such short swords, he replied, "We come up close to our enemies."

6924. BRAVERY, Patriotic. During our late war, a Christian corporal seized the flag, several bearers of which had been already shot down, saying to a comrade as he bore it to immediate death, "If I fall, tell my dear wife that I die with a good hope in Christ, and that I am glad to give my life for my country." A lieutenant-colonel, who had been overwhelmed with fear amid the perils of battle, was deeply impressed at the act, and said, "I can never forget that, and I want to become a Christian, too, for I know there is a reality in religion."

6925. BRAVERY, True. True bravery is shown by performing without witnesses what one might be capable of doing before all the world.

La Rochefoucauld.

6926. BREAD, Cost of. Water, which is one of the great necessities of life, may in general be gratuitously procured; but it has been well observed, that if bread, the other great necessity of human life, could be procured on terms equally cheap and easy, there would be much more reason to fear that men would become brutes for the want of something to do, rather than philosophers from the possession of leisure.

Colton.

6927. BREAD, Fragments of. Arabs have a strong respect for wheat in any shape. If a morsel of bread falls to the ground, an Arab will gather it up with his right hand, kiss it, touch his forehead with it, and place it in a recess, or on a wall, where the fowls of the air might find it; for they say, "We must not tread under foot the gift of God." I have seen this reverence exhibited constantly by all classes of people, by masters, servants, and even by little children, Moslems, and Christians.

Domestic Life in Palestine.

6928. BREAD, Praying for and Seeking. A sick mother and her little girl were living in a very wretched attic. It was cold and dark one morning, when the hungry child awoke, and remembered that there was no bread for breakfast. Nettie's mother had often told her that the God who feeds tiny birds will not refuse bread to a little child who asks for it. The little girl slipped quietly out of bed, that she might not awake her mother, and kneeling down by the bedside, said slowly, "Give us this day our daily bread." The bare room seemed to mock the child's prayer; but she had no sooner asked God for the bread than she determined to seek it. Wrapping her shabby cloak about her, she went down the long staircase, and through the dark alley, into the busy street. No one noticed the hungry little girl, and she was beginning to wonder where God kept his bread, when a sudden turn of the street showed her a large and well-filled baker's shop. "This," thought she, "is the place." The baker looked kindly at the little eager face that entered his shop so confidently. "I've come for it," she said. "Come for what?" "My daily bread," she said, pointing to the loaves. "I'll take two, if you please; one for mother, and one for me." "All right," said the baker, putting them into a bag, and giving them to his little customer, who started at once into the street. "Stop, you little rogue!" he said, roughly; "where is your money?" "I haven't any," she said, simply. "Haven't any!" he repeated, angrily; "you little thief, what brought you here, then?" The words frightened the child, who, bursting into tears, said, "Mother is sick, and I am so hungry. In my prayers I said, 'Give us this day our daily bread,' and then I thought God meant me to fetch it; and so I came." The baker was softened by the child's simple tale, and he sent her back to her mother with a well-filled basket. As the poor sufferer received the unexpected supply, she softly said, "The God of the fatherless answers prayer. I ought to call you 'Faith!' my child."

6929. BREAD, The Worst. Upon the question, What is the worst bread which is eaten? one answered, in respect of the coarseness thereof, "Bread made of beans." Another said, "Bread made of acorns." But the third hit the truth, and said, "Bread taken out of other men's mouths, who are the true proprietors thereof."

Such bread may be sweet in the mouth to taste, but is not wholesome in the stomach to digest.

Thos. Fuller.

6930. BREAD OF LIFE, Hunger for the. The primitive Greeks fed only upon acorns, but afterward learned the art of wheat culture and bread making. They discarded their former food, and counted it only fit for swine. When a man has once tasted the bread of life he has no more desire for the "flesh-pots of Egypt," but cries, "Lord, ever, evermore give us of this bread." It is a strange and an unnatural thing for a Christian to turn again to the "beggarly elements," the husks and vanities of the world for satisfaction. Having eaten of the fruits and bread of the kingdom of grace, it is a sad day when the hunger for them is lost. It should increase till we feast with the Master in his heavenly kingdom.

6931. BREAD UPON THE WATERS, Import of. Rice is the food most used in Egypt. Every year, when the snow melts off the mountains, the river Nile rises and overflows its banks, and covers all the country round it with water. Rain is scarcely ever seen in Egypt, and it would be a desert but for the river that waters it. The people set down stakes, every man to mark out his own land, before the waters come. When the Nile has risen, and all the land is covered with water, they go out in little boats to sow their rice by casting it on the waters. The rice sinks in the mud below, and when these waters are gone they find that it has taken root and sprouted, and it grows up and gives them a harvest. This is "Casting their bread upon the waters, and finding it after many days."

Anon.

6932. BREVITY Advised. Talk to the point, and stop when you have reached it. The faculty some possess of making one idea cover a quire of paper, is not good for much. Be comprehensive in all you say or write. To fill a volume upon nothing is a credit to nobody; though Lord Chesterfield wrote a very clever poem upon nothing. There are men who get one idea into their heads, and but one, and they make the most of it. You can see it, and almost feel it, when in their presence. On all occasions it is produced, till it is worn as thin as charity. They remind one of a twenty-four pounder discharged at a humming bird. You hear a tremendous noise, see a volume of smoke, but you look in vain for the effects. The bird is scattered to atoms. Just so with the idea. It is enveloped in a cloud, and lost amid the rumblings of words and flourishes. Short letters, sermons, speeches, and paragraphs, are favorites with us. Commend us to the young man who wrote to his father: "Dear sir, I am going to be married;" and also to the old gentleman, who replied, "Dear son, go ahead." Such are the men for action. They do more than they say. The half is not told in their cases. They are worth their weight in gold for every purpose in life. Reader, be short; and we will be short with the advice.

John Neal.

6933. BREVITY, Example of. The Duke of

Wellington wrote to Dr. Hutton for information as the scientific acquirements of a young officer who had been under his instructions. The doctor thought he could not do less than answer the question verbally, and made an appointment accordingly. When Wellington saw him he said, "I am obliged to you, doctor, for the trouble you have taken. Is — fit for the post?" Clearing his throat, Dr. Hutton began, "No man more so; I can—" "That's quite sufficient," said Wellington; "I know how valuable your time is; mine, just now, is equally so. I will not detain you any longer. Good morning." Chambers' Journal.

6934. BREVITY, Motto of. That earnest minister, Dr. Cotton Mather, had inscribed in large letters over his study door the admonition "Be SHORT." It is appropriate to preachers, prayer-leaders, teachers and public speakers. The best efforts become tiresome if protracted.

6935. BRIBERY, Influence of. The Spartans were the only people that for a while seemed to disdain the love of money; but the contagion still spreading, even they at last yielded to its allurements, and every man sought private emoluments without attending to the good of his country. "That which has been is that which shall be!" Bp. Horne.

6936. BRIBERY, Knavery of. A thief coming to rob a house would have stopped the barking of a dog by throwing sops to him. "Away with you!" said the dog; "I had my suspicions of you before, but this excess of civility assures me that you are a rogue." Æsop.

6937. BRIBERY, Proof against. Great presents were sent to Epaminondas, the celebrated Theban general by the king of Persia, which he rejected. At the same time he had but one upper garment, and had to stay in-doors when it required washing or mending. He contemned riches, and when he died, nothing was found in his house but a small iron spit; nothing in which to bury his body, and his funeral was at the public expense.

6938. BRIBERY, Resisting. A Roman was appointed judge between his son and the province of Macedonia. When all the parties had been heard, the father said, "It is evident that my son has suffered himself to be bribed, therefore I deem him unworthy of the republic and of my house, and I order him to depart from my presence." Xenocrates the philosopher stood firm against temptations and bribery. Philip of Macedon attempted to gain his confidence with money, but with no success. Alexander in this imitated his father, and sent some of his friends with fifty talents for the philosopher. They were introduced, and supped with Xenocrates. The repast was small, frugal, and elegant without ostentation. On the morrow the officers of Alexander wished to pay down the fifty talents; but the philosopher asked them whether they had not perceived from the entertainment of the preceding day that he was not in want of money. "Tell your master," said he, "to keep his money; he has more people to maintain than I have." Phocion, the Athenian, was celebrated for his virtues, private as well as public. Philip, as well as his son Alexander, attempted to bribe him, but to no purpose. Antipater, who succeeded in the government of Macedonia after the death of Alexander, also attempted to corrupt him, but with the same success as his royal predecessor; and when a friend had observed to Phocion that he could so refuse the generous offers of his patrons, yet he should consider the good of his children, and accept them for their sake, Phocion calmly replied that if his children were like him, they could maintain themselves as well as their father had done; but if they behaved otherwise, he declared that he was unwilling to leave them anything, which might either supply their extravagances or encourage their debaucheries. Buck.

6939. BRIBERY, Witnesses of. The following case was tried before a Cadi at Smyrna. A poor man claimed a house which a rich man had usurped. The former held his deeds and documents to prove his right; but the latter had provided a number of witnesses to invalidate his title. In order to support their evidence effectually, he presented the Cadi with a bag containing 500 ducats. When the day arrived for hearing the cause, the poor man told his story, and produced his writings, but could not support his case by witnesses; the other rested the whole case on his witnesses, and on his adversary's defect in law, who could produce none; he urged the Cadi, therefore, to give sentence in his favor. After the most pressing solicitations, the judge calmly drew out from under his sofa the bag of ducats which the rich man had given him as a bribe, saying to him very gravely, "You have been much mistaken in the suit, for if the poor man could produce no witnesses in confirmation of his right, I myself can produce at least five hundred." He then threw away the bag with reproach and indignation, and decreed the house to the poor plaintiff.

6940. BRIDE, Serving for a. It is related that a rich saddler, whose daughter was afterwards married to Dunk, the celebrated Earl of Halifax, ordered in his will that she should lose the whole of her fortune if she did not marry a saddler. The young Earl of Halifax, in order to win the bride, served an apprenticeship of seven years to a saddler, and afterwards bound himself to the rich saddler's daughter for life. Anon.

6941. BROKEN THINGS, The Value of. It is on crushed grain that man is fed; it is by bruised plants that he is restored to health. It was by broken pitchers that Gideon triumphed; it was from a wasted barrel and empty cuse that the prophet was sustained; it was on boards and broken pieces of the ship that Paul and his companions were saved. It was amid the fragments of broken humanity that the promise of the higher life was given; though not a bone of him was broken, yet it is by the broken life of Christ that his people shall live eternally; it was by the scattering of the Jews that the Gentiles were brought in; it was by the bruised and torn bodies of the saints that the truth was so made to triumph that it became a saying, that "the blood of the martyrs was the seed of the church." It is by this broken box (Mark 14: 3), that throughout the wide world it is proclaimed how blessed and glorious a thing it is to do a whole thing to Christ. When the true story of all things shall be known, then will it appear how precious in God's sight, how powerful in his hands, were many broken things. Broken earthly hopes will be found to have been necessary to the bringing of the better hope which endures forever. Broken bodily constitutions will be found to have been needful in some cases to the attainment of that land where the body shall be weary and sore no more; broken earthly fortunes, to the winning of the wealth beyond the reach of rust and moth and thief; broken earthly honor, to the being crowned with the diadem which fadeth not away.

6942. BROTHER, Betrayal of a. John Diazius, a Spaniard, became a Protestant. His brother Alphonsus Diazius, hearing of this, resolved to reclaim him to Romanism or slay him. He first approached him with affectionate and brotherly kindness, and used all his influence, but in vain. He left him in a friendly manner, and hired an assassin to whom he gave a letter of introduction to his brother. The assassin delivered it, and while the brother was reading it, he drew forth a concealed hatchet and cleft his skull. For this Alphonsus was applauded by the Papists, but his conscience smote him unendurably, and during the Council of Trent he hung himself.

6943. BROTHER, Christ our. A Glasgow boy was beguiled from home till late one dark and stormy night by his love of stories. To get home he had to pass a graveyard. "I wish I were home," he said. He was a timid little boy, and began to weep. He was afraid of the dark night and the rolling thunder, and of the graveyard. After a while he got courage to say, "Keep the door open, and cry after me till I am out of hearing, and I will not be afraid." The other boys agreed, and opened the door to let him out. But just at that moment there came another flash of lightning, and another roll of thunder, and he and they ran back and cowered beside the fire. "Come with me, some of you," he next said. "Come two of you; I am afraid to go alone." But the other boys were very little older than himself. And now they also were afraid, and they began to cry. Eight o'clock! Nine! "Oh, I wish I were at home!" Ten! and still he is afraid to go. Half-past ten! eleven! "I wish—I wish I were at home." He went to the door a third time. He still saw nothing but the black, wet night. He cried more bitterly than before. He cried as if his heart would break—"I wish—I wish—I wish I were at home!" While he was sobbing out these words he saw a star of light twinkling through the gloom. It came nearer and nearer, and grew bigger the nearer it came. Joy! It was light from his father's house! His brother, carrying a lantern, had come to fetch him home. It was as if daylight had come back again. His crying was at an end; his tears were dried up. He became bold as a lion. The fear of the graveyard went away, and he stepped out into the darkness with a smile on his face. His brother was by his side, and the light of his brother's lantern would light him home! Now Christ does for his dying brothers and sisters just what this boy's brother did for him. He comes for them, with light from their Father's house, and takes them by the hand to lead them home. Dr. A. MacLeod.

6944. BROTHER, Discovery of a. Bauer, who commanded the Russian cavalry in Hclstein, was a soldier of fortune, whose family and country were unknown to every one. When encamped near Husum, he took a way of discovering himself as novel as it was amiable. He invited all his field officers, and some others, to dine with him, and sent his adjutant to bring a miller and his wife, who lived in the neighborhood, to the entertainment. The poor couple came, very much afraid of the summons, and quite confused when they appeared before the Muscovite General. Bauer, seeing this, bade them be quite easy, for he only intended to show them kindness, and had sent for them to dine with him that day; at the same time, he conversed familiarly with them about the country. At dinner, the General placed the miller and his wife one on each hand, and nearest to him, and paid particular attention to them. In the course of the entertainment he asked the miller many questions about his family and relations. The miller stated that he was the eldest son of his father, who left the mill he then possessed, and that he had two brothers and one sister. "Have you no other brother?" said the General. "No," replied the miller; "I had once another brother, but he went away with the soldiers when he was very young, and must have long ago been killed in the wars." The General, observing the company much surprised at his conversation with the miller, said to them, "Brother soldiers, you have always been curious to know who I was, and whence I came. I now inform you that this is the place of my nativity, and you have heard from this miller, who is my elder brother, what my family is." Then turning to the astonished miller and his wife, the General embraced them, saying that he was the brother they had supposed dead. The General then invited the whole company to meet him next day at the mill, where a plentiful entertainment was provided. Anon.

6945. BROTHERHOOD, Claims of. At the last meeting of the Woburn Conference, Farmer Allen, of Wakefield, related the following anecdote: "One Sunday morning, while a certain deacon was preparing for church, a wandering wayfarer, or, in modern parlance, a 'tramp,' appeared at his door, pleaded his hunger, and begged for something to eat. The deacon looked solemn, and frowningly, but reluctantly, got a loaf of bread and began to cut it, but while doing so took occasion to admonish the beggar concerning the error of his ways. After reminding him that it was the holy Sabbath that he was desecrating, he asked him if he knew how to pray? 'No,' was the reply. 'Then,' said the deacon, 'I'll teach you,' and he commenced to repeat the Lord's prayer. But just as he uttered the first words, 'Our Father,' the beggar interrupted him with the question, 'What! is he your father and mine too?' 'Yes,' the deacon replied. 'Why,' exclaimed the beggar, 'we are brothers, then, ain't we? Can't you cut that slice a little thicker?' 'The convention forgot its solemnity long enough to indulge in the first and only hearty laugh on the occasion.'

6946. BROTHERHOOD, Condescension of. The King of England had instructed his representative to sue for the release of certain Huguenots, who had been thrown into the Bastille for their religion. "What would your master, the King of England, say, if I sue for the release of the prisoners in Newgate?" was the French king's reply. The ambassador's reply was, "Your Majesty may have every one of them if you will claim them as your brethren." The Lord Jesus Christ makes this claim in behalf of all on the earth who receive him.

6947. BROTHERHOOD, Nature's. There is a brotherhood between us and flowers and trees, between the green things that wither, and the bright and beautiful ones that die. The dead violet is the fragrant memorial of the infant that drooped and died—the still unscattered dust of the flower that fades in June brings to our remembrance the fair form that was suddenly breathed on by some mysterious emissary, and passed away in her noon. Another falls from the tree of life like that sere leaf. In the woods in winter we cannot be long alone; visions and associations will gather around us—departed forms, and almost forgotten faces will rise like their shadows from the grave, and almost forgotten faces will come forth from the past, and bear witness to the words which, like monumental inscriptions on the pavement, the feet of traffic are continually defacing, but which the sweep of years renders again clear and legible: "All flesh is as grass; the grass withereth, and the flower fadeth."

Cumming.

6948. BROTHERS, Love of. After the death of Darius, king of Persia, his two sons, Ariamenes and Xerxes, claimed the kingdom, the first because of his seniority, and the second because of possession, for he held the sceptre in his brother's absence after his father's death. They met as private citizens, Xerxes making presents to Ariamenes, with this address: "With these presents your brother Xerxes expresses the honor he has for you; and if by the judgment and suffrage of the Persians I be declared king, I place you next to myself." Ariamenes answered: "I accept the presents, but presume the kingdom of Persia to be my right. Yet for all my younger brethren I shall have an honor, but for Xerxes is the first place." The kingdom was adjudged to Xerxes by Artabanus to whom the question was referred. Thereupon, Ariamenes took Xerxes by the hand and seated him on the throne, and was himself made next in the kingdom by Xerxes. With fraternal devotion Ariamenes filled his office, and was slain in the naval engagement at Salamis, contending for his brother's honor.

6949. BUILDING, Enemies of. If we would be temple builders we must have a temple builder's lot. I mean, hold a sword in one hand and a trowel in the other. Faithful Nehemiahs have many Sanballats to deal with. Building the walls of the New Jerusalem is what the profane and formalist do not approve of. Would you be a Nehemiah, and no Sanballat to oppose you? Whitefield.

6950. BUILDING for Eternity. Piso built a house, in the construction of which he bestowed the greatest care upon every part. Augustus Cæsar commended him, saying, "You cheer my heart, who build as if Rome would be eternal." Character requires greater care, for it shall live when Piso's house is scattered in dust and the world itself is dissolved.

6951. BUILDING Little by Little. A boy watched a large building as the workmen from day to day carried up bricks and mortar. "My son," said his father, "you seem much interested in the bricklayers. Do you think of learning the trade?" "No," he replied, "I was thinking what a little thing a brick is, and what great houses are built by laying one brick upon another." "Very true, my son; never forget it. So it is in all great works; all your learning is but one lesson added to another. If a man could walk all round the world, it would be by putting one foot before another. Your whole life will be made up of a succession of moments. Learn from this not to despise little things. Be not discouraged by great labors. They become easy if divided into parts. You could not jump over a mountain, but step by step takes you to the other side. Do not fear, therefore, to attempt great things. Always remember that the large building rose by laying one brick upon another."

Presbyterian

6952. BUILDING, Uncertain. In countries subject to earthquakes the houses are built low and light. This is wise where the earth itself is unstable. The lesson is for all worldly affairs. The earth is unreliable, and our structures may be overthrown at any moment. Make sure of an eternal mansion in heaven.

6953. BURDEN, Crying under the. A minister was moving his library up stairs. His little boy wanted to help him, so he gave him the biggest book he could find, and the little fellow tugged at it till he got it about half way up, and then he sat down and cried. His father found him, and just took him in his arms, big book and all, and carried him up stairs. So Christ will carry you and all your burdens.

Moody.

6954. BURDEN, Loss of a. Now I saw in my dream that the highway up which Christian was to go was fenced on either side with a wall, and that wall was called Salvation. Up this way, therefore, did burdened Christian run, but not without great difficulty, because of the load on his back. He ran thus till he came at a place somewhat ascending; and upon that place stood a cross, and a little below, in the bottom, a sepulchre. So I saw in my dream, that just as Christian came up with the cross, his burden loosed from off his shoulders, and fell from off his back, and began to tumble; and so continued to do, till it came to the mouth of the sepulchre, where it fell in, and I saw it no more.

Bunyan.

6955. BURIAL, A Fiction. As the soul is the man, and the material body only his house while upon earth; a man is never really buried. No human being since the beginning of the world has ever yet been buried—no, not even for a few minutes, buried! How can a living soul be buried? Man is where his conscious being is, his memory, his love, his imagination; and since these cannot be put in the grave, the man is never put there. So far from being our "last home," the grave is not a home at all; for we never are laid in it, or go near it. "How shall we bury you?" said Orito to Socrates, before he drank the poison. "Just as you please," replied Socrates, "if only you can catch me!" Socrates knew better than that he should die. He saw through death as a vapor curtain through which he would burst into another life. "I shall not die; I shall never die," is what every man ought to say, and energetically to think. "I shall never die; I shall never be buried; bury me if you can catch me."

Grindon.

6956. BURIAL, Miraculous. St. Antony visited Paul the hermit, who was very aged and very holy. He found him in his cave in the attitude of prayer with hands outspread rigid in death. He prayed, wrapped the corpse in a mantle, and was sad because he had no spade with which to dig a grave for it. Then two lions came running from the inner part of the desert, their manes tossing on their necks. They came straight to the corpse of the blessed old man, wagging their tails, and roaring with mighty growls, so that Antony understood them to lament, as best they could. Then they began to claw the ground with their paws, and, carrying out the sand eagerly, dug a place large enough to hold a man; then at once, as if begging a reward for their work, they came to Antony, drooping their necks, and licking his hands and feet. But he perceived that they prayed a blessing from him; and at once, bursting into praise of Christ, because even dumb animals felt that he was God, he said, "Lord, without whose word not a leaf of the tree drops, nor one sparrow falls to the ground, give to them as thou knowest how to give;" and sent them away. Antony then laid the body of Paul in the grave and heaped the earth upon it. This event is narrated by Jerome, and declared to be authentic.

6957. BURNT-OFFERING, Import of the. "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind." I cannot doubt that the type refers to this in speaking so particularly of the parts of the burnt-offering; for "the head," "the fat," "the legs," "the inwards," are all distinctly enumerated. "The head" is the well-known emblem of the thoughts; "the legs," the emblem of the walk; and "the inwards," the constant and familiar symbol of the feelings and affections of the heart. The meaning of "the fat" may not be quite so obvious, though here also Scripture helps us to the solution. It represents the energy not of one limb or faculty, but the general health and vigor of the whole. In Jesus these were all surrendered, and all without spot or blemish. Had there been but one thought in the mind of Jesus which was not perfectly given to God; had there been but one affection in the heart of Jesus which was not yielded to his Father's will; had there been but one step in the walk of Jesus which was not taken for God and not for his own pleasure; then he could not have offered himself or been accepted as "a whole burnt-offering to Jehovah." But Jesus gave up all; he reserved nothing. All was burnt, all consumed upon the altar. Such was "the whole burnt-offering"—the entire surrender of self to God in everything. A. Jukes.

6958. BUSINESS, Ashamed of. Never shrink from doing anything which your business calls you to. The man who is above his business, may one day find his business above him.

Samuel Drew.

6959. BUSINESS, Failures in. There were seven thousand, seven hundred and forty failures in business during the year 1875, involving liabilities to the amount of over two hundred millions of dollars. In the five years, 1871-1875, the whole number of failures reported was twenty-five thousand, seven hundred and thirty-seven, and the liabilities of these bankruptcies were nearly eight hundred millions of dollars ($794,111,153). It is estimated that eighty-five per cent. of all who go into business, fail in the course of a few years; and that only three out of every hundred gain more than a living. Such are the uncertainties of trade, with all its opportunities, its shrewd and daring operators, its varied experience, its versatility, its capital, its enterprise, and its power over men.

Talmage.

6960. BUSINESS, Fidelity Required in. A rich farmer in Oneida county, N. Y., where Millerism was rampant, joined the society. The believers, all of them poor, welcomed the rich convert and told him that they were in the habit of having all things in common, as the end was at hand; the Master was coming speedily. The man said he would study the Bible on that subject, pray over it, and give his decision as to surrendering his property, at the next meeting. When the time came, he reported that while dwelling on the subject and seeking divine direction, the words of the Master had been deeply impressed upon him, and he had determined to obey them: "Occupy till I come."

6961. BUSINESS, God's Care for Our. A king appointed a very busy nobleman to be his ambassador to a distant court. He declined the honor on the ground of his family and urgent business concerns at home. The king answered, "You must go; only do you mind my concerns heartily and I will take care of yours." So God says to men.

6962. BUSINESS, Honesty in. An incident is related of Mr. A. T. Stewart's first day's business. A woman came to buy calico, and a clerk told her that the colors were fast and would not wash out. Mr. Stewart indignantly remonstrated with the salesman. "What do you mean by saying what you know to be untrue? The calico will fade; she will demand her money back, and she will be right. I don't want goods represented for what they are not." "Look here, Mr. Stewart," said the clerk, "if those are going to be your principles in trade, I'm going to look for another situation. You won't last long." But Mr. Stewart did last.

6963. BUSINESS to be Honored. Every man is a debtor to his profession, from the which, as men do of course seek to receive countenance and profit, so ought they of duty to endeavor themselves, by way of amends, to be a help and ornament thereunto. Bacon.

6964. BUSINESS, Laws of. The planets have a two-fold action in their orbits and on their axes, the one motion not interfering, but carried on simultaneously, and in perfect harmony with the other; so must it be that man's two-fold activities round the heavenly and the earthly centre disturb not nor jar with each other; so that man may be at once "diligent in business and fervent in spirit, serving the Lord." Caird.

6965. BUSINESS a Means of Grace. Dr. Hawes, in his biography of Norman Smith, a merchant in his congregation, says he never grew in grace more readily or shone brighter as a Christian than the last six or seven years of his life, when he had the greatest amount of business on his hands. From the time when he devoted all to God and resolved to pursue his business as a part of his religion, he found no tendency in his worldly engagement to chill his piety or enchain his affections to earth. His business became to him a means of grace, and helped him forward in the divine life, just as truly as the reading the Scriptures and prayer.

6966. BUSINESS, Prayer before. Lord Ashley, before he charged at the battle of Edge Hill, made this short prayer: "O Lord! thou knowest how busy I must be this day; if I forget thee, do not thou forget me." Hopkins.

6967. BUSINESS, Qualities for. Rare almost as great poets—rarer, perhaps, than veritable saints and martyrs—are consummate men of business. A man, to be excellent in this way, must not only be variously gifted, but his gifts should be nicely proportioned to one another. He must have in a high degree that virtue which men have always found the least pleasant of virtues—prudence. His prudence, however, will not be merely of a cautious and quiescent order, but that which, being ever actively engaged, is more fitly called discretion than prudence. Such a man must have an almost ignominious love of details, blended (and this is a rare combination) with a high power of imagination, enabling him to look along extended lines of possible action, and put these details in their right places. He requires a great knowledge of character, with that exquisite tact which feels unerringly the right moment when to act. A discreet rapidity must pervade all the movements of his thought and action. He must be singularly free from vanity, and is generally found to be an enthusiast, who has the art to conceal his enthusiasm. Helps.

6968. BUSINESS, Rivalries of. Two merchants became active enemies through the rivalries of business. One of them was converted, and sought counsel how to treat his rival. He was advised, "When any one asks for an article you have not, recommend him to go over to your neighbor." The latter being informed who sent them by the customers, was overcome by his rival's altered conduct. A reconciliation was effected, and they became friends and Christian brothers.

6969. BUSINESS, Secular. The founder of Rome marked out that city with a plough, having a brazen ploughshare drawn by a bull and a cow yoked together. Where a gate was required the plough was lifted out and the furrow discontinued. Wherever the plough touched was sacred ground not to be passed over. The whole wall was sacred except the gateways. They made the common mistake of counting the ways of trade and commerce as unholy, and carrying no elevating ideas, such as Christianity gives, into them.

6970. BUSINESS, Success in. Isaac Rich, who left a million and three-quarters to found the Boston University of the M. E. Church, began business thus: At eighteen he went from Cape Cod to Boston with three or four dollars in his possession, and looked about for something to do, rising early, walking far, observing closely, reflecting much. Soon he had an idea; he bought three bushels of oysters, hired a wheelbarrow, found a piece of board, bought six small plates, six iron forks, a three-cent pepper-box, and one or two other things. He was at the oyster boat buying his oysters at three o'clock in the morning, wheeled them three miles, set up his board near a market, and began business. He sold out his oysters as fast as he could get them, at a good profit. He repeated this experiment morning after morning until he saved $130, with which he bought a horse and wagon, and had five cents left. "How are you going to board your horse?" asked a stable-keeper who witnessed this audacious transaction. "I am going to board him at your stable." "But you're a minor," replied this Yankee, "and, mind, I can't trust you more than a week." The next morning the lad, who had established a good credit with oyster men, bought thirteen bushels of remarkably fine oysters, which he sold in the course of the day at a profit of $17. So he was able to pay for his horse's board. And right there in the same market he continued to deal in oysters and fish for forty years, became king of that business, and ended by founding a college.

Zion's Herald.

6971. BUSINESS, Test of. When Professor Finney was holding meetings in the city of Edinburgh, a gentleman called upon him in great distress of mind. He had listened to Mr. Finney's sermon on the previous evening, and it had torn away his "refuge of lies." Mr. Finney pointed out to him the way of life clearly, as his only hope of salvation. The weeping man assured him that he was willing to give up all for Jesus; that he knew of nothing he would reserve. "Then let us go upon our knees and tell God of that," said Mr. Finney. So both knelt at the altar, and Mr. Finney prayed: "O Lord, this man declares that he is prepared to take thee as his God, and to cast himself upon thy care now and for ever." The man responded, "Amen," heartily. Mr. Finney continued: "O Lord, this man vows that he is ready to give his wife, family, and all their interests up to thee." Another hearty "Amen" from the man. He went on: "O Lord, he says that he is willing to give thee his business, whatever it may be, and conduct it for thy glory." The man was silent—no response. Mr. Finney was surprised at his silence, and asked, "Why do you not say 'Amen' to this?" "Because the Lord will not take my business, sir; I am in the spirit trade," he answered. Any business which cannot be consecrated to Christ and done in his name must be abandoned or heaven will be lost.

6972. BUSINESS, Useful. If a man with a scythe should mow the empty air, he would sooner be weary than he who sweats with toil in cutting the standing corn. Business is the salt of life, which not only gives a grateful smack to it, but dries up those crudities that would offend, preserves from putrefaction, and drives off all those blowing flies that would corrupt it. There are in business three things necessary,—knowledge, temper, and time. Unless a man knows what he is going about, he is liable to go astray, or to lose much time in finding out the right course. If he want temper, he will be sure not to want trouble. It must be left to judgment to discern when the season is proper.

Feltham.

6973. BUSINESS, Unsuccessful. The man who never failed in business cannot possibly know whether he has any "grit" in him, or is worth a button. It is the man who fails, then rises, who is really great in his way. Peter Cooper failed in making hats, failed as a cabinet-maker, locomotive builder, and grocer; but as often as he failed he "tried and tried again," until he could stand upon his feet alone, then crowned his victory by giving a million dollars to help the poor boys in times to come. Horace Greeley tried three or four lines of business before he founded the Tribune, and made it worth a million dollars. Patrick Henry failed at everything he undertook, until he made himself the orator of his age and nation. Stephen A. Douglas made dinner tables, and bedsteads, and bureaus, many a long year before he made himself a "giant" on the floor of Congress. Abraham Lincoln failed to make both ends meet by chopping wood, failed to earn his salt in the galley slave life of a Mississippi flat-boatman; he had not even wit enough to run a grocery, and yet he made himself a grand character of the nineteenth century. General Grant failed at everything; he learned to tan hides, but could not sell leather enough to purchase a pair of breeches; a dozen years ago, "he brought up" on top of a woodpile, "teaming it" to town for forty dollars a month; and yet he is head of a great nation. The lesson for every young man is this: As long as you have the health, and have power to do, go ahead; if you fail at one thing, try another, and a third—a dozen even. Look at the spider; nineteen times it tried to throw out its web to its place of attachment, and on the twentieth succeeded. The young man who has the gift of continuance is the one whose foot will be able to breast the angry waters of human discouragement.

Graphic.

6974. BUSY-BODIES, Work of. It is observed of the hen that, loathing the plenty of meat that is cast before her on a clean floor, she will be scratching in a hole or spurring the dunghill in search of one single musty grain. So these over-busy people, neglecting such obvious and common things into which any man may inquire and talk of without offence, cannot be satisfied unless they rake into the private and concealed evils of every family in the neighborhood. It was smartly said by the Egyptian, who, being asked what it was he carried so closely, replied, it was therefore covered that it might be secret.

Plutarch.

6975. CALAMITY, Benefit of. A storm led to the discovery of the gold mines in California. A storm has driven some to the discovery of the richer mines of the love of God in Christ.

6976. CALAMITY, Sympathy for. There was an Englishman in Chicago the winter before the fire, who was much impressed with the sudden growth of the city. He went back to Manchester, where he told the people about the city only forty years old, with all its fine buildings, its colleges, its churches. It was, he thought, a most wonderful city. But no one seemed to take an interest in Chicago. "But," he says, "one day the news came flashing over the wires that Chicago was on fire. The moment the people heard about the Chicago fire they became suddenly interested about Chicago. Then every man that he had tried to tell about Chicago became suddenly interested, and they couldn't hear too much." The news came flashing over the wires that half the city was burnt. He said, "There were men there couldn't help but weep." At last the news came that 100,000 people were burned out of their houses, and were in danger of starvation unless immediate help was sent. Then these men came forward and gave their thousands. It was the calamity of Chicago that brought out the love and pity of those men. In Chicago men went to bed on Sunday night millionaires, and Monday morning all was swept away. I didn't see a man shed a tear over the loss of his property. At last the news came flashing over the wires that help was coming—that a delegation was coming from New York that was bringing clothing and food and money—and I saw men weep like little children then. It was that that touched the heart of Chicago. I never loved America so much in my life. I loved the whole world. We couldn't help but love others, because they loved us; and so it was the calamity of Adam that brought out God's love.

6977. CALUMNY, Allegory of. A traveler, setting out upon a long journey, was assailed on the road by curs, mastiffs, and half-grown puppies, which came out from their kennels to bark at him as he passed along. He often dismounted from his horse to drive them back with stones and sticks into their hiding-places. This operation was repeated every day, and sometimes as often as twenty times a day. The consequence was, that more than half the traveler's time was consumed in chasing these dogs and puppies. At last he was overtaken by a neighbor, who was going the same road, but who had set out a long time after him. The latter traveler was very much surprised to find the other no further on his journey, and, on hearing the reason, "Alas!" said he, "is it possible that you have lost your time and wasted your strength in this idle occupation? These same animals have beset me all along the road; but I have saved my time and my labor in taking no notice of their barking, while you have lost yours in resenting insults which did you no harm, and in chasing dogs and puppies, whose manners you can never mend."

Anon.

6978. CALUMNY, Reproof of. Some young ladies at the house of Rev. B. Jacobs, of Cambridgeport, were one day talking about one of their female friends. As he entered the room, he heard the epithets "odd," "singular," etc., applied. He asked, and was told the name of the young lady in question, and then said, very gravely, "Yes, she is an odd young lady; she is a very odd young lady; I consider her extremely singular." He then added, very impressively, "She was never heard to speak ill of an absent friend." The rebuke was not forgotten.

6979. CALUMNY, Spread of. Calumny crosses oceans, scales mountains, and traverses deserts with greater ease than the Scythian Abaris, and, like him, rides upon a poisoned arrow.

Colton.

6980. CALUMNY, Treatment of. Boerhave, who had many enemies, used to say that he never thought it necessary to repeat their calumnies. "They are sparks," said he, "which, if you do not blow them, will go out of themselves. The surest method against scandal is to live it down by perseverance in well doing, and by prayer to God that he would cure the distempered minds of those who traduce and injure us."

6981. CALUMNY, Voracity of. Like the tiger that seldom desists from pursuing man after having once preyed upon human flesh, the person who has once gratified his appetite with calumny, makes ever after the most agreeable feast on murdered reputation.

Goldsmith

6982. CALUMNY, Wise Use of. Philip of Macedon was wont to say that he was much beholden to the Athenian orators; since by the slanderous and opprobrious manner in which they spoke of him, they were the means of making him a better man, both in word and deed. "For," added he, "I every day do my best endeavor, as well by my sayings as doings, to prove them liars."

6983. CALVARY, Mount. Mount Calvary is lord of the Sacred Mountains, and by its baptism of blood and agony, its moral grandeur, and the intense glory that beams from its summit, is worthy to crown the immortal group. Its moral height no man can measure, for though its base is on the earth, its top is lost in the heaven of heavens. The angels hover around the dazzling summit, struggling in vain to scale its highest point, which has never yet been fanned by even an immortal wing. The divine eye alone embraces its length and breadth, and depth and height. Oh, what associations cluster around it! what mysteries hover there! and what revelations it makes to the awe-struck beholder! Mount Calvary! at the mention of that name the universe thrills with a new emotion, and heaven trembles with a new anthem, in which pity and exultation mingle in strange yet sweet accord!

Headley.

6984. CALVARY, Safety on. Away on the frontier of our country, out on the prairies, where men sometimes go to hunt, or for other purposes, the grass in the dry season sometimes catches fire, and you will see the flames uprise twenty or thirty feet high, and roll over the Western desert faster than any fleet horse can run. Now, what do the men do? They know it is sure death unless they can make some escape. They would try to run away, perhaps, if they had fleet horses. But they can't; that fire goes faster than the fleetest horse can run. What do they do? Why, they just take a match, and they light the grass from it, and away it burns, and then they get into that burnt district. The fire comes on, and there they stand perfectly secure. There they stand perfectly secure—nothing to fear. Why? Because the fire has burned all there is to burn. Such a place is Mount Calvary.

6985. CALVINISM, Dislike of. Neither of the Wesleys were very merciful to the Calvinists; but Charles was always peculiarly severe upon them; he had a theory that Calvinism, as a matter of necessity, soured the temper just as rennet sours milk. One day he was preaching in his chapel, and had got on his favorite theme: "I never knew," he said, "such a thing as a good-tempered Calvinist; it is a contradiction in terms, a moral impossibility." A man started up at the farther end of the chapel, and putting his arms akimbo, screamed out, "You're a liar!" "Ah!" said Charles Wesley, "have I drawn out Leviathan with a hook?"

6986. CAPACITIES Alone Insufficient. Those who, in confidence of superior capacities or attainments, disregard the common maxims of life, should remember that nothing can atone for the want of prudence; that negligence and irregularity long continued will make knowledge useless, wit ridiculous, and genius contemptible.

6987. CAPACITIES, Shameful. Antisthenes, the founder of the sect of the Cynics, when he was told that Ismenias played excellently upon the flute, answered properly enough, "Then he is good for nothing else, otherwise he would not have played so well." Such also was Philip's saying to his son, when, at a certain entertainment, he sang in a very agreeable and skillful manner, "Are you not ashamed to sing so well?" Even so, when one who professes to be of the seed royal of heaven, is able to rival the ungodly in their cunning, worldliness, merriment, scheming, or extravagance, may they not blush to possess such dangerous capacities? Heirs of heaven have something better to do than to emulate the children of darkness. Spurgeon.

6988. CAPACITIES, Special. I am of the opinion that every mind that comes into the world has its own specialty—is different from every other mind; that each of you brings into the world a certain bias, a disposition to attempt something of its own, something your own—an aim a little different from that of any of your companions; and that every young man and every young woman is a failure so long as each does not find what is his or her own bias; that just so long as you are influenced by those around you, so long as you are attempting to do those things which you see others do well instead of doing that thing which you can do well, you are so far wrong, so far failing of your own right mark. Everybody sees the difference in children. They very early discover their tastes. One has a taste for going abroad, another for staying at home; one for books, another for games; one wishes to hear stories, another wants to see things done; one is fond of drawing, the other cannot draw at all, but he can make a machine. This difference, as you advance, becomes more pronounced. You are more distinct in your conception of what you can do—more decided in avoiding things which you cannot and do not wish to do. Now, I conceive that success is in finding what it is that you yourself really want, and pursuing it; freeing yourself from all importunities of your friends to do something which they like, and insisting upon that thing which you like and can do.

6989. CAPITAL, Defined. Capital! What is capital? Is it what a man has? Is it counted by pounds and pence, stocks and shares, by houses and lands? No! capital is not what a man has, but what a man is. Character is capital; honor is capital. Macdruff.

6990. CAPITAL, Workingman's. The workingman's capital is health and not wealth. It does not consist in landed property, but in sinew and muscle, and if he persist in the use of intoxicating liquors, they will strike at the very root of his capital—a sound physical constitution. After this is lost, he becomes unfit for the workshop, for no master will employ a man who wants capital. He has then to repair to the poor-house or the infirmary. Hunter.

6991. CAPTIVES, Deliverance of. It was my privilege to go into Richmond with General Grant's army. There are a thousand poor captives, and they are lawful captives, prisoners in Libby Prison. Talk to some of them that have been there for months, and hear them tell their story. I have wept for hours to hear them tell how they suffered, how they would not hear from their homes and their loved ones for long intervals, and how sometimes they would get messages that their loved ones would die, and they could not get home to be with them in their dying hours. Let us, for illustration, picture a scene. One beautiful day in the spring they are there in the prison. All news has been kept from them. They have not heard what has been going on around Richmond, and I can imagine one says one day, "Ah, boys, listen! I hear a band of music, and it sounds as if they were playing the old battle-cry of the Republic. It sounds as if they were playing The Star-spangled Banner! long may it wave o'er the land of the free and the home of the brave!" And the hearts of the poor fellows begin to leap for joy. "I believe Richmond is taken. I believe they are coming to deliver us!" and every man in that prison is full of joy, and by and by the sound comes nearer, and they see it is so. It is the Union army! Next the doors of the prison are unlocked; they fly wide open, and those thousand men are set free. Wasn't that good news to them? Could there have been any better news? They are out of prison, out of bondage, delivered! They can go to their wives, their children, and their homes now. Ah, my friends, you could not find happier men than those that were liberated at that time; and that is just the Gospel. Christ came to proclaim liberty to the captives. Every man has been taken captive by Satan, and Christ has come to snap his bonds. Moody.

6992. CAPTIVITY, Memento of. A medal was struck by Vespasian on the subjugation of the Jews; on the reverse is seen a palm-tree, and a woman sitting on the ground at the foot of it, with her head leaning on her arm, weeping; and at her feet different pieces of armor with this legend, "Judea capta" (taken). Thus was exactly fulfilled the saying of the prophet, "And she, being desolate, shall sit upon the ground."

6993. CARDS, Folly of. It is very wonderful to see persons of the best sense passing away a dozen hours together in shuffling and dividing a pack of cards, with no other conversation but what is made up of a few game-phrases, and no other ideas but those of black or red spots ranged together in different figures. Would not a man laugh to hear any one of his species complaining that life is short?

6994. CARDS, Ruined by. Around a centre-table, where an astral lamp was shedding its light, sat three girls, one holding in her hands a pack of cards. At the back of her chair stood a young man who for years had successfully resisted every effort made by his companions to induce him to learn the game. "Come," said she, "we want one to make out our game. Play with us once, if you never play again." Her eye, cheek, and lip conspired to form an eloquent battery, which sent forth its attack upon the fortress of good resolutions in which he had so long stood secure, until it fell like the walls of an ancient city when jarred by the battering ram. He learned the cards and played. A few weeks afterward I was passing his door at a late hour, and a candle was shedding its dim light through the window. Since that time I have looked from my chamber nearly every hour of the night, from the close of day until early morn, and seen the light faintly struggling through the curtains that screened the inmates of that room from every eye save his who seeth alike in darkness and noonday. Gambling brought with it disease, and death came just as he numbered the half of his threescore years and ten. During his last hours I was sitting by his bedside, when he fixed on me a look I shall never forget, and bade me listen to his dying word: "I might have been a different man from what I am; but it is now too late. I am convinced that there is a state of being beyond the grave; and when I think of the retribution which awaits me in another world, I feel a horror which I am unable to describe." These were among the last words he ever uttered.

Am. Messenger.

6995. CARE, Biblical. Matt. 13: 22—"The cares of this world." Anxious care divides the mind and generally takes the larger half. The figure our Lord uses is a very suggestive one; comparing care and covetousness to thorns. Thorns came in with sin, and are a fruit of the curse. They are entangling, vexing, scratching, and they choke the good seed. The man that deals with thorns must be well armed and guarded, 2 Sam. 23: 6, 7. Luke 10: 40—"Cumbered about much serving." The original signifies drawn in different ways at the same time, exactly answering to our English word "distracted." Luke 12: 29—"Neither be ye of doubtful mind." Margin, "Live not in careful suspense," tossed about as thistle-down in the air; or like a ship, the sport of the changeful tide and angry billows. Phil. 4: 6—"Be careful for nothing." Care is a Christian duty. Carefulness, in the literal meaning of our English word (fullness of care) is a sin, arguing needless perplexing and unworthy distrust, 1 Cor. 7: 32. Ps. 55: 22—"Cast thy burden upon the Lord." "Thy gift" (margin) thy allotted portion—thy care. Roll it, as the word is, Ps. 37: 5; Prov. 16: 3, (marg.), where the text is "Commit." 1 Pet. 5: 7, "Casting all your care upon him." Not only sorrowful care, but every anxious thought—every lawful wish—the "heaviness" that "makes the heart stoop." Cast all upon God. Jesus is the care-bearer, as well as the sin-bearer of his people, Isa. 53: 4, 5. Prov. 10: 22, "True riches," and "no sorrow" added. 1 Cor. 3: 21, "Things present," "things to come," "all are yours." Then what need for anxious care? Bowes.

6996. CARE, Divine. Two little girls were walking homeward one moonlight evening when one of them said, "Sister Annie, it don't make any difference how fast we walk, the moon keeps up with us every step of the way; it don't move at all, and yet it is always going along with us." "So it is with God; though he seems far away, he is keeping step with us always in the march of life."

6997. CARE, Personification of. Care, crossing a dangerous brook, collected a mass of the dirty slime which deformed its banks, and moulded it into the image of an earthly being, which Jupiter, on passing by soon afterwards, touched with ethereal fire and warmed into animation; but, being at a loss what name to give this new production, and disputing to whom of right it belonged, the matter was referred to the arbitrament of Saturn, who decreed that his name should be man (Homo—ab humo, from the dirt of which he had been made); that Care should entirely possess his mind while living; that Tellus, or the earth, should receive his body when dead; and that Jupiter should dispose of his celestial essence according to his discretion. Thus was man made the property of Care from his original formation; and Discontent, the offspring of Care, has ever since been his inseparable companion. Hyginus.

6998. CARE, Universal. Look into the country fields, there you see toiling at the plough and scythe; look into the waters, there you see tugging at oars and cables; look into the city, there you see a throng of cares, and hear sorrowful complaints of bad times and the decay of trade; look into studies, and there you see paleness and infirmities, and fixed eyes; look into the court, and there are defeated hopes, envyings, underminings, and tedious attendance; all things are full of labor, and labor is full of sorrow; and these two are inseparably joined with the miserable life of man.

T. Rogers.

6999. CARELESSNESS, Childish. A boy who had read Matthew and Mark in the New Testament was asked if he had read about Jesus Christ. He replied, "No, I am only as far as Luke." He was like too many, small and great, old and young, who read the Bible without attention or profit.

7000. CARELESSNESS of Christians. Alluding to the carelessness of Christians, Father Taylor, of Boston, used the figure of a mariner steering into port through a narrow, dangerous channel: "False lights here, rocks there, shifting sand banks on one side, breakers on the other; and who, instead of fixing his attention to keep the head of the vessel right, and to obey the instructions of the pilot as he sings out from the wheel, throws the pilot overboard, lashes down the helm, and walks the deck whistling, with his hands in the pockets of his jacket." Here, suiting the action to the word, he puts on the true sailor-like look of defiant jollity; changed in a moment to an expression of horror, as he added, "See! see! she drifts to destruction!" Mrs. Jameson.

7001. CARELESSNESS, Consequences of. Childish imbecile carelessness is enough to render any man poor, without the aid of a single positive vice. Wayland.

7002. CARELESSNESS, Destructive. Beware of carelessness; no fortune will stand it long: you are on the high road to ruin the moment you think yourself rich enough to be careless. S. Smith.

7003. CARELESSNESS, Result of. Stonewall Jackson, the great general of the Confederates, lost his life through an act of gross carelessness on his own part, being shot by his own soldiers while he was returning from a reconnoitering of the Federal lines near Chancellorsville. He had given orders for a strict watch in that very direction, and to fire on any one approaching that way. His cavalry, supposing him an enemy, fired on him and his escort. They all fell, fatally wounded, but two. No worker has a charmed life, and if we violate the law we cannot hope to escape. In one sense it may be true that a "man is immortal until his work is done;" but it is equally true that when we begin to be careless we either cease to be immortal or else our work is nearly done. A. D. Vail.

7004. CARES, Abusing. I met a brother who, describing a friend of his, said he was like a man who had dropped a bottle, and broken it, and put all the pieces in his bosom, where they were cutting him perpetually. I have seen persons with troubles and cares that seemed like one that had fragments of glass in his bosom, that cut him, and that cut him the more the tighter he pressed them to his heart. Beecher.

7005. CARES, Transient. Quick is the succession of human events; the cares of to-day are seldom the cares of to-morrow; and when we lie down at night, we may safely say to most of our troubles, Ye have done your worst, and we shall meet no more. Cowper.

7006. CARICATURE, Advantage of. The caricaturist is one of the best of historical commentators. The striking peculiarities of the age, which are often but dimly seen in the pages of history, and carefully thrown into shadow in historical pictures, are always distinctly mirrored in the sketches of caricature, which has all the truth and vividness of a reflector; with permanence instead of evanescence, in its forms and colors. It gives enduring shapes to the jests of the hour. It shows us the great men of a period as they were seen and laughed at by their contemporaries; and by enabling us to feel the emotions they inspired when alive, and enjoy the mirth their conduct or appearance suggested, lets us into the understanding of their characters, both more truly and more amusingly than biography. Anon.

7007. CARICATURE, Evil of. The great moral satirist, Hogarth, was once drawing in a room where many of his friends were assembled, and among them my mother. She was then a very young woman. As she stood by Hogarth, she expressed a wish to learn to draw caricature "Alas, young lady," said Hogarth, "it is no faculty to be envied! Take my advice, and never draw caricature; by the long practice of it, I have lost the enjoyment of beauty. I never see a face but distorted; I never have the satisfaction to behold the human face divine." We may suppose that such language from Hogarth would come with great effect; his manner was very earnest, and the confession is well deserving of remembrance. Bishop Sandford.

7008. CASTE, Barrier of. I know by experience that it is unpleasant to reside in a Metawely village. Caste is an effectual barrier against forming any intimate relations with the villagers. You never contract friendship with persons who will neither eat with, nor visit you, and into whose houses you cannot enter without contracting or imparting defilement. The law must be broken down before people thus situated can either unite in religious ceremonies or contract family alliances. The Metawelies live separate both in fact and feeling from their neighbors, hating all, hated by all. They refuse to eat with all classes except themselves; and so it was with the Jews. Even the apostles esteemed it a thing unclean to associate or eat with one of another nation. Thompson.

7009. CASTE, Folly of. A Spaniard in South America, who suffered severely from the gout, refused to be cured by an Indian. "I know," said he, "that he is a famous man, and would certainly cure me; but he is an Indian, and would expect to be treated with attentions which I cannot pay to a man of color, and therefore I prefer remaining as I am."

7010. CATECHISM, Influence of the. An English Sabbath-school scholar requested his mother not to allow his brother to bring home anything that was smuggled when he went to sea. "Why do you wish that, my child?" said the mother. He answered, "Because my Catechism says it is wrong." The mother replied, "But that is only the word of man." He said, "Mother, is it the word of a man which said, 'Render unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's?'" This reply silenced the mother; but his father still attempting to defend the practice of smuggling, the boy said to him, "Father, whether is it worse, to rob one or to rob many?"

7011. CAUTION, Christian. He that goes too near sin to-day, may fall into it to-morrow. God has been so indulgent as to give us a latitude and liberty to exercise a pious zeal over ourselves, that we may show how much we fear to offend him; and a cautious Christian will say with St. Paul, "All things are lawful, but all things are not expedient." Prudence will not always venture to the brink of innocence. Boyle.

7012. CAUTION, Excessive. The plain truth is, that many believers in the present day seem so dreadfully afraid of doing harm that they hardly ever dare to do good. There are many who are fruitful in objections, but barren in actions; rich in wet blankets, but poor in anything like Christian fire. They are like the Dutch Deputies who would never allow Marlborough to venture anything, and by their excessive caution prevented many a victory being won.

7013. CEMETERIES, Origin of. Anciently none were buried in churches or church-yards; it was even unlawful to inter in cities, and the cemeteries were without the walls. Among the primitive Christians these were held in great veneration. It appears from Eusebius and Tertullian, that in the early ages they assembled for divine worship in the cemeteries. Valerian seems to have confiscated the cemeteries and other places of divine worship; but they were restored again by Gallienus. As the martyrs were buried in these places the Christians chose them for building churches on, when Constantine established their religion; and hence some derive the rule, which still obtains in the Church of Rome, never to consecrate an altar without putting under it the relics of some saint.

7014. CENSORIOUSNESS, Victims of. Pedley, a well-known natural simpleton, was wont to say: "God help the fool." None are more ready to pity the folly of others than those who have a small share of wit themselves. "There is no love among Christians," cries the man, who is himself destitute of true charity. "Zeal has vanished," exclaims the idle talker. "O, for more consistency," groans the hypocrite. "We want more vital godliness," protests the false pretender. As in the fable the wolf preached against sheep-stealing, so very many hunt down those sins in others which they shelter in themselves.

7015. CENSURE, Eminence and. Censure, says an ingenious author, is the tax a man pays to the public for being eminent. It is folly for an eminent man to think of escaping it, and a weakness to be affected with it. All the illustrious persons of antiquity, and, indeed, of every age in the world, have passed through this fiery persecution. There is no defence against reproach but obscurity; it is a kind of concomitant to greatness, as satires and invectives were an essential part of a Roman triumph.

7016. CENSURE, Improvement of. Plato, when he was in company with any persons that were guilty of unhandsome actions, was wont thus to reflect upon himself and ask this question, "Am I of the like temper and disposition with these men?" In like manner, whosoever passes a hard censure upon another man's life should presently make use of self-examination, and inquire what his own is; by which means he will come to know what his failings are, and how to amend them. Thus the very censures and back-bitings of his enemy will redound to his advantage, although in itself this censorious humor is a very vain, empty and useless thing. On the contrary, we may reap no less advantage for our being judged and censured by our enemies.

7017. CEREMONY, Legal. Ceremony resembles that base coin which circulates through a country by the royal mandate; it serves every purpose of real money at home; but it is entirely useless if carried abroad; a person who should attempt to circulate his native trash in another country would be thought either ridiculous or culpable. He is truly well bred who knows when to value and when to despise those national peculiarities which are regarded by some with so much observance. A traveler of taste at once perceives that the wise are polite all the world over; but that fools are only polite at home.

7018. CEREMONY, Profitless. Ceremonies do but clothe the covenant of grace. There are men who cannot see the body for the clothing, the signification of the spirit for the letter, the sword for the sheath, the kernel for the shell. They cannot see Christ but in the outward bark and rind of ritual observances and ceremonies, in the shell of them; and so they become unprofitable servants.

7019. CHANCE, No Such Thing as. It is strictly and philosophically true in nature and reason, that there is no such thing as chance or accident; it being evident that these words do not signify anything really existing, anything that is truly an agent or the cause of any event; but they signify merely men's ignorance of the real and immediate cause.

7020. CHANCE, Providence not. A sailor, on going to sea, said to his religious brother: "Tom, you talk a great deal about religion, and Providence, and if I should be wrecked, and a ship was to heave in sight and take me off, I suppose you would call it a merciful Providence. It's all very well, but I believe no such thing—these things happen, like other things, by mere chance, and you call it Providence, that's all!" He went upon his voyage, and his hypothesis was soon literally true; he was wrecked, and remained upon the wreck three days, when a ship appeared, and, seeing their signal of distress, came to their relief. He returned, and in relating it, said to his brother, "Oh, Tom, when that ship hove in sight, my words to you came in a moment into my mind—it was like a bolt of thunder: I have never got rid of it; and now I think it no more than an act of common gratitude to give myself up to God who pitied and saved me."

7021. CHANGE, Emblem of. Heraclitus says that no one can step twice into the same river, since nature, by her changes, is ever altering and transforming all things. It applies to associations, influence, thoughts and emotions.

7022. CHANGE, Love of. He that will have an oar for every man's boat, shall have none left to row his own. They, saith Melancthon, that will know aliquid in omnibus, shall indeed know nil in toto. Their admiration or dotage of a thing is extreme for the time, but it is a wonder if it outlive the age of a wonder, which is allowed but nine days. They are angry with time, and say the times are dead, because they produce no more innovations. Their inquiry of all things is not quam bonum, but quam novum. They are almost weary of the sun for continual shining. Continuance is a sufficient quarrel against the best things; and the manna of heaven is loathed because it is common. This is not to be always the same, but never the same; and while they would be everything they are nothing; but like the worm Pliny writes of, multi-poda, that hath many feet, yet is of slow pace. A while you shall have him in England, loving the simple truth; anon in Rome, groveling before an image. Soon after he leaps to Amsterdam; and yet must he still be turning, till there be nothing left but to turn Turk. Adams.

7023. CHANGE, Misconception of. An old man, observing that the ancient laws were neglected, and that new evil customs crept in, said to Agis, when he had now grown old himself, "All things here at Sparta are turned topsy-turvy." He replied, with a joke, "If it is so, it is agreeable to reason; for when I was a boy, I heard my father say all things were topsy-turvy; and he heard his father say the same; and it is no wonder if succeeding times are worse than the preceding; but it is a wonder if they happen to be better, or but just as good." Plutarch.

7024. CHANGES, Bodily. Our bodies are at all times like the fire which was shown to the hero of the Pilgrim's Progress in the Interpreter's house, which had water poured on it on one side of the wall against which it blazed, and oil on the other. Here one tissue is burning like fuel, and there another is becoming the depository of combustible matter. We have, as it were, millions of microscopic wind-furnaces, converting into carbonic acid, water-vapor, and other products of combustion, all the combustible elements of the body; and millions of blast-furnaces, reducing the starch and sugar of the food, and the sulphates and phosphates of the body, into inflammable oils and other fuels, which are finally transferred to the wind-furnaces, and burned there. Burning, and, what we must call in contradistinction, unburning, thus proceed together; the flame of life, like a blowpipe flame, exhibiting an oxidizing and a reducing action, at points not far distant from each other. Such is the human body—ever changing, ever abiding—a temple always complete, and yet always under repair, a mansion which quite contents its possessor, and yet has its plans and its materials altered each moment—a machine which never stops working, and yet it is taken to pieces in the one twinkling of an eye, and put together in the other—a cloth of gold, to which the needle is ever adding on one side of a line, and from which the scissors are ever cutting away on the other. Yes. Life, like Penelope of old, is ever weaving and unweaving the same web, whilst her grim suitors, Disease and Death, watch for her halting; only, for her is no Ulysses who will one day in triumph return. Dr. G. Wilson.

7025. CHARACTER, Change of. An irreligious merchant had been absent from his store for some time, and on his return noticed a marked change in one of his clerks. He said to his partner, "I do not understand what has come over George. He don't seem like the same person he did when I went away. He was always smart, but now he seems more tender, respectful, and genial. I think I should love him, if I had much to do with him." "I suppose you know what has happened to him since you have been gone?" "I don't know what you refer to." "George has become a Christian."

7026. CHARACTER, Completeness of. Whilst a man is capable of changing we may be forced to retract our opinions. He may forfeit the esteem we have conceived of him, and some time or other appear to us under a different light from what he does at present. In short, as the life of any man cannot be called happy or unhappy, so neither can it be pronounced vicious or virtuous, before the conclusion of it. It was upon this consideration that Epaminondas, being asked whether Chabrias, Iphicrates, or he himself, deserved most to be esteemed? "You must first see us die," saith he, "before that question can be answered." As there is not a more melancholy consideration to a good man than his being obnoxious to such a change, so there is nothing more glorious than to keep up a uniformity in his actions and preserve the beauty of his character to the last. Addison.

7027. CHARACTER, Decisive. I wish a character as decisive as that of a lion or a tiger, and an impetus towards the important objects of my choice as forcible as theirs towards prey and hostility. J. Foster.

7028. CHARACTER, Desirable. "I know nothing of that man's creed," said a person of a religious tradesman with whom he dealt, "because I never asked him what he believed; but a more honorable, punctual, generous tradesman, I never met with in my life, I would as soon take his word for a thousand pounds, as I would another man's bond for a shilling. Whatever he promises he performs, and to the time also."

7029. CHARACTER, Difficulty of Changing. The good or evil propensities of one age are, with their virtues and vices, transferred to the next. 'Tis extraordinary when an evil child becomes a sober, modest youth, or a dissolute youth becomes a godly man. The seed of the hemlock may pass into another stage, and be seen to blossom into flower, but it still retains its deadly principle. Childhood is as the seed in whose virtue the tree of life is contained. The characters that are cut in the bark, when the tree grows, deeply and visibly remain. 'Tis painful as death to change a sinful life of many years, and begin a contrary course of actions. There are two great branches of folly which spring out of a vicious youth: Youth will not do what it can; and manhood afterwards cannot do what it would. Salter.

7030. CHARACTER, Elements of. Character is not a massive unit; it is a fabric rather. It is an artificial whole made up of the interply of ten thousand threads. Every faculty is a spinner, spinning every day its threads, and almost every day threads of a different color; and character is made up by the weaving together of all these innumerable threads of daily life. Its strength is not merely in the strength of some simple unit, but in the strength of numerous elements.

Beecher.

7031. CHARACTER, God's Knowledge of. As the eye of the cunning lapidary detects in the rugged pebble just digged from the mine the polished diamond that shall sparkle in the diadem of a king; or as the sculptor in the rough block of marble newly hewn from the quarry beholds the statue of perfect grace and beauty that is latent there, and waiting but the touch of his hand; so he who sees all, and the end from the beginning, sees oftentimes greater wonders than these: he sees the saint in the sinner—Paul the preacher of the faith in Saul the persecutor of the faith.

Trench.

7032. CHARACTER, Good. A good character is a coat of triple steel, giving security to the wearer, protection to the oppressed, and inspiring the oppressor with awe.

Colton.

7033. CHARACTER, Impressiveness of. If a sheet of paper, on which a key has been laid, be exposed for some minutes to the sunshine, and then instantaneously viewed in the dark, the key being removed, a fading spectre of the key will be visible. Let this paper be put aside for many months where nothing can disturb it, and then in darkness be laid on a plate of hot metal, the spectre of the key will again appear. In the case of bodies more highly phosphorescent than paper, the spectres of many different objects which may have been laid on in succession will, on warming, emerge in their proper order. This is equally true of our bodies and our minds. We are involved in the universal metamorphosis. Nothing leaves us wholly as it found us. Every man we meet, every book we read, every picture or landscape we see, every word or tone we hear, mingles with our being and modifies it.

Christian Treasury.

7034. CHARACTER, Judgment of. The physician by a single symptom is able to identify the disease. A comparative physiologist from a single bone reconstructs the animal, determines its class, location and habits. So single deeds, words, sentences, associates, form a remarkably correct basis of judging character.

7035. CHARACTER, Knowledge of. As for that second-hand knowledge of men's minds, which is to be had from the relation of others, it will be sufficient to observe of it, that defects and vices are best learned from enemies—virtues and abilities from friends—manners and times from servants, and opinions and thoughts from intimate acquaintance; for popular fame is light, the judgment of superiors uncertain, before whom men walk more masked and secret. The truest character comes from domestics.

Lord Bacon.

7036. CHARACTER, Light of. Have only one chief end. The head-light on an engine is a small lamp, backed and set forth by a burnished reflector. Then it casts forth its brightness, pointing out and illuminating the way for the speeding travelers. Your lamp may not be large, but if you will put behind and about it the burnished reflector of a consistent, concentrated life, it may shine forth into the darkness, guiding hurrying pilgrims safely through the night.

Dr. Fowler.

7037. CHARACTER, Materials for. Instead of saying that man is the creature of circumstance, it would be nearer the mark to say that man is the architect of circumstance. Our strength is measured by our plastic power. From the same materials one man builds palaces, another hovels; one warehouses, another villas: bricks and mortar are mortar and bricks, until the architect can make them something else. Thus it is that in the same family, in the same circumstances, one man rears a stately edifice, whilst his brother, vacillating and incompetent, lives forever amid ruins: the block of granite which was an obstacle in the pathway of the weak, becomes a stepping-stone in the pathway of the strong.

Carlyle.

7038. CHARACTER, Similarity of. Thomas Carlyle, once passing along the Strand, London, said he would like to stop the stream of people and ask every one his history. After a little he said, "No, I will not stop them; for if I did I should find that they were like a flock of sheep following in the track of one another."

7039. CHARACTER, Sternness of. There were many Christian men in Wittenberg who said to Martin Luther, "You don't mean that you are going to hang up those on the church door?" Said Luther: "They are true; they assail damning error; my Fatherland is bowing down to Antichrist." "Pause," said the men who would stand well with everybody. "Is not this zeal without knowledge? Think how you will scandalize the University; how you will drive off men who would follow you in a more discreet course." "Avaunt!" said the Reformer. "The people are perishing in ignorance. The crowds of the common people who come into the city to market will read these words. Yours is not discretion, but cowardice." He did the deed; and, as the result of that act, Europe received the Protestant Reformation, and the night of the Middle Ages was ended.

Guest.

7040. CHARACTER, Successful. The great things of this world have been accomplished by individuals. Vast social reformations have originated in individual souls. Truths that now sway the world were first proclaimed by individual lips. Great thoughts that now are the axioms of humanity proceeded from the centre of individual hearts. No warlike host delivered the children of Israel from the bondage of Egypt, but one man—Moses. No senate of statesmen raised Israel to a pitch of greatness that proclaimed a theocratic nation to the world, but one man—David. No school of divines gave to England the Bible in the mother tongue, but one man—Wycliffe. No learned society discovered America, but one man—Columbus. No association of science revealed the clue to interpret the laws of the universe, but one man—Galileo. No parliament saved English liberties, but one man—Pym. No assembly of theologians wrote the book which, next to the Bible, has had the most potent influence on the English language and on English hearts, but one man—John Bunyan. No confederate nations rescued Scotland from her distracted councils, from her political and ecclesiastical enemies, but one man—Knox. No chambers of commerce taught Europe to abolish the restrictions of trade, but one man—Richard Cobden. Doubtless these men found their coadjutors; but all through the ages God has put immense honor upon individuals.

7041. CHARITIES, Collecting. When Dr. Goodall was collecting for missionary purposes, he entered the counting-room of a wealthy merchant; who, as he entered the door, said abruptly, "Humph! A beggar, I suppose." "No," said Dr. Goodall, buoyantly, nothing daunted, "not a beggar, but a collector; I am informed you have some of my Lord's money in your hands, and I have come to collect a portion of the interest." "Nothing for you," was the surly reply. "Very well. I will go and tell your Master what you say. He is very patient and long-suffering," and left him. The next morning he received two hundred dollars from the merchant.

7042. CHARITIES, Deposits. A religious man says, "I took a church envelope, and opening my pocket-book I put into it some money, and placed the whole in another partition of the purse; and I thought to myself, I have as much money as before. On the following Sunday the envelope and its contents were deposited in the basket; and a voice whispered, 'You have as much money as ever, but a part is in a different place.'"

7043. CHARITIES, Small. An English lad proposed to put a penny in the box for missions. His sister rallied him on the uselessness of so small a gift, and said, "It would never be noticed among the large sums given by others. He persisted, however, and the tellers reported a collection of £6, 5s. and 1d. The boy whispered to his sister, "Hear that; that's my penny; you said it was so little it would never be noticed, and the gentleman has told the whole congregation." The most famous gift ever made was two mites. The omniscient God is a perfect accountant.

cut a shoe out of it." "And his ears," said a fourth, "all dragged and bleeding." "No doubt," said a fifth, "he has been hanged for thieving." And Jesus heard them, and looking down compassionately on the dead creature, he said, "Pearls are not equal to the whiteness of his teeth." Then the people turned to him with amazement, and said among themselves, "Who is this? This must be Jesus of Nazareth, for only he could find something to pity and approve even in a dead dog." And, being ashamed, they bowed their heads before him, and went each on his way. Anon.

7045. CHARITY, Compulsory. A bishop, named Troilus, was visiting John of Alexandria, famous for his charities. The latter took his guest to visit some poor people for whom he had erected some huts. While there John said, "I see you have some money with you—many pounds, if I mistake not; distribute it among these my poor." The bishop could not refuse, so his gold was emptied into the pockets of the poor beggars. Now he had previously found an elegantly chased silver drinking-cup in town, and had set his heart upon it. The price of it was thirty pounds, and the money he had unwillingly given to the beggars he had set apart for that purchase. After parting with his money he was so chagrined and disappointed that he fell into a fever. Not seeing him for some days, John sent for him and learned of his illness. Suspecting the cause, he took thirty pounds, and going to the sick man, said, "I borrowed of you thirty pounds, the other day, for my poor; if you are so disposed, I will at once repay the sum." At once the fever vanished, and the sorely vexed bishop jumped from his bed, ready to accept the patriarch's invitation to dine with him. After dinner Bishop Troilus fell asleep and thought himself in a land of wonderful beauty, and there he beheld a mansion of unearthly glory, over the door of which was inscribed "THE ETERNAL MANSION AND PLACE OF REPOSE OF TROILUS, THE BISHOP." At this he was greatly delighted. Just then a glorious One, with many white robed attendants, came by, and when he had read the title he said, "Not so; change the inscription." Then the writing was changed by the attendants, and in its place was inscribed, "THE ETERNAL MANSION AND PLACE OF REPOSE OF JOHN, ARCHBISHOP OF ALEXANDRIA, PURCHASED FOR THIRTY POUNDS." By this it appeared that Troilus had sold his mansion as Judas sold his Master.

7046. CHARITY, Immortal. A poor widow in Christ's time entered the temple and cast into the treasury the insignificant sum of two mites, equal to four mills, or less than half a cent. It was all she possessed. It attracted the attention of Christ, who graded this trifling charity according to the divine standard, and immortalized the giver of two mites. To his disciples he said, "Verily I say unto you, that this poor widow hath cast more in than all they which have cast into the treasury; for all they did cast in of their abundance, but she of her want did cast in all that she had, even all her living," Mark 12: 43.

7047. CHARITY, Legend of. Marcian, a priest of the church of Constantinople, was on his way to participate in the dedication of the church of St. Anastasia, which he had built, when he was accosted by a very ragged and importunate beggar. He found he had no money, and quickly slipping off his tunic, gave it to the emaciated pauper. This left him without a nether garment, which he thought to conceal by drawing his priestly robes closely about him. The church was crowded; the Emperor Leo, the Empress, and many senators, being present. Marcian was called to the conspicuous service of celebrating the Holy Sacrament. Fearing exposure he began. His robes parted, and all saw beneath them a garment of burnished gold, which flashed brilliantly as he moved. When the service was ended, the patriarch, Gennadius, rebuked him for wearing a garment more splendid than the Emperor's. Marcian denied having worn such a garment. Gennadius tore open his vestments and discovered that he had on no garment save his priestly garb. So glorious is the garment of charity.

7048. CHARITY, Pagan. It is written of Plato that, when he did give to a poor profligate wretch, his friends very much wondered that Plato, the great divine philosopher, should take pity on such a wretched miscreant; but he, like himself, in such misty days as those were, answered, "I show mercy to the man, not because he is wicked, but because he is a man of my own nature." His answer was warrantable; for, if we consider our first parents, we shall find ourselves bound by the same obligation to do good unto all men. "There is neither Jew nor Greek, bond nor free, neither male nor female, in Christ Jesus." Salter.

7049. CHARITY, Present Duty of. Two collectors called upon a rich merchant at his office to solicit a contribution to the missionary society. Their application was received courteously, and the gentleman subscribed twenty-five dollars. Encouraged by this success, the collectors asked permission to present their book to some of the clerks in the counting-house and warehouse. Whilst thus engaged, the postman entered with letters for the merchant. Amongst other items of intelligence was information of a vessel wrecked at sea with a valuable cargo, uninsured, involving a loss of several thousand dollars. The merchant was evidently affected by the bad news he had received, but seeing the missionary collectors retiring from the premises, he called them, and said: "Gentlemen, I am sorry to trouble you, but since you left my office, I have received intelligence of the loss of one of my ships at sea, with a valuable cargo, uninsured, and I am consequently poorer by several thousand dollars than I thought I was; I must therefore ask permission to alter the figure which I wrote in your collecting book." The collectors handed their book to the merchant, when, to their utter astonishment, he altered his contribution to one hundred dollars. When they inquired if he had not made a mistake, he replied, "No, gentlemen, I wished to alter my contribution to a higher figure since I heard of my heavy loss, for I doubt whether I have been giving to the cause of God in time past as much as I ought to have done. At all events, I am determined to give more liberally in the future, and that without delay, lest more of my property should be swallowed up in the sea as a just punishment for my past unfaithfulness."

7050. CHARITY, Private. Mrs. Judson, in an account of the first Burman convert, says, "I was reading with him Christ's sermon on the mount. He was deeply impressed, and unusually solemn. 'These words,' said he, 'take hold on my very heart; they make me tremble. Here God commands us to do everything that is good in secret, not to be seen of men. How unlike our religion is this! When Burmans make offerings at the pagodas, they make a great noise with drums and musical instruments, that others may see how good they are; but this religion makes the mind fear God; it makes it, of its own accord, fear sin.'"

7051. CHARITY, Providing for. Bishop Zosimus bade his deacon, John, give two coins to a poor man who asked an alms. He replied, "Our purse is empty." "Go and sell thy cloak and give to him that needeth," was the bishop's reply. Now John was reluctant to do this, for it was a new one, just bought. Then the bishop took off his own cloak, and handing it to him, bade him go and sell it. As the deacon returned, having executed his commission and relieved the beggar, a young man came in and gave the bishop a heavy purse of gold. He rebuked John for his little faith.

7052. CHARITY, Recompense of. During the retreat of Alfred the Great, at Athelney, in Somersetshire, after the defeat of his forces by the Danes, a beggar came to his castle there, and requested alms. When his queen informed him that they had only one small loaf remaining, which was insufficient for themselves and their friends, who were gone abroad in quest of food, though with little hopes of success, the king replied, "Give the poor Christian one half of the loaf. He who could feed the 5,000 men with five loaves and two small fishes can certainly make that half of the loaf suffice for more than our necessities." Accordingly, the poor man was relieved, and this noble act of charity was soon recompensed by a providential store of fresh provisions, with which his people returned. Percy.

7053. CHARITY, Restraint of. A monk asked Pambo, "How is it that the divine spirit never allows me to be charitable?" "Don't say the divine spirit," said the abbot indignantly; "say I don't want to be charitable."

7054. CHARITY, Rewarded. It was a time of great scarcity, almost famine, and prices were so high that Falk did not know how he was to get bread for his children, when a poor boy came into the Sunday-school on crutches, and said weeping, "No one pities me. The dogs have often fallen on me and bitten me. Dear sir, for Christ's sake, pity me, and let me have some rest. Put me in a workshop—I will be a tailor, or anything you like. Only take me in.” “Dear children,” said Falk, “the times are hard, but I will send none of you away; and I will take the stranger from afar off in. And I tell you—and now think of it—blessings will flow richly in upon our house; and God, who has led Ludwig Minner over the Thuringian forest in snow and rain, has not led him in vain to us, and he will provide bread, not only for him, but for us all.” And before the next Sunday a tailor had taken Minner into his workshop, and the Prince of Rudolstadt had sent a donation of five hundred crowns.

P. B. Power.

7055. CHARITY, Unequal. A poor widow lady, liberal in proportion to her means to the cause of religion, unexpectedly succeeded to a large fortune, but where she had formerly given a guinea, she now gave but a shilling. Her minister felt it his duty to expostulate with her, and remind her of her former generosity when her means were so circumscribed. “Ah! sir,” she replied, “then I had the shilling means, but the guinea heart; now I have the guinea means, but only the shilling heart. Then I received from my Heavenly Father’s hand, day by day, my daily bread, and I had enough and to spare; now I have to look to my ample income, but I live in constant apprehension that I may come to want!”

Moister.

7056. CHARITY, Valuing. Melania visited Pambo, the hermit, in his wilderness, and found him plaiting mats. She presented him with a silver vessel of great value. The monk never looked up from his work but said, “Here, stewards, take and sell it for the good of the brotherhood.” Melania stood before him, expecting some attention after so liberal a gift, but Pambo took no notice of her. She said, “Do you know, father, what is the value of my present?” “He to whom it was offered needs not that you should tell him,” answered the abbot. At another time a man brought him money to be distributed in alms, and directed him to “count it.” Pambo replied, “God does not ask how much, but how. It is not the amount, but the will with which it is given.”

7057. CHASTISEMENTS, Divine. As it concerns us to observe when the creatures become corrosives, so it does also to improve this corroding dispensation. Let it be a means to eat out the proud flesh of some sin or other, which is the procuring cause of all. The creatures frown; but doth not God frown on some sin, in their frowning? It would better become those who cry out against their superiors, to consider how the taking cold in the feet is often the cause of disorder in the head. The sins of people, wives, children, servants, are the cold vapors which cause a distemper. The headache of some above others, becomes a heart-ache to and from those below others. View sin, then, so as to be more abased for it, and creatures less in the way of disquiet. So the prophet teaches (Lam. 3: 40). The overtaking of sin with hue-and-cry is the best remedy under such maladies.

Crane.

7058. CHASTISEMENTS, Reception of. On one occasion a minister found it necessary to punish his little daughter. But she climbed into his lap, and, throwing her arms around his neck, said: “Papa, I do love you.” “Why do you love me, my child?” the father asked. “Because you try to make me good, papa.”

7059. CHASTISEMENTS, Test of. All is well as long as the sun shines and the fair breath of heaven gently wafts us to our own purposes. But if you will try the excellency and feel the work of faith, place the man in a persecution; let him ride in a storm; let his bones be broken with sorrow, and his eyelids loosed with sickness; let his bread be dipped with tears, and all the daughters of music be brought low; let us come to sit upon the margin of our grave, and let a tyrant lean hard upon our fortunes and dwell upon our wrong; let the storm arise, and the keels toss till the cordage crack, or that all our hopes bulge under us, and descend into the hollowness of sad misfortunes.

Jeremy Taylor.

7060. CHEERFULNESS, Advantages of. Give us, O give us, the man who sings at his work! Be his occupation what it may, he is equal to any of those who follow the same pursuit in silent sullenness. He will do more in the same time—he will do it better—he will persevere longer. One is scarcely sensible of fatigue whilst he marches to music. The very stars are said to make harmony as they revolve in their spheres. Wondrous is the strength of cheerfulness, altogether past calculation its powers of endurance. Efforts, to be permanently useful, must be uniformly joyous—a spirit all sunshine—graceful from very gladness—beautiful because bright.

Carlyle.

7061. CHEERFULNESS a Blessing. Persons who are always innocently cheerful and good-humored are very useful in the world; they maintain peace and happiness, and spread a thankful temper amongst all who live around them.

Miss Tallbot.

7062. CHEERFULNESS, Cultivate. Be cheerful, no matter what reverses obstruct your pathway, or what plagues follow in your trail to annoy you. Ask yourself what is to be gained by looking or feeling sad when troubles throng around you, or how your condition is to be alleviated by abandoning yourself to despondency? If you are a young man, nature designed you “to be of good cheer;” and should you find your road to fortune, fame, or respectability, or any other boon to which your young heart aspires, a little thorny, consider it all for the best, and that these impediments are only thrown in your way to induce greater efforts and more patient endurance on your part. Far better spend a whole life in diligent, aye, cheerful and unremitting toil, though you never attain the pinnacle of your ambitious desires, than to turn back at the first appearance of misfortune, and allow despair to unnerve your energies, or sour your naturally sweet and cheerful disposition. If you are of the softer, fairer portion of humanity, be cheerful, though we know full well that most afflictions are sweet to you when compared with disappointment and neglect; yet let hope banish despair and ill-forebodings. Be cheerful; do not brood over fond hopes unrealized, until a chain, link after link, is fastened on each thought, and wound around the heart. Nature intended you to be the fountain-spring of cheerfulness and social life, and not the traveling monument of despair and melancholy.

Helps.

7063. CHEERFULNESS, Effects of. The poet Carpani inquired of Haydn, how it happened that his church music was always so cheerful. The great composer replied, "I cannot make it otherwise. I write according to the thoughts I feel: when I think upon God, my heart is so full of joy that the notes dance and leap, as it were, from my pen: and since God has given me a cheerful heart, it will be pardoned me that I serve him with a cheerful spirit."

7064. CHEERFULNESS, Enforced. Emerson says: "Do not hang a dismal picture on your wall, and do not deal with sable and glooms in your conversation." Beecher follows: "Away with these fellows who go howling through life, and all the while passing for Birds of Paradise. He that cannot laugh and be gay, should look to himself. He should fast and pray until his face breaks forth into light." Talmage then takes up the strain: "Some people have an idea that they comfort the afflicted when they groan over them. Don't drive a hearse through a man's soul. When you bind up a broken bone of the soul, and you want splints, do not make them out of cast iron." Hume, the historian, said that the habit of looking at the bright side of things was better than an income of a thousand a year. It was said of Cromwell that hope shone like a fiery pillar in him when it had gone out in all others.

S. S. Journal.

7065. CHEERFULNESS, Habit of. When Gœthe says that in every human condition foes lie in wait for us, "invincible only by cheerfulness and equanimity," he does not mean that we can, at all times be really cheerful, or at a moment's notice; but that the endeavor to look at the better side of things will produce the habit, and that this habit is the surest safeguard against the danger of sudden evils.

Hunt.

7066. CHEERFULNESS, Reason for. Columbanus once said, "Deicolus, why art thou always smiling?" "Because no one can take my God from me," he replied.

7067. CHEMISTRY, Utility of. The transformations of chemistry, by which we are enabled to convert the most apparently useless materials into important objects in the arts, are opening up to us every day sources of wealth and convenience of which former ages had no idea, and which have been pure gifts of science to man. Every department of art has felt their influence, and new instances are continually starting forth of the unlimited resources which this wonderful science develops in the most sterile parts of nature. Not to mention the impulse which its progress has given to a host of other sciences, which will come more particularly under consideration in another part of this discourse, what strange and unexpected results has it not brought to light in its application to some of the most common objects! Who, for instance, would have conceived that linen rags were capable of producing more than their own weight of sugar, by the simple agency of one of the cheapest and most abundant acids? that dry bones could be a magazine of nutriment, capable of preservation for years, and ready to yield up their sustenance in the form best adapted to the support of life, on the application of that powerful agent, steam, which enters so largely into all our processes, or of an acid at once cheap and durable? that sawdust itself is susceptible of conversion into a substance bearing no remote analogy to bread, and though certainly less palatable than that of flour, yet no way disagreeable, and both wholesome and digestible, as well as highly nutritive? What economy in all processes where chemical agents are employed, is introduced by the exact knowledge of the proportions in which natural elements unite, and their power of displacing each other! What perfection in all the arts where fire is employed, either in its more violent applications—as, for instance, in the smelting of metals by the introduction of well adapted fluxes, whereby we obtain the whole produce of the ore in its purest state—or in its milder forms, as in sugar refining,—the whole modern practice of which depends on a curious and delicate remark of a late eminent scientific chemist on the nice adjustment of temperature at which the crystallization of syrup takes place; and a thousand other arts which it would be tedious to enumerate! Herschel.

7068. CHILD, Character in the. Little snapping-turtles snap, so the great naturalist tells us, before they are out of the egg-shell. I am satisfied that, much higher up in the scale of life, character is distinctly shown as the age of two or three months. Holmes.

7070. CHILD, A Heaven-bound. The train was going west, and the time was evening. At a station a little girl about eight years old came aboard, carrying a little budget under her arm. She came into the car and deliberately took a seat. She then commenced an eager scrutiny of faces; but all were strange to her. She appeared weary, and placing her budget for a pillow, she prepared to try to secure a little sleep. Soon the conductor came along collecting tickets and fare. Observing him, she asked if she might lie there. The gentlemanly conductor replied that she might, and then kindly asked for her ticket. She informed him that she had none, when the following conversation ensued. Said the conductor, "Where are you going?" she answered, "I am going to heaven." He asked again, "Who pays your fare?" She then said, "Mister, does this railroad lead to heaven, and does Jesus travel on it?" He answered, "I think not. Why did you think so?" "Why, sir, before my ma died she used to sing to me of a heavenly railroad; and you look so nice, and talk so kind, I thought this was the road. My ma used to sing of Jesus on the heavenly railroad, and that he paid the fare for everybody, and that the train stopped at every station to take people on board; but my ma don't sing to me any more. Nobody sings to me now, and I thought I would take the cars and go to ma. Mister, do you sing to your little girl about heaven, you have a little girl, haven't you?" He replied, "No, my little dear, I have no little girl now. I had one once, but she died some time ago, and went to heaven." Again she asked, "Did she go over this railroad; and are you going to see her now?" By this time every person in the coach was upon his feet, and most of them were weeping. An attempt to describe what I witnessed is almost futile. Some said, "God bless the little girl!" Hearing some person say that she was an angel, the little girl earnestly replied, "Yes, my ma used to say that I would be an angel some time." Addressing herself once more to the conductor, she asked him, "Do you love Jesus? I do, and if you love him he will let you ride to heaven on his railroad. I am going there, and I wish you would go with me. I know Jesus will let me into heaven, when I get there, and will let you in too, and everybody who will ride on his railroad—yes, all these people. Wouldn't you like to see heaven, and Jesus, and your little girl?" These words, so innocently and pathetically uttered, brought a great gush of tears from all eyes, but most profusely from the eyes of the conductor. Some who were traveling on the heavenly railroad shouted aloud for joy. She now asked the conductor, "Mister, may I lie here until we get to heaven?" He answered, "Yes, dear, yes." She then asked, "Will you wake me up then, so that I might see my ma, your little girl, and Jesus? for I do so want to see them all." The answer came in broken accents, but in words very tenderly spoken, "Yes, dear angel, yes. God bless you!" "Amen!" was sobbed by more than a score of voices. Turning her eyes again upon the conductor she interrogated him again. "What shall I tell your little girl when I see her? Shall I say to her that I saw her pa on Jesus' railroad? Shall I?" This brought a fresh flood of tears from all present, and the conductor knelt by her side, and embracing her, wept the reply he could not utter. At this juncture the brakeman called out, "H—s." The conductor arose, and requested him to attend to his (the conductor's) duty at the station, for he was engaged. That was a precious place. I thank God that I was witness to this scene; but I was sorry that at this point I was obliged to leave the train. Ch. Expositor.

7071. CHILD, A Martyred. The Proconsul Anulinus, of Carthage, A. D. 304, examining Felix and Victoria on the charge of being Christians, they boldly declared their observance of the Lord's day and readiness to die for Christ. He thought to prevail easily with a little boy, Hilarion by name. To the proconsul's inquiry if he had been present at the meetings of the Christians, he answered, "I am a Christian; I have been at the meeting, and it was of my own choice, not of compulsion." He then threatened him with some childish punishment. The boy only laughed at it. The proconsul then said, "I will cut off your nose and ears." Hilarion answered, "You may do it, but I am a Christian still." Then he was sentenced to be taken to the prison, hearing which, he cried, "God be thanked!" In this prison he was kept till he died of starvation, and went to heaven to receive the victor's palm.

7072. CHILDHOOD, Conversion in. What a study of the Christian life a garden is! Take the matter of transplantation. Things transplanted late, when well grown, don't do well. You take an old sinner of a tomato-plant, for instance, who has been growing rank and weak in the sinful hot-bed, and put him out in the rich but wholesome soil of the garden. He goes down like a rag-baby in a shower. I had some that blossomed in their iniquity. Changed into the garden-soil—the Christian soil, if I may say so—they wilted flat, and grew as sick as death and fever and ague. But a young plant taken early from the Sunday-school does better; and most hardy and thrifty of all are those plants that spring from the seed, and grow to maturity where they stand, never needing to be transplanted into the church. Of course, the old tomatoes revive, and go on, after a time, famously, bearing loads of fruit. But they have a hard struggle and a long one.

7073. CHILDHOOD, Devotion in. It is of the last importance to season the passions of a child with devotion, which seldom dies in a mind that has received an early tincture of it. Though it may seem extinguished for a while by the cares of the world, the heats of youth, or the allurements of vice, it generally breaks out and discovers itself again as soon as discretion, consideration, age, or misfortunes have brought the man to himself. The fire may be covered and overlaid, but cannot be entirely quenched and smothered. Addison.

7074. CHILDHOOD, Haste with. A blacksmith, when he pulled his iron out of the fire, used to call out to his son, "Quick! quick! Now or never!" By this means he taught his son to strike the iron when it was hot, well knowing that if he once let it get cold, he should not be able to form it into a shoe. Now the disposition of a young person is somewhat like the hot iron; it can be easily bent into a proper form by education; but the mind of an aged person is like cold iron, not very easily altered—indeed, if it has been altogether neglected, it is next to impossible to form it aright.

Anon.

7075. CHILDHOOD, Indulgence in. Young people who have been habitually gratified in all their desires, will not only more indulge in capricious desires, but will infallibly take it more amiss when the feelings or happiness of others require that they should be thwarted, than those who have been practically trained to the habit of subduing and restraining them, and consequently will, in general, sacrifice the happiness of others to their own selfish indulgence. To what else is the selfishness of princes and other great people to be attributed? It is in vain to think of cultivating principles of generosity and beneficence by mere exhortation and reasoning. Nothing but the practical habit of overcoming our own selfishness, and of familiarly encountering privations and discomfort on account of others, will ever enable us to do it when required. And therefore I am firmly persuaded that indulgence infallibly produces selfishness and hardness of heart, and that nothing but a pretty severe discipline and control can lay the foundation of a magnanimous character.

Lord Jeffrey.

7076. CHILDHOOD, Memories of. The impressions of childhood are proverbially the most indelible. The mind of man is like one of those ancient manuscripts that are covered with successive layers of writing, of which the last alone is visible; but the application of a chemical test reveals all the rest. In like manner, the human mind is covered with innumerable layers of imperishable memories. We speak of forgetfulness; but, in truth, we forget nothing—at least, in the sense of its passing entirely from the mind. Thus we find in the case of very old people, that, while the events of the present make scarcely any impression at all on the memory, the reminiscences of childhood come trooping back in all the vivid freshness of youth.

Anon.

7077. CHILDREN, Benefit of. I am fond of children. I think them the poetry of the world, the fresh flowers of our hearths and homes; little conjurors, with their "natural magic," evoking by their spells what delights and enriches all ranks, and equalizes the different classes of society. Often as they bring with them anxieties and cares, and live to occasion sorrow and grief, we should get on very badly without them. Only think, if there was never anything anywhere to be seen, but great grown-up men and women! How we should long for the sight of a little child! Every infant comes into the world like a delegated prophet, the harbinger and herald of good-tidings, whose office it is "to turn the hearts of the fathers to the children," and to draw "the disobedient to the wisdom of the just." A child softens and purifies the heart, warming and melting it by its gentle presence; it enriches the soul by new feelings, and awakens within it what is favorable to virtue. It is a beam of light, a fountain of love, a teacher whose lessons few can resist. Infants recall us from much that engenders and encourages selfishness, that freezes the affections, roughens the manners, indurates the heart: they brighten the home, deepen love, invigorate exertion, infuse courage, and vivify and sustain the charities of life. It would be a terrible world, I do think, if it was not embellished by little children!

7078. CHILDREN, Biblical. Children are represented as "Stars," Gen. 37: 9. Arrows in the hands of a mighty man, Ps. 127, 4. A Chinese proverb says, "When a son is born into a family, a bow and arrow are hung up at the gate." "Olive plants" Ps. 128: 3, the emblem of peace, richness and prosperity. Corner stones polished after the similitude of a palace, Ps. 144: 12, the bonds of union and upholders of harmony. Lambs, John 21: 15. The Hebrew idiom for childhood is taken from building a house, from which the Hebrew word for son is derived, Deut. 25: 9; Ruth 4: 11. Prov. 23: 15—"My son, if thine heart be wise, mine heart shall rejoice, even mine." Swinnock says, "Lord, let thy blessing so accompany my endeavors, that all my sons may be Benaiahs (the Lord's building), then will they be all Abners (their father's light); and that all my daughters may be Bethuels (the Lord's daughters), and then will they be all Abigail's (their father's joy)."

7079. CHILDREN, Chance for the. A writer in a recent California paper says: It was only twenty-five years ago—1850—that the following incident occurred at Downieville, in Sierra County: The country was full of men engaged in mining, and Downieville was a busy camp. There had been built for public uses a large building, sometimes used as a theatre and sometimes for the purposes of a public hall. The surrounding gulches were filled with men rude of manners, but full of tender memories, and there was then but a score of women in the county, and not a baby, so far as was generally known, in the circuit of a hundred miles. It was the Fourth of July, and Downieville celebrated. The stars and stripes floated from a peeled and lofty pine, and the chorus of the anvil had re-echoed through the hills. The house was crowded with the miners; poet, reader and orator had performed their parts, and the recently organized brass band was giving in boisterous resonance some popular national anthem, when suddenly there burst out the feeble wail of an infant—first low, then swelling out in all the defiant strength of baby lungs. The band put forth its loudest strains: the baby, excited to renewed exertion, redoubled its vigor. It was nip and tuck between band and baby. The young mother did her best to divert the child and hush him, when from the audience there uprose a brawny miner, and shaking his fist at the music, cried, "Hush that infernal band and give the baby a chance!" The band stopped its playing, and never did stalwart men listen to sweeter music than those exiles from home and women as they drank in the tones of the wailing child

There were tears in many an eye. The child was hushed upon its mother's breast, and at the word there went up three rousing cheers for the first baby of the Northern Sierras. Looking over the figures of the school census we find that there are now 280,000 children in California under fifteen years of age, and the Downieville baby is only twenty-five years old. This is a good showing for a young State. Give the babies a chance, and we can get on without any further Eastern emigration.

7080. CHILDREN, Christ and the. The Lord Jesus showed in many ways the tender care he felt for children. (1.) He took them in his arms and blessed them, Mark 10: 13-16, expressing his displeasure at the disciples who would have kept them from him. (2.) He twice made them the patterns of humility and docility, Matt. 18: 2, 3; Luke 18: 17. (3.) He spoke of them as being under the guardian care of the angels in heaven, Matt. 18: 10. (4.) He received the hosannas of the children on his entry into Jerusalem, Matt. 21: 15, 16. Bowes.

7081. CHILDREN, Christianity and. The Gospel alone opens its warm bosom to the young. Christianity alone is the nurse of childhood. Atheism looks on them as on a level with the brutes. Deism or skepticism leaves them to every random influence, lest they catch a bias. The Romans exposed their infants. Barbarians and ancient tribes offered them as burnt sacrifices to Moloch. Mahometanism holds mothers and infants as equally of an inferior caste. Hindooism forgets the infant she bears, and leaves it to perish on the banks of the Ganges. The Chinese are notorious as infanticides. Christianity alone contemplates them as immortal creatures, and prescribes for their tuition for heaven. And the nearer the time that the rising of the Sun of Righteousness approached, the warmer and more intense did the interest of the Church show itself in regard to the young. Moses gave directions on the subject. Joshua and Abraham commanded their households after them; David declared how the young were to purify their way; and Solomon distinctly enjoined, "Remember thy Creator in the days of thy youth;" but it was reserved for him who spake as never man spake, to press that sentence, "Suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not, for of such is the kingdom of heaven." The temple Juggernaut presents a grave; the mosque, contempt; infidelity, neglect for children. The bosom of the Son of God alone finds them a nursery and a home. Salter.

7082. CHILDREN, Controlling. In order to form the minds of children, the first thing to be done is to conquer their will. To inform the understanding is a work of time, and must, with children, proceed by slow degrees, as they are able to bear it; but the subjecting the will must be done at once, and the sooner the better; for, by neglecting timely correction, they will contract a stubbornness and obstinacy which are hardly ever conquered, and not without using such severity as would be as painful to me as the child. In the esteem of the world they pass for kind and indulgent, whom I call cruel, parents, who permit their children to get habits which they know must afterwards be broken. Mrs. S. Wesley.

7083. CHILDREN, Disobedient. 2 Sam. 18: 18, Absalom's pillar. Travelers say the place is taken notice of to this day; and it is common for passengers to throw a stone to this heap, with words to this purpose: "Cursed be the memory of wicked Absalom, and cursed forever be all wicked children, that rise up in rebellion against their parents." Henry.

7084. CHILDREN, Duties of. As letters graven in the body of a tree, they grow up with the tree, and the fruit of the tree grows up with the tree, and therefore the twigs break not with the greatness of the weight of it, because they grow up together. So plant good things in those that are young, inure them to know good things, to hate ill ways, plant in them blessed desires, and inure them to holy exercises and good duties, that good exercise may grow up with them, as the fruit with the tree. Sibbes.

7085. CHILDREN, Effort for the. A mother who had brought up a large family of children, all of whom had become members of the Christian fold, was asked what means she had used with so much success to win them to the cross. She replied: "I have always felt that if they were not converted before they became seven or eight years of age they would probably be lost, and when they have approached that age I have been in an agony lest they should pass it unconverted. I have gone to the Lord in my anguish, and he has not turned away my prayers, nor his mercy from me."

7086. CHILDREN, First Work of. I think a good deal of all the work done in Sabbath-school is lost, because we try to teach God's truth to children before their hearts have been given to Christ. If they can only be induced to open their hearts, their minds will be illuminated by the Divine truth. I have taught in the Sunday-school, and it was a good while before I knew this. There was a Sunday-school superintendent who got discouraged, and said he was going to give up the school. "I'll tell you what you want," said a wise brother who went to him; "seek and find Jesus yourself, and you will have the strength and see the way to carry on your work acceptably in your sight and in the sight of God." And he did find Jesus and courage. Moody.

7087. CHILDREN, Gospel and. Rev. John Williams had a grand celebration of his Sunday-school children at Raiatea, with six hundred dressed in European costume, in procession, carrying banners with the inscriptions, "What a blessing is the gospel!" "Had it not been for the gospel we should have been destroyed as soon as we were born." "Suffer little children to come unto me." The old people who saw them lamented that they had murdered their own children. The slaughter of infants throughout heathendom is the general practice. The gospel protects life, and cherishes the weak and helpless.

7088. CHILDREN, Imagination of. Although—like ants which throw off their wings in becoming workers—most grown people have discarded their imagination before entering on actual life, the little ones still have it; and if there are no flowers, they will quickly make them. If the surrounding atmosphere be warm and genial, wakeful life will be a ceaseless joy: invention will never be exhausted, and the materials of pastime will never be far to seek; a few corks will improvise a navy, and sticks and stones a palace.

Dr. J. Hamilton.

7089. CHILDREN, Love of. During a famine in Germany, a family was driven to the verge of starvation. The father proposed that one of the children should be sold and food provided for those which remained. When at last the mother consented, the question arose which of the four should be selected. The eldest, the first-born, could not be spared; the second looked like the mother, the other resembled its father, and the youngest was the child of their old age—they could spare none. Rather than part with any, they decided to perish with hunger. Yet God so loved the world that he gave his only-begotten son to die for his enemies.

7090. CHILDREN, Martyred. Bassa, a Christian mother, early instructed her three boys to love Christ. Their pagan father accused them to the prefect of Edessa, thinking that the boys would soon be induced to sacrifice to idols, and the constancy of the mother would fail. Theognis, the eldest, was hung up by the wrists and ankles, and his body raked and torn with sharp irons, but he would not give up Christ. The executioners gashed his body till he became insensible, and then cast him, mangled and dead, upon the sand. Agapius, a little boy of great beauty, was next tortured. With the shrill voice of a child, he cried, "King Christ! I will not deny thee! Dear brother, I will not deny thee, but be brave as thou wast." The executioners peeled the skin from his head to his breast, and he died. The youngest was then brought, and asked his name. He answered, "My mother calls me Pistus, and says I must be what I am called—Faithful." Without other cruelty, his head was struck off. Children can be faithful to Christ, even unto death.

7091. CHILDREN, Mother's Prayers for her. A mother whose children were remarkable examples of early piety, was asked the secret of her success. She answered, "While my children were infants on my lap, as I washed them, I raised my heart to God, that he would wash them in that blood which cleanseth from all sin; as I clothed them in the morning, I asked my Heavenly Father to clothe them with the robe of Christ's righteousness; as I provided them food, I prayed that God would feed their souls with the bread of heaven, and give them to drink of the water of life. When I have prepared them for the house of God, I have pleaded that their bodies might be fit temples for the Holy Ghost to dwell in. When they left me for the week-day school, I followed their infant footsteps with a prayer, that their path through life might be like that of the just, which shineth more and more unto the perfect day. And as I committed them to the rest of the night, the silent breathing of my soul has been, that their Heavenly Father would take them to his embrace, and fold them in his paternal arms."

7092. CHILDREN, Mourning for, Prohibited. When children die, no libations nor sacrifices are made for them, nor any other of those ceremonies which are wont to be performed for the dead. For infants have no part of earth or earthly affections. Nor do we hover or tarry about their sepulchres or monuments, or sit by when their dead bodies are exposed. The laws of our country forbid this, and teach us that it is an impious thing to lament for those whose souls pass immediately into a better and more divine state.

Plutarch.

7093. CHILDREN, Neglect of. Socrates used to say that if he could get up to the highest place in Athens, he would lift up his voice and proclaim, "What mean ye, fellow-citizens, that ye turn every stone to scrape wealth together, and take so little care of your children, to whom, one day, ye must relinquish it all?"

7094. CHILDREN, Power of. In the early French revolution the school-boys of Bourges formed themselves into a Band of Hope. They wore a uniform, and were taught drill. On their holidays, their flag was unfurled, displaying in shining letters the sentence, "Tremblez, Tyrans, Nous grandirons!" (Tremble, Tyrants, we shall grow up!) Without any charge of spurious enthusiasm, we may, in imagination, hear the shouts of confidence and courage, uttered by the young Christians of the future, as they say, "Tremble, O enemy, we are growing up for God!" S. R. Pattison.

7095. CHILDREN, Power of. Themistocles observing his son's tyranny over his mother, said this boy had more power than all the Greeks, for the Athenians governed Greece, he the Athenians, his wife him, and his son his wife.

7096. CHILDREN, Precaution with. When we see a servant bearing a lighted torch we forbid him to carry it into places where there is straw, hay or such combustible matter, for fear when he least thinks of it a spark should fall and set fire to the whole house. Let us use the same precaution with our children, and not carry their eyes to places of frivolity and amusement. If vain and wicked persons dwell near, us let us forbid our children to look upon them, or have any conversation or commerce with them; lest some spark falling into their souls should cause a general conflagration, and an irreparable damage.

Chrysostom.

7097. CHILDREN, Sacrifice of. An eminent historian, speaking of that diabolical custom which so long prevailed amongst the old Carthaginians, of offering their children to a detestable idol (which was formed in such a manner, that an infant put into its hands, which were stretched out to receive it, would immediately fall into a gulf of fire), adds a circumstance, which one cannot mention without horror: "The mothers, who, with their own hands, presented the little innocents, thought it an unfortunate omen that the victim should be offered weeping; and, therefore, used a great many fond artifices to divert it, that, soothed by the kisses and caresses of a parent, it might smile in that dreadful moment in which it was to be given up to the idol." Pardon me, my friends; such is your concern for the present ease and prosperity of your children, while their souls are neglected—a fond solicitude that they may pass smiling into the hands of the destroyer. Dr. Doddridge.

7098. CHILDREN, Teaching. A lady had asked Rev. Mr. Simeon if we ought always to be talking about religion? "No, no!" he answered, "let your speech be seasoned with salt; seasoned with salt, madam, not a whole mouthful. Nothing produces more fatal results than 'dinning' religion into a child; the 'whole mouthful' crammed into the child's mouth being simply rejected with disgust. Though, in dealing with the children, everything should be seasoned with the salt of true religion, yet we must remember that small vessels are soon filled, and he who is 'touched with the feeling of our infirmities,' certainly meant us to be touched with the infirmities of little children."

7099. CHILDREN, Thankfulness for. Lady Storman, mother of Lord Chief Justice Mansfield, being complimented on having the three finest sons in Scotland to be proud of, replied, "No, madam, I have much to be thankful for, but nothing to be proud of."

7100. CHILDREN, Training the. On the mantel-shelf of my grandmother's best parlor, among other marvels, was an apple in a phial. It quite filled up the body of the bottle, and my wondering inquiry was, "How could it have been got into its place?" By stealth I climbed a chair to see if the bottom would unscrew, or if there had been a join in the glass throughout the length of the phial. I was satisfied by careful observation that neither of these theories could be supported, and the apple remained to me an enigma and a mystery. Walking in the garden I saw a phial placed on a tree bearing within it a tiny apple, which was growing within the crystal; now I saw it all; the apple was put into the bottle while it was little, and it grew there. Just so must we catch the little men and women who swarm our streets—we call them boys and girls—and introduce them within the influence of the church, for alas! it is hard indeed to reach them when they have ripened in carelessness and sin.

Spurgeon.

7101. CHILDREN, Treatment of. Children should not be flattered, but they should be encouraged. They should not be so praised as to make them vain and proud, but they should be commended when they do well. The desire of praise should not be the principle from which they are taught to act, but they should feel that the approbation of parents is a desirable thing, and when they act so as to deserve that approbation, no injury is done them by their understanding it. He who always finds fault with a child; who is never satisfied with what he does; who scolds and frets and complains, let him do as he will, breaks his spirit, and soon destroys in the delicate texture of his soul all desire of doing well. The child in despair soon gives over every effort to please. He becomes sullen, morose, stupid, and indifferent to all the motives that can be presented to him, and becomes indifferent as to what he does—since all that he does meets with the same reception from the parent.

Barnes.

7102. CHILDREN, Uncontrolled. Prof. Webster was convicted of the murder of Dr. Parkman, of Boston, on circumstantial evidence. He confessed the crime; but excused it by saying, "I am irritable and passionate; a quick-handed and brisk violence of temper have been the besetting sins of my life. I was an only child, much indulged, and have never acquired the control over my temper, as I ought to have acquired early: and the consequence is all this."

7103. CHILDREN, Usefulness of. A little boy heard a passionate drunkard swearing at his horses, and asked, "Is that the way you pray, Mr. Raney?" It was the means of the conversion of the drunkard, which brought great happiness to his family.

7104. CHILDREN, Watching for us. When we leave our little children for a few days they watch impatiently for our return. They stand at the window and look down the road through which they expect us to come, and say, "Will papa and mamma never come home?" If they are on a visit and expect us to come for them, they watch and say, "O that papa and mamma would come." Many of us have children in our heavenly Father's house, who are eagerly watching for our coming. A dying child, after exhorting her friends to meet her in heaven, said, "I'll be watching for you."

7105. CHIVALRY, Knighthood of. After confession, a midnight vigil in a church, and the reception of the eucharist, the knight laid his sword on the altar, to signify his devotion to the Church and determination to lead a holy life. The sword was blessed, and girded upon the candidate, by the highest ecclesiastic present. Spurs were also bound on him, and he was smitten upon the cheek or shoulder, the last affront he was to bear unrequited. He then took an oath to protect the distressed, maintain right against might, and never by word or deed to stain his character as knight or Christian. His installation was then complete. If he violated his oath his spurs were chopped off, his sword broken, his escutcheon reversed, and some religious observances were added, during which each piece of armor was taken off, and cast from the recreant knight. To be a true knight was the highest ambition in the age of chivalry. Christianity has a long list of untitled knights.

7106. CHOICE, Christian. A legend represents that Irenæus, one of the fathers of the church, was placed between an idol and a cross and required to choose between them. To prefer the idol was to have official protection, and the honors of the prevailing heathenism conferred upon him. To prefer the cross was to renounce the world and to die for Christ. It required no time for deliberation. He chose the cross and was honored by suffering death upon it like his Divine Master, A. D. 202.

7107. CHOICE, Consider thy. Better it is, toward the right conduct of life, to consider what will be the end of a thing, than what is the beginning of it; for what promises fair at first may prove ill, and what seems at first a disadvantage, may prove very advantageous. Wells.

7108. CHOICE, Reasonable. A young lady, in a time of religious interest, sat down and wrote out all the reasons she could think of to help her to decide whom she would serve. She wrote, 1. "Reasons why I should serve the world." 2. "Reasons why I should serve the Lord." She was surprised that she could find no satisfactory reason for the first, and urgent ones for the last. She acted upon her reason, gave herself to God and was blest.

7109. CHOICE, Results of. A Hartford pastor exchanged with the chaplain of the Connecticut State Prison. As he arose in desk he saw among the prisoners a friend of his youth. Their eyes met, and they recognized each other. At the conclusion of the service he sought the man to learn his history. "We were boys," said the prisoner, "in the same neighborhood, we went to the same school, we sat on the same seat, and my prospects were as bright as yours. At fourteen you embraced religion; I chose the world and sin. You are now an honored minister of the gospel; and I, a wretched outcast from society, lost to hope, have been already in prison ten years, and sentenced for life."

7110. CHRIST, Abode of. Martin Luther said, "If any one knocks at the door of my breast and says, 'Who lives there?' my answer is, 'Jesus Christ lives here, not Martin Luther.'" This experience is enjoyed when the soul is united in a personal, conscious, ever-abiding union with Christ.

Dr. Foss.

7111. CHRIST, Accessibility of. John 6: 37—"Him that cometh unto me I will in no wise cast out." Recently rendered by Matthew of Erberg, in his Italian Bible, "I will by no means thrust him out of doors." Dr. A. Clarke regards the figure, as that of a poor man in deep distress and poverty, who comes to a nobleman's house for relief; he appears at the door, and the owner receives him and relieves him. The strong negative, "I will in no wise cast him out," is equal to the affirmative—"I will kindly and graciously receive him. Christ was born at an inn," says Bishop Hall, to prefigure his willingness to receive all comers. The cities of refuge were distributed over the land of Canaan, and made accessible to all, and kept with the gates open—clear types of Jesus, the strong refuge, ever ready to receive all needing shelter and protection.

7112. CHRIST, Advantage of the Invisibile. It is said when the Duke of Wellington, on one occasion, rode up to his retreating army, a soldier happened to see him first and cried out,

"Yonder is the Duke of Wellington; God bless him!" and the retreating army had courage to nerve itself afresh and went forward and drove the enemy. One has said that the Duke of Wellington was worth more at any time than five thousand men. So it would be if we had the Captain of our salvation in front, we would go forward. How gloriously would this church contend if Christ were visibly in front of them! But the army was sometimes without the Duke of Wellington. There was a place where he could not be. And if Christ were visibly present, he would be present at the same time, only at one church in one locality; it might be in Philadelphia, but what of the thousand other cities? But an unseen Saviour is at the head of the column everywhere. We know he is there. The Captain of our salvation is where two or three are gathered in his name to inspire; and to-day, in every city on the face of this globe, where the columns meet to march, his voice sounds "Onward!" in their ears. His very being unseen inspires hope, and strength and joy. To-day, I thank God, he is leading the hosts in Lapland, in Russia, in China, in Japan, in the torrid regions of Africa, in the islands of the sea, in the mountain-tops, and in the valleys. Oh! how many hearts feel the inspiring influence of his holy presence to-day. It is because he is invisible. "Blessed are they that have not seen and yet believe."

Bp. Simpson.

7113. CHRIST our All. "Do you know Jesus?" The question was put to a pious young wife, who, having been suddenly stricken down by typhus fever, lay sick unto death, and unconscious of every loving friend by whom she was surrounded. Her husband, to whom she had been married but two short years, had been vainly endeavoring to obtain some sign of recognition. In the agony of his grief he said, "Surely you know me, my darling Ellen? I am Charles, your husband; don't you remember?" "No," she replied, languidly opening her dying eyes; "no, I don't know you, My husband—why—I have no husband." "But you know Jesus, do you not?" inquired a friend, who sat weeping by the bedside. This seemed to touch a chord; and, almost in the very words of good Bishop Beveridge on his death-bed, she responded, whilst the radiance of the coming glory beamed on her brow, and a bright smile played upon her lips, "Jesus—Jesus—oh yes, I do know Jesus; why, he has long been my dearest friend! know Jesus? why he is my Saviour, he is close to me now, close here, quite close. Let me clasp the hand of one who talks to me of my Friend, my Brother." After a short illness of four days, she was called home to be with Christ.

7114. CHRIST, All-sufficiency of. The greater Cham is said to have a tree full of pearls hanging by clusters; but what is the great Cham's tree to Christ, our tree of life, who hath all variety and plenty of fruit upon him. The happinesses that come to believers by Christ are so many, that they cannot be numbered; so great, that they cannot be measured; so cop-ous, that they cannot be defined; so precious, that they cannot be valued: all which speaks out the fullness and all-sufficiency of Christ.

7115. CHRIST, Ascension of. Biblical. The high priest entering the Holy of Holies once every year, on the day of Atonement, Lev. xvi.; Heb. 9: 24-26. The Holy of Holies, where the symbol of Divine glory rested, typified heaven; and within that mysterious shrine the high priest, after he had made atonement for himself, for the sanctuary, and for the people, was to enter; and, dressed in the white linen robes common to the priesthood (not in the gorgeous robe of his high priesthood), was to sprinkle with blood before the mercy-seat seven times, taking with him also a censer full of burning coals, and sweet incense, beaten small. The ark carried up, with pomp and rejoicing, to Mount Zion, Ps. 24; 68: 18. Moses going up into the mount to receive the law, Deut. 10, and Elijah's translation to heaven, followed by the double portion of his spirit being given to his successor, have generally been acknowledged by the church as figures of Christ's ascension. Some add Samson's victoriously carrying up the gates of Gaza to the top of the hill, Judges 16: 3.

7116. CHRIST, Attachment to. In the time of the Marian persecution there was a woman who, being brought before bloody Bonner, then Bishop of London, upon the trial of religion, he threatened her that he would take away her husband from her. Saith she, "Christ is my husband." "I will take away thy child." "Christ," saith she, "is better to me than ten sons." "I will strip thee," saith he, "of all thy outward comforts." "Yea, but Christ is mine," saith she; "and you cannot strip me of him." O, the assurance that Christ was hers bore up her heart and quieted her spirit, under all. "You may take away my life," saith Basil, "but you cannot take away my comfort;—my head, but not my crown: yea," said he, "had I a thousand lives, I would lay them all down for my Saviour's sake, who hath done abundantly more for me."

7117. CHRIST, Attributes of. Christ is a rare jewel, but men know not his value; a sun which ever shines, but men perceive not his brightness, nor walk in his light. He is a garden full of sweets, a hive full of honey, a sun without a spot, a star ever bright, a fountain ever full, a brook which ever flows, a rose which ever blooms, a foundation which never yields, a guide who never errs, a friend who never forsakes. No mind can fully grasp his glory; his beauty, his worth, his importance, no tongue can fully declare. He is the source of all good, the fountain of every excellency, the mirror of perfection, the light of heaven, the wonder of earth, time's master-piece, and eternity's glory; the sun of bliss, the way of life, and life's fair way. "He is altogether lovely," says the saint; a morning without clouds, a day without night, a rose without a thorn; his lips drop like the honey-comb, his eyes beam tenderness. His heart gushes love.

The Christian is fed by his hands, carried in his heart, supported by his arm, nursed in his bosom, guided by his eye, instructed by his lips, warmed by his love; his wounds are his life, his smile the light of his path, the health of his soul, his rest and heaven below.

7118. CHRIST, Banner of. In the times of William Wallace, a daring freebooter infected the seaports of Scotland. In approaching a port he ran up a blood-red flag, and also unfurled the pirate's signal, a death's-head and crossbones, which spread general dismay. Wallace resolved to rid the seas of this cruel scourge. He fitted out a merchantman with rich lading, as if for a cruise, but filled the space between decks with armed men. The pirate gave chase, overhauled, and expected to make the rich prize an easy prey. Wallace's men waited the signal to spring upon the boarders, which they did, captured their leader, and hung him at the yard-arm. He burned the ship, and taking its crew in chains set sail for the city of Perth, flying the captured flag of the pirate at his peak. The people saw the dreaded emblem, and rang the bells of the town to give the alarm. As he neared the dock he ran up the Scotch flag above the pirate's emblem of blood and plunder. The story soon spread through the excited city of the capture of the pirate, and William Wallace, the hero of Scotland, was hailed as his country's deliverer. Christ encountered all the foes of man and conquered. His banner is over all.

7119. CHRIST, Birth of. The death of Christ is a great mystery; but his birth is even a greater. That he should live a human life at all, is stranger than that, so living, he should die a human death. I can scarce get past his cradle in my wondering, to wonder at his cross. The infant Jesus is, in some views, a greater marvel than Jesus with the purple robe and the crown of thorns.

7120. CHRIST, Blood of, a Mystery. A reader of the Bible was assailed by an infidel with such expressions as these: "That the blood of Christ can wash away sin is foolishness; I don't understand or believe it." The Bible student remarked, "You and Paul agree exactly." "How?" "Turn to the first chapter of Corinthians and read the eighteenth verse: 'For the preaching of the Cross is to them that perish foolishness; but unto us which are saved, it is the power of God.'"

7121. CHRIST, Blood of, Needed. A man dreamed that he died, and went up to an inclosure surrounding heaven, seeking an entrance. He found a gate on which was written, "Without holiness no man shall see the Lord!" "All right," said he; "I have that," and he was about entering when a man touched his shoulder, saying, "Stop! you think of entering through that gate?" "Certainly," said he; "I have holiness: I am no sinner." "But do you not remember that when we were boys, and were playing together, you once cheated me out of a marble?" "Yes, I believe I do." "There is one sin, then," said the man; "and since you have committed one sin, you cannot go in at that gate." At this the moralist was much distressed. While weeping at his exclusion and disappointment, he saw another gate, over which was written, "The blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth from all sin." "Thank God for that!" he cried, and immediately renounced his own righteousness, and sought admittance through the blood of Christ.

7122. CHRIST, Blood of, Preached. I was in a city in Europe, and a young minister came to me and said, "Moody, what makes the difference between your success in preaching and mine? Either you are right and I am wrong, or I am right and you are wrong." Said I, "I don't know what the difference is, for you have heard me and I have never heard you preach. What is the difference?" Said he, "You make a good deal out of the death of Christ, and I don't make anything out of it. I don't think it has anything to do with it. I preach the life." Said I, "What do you do with this: 'He hath borne our sins in his own body on the tree?'" Said he, "I never preached that." Said I, "What do you do with this: 'He was wounded for our transgressions; he was bruised for our iniquities, and with his stripes we are healed?'" Said he, "I never preached that." "Well," said I again, "what do you do with this—without the shedding of blood there is no remission?" Said he, "I never preached that." I asked him, "What do you preach?" "Well," he says, "I preach a moral essay." Said I, "My friend, if you take the blood out of the Bible, it is all a myth to me." Said he, "I think the whole thing is a sham." "Then," said I, "I advise you to get out of the ministry very quick, I would not preach a sham. If the Bible is untrue, let us stop preaching, and come out at once like men, and fight against it if it is a sham and untrue; but if these things are true, and Jesus Christ left heaven and came into this world to shed his blood and save sinners, then let us lay hold of it and preach it, in season and out of season." In the college at Princeton this last year, when the students were ready to go forth into the world, the old man, their instructor, would stand up there and say, "Young men, make much of the blood. Young men, make much of the blood!" I have learned this, that a minister who makes much of the blood, and makes much of substitution, and holds Christ up as the sinner's only hope, God blesses his preaching. And if the Apostles didn't preach that, what did they preach? You take the great doctrine of substitution out of the preaching of Paul, Peter, John, James and Philip, and of all those holy men, and you take out all that they preached. And so, my friends, there don't seem to be one ray of hope for the man that ignores the blessed, blessed subject of the blood. "Without the shedding of blood there is no remission."

Moody.

7123. CHRIST, Bloody Sweat of. Kannegiesser remarks, "If the mind is seized with a sudden fear of death, the sweat, owing to the excessive degree of constriction, often becomes bloody."

The eminent French historian, De Thou, mentions the case of an Italian officer who commanded at Monte-Marco, a fortress of Piedmont, during the warfare in 1552 between Henry II. of France and the Emperor Charles V. This officer having been treacherously seized by order of the hostile general, and threatened with public execution unless he surrendered the place, was so agitated at the prospect of an ignominious death, that he sweated blood from every part of his body. The same writer relates a similar occurrence in the person of a young Florentine at Rome, unjustly put to death by order of Pope Sixtus V., in the beginning of his reign, and concludes the narrative as follows: "When the youth was led forth to execution, he excited the commiseration of many, and, through excess of grief, was observed to shed bloody tears, and to discharge blood instead of sweat from his whole body." Medical experience does so far corroborate the testimony of the gospels, and shows that cutaneous hemorrhage is sometimes the result of intense mental agitation. The awful anguish of him who said, "My soul is exceeding sorrowful, even unto death," was sufficient cause to produce the bloody perspiration on a cold night and in the open air.

7124. CHRIST, Branches of. When a small scion is grafted into a tree, a stream of sap and juice begins to flow from the stock into the branch which has been grafted in, till at length it shall blossom and bud and bring forth fruit; it partakes at once both of the root and fatness of the tree. Precisely as the sap flows from the stock into the branch which has been grafted in, so does one continued stream of fruitfulness flow from the Saviour to the souls of those who are really united to him, and who are branches abiding in him. Christ is made sanctification (1 Cor. 1: 30). F. F. Trench.

7125. CHRIST, Calmness of. Science tells us that underlying all the tumult and restlessness of the waves of the ocean, over which the winds trample, there is a vast stratum of altogether motionless waters, so utterly tranquil, even when through storm and gloom, "there is sorrow on the sea (Jer. 44: 23), that the tiniest and most fragile shell at the bottom is not stirred, nor in the slightest abraded by all the turmoil above. It seems to me that this remarkable fact and phenomenon may be taken as a symbol of our blessed Lord, regarded as at once "the man Christ Jesus," and very God. In his human nature there was a well of tenderness, that was easily stirred to softest tears; a delight of yearning love that was eager to flow out, and pour itself into the lowliest heart that would lay itself upon his broad bosom; a measureless amplitude of sympathy that was ever ready to bear the heaviest, yea, all the burdens of others; and, I would add, a large and generous charity, that was quick to anticipate confession and to lavish forgiveness—meeting the penitent self-accusation and request of the returning prodigal, "Make me as one of thy hired servants," with the welcome of a son. But underlying all, there was the ETERNAL CALM, unstirred, un moved, of his divinity. What I have just spoken of was as the tossings of the surface-waves, that bear the infinite depths of calm, untouched.

Grosart.

7126. CHRIST, Commander. A personal friend, an eye-witness of the affair, informed me that at the first battle of Fredericksburg, while the attacking army had advanced beyond the Rappahannock, each of the several divisions crossing the stream in the very face of the enemy—here dashing upon the foe, here storming a redoubt, there grappling hand in hand with the enemy—while all this was going on, on the other side of the river, upon an eminence, stood the commanding general, surrounded by orderlies ready to carry any commands that were given them. Just at his side was the telegraphic battery, with wires carried in the rear of each division wherever it went; so that the single mind and heart of Burnside gave orders to every part of the advancing army. A single mind controlled the whole movement of the beleaguering host, scattered over many miles of the river bank. You know for what purpose I mention this. Christ cannot go about as he did in Galilee and Judea; but, standing above the embattled host, he overlooks the whole field, and contemplating “the peculiar race,” as they go forth to victory, he himself issues the orders, and legions of angels appear for them, and the power of his Spirit, quicker than the electric spark, marshals them on to the conflict.

Dr. Curry.

7127. CHRIST, Conquests of. How insipid and tame are the histories of all other conquests—of the rise and fall of all other kingdoms and empires—when compared with the grand and wonderful achievements of the “King Immortal,” and the fall of death beneath his power, and the giving up of all his prey; when every victim from earth and sea, though under monuments of marble, nay, rocks of adamant, shall be restored; when he shall bring forth every particular form to be repossessed by its proper spirit, from which it has been for a season divorced! Thus will he “swallow up death in victory,” and then clothe his redeemed with garments of immortality. Death shall be known and feared no more. Millions of millions shall join in everlasting praises to him whom all the redeemed will acknowledge as their Great Deliverer.

R. Hall.

7128. CHRIST, Crowning. After King George III. was crowned, and invested with all his royal dignity, all the peers were allowed the privilege of putting on their crowns. They looked like a company of kings, as in some sense they were. But immediately they came, one by one, and laid down their crowns at their sovereign's feet, in testimony of their having no power or authority but what they derived from him; and having each kissed his sceptre, he allowed each of them to kiss himself; upon which their crowns were restored to them, and they were all allowed to reign as subordinate kings. This could not miss bringing to mind what is recorded in the Revelation of the whole redeemed company, who are said to be kings and priests unto God, and who are to reign with Jesus Christ forever and ever; their casting down their crowns, and saying, “Thou art worthy to receive power and majesty.” I thought with myself were I so happy as to make one of that innumerable company, redeemed from among men, I should not envy all the nobles in England what they are now enjoying.

Strachan.

7129. CHRIST, Crucifier of. Wm. Shrubsole casually took up a volume, written by Isaac Ambrose, and began to read that part of it which treats of “Looking to Jesus.” He was much affected at the relation of the sufferings of Christ, and sensibly interested at the inquiry which the author makes,—Who were the persons that brought the Divine Sufferer into so much distress? “I was convinced,” he said, “that I was deeply concerned in that horrid transaction; and from this time I date the Lord first penetrated my dark mind with the dawn of heavenly light and salvation.”

7130. CHRIST, Crucifying. Bridaine, a French preacher, discoursing on the passion of Christ, said, “A man, accused of a crime of which he was innocent, was condemned to death by the iniquity of his judges. He was led to punishment; but no gibbet was prepared, nor was there any executioner to perform the sentence. The people, moved with compassion, hoped that the sufferer would escape death. But one man raised his voice, and said, ‘I am going to prepare a gibbet, and I will be the executioner.’ You groan with indignation! Well, my brethren, in each of you I behold this cruel man. There are no Jews here to-day, to crucify Jesus Christ; but you dare to rise up and say, ‘I will crucify him.’” These words produced most powerful emotion, and nothing was heard but the sobs of the people.

7131. CHRIST, Divinity of. Two Socinians once called on an old member of the Society of Friends, to ask what was his opinion of the person of Christ. He replied, “The apostle says, We preach Christ crucified, unto the Jews a stumbling-block, because they expected a temporal Messiah; to the Greeks foolishness, because he was crucified as a malefactor; but unto them which are called, both Jews and Greeks, Christ the power of God, and the wisdom of God. Now, if you can separate the power of God from God, and the wisdom of God from God, I will come over to your opinions.”

7132. CHRIST, Enemies of. The enemies of Christ's kingdom conceive mischief, but they bring forth nothing but vanity. They conceive chaff, and bring forth stubble. “They imagine nothing but a vain thing;” their malice is but like the fighting of briars and thorns with the fire; like the dashing of waves against a rock; like a madman shooting arrows against the sun, which at last return upon his own head, like the puffing of the fan against the corn, which driveth away nothing but the chaff; like the beating of the wind against the sail, or the foaming and raging of the waters against a mill: which by the wisdom of the artificers are all ordered unto useful and excellent ends. "And surely when the Lord shall have accomplished his work on Mount Zion, when he shall by the adversary, as by a fan, have purged away the iniquity of Jacob, and taken away sin, he will then return in peace and beauty unto his people again." Look on the preparation of some large building: in one place you shall see heaps of lime and mortar; in another, piles of timber; everywhere rude and indigested materials, and a tumultuary noise of axes and hammers; but at length the artificer sets everything in order, and raiseth up a beautiful structure: such is the proceeding of the Lord in the afflictions and visitations of his church; though the enemy intend to ruin it, yet God intends only to repair it. Thus far as "Donec" respects Christ's kingdom in itself.

Bp. Reynolds.

7133. CHRIST, Exaltation of. When the Jewish rulers, who had sworn the life of Jesus away before the tribunal of the Roman governor, heard first of his resurrection, they remonstrated with the witnesses: "Ye intend to bring this man's blood upon us." The resurrection of Jesus had no other meaning to them than vengeance. They reasoned: "If he whom we slew is exalted, woe unto us!" But to these very men the apostles preached pardon. They proclaimed that Jesus is exalted for the purpose of showing mercy to his murderers. He is exalted to give, and he gives even to them. He gives to all, and upbraided not. Now that he is exalted, and his enemies are in his power, instead of taking vengeance, he gives remission of sins. The water is exalted into the heavens in order that it may give rain upon the earth—it is exalted to give. It is drawn up, as by a resurrection; and arises pure into the heavens, that it may be in a capacity to send refreshing to the thirsty ground. In the same way he who comes as rain on the mown grass was exalted that he might give—that he might give himself, as the living water, to his own.

Arnot.

7134. CHRIST our Example. The Gospel doth not only represent the doctrine of Christ to be believed; but also the life of Christ to be followed: nor shall any have him for their advocate and propitiation, but such as are willing to have him for their pattern and example; to copy out and imitate his humility, patience, purity, benignity, and self-resignation. None shall be benefited by his death, that are unwilling to live his life.

Dr. Worthington.

7135. CHRIST, Excellency of. As all waters meet in the sea, and as all the lights meet in the sun, so all the perfections and excellencies of all the saints and angels meet in Christ; nay, Christ hath not only the holiness of angels, the loveliness of saints, and the treasures of heaven, but also the fullness of the Godhead—the riches of the Deity are in him: "For it hath pleased the Father that in him should all fullness dwell,"—fullness of grace, fullness of knowledge, fullness of love, fullness of glory.

Dyer.

7136. CHRIST, Figures of. Dr. Guthrie says:

"How difficult it would be to name a noble figure, a sweet simile, a tender or attractive relationship, in which Jesus is not set forth to woo a reluctant sinner and cheer a desponding saint! Am I wounded? He is balm. Am I sick? He is medicine. Am I naked? He is clothing. Am I poor? He is wealth. Am I hungry? He is bread, Am I thirsty? He is water. Am I in debt? He is a surety. Am I in darkness? He is a sun. Have I a house to build? He is a rock. Must I face that black and gathering storm? He is an anchor, sure and steadfast. Am I to be tried? He is an advocate. Is sentence passed, and am I to be condemned? He is pardon. To deck him out and set him forth, Nature culls her finest flowers, brings her choicest ornaments, and lays these treasures at his feet. The skies contribute their stars. The sea gives up its pearls. From fields, and rivers, and mountains, Earth brings the tribute of her gold, and gems, and myrrh, and frankincense, the lily of the valley, the clustered vine, and the fragrant rose of Sharon." Tertullian said, "If thou endurest wrong for Christ's sake, he is a revenger; if sorrow, he is a comforter; if sickness, he is a Physician; if loss, he is a Restorer; if life, he is a reviver."

7137. CHRIST, For the Sake of. Some years ago, in war time, a well-known judge, who had been much interested himself for the welfare of the suffering soldiers, resolved that while a certain case was pending, he would turn away all applicants for charity, that he might devote himself wholly to the duties of his profession. One day a soldier came into his office, poorly clad, his face bearing the deep lines of suffering. The judge, pretending not to notice him, continued his work. The soldier fumbled in his pockets for a long time, and then said in an uncertain, disappointed voice, as though he saw that he was unwelcome, "I did have a letter for you." The judge, acting against the prompting of a warm, generous heart, made no reply. Presently a thin trembling hand pushed a note along the desk. The judge raised his face slightly, and was about to say, "I have no time for such matters as those," when he discovered the writing was that of his own son, a soldier in the army. He took up the note. It read in substance: "Dear Father—The bearer is a soldier, discharged from the hospital. He is going home to die. Assist him in any way you can, for Charlie's sake." All the tender emotions of his soul were laid open. He said to a friend afterward, "I took the soldier to my heart, for Charlie's sake; I let him sleep in Charlie's bed. I clothed him, and supplied him with every comfort, for the sake of my own dear boy." My friends, God will never turn the needy away without a blessing, for his dear son's sake—for Jesus' sake. Moody.

7138. CHRIST, Freedom by. Christ's work as our substitute is shown by a story of the time of Napoleon the Great. When a draft was made for soldiers to fill the armies of the Empire, one drafted man procured a substitute to take his place in the ranks. The substitute went into the field and fell, while the drafted man remained in safety at home. After a while another draft was ordered, and the name of the same man was called again. He refused to respond, saying, "I am free. I sent a substitute into the army, and he was killed. So I am as a dead man." The case was carried into the French law-courts, and there it was decided that the man was free. The law had accepted his substitute, and it could not enforce its claims against him.

7139. CHRIST, Fullness of. We know a little of Christ our Saviour, but, oh! how small a portion have we seen of the fullness that is in him! Like the Indians, when America was first discovered, we are not aware of the amazing value of the gold and treasure in our hands. Ryle.

7140. CHRIST, Glory of. Cannot we imagine how the hearts of the saints will be enraptured as they see and comprehend all these wonders in their Lord? The astronomer, as he surveys the vast expanse of heaven through his telescope, has his admiration drawn out as it never could have been if he surveyed it only with the naked eye; and he who examines a flower through a microscope, rises from his steady gaze, and strong light, and high magnifying power, which has let him into nature's secrets, with an enthusiasm which otherwise he never could have felt; but neither telescope nor microscope ever admitted any philosophers into such secrets in the natural world as those to which this "I will" (John 17: 24) of Jesus shall admit his glorified people in the spiritual world. Power.

7141. CHRIST, the God-Man. When thou hearest of Christ, do not think him God only, or man only, but both together. For I know Christ was hungry, and I know that with five loaves he fed five thousand men, besides women and children. I know Christ was thirsty, and I know Christ turned water into wine. I know Christ was carried in a ship, and I know Christ walked on the waters. I know Christ died, and I know Christ raised the dead. I know Christ was set before Pilate, and I know Christ sits with the Father. I know Christ was worshiped by the angels, and I know Christ was stoned by the Jews. And truly, some of these I ascribe to the human, others to the divine nature; for by reason of this he is said to be both together. St. Chrysostom.

7142. CHRIST, Go to. I am a great lover of John Bunyan, but I do not believe him infallible; for I met with a story the other day which I think a very good one. There was a young man in Edinburgh who wished to be a missionary. He was a wise young man; he thought—"Well, if I am to be a missionary, there is no need for me to transport myself far away from home; I may as well be a missionary in Edinburgh." There's a hint to some of you ladies, who give away tracts in your district, and never give your servant Mary one. Well, this young man started, and determined to speak to the first person he met. He met one of those old fishwives: those of us who have seen them can never forget them; they are extraordinary women indeed. So, stepping up to her, he said, "Here you are, coming with your burden on your back; let me ask you if you have got another burden, a spiritual burden?" "What!" she said; "do you mean that burden in John Bunyan's 'Pilgrim's Progress?' Because if you do, young man, I have got rid of that many years ago, before you were born. But I went a better way to work than the Pilgrim did. The Evangelist that John Bunyan talks about was one of your parsons that do not preach the gospel; for he said, 'Keep that light in thine eye, and run to the wicket-gate.' Why, man alive! that was not the place for him to run to. He should have said, 'Do you see that cross? Run there at once!' But instead of that, he sent the poor pilgrim to the wicket-gate first; and much good he got by going there!—he got tumbling into the slough, and was like to have been killed by it." "But did not you," he asked, "go through any slough of despond?" "Yes, young man, I did; but I found it a great deal easier going through with my burden off than on my back." The old woman was quite right. We must not say to the sinner, "Now sinner, if thou wilt be saved, go to the baptismal pool—go to the wicket-gate—go to the church—do this or that." No, the cross should be right in front of the wicket-gate, and we should say to the sinner, "Throw thyself there, and thou art safe. But thou art not safe till thou canst cast off thy burden, and lie at the foot of the cross, and find peace in Jesus." Spurgeon.

7143. CHRIST, Grace of. When Pompey's adherents deserted him, and went over to Cæsar, or were taken prisoners and brought to Cæsar, he loaded them with favors and honors. He declared that it was his highest pleasure to save his enemies who had fought against him. Such clemency and favor is that which Christ shows even to those who have opposed him most.

7144. CHRIST, the Head. Denham Smith makes this remark, "They cannot 'pluck' them out; but they think they may slip out." "Ay," says he, "but they are in his hands; and they are members of his body, and of his flesh, and of his bones." And in Freemasons' Hall, holding up his hands in the midst of a large assembly, he said, "Do you expect to see my fingers fall away? Do you expect to see them drop off! No; because they are parts of myself; and because I live, they shall live also." So Christ's members are parts of himself; and while he lives, they must live. You cannot drown a man while his head is above water; therefore, though he feel below water, he is not drowned if his head is above the stream. So you cannot destroy the church, while the head is alive. Let the head be saved, and the body is saved, if we be really, vitally, personally, and spiritually one with the Lord Jesus Christ. Spurgeon.

7145. CHRIST in the Heart. A stationer, being at a fair, hung out his picture of men famous in their kind; among which he had also the picture of Christ. Divers men bought, according to their several fancies. The soldier buys his Cæsar, the lawyer his Justinian, the physician his Galen, the philosopher his Aristotle, the poet his Virgil, the orator his Cicero, and the divine his Augustine—every man after the dictation of his own heart. The picture of Christ hung by still, of less price than the rest; a poor shopman that had no more money than would purchase it, bought it, saying, "Now every one hath taken away his god, let me have mine!" Thus, whilst the covetous repair to their riches, like birds to their nests; the ambitious to their honors, like butterflies to a poppy; the strong to their holds; the learned to their arts; atheists to their sensual refuges, as dogs to their kennels; and politicians to their wit, as foxes to their holes; the devout soul will have no other sanctuary, fix upon no other object, but Christ Jesus, not pictured in their chamber, but planted in the inner chamber of the heart. Salter.

7146. CHRIST, Heart of. One of the versions of the tradition of the age of chivalry, says that a Scottish king, when dying, bequeathed his heart to the most trusted and beloved of his nobles, to be carried to Palestine. Enclosing the precious deposit in a golden case, and suspending it from his neck, the knight went out with his companions. He found himself, when on his way to Syria, hard pressed by the Moors of Spain. To animate himself to supernatural efforts, that he might break through his thronging foes, he snatched the charge intrusted to him from his neck, and, flinging it into the midst of his enemies, exclaimed, "Forth, Heart of Bruce! as thou wast wont, and Douglas will follow thee or die." The servant cannot go among the vile where the master's heart has not gone.

7147. CHRIST, a Hiding Place. An irreligious young man was driven by a severe rain storm to take shelter in a church. He heard a sermon, but was not impressed. The preacher went to him and said, "I am glad to see you in the house of the Lord even under these circumstances. I hope you will find as good a shelter at the last great day. Remember him who is 'a covert from the storm,' and do not neglect that shelter into which the righteous run and are safe." This apposite personal application of the event which brought him there was the means of leading him to Christ.

7148. CHRIST in History. Tacitus has actually attested the existence of Jesus Christ; the reality of such a personage; his public execution under the administration of Pontius Pilate; the temporary check which this gave to the progress of his religion; its revival a short time after his death; its progress over the land of Judea, and to Rome itself, the metropolis of the empire; all this we have in a Roman historian. Dr. Chalmers.

7149. CHRIST, Humanity of. Types and figures. The Tabernacle, both as a whole, and in its different parts. John 1:14—"The Word was made flesh and dwelt (literally tabernacled) among us." The vail, made of beautiful and costly work, rent at Christ's death, Heb, 10:

20; Matt. 27: 51; the shittim wood of the brazen altar, and of the altar of incense, etc. The Temple—the shrine of Deity, John 2: 19-21; Col. 2: 9. The Twig, or sprout, from the stem of Jesse, Isa. 11: 1. Contrast the fall of the high trees, and Lebanon destroyed (the great ones of the earth), with the rise and reign of the slender twig, 10: 33, 34. The Tender plant, or sucker out of the dry ground, Isa. 53: 2; see 52: 23. The Branch, Zech. 3: 8; 6: 12; Jer. 23: 5; Isa. 4: 2; 11: 1. The Hebrew word for branch (netzer) is most probably the origin of the name of Nazareth, and helps to explain Matt. 2: 23. The day-spring from on high, Luke 1: 18 (marg. sunrise, or branch). Jacob's ladder—of which the foot was on earth, and the top reached to heaven, Gen. 28: 12; John 1: 51. Bowes.

7150. CHRIST, Hungering for. "Blessed are they which do hunger and thirst after righteousness for they shall be filled." Bunyan calls this "a text to hang a soul upon."

7151. CHRIST, Incomprehensible. In a company of literary gentlemen, Daniel Webster was asked if he could comprehend how Jesus Christ could be both God and man. "No sir," he replied, and added, "I should be ashamed to acknowledge him as my Saviour if I could comprehend him. If I could comprehend him he could be no greater than myself. Such is my sense of sin, and consciousness of my inability to save myself, that I feel I need a superhuman Saviour, one so great and glorious that I cannot comprehend him."

7152. CHRIST, Immortal. After Wm. Pitt had finished his education he started, according to the custom of his day, to make the tour of the continent of Europe. In a German grave-yard he found the name of one upon a monument, and following it the epitaph, "The great borrower." This man had established a great business, gained the public confidence, borrowed millions, and died bankrupt. The thought came to Pitt that he was bankrupt because death put an end to his plans. "My country," said he, "can afford to borrow, for she is immortal." Such is the story of the founder of the great British national debt. Men die, nations wane and disappear, but Jesus Christ is "the same yesterday, to-day, and forever." He can afford to wait, but "he will not fail nor be discouraged till he has brought forth judgment unto victory."

7153. CHRIST our Intercessor. Phocion plead for the most unfortunate persons, and for this some of his countrymen condemned him. He used to say that the good had no need of an advocate. A celebrated criminal was cast into prison, and begged that Phocion would come to him. His friends sought to dissuade him, but he resisted all dissuasions, saying, "Let me alone, good people; where can we rather wish to speak to Aristogiton than in a prison?" So Christ pleads for those who need him most.

7154. CHRIST, Judah's Lion. The tribe of Judah had for its emblem on its banner the figure of a lion. In their marches this tribe headed the column, and their flag first challenged the enemy. "Judah is a lion's whelp," said Jacob, Gen. 49: 9. The heroism of the tribe was well-known. From this tribe the Saviour came. He took up the banner to lead his hosts to victory. The Revelator notes his progress. "The lion of the tribe of Judah, he hath prevailed." His banner leads all, floats above all, and shall triumph over all.

7155. CHRIST, our Keep. The castles of feudalism were surrounded with walls, and moats that could be filled with water. These defences were called the keep of the castle. Whosoever would reach the castle must scale or destroy its walls and encounter the archers upon them and swim its moat. Christ is the keep or keeper of all his followers. He defends them from all assaults of hell and sin.

7156. CHRIST Knocking. The Emperor Henry IV., the mightiest sovereign of Europe, brought upon himself the anathema of Pope Hildebrand by disregarding his edicts. The Pope soon stirred up the people against him, and he was glad to seek a reconciliation. The Emperor went in person to the Pope's residence at Canosa, and stood in an outer court for three days, amid the cold of winter, barefoot, clad only in a woolen shirt, seeking absolution. Christ stands without the soul of man, asking for admission. The pope self, with an assumption greater than that of Hildebrand, refuses admittance. He has waited not days, but weeks and years, and may ere long depart forever.

7157. CHRIST, Knowledge of. Though something of Christ be unfolded in one age, and something in another, yet eternity itself cannot fully unfold him. "I see something," said Luther, "which blessed Augustine saw not; and those that come after me, will see that which I see not." It is in the studying of Christ, as in the planting of a new-discovered country; at first men sit down by the sea-side, upon the skirts and borders of the land, and there they dwell; but by degrees they search further and further into the heart of the country. Ah, the best of us are yet but upon the borders of this vast continent! John Flavel.

7158. CHRIST, Leaning on. Miss Fiske, of the Nestorian Mission, was at one time in feeble health, and much depressed in spirits. One hot Sabbath afternoon she sat on her mat on the chapel floor, longing for support and rest, feeling unable to maintain her trying position until the close of worship. Presently she felt a woman's form seated at her back, and heard the whisper, "Lean on me." Scarcely yielding to the request, she heard it repeated, "Lean on me." Then she divided her weight with the gentle pleader, but that did not suffice. In earnest, almost reproachful tones, the voice again urged, "If you love me, lean hard!"

7159. CHRIST, Legend of. A foolish legend says that on the arrival of the holy family with the child Jesus in Egypt, all the idols fell before him, and that Aphrodisius, then governor of Egypt, recognizing the divinity of Christ from this omen, fell down and worshiped him as his God.

7160. CHRIST Lifted up. After the battle of Pittsburgh Landing and Murfreesboro, I was in a hospital at Murfreesboro. And one night, after midnight, I was woke up and told that there was a man in one of the wards who wanted to see me. I went to him, and he called me "chaplain," and said he wanted me to help him die. And I said, "I'd take you right up in my arms and carry you into the kingdom of God if I could; but I can't do it; I can't help you to die." And he said, "Who can?" I said, "The Lord Jesus Christ can—he came for that purpose." He shook his head and said, "He can't save me; I have sinned all my life." And I said, "But he came to save sinners." I thought of his mother in the North, and I knew that she was anxious that he should die right, and I thought I'd stay with him. I prayed two or three times, and repeated all the promises I could, and I knew that in a few hours he would be gone. I said I wanted to read him a conversation that Christ had with a man who was anxious about his soul. I turned to the third chapter of John. His eyes were riveted on me, and when I came to the 14th and 15th verses, he caught up the words, "As Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of man be lifted up; that whosoever believeth on him should not perish, but have eternal life." He stopped me and said, "Is that there?" I said, "Yes," and he asked me to read it again, and I did so. He leaned his elbows on the cot and clasped his hands together and said, "That's good; won't you read it again?" I read it the third time, and then went on with the rest of the chapter. When I finished his eyes were closed, his hands were folded, and there was a smile on his face. O! how it was lit up! What a change had come over it! I saw his lips quivering and I leaned over him and heard, in a faint whisper, "As Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, so must the Son of man be lifted up, that whosoever believeth on him should not perish, but have eternal life." He opened his eyes and said, "That's enough; don't read any more." He lingered a few hours and then pillowed his head on those two verses, and then went up in one of Christ's chariots and took his seat in the kingdom of God.

7161. CHRIST, Longing for. "Whilst we are at home in the body, we are absent from the Lord." You have a little shadow, or emblem of this in other creatures: you see the rivers, though they glide never so sweetly betwixt the fragrant banks of the most pleasant meadows in their course and passage, yet on they go towards the sea; and if they meet with never so many rocks and hills to resist their course, they will either strive to get passage through them, or if that may not be, they will fetch a compass and creep about them, and nothing can stop them till by a central force they have finished their weary course, and poured themselves into the bosom of the ocean. Or as it is with yourselves, when abroad from your habitations and relations: this may be pleasing a little while; but if every day might be a festival, it would not long please you, because you are not at home.

Flavel.

7162. CHRIST, Looking to. That flower which follows the sun, doth so even in cloudy days: when it doth not shine forth, yet it follows the hidden course and motion of it. So, the soul that moves after God, keeps that course when he hides his face; is content, yea, is glad at his will in all estates, or conditions, or events.

Leighton.

7163. CHRIST, Love to. It is said that when Cato the younger was but a child, he was asked whom he loved most. He answered, "My brother." He was then asked whom next. He replied, "My brother." Again and again whom he loved, third, fourth and fifth, and so until the questioner was tired, and he still said "My brother." As he grew older he displayed the same disposition, and was never happier than when in his brother's company. The Christian should love Christ thus, first, last and above all others.

7164. CHRIST, Mercy of. Arnot says, "A ship has caught fire at sea. The passengers and crew, shut up in one extremity of the burning ship, strain their eyes and sweep the horizon round for sight of help. At length, and just in time, a sail appears and bears down upon them. But the stranger, fearing fire, does not venture near, but puts about her helm, and soon is out of sight. The men in the burning ship are left to their fate. How dreadful their situation, when the selfish ship saved itself from danger, and left them to sink! What heart can conceive the misery of human kind, if the Son of God had saved himself from suffering, and left a fallen world to the wrath of God!" But Christ did not save himself and let the wreck of humanity go down. He sank into the dark waves of death to rescue man.

7165. CHRIST Mighty to Save. It is possible to have both knowledge and power in vain. I know not that I can better, and I feel that I cannot more touchingly, illustrate this, than by a fact concerning that good and true soldier of Jesus Christ, Hedley Vicars. A friend of his told lately to an auditory in London that his wound was not a mortal one. It was one well known, and over which a surgeon has perfect power. And yet "he died." Why? Because, in the hurry and tumult of that terrible morning, on the gray heights of the Crimea, the regiment of Hedley Vicars was carried far from the tents that held the supplies. There was no bandage with which to tie the bleeding artery; and, ere they reached the store-tents, the Christian soldier was no more. He bled to death. "If," said his friend, with the pathos of true affection, "if there had been a bandage—if the tents of supplies had been half-a-mile nearer, Hedley Vicars might have been alive to-day." It needeth not, my friends, that I "adorn this tale" of war. I leave it alone in its beautiful simplicity. You have anticipated its application. Knowledge of the wound was of no avail: power over the wound was of no avail. Knowledge and power, in the absence of the bandage, in the distance from the supplies, were of no avail. Grosart.

7166. CHRIST, Miracles of. We distinguish a two-fold object of his miracles: the first a material one—the meeting of some immediate emergency, of some want of man's earthly life which his love urged him to satisfy; the other and higher one—to point himself out to the persons whose earthly necessities were thus relieved, as the one alone capable of satisfying their higher and essential spiritual wants; to raise them from this single exhibition of his glory in the individual miracle to a vivid apprehension of the glory of his entire nature. Nay, it was to be a sign to all others that they might believe in him as the son of God.

Neander.

7167. CHRIST, the Mirror of Truth. There is in Rome an elegant fresco by Guido, "The Aurora." It covers a lofty ceiling. Looking up at it from the pavement your neck grows stiff, your head dizzy, and the figures indistinct. You soon turn away. The owner of the palace has placed a broad mirror near the floor. You may now sit down before it as at a table, and at your leisure look into the mirror, and enjoy the fresco that is above you. There is no more weariness, nor indistinctness, nor dizziness. So God has brought otherwise inaccessible celestial truth to our world through Jesus Christ. In him, as in a glass, we may behold the glory and truth and grace of God. He is himself "the Truth." Like the Rospiglioso mirror beneath the "Aurora," Christ reflects the excellencies of heavenly character. In all essential elements he was on earth what they are in heaven.

S. S. Journal.

7168. CHRIST, Need of Contact with. There are two kinds of magnets, steel magnets and soft iron magnets. The steel magnet receives its magnetism from the loadstone, and has it permanently; it can get along very well alone in a small way; it can pick up needles and do many other little things to amuse children. There is another kind of magnet which is made of soft iron, with a coil of copper wire round it. When the battery is all ready and the cups are filled with the mercury, and the connection is made with the wires, this magnet is twenty times as strong as the steel magnet. Break the circuit, and its power is all gone instantly. We are soft iron magnets; our whole power must come from the Lord Jesus Christ; but faith makes the connection, and while it holds we are safe.

7169. CHRIST, None Cast Out by. The custom prevailed among the pagan Kafirs of casting out their sick and dying friends and leaving them in some desolate place, lest their houses should be defiled with the presence of the dead. The helpless are thus left to suffer cruel agonies. A little girl who had been torn by wolves, was cast out by her parents to die. She thought of the missionary's well known kindness and resolved, "I will try to creep to his house, for he is kind and will not cast me out." Slowly she made her way to his door. He received her with great tenderness, bound up her wounds and tended her carefully till they were healed. Then he asked her if she would go back to her parents; she said, "O no, they cast me out; you took me in; I will stay with you." She went also to Christ and was received. Christ says, "He that cometh unto me I will in no wise cast out."

7170. CHRIST Not a Hard Master. I remember once a party of gentlemen speaking of this parable that I read, and asking a deaf man, "What do you think of this man's hiding his talent and about the justice of his reward?" The deaf man replied, "I don't know anything about the justice of his reward, but I know he is a liar. The Lord isn't a hard master." And so these men who bury their talents, they think the Lord is a hard master; but the men who are using their talents, they don't think the Lord is a hard master. Moody.

7171. CHRIST, Painting of. John Huss, the martyr of the fifteenth century, while in his dungeon awaiting execution, dreamed that the pictures of Christ, which he had caused to be painted on the walls of his study, were obliterated by the pope. By this he was grieved. The next day he dreamed that a great number of painters were restoring the pictures of Christ in greater beauty. He saw great crowds of people admiring the portraits, and heard them say, "Now let the pope and the bishops come; they will never be able to efface them again." He was much encouraged, and told his dreams to a friend who cautioned him against trusting in them. Huss answered, "I am not a dreamer, but I hold this for certain that the image of Christ shall never be effaced. They have wished to destroy it, but it shall be painted again in the hearts of men by painters abler than myself. The nation which loves Jesus Christ will rejoice thereat, and I awakening from the dead, and rising from the grave, shall thrill with great joy." A century of persecution did indeed blot the image of Jesus from the hearts of men, and a feast was held in Rome to celebrate the complete triumph of the papacy. Then appeared Luther and many more painters, restoring the image of Christ in the hearts of multitudes.

7172. CHRIST a Physician. Christ has put himself under the name of physician, a doctor for curing diseases; and you know that applause and fame is a thing that physicians much desire. That is it that helps them to patients, and that also that will help their patients to commit themselves to their skill for cure with the more confidence and repose of spirit. And the best way for a doctor or a physician to get themselves a name is, in the first place, to take in hand and cure some such as all others have given up for lost and dead. Physicians get neither name nor fame by pricking of wheals, or picking out thistles, or by laying of plasters to the scratch of a pin; every old woman can do this. But if they would have a name and a fame, if they will have it quickly, they must, as I said, do some great and desperate cures. Let them fetch one to life that was dead; let him recover one to his wits that was mad; let them make one that was born blind to see; or let them give right wits to a fool; these are notable cures, and he that can do thus, and if he doth thus first, he shall have the name and fame he desires.

7173. CHRIST, Preparing the Way of. Dr. Wolf, when lecturing in Philadelphia, 1837, stated that on entering Jerusalem from the west, in the direction of Gaza, the road, for a considerable distance from Jerusalem, was so full of stones that it was impossible to ride, and those who were entering the city were obliged to dismount. When Ibrahim Pacha, son of Mohammed Ali, approached Jerusalem, a considerable number of laborers went before him, and removed the stones from the way, amidst a constant cry of "Cast up! cast up the way! Remove the stones!" And on a standard was written, "The Pacha is coming;" and everywhere the cry was heard, "The Pacha is coming! The Pacha is coming! Cast up the way! Remove the stones!" The expression indicates the removal of obstacles and difficulties, preparatory to some important manifestation, or some signal event. See also Isaiah 62: 10.

7174. CHRIST, Presence of. It is said that the Macedonians had a great general named Eumenes, in whom they placed immense confidence. On one occasion, when he was very sick, they were forced to march against an opposing host without his presence at their head. Seeing the lustre of the golden armor and the beauty of the purple vests of their foes, and the immense elephants with towers upon their backs filled with armed men, they halted, declaring that they would not move a step unless their leader could direct their movements. Eumenes, hearing of their indecision, hastened with speed to the front, opened the curtains that hid him from their view, and stretched forth his hand to bid them advance. Catching the inspiration, they saluted him joyously, clanked their weapons, uttered a great shout, and went forward, thinking themselves invincible. They were defeated because he was only a man, but the presence of Christ secures victory.

7175. CHRIST, Prizing. A martyr was asked whether he did not love his wife and children, who stood by him. "Love them!" said he, "Yes; if all the world were gold and at my disposal, I would give it all for the satisfaction of living with them, though it were in prison; yet in comparison with Christ I love them not."

7176. CHRIST, Receiving. A young nobleman had been long absent from his extensive domains and numerous tenantry, till he was a stranger to them. Having returned home, he was out hunting, and wandered from his party become lost and thoroughly drenched. He sought shelter and relief in the cottages of some of his tenants, but they did not recognize him as the lord of the manor, and shut their door, in his face. Knocking at the cottage of a poor widow he heard the invitation, "Come in, thou blessed of the Lord." She gave him a suit of dry though coarse clothing, and spread before him the best fare she could provide. He went away promising to return for his own clothes. The next day he appeared with his retinue, and stopped before the poor widow's door. She discovered in the young lord her unknown guest. He thanked her for the kindness shown to a stranger, and rewarded her with a better cottage and an annuity. She gave as a reason for her hospitality the case of her own boy away at sea, who might be needing shelter, and of him who had not where to lay his head, who "came unto his own, and his own received him not."

7177. CHRIST, Reflecting. A small mirror may flood a room with dazzling light if only it confronts the sun; and a child may dwell so near to Christ that he or she may be the charm and lustre of the home. Bolton.

7178. CHRIST our Refuge. Along the exposed routes among the Alps places of shelter have been erected. Into these the threatened or weary traveler may enter and find protection and refreshment. The pilgrim of the desert finds stone shelters erected by beneficent hands by the wayside, in which he may hide from the resistless storm. Such is Christ to thee, O pilgrim of Life; thy shelter, thy refuge, thy rest, "the shadow of a great Rock in a weary land."

7179. CHRIST, Resurrection of. Biblical types and Illustrations. Isaac received back from the dead, Gen. 21: 10-14; Heb. 11: 19, "he received him in a figure" (or for a type). Joseph raised from the prison to the throne, Gen. 39: 20; 41: 39-45. Jonah restored, after three days and three nights in the whale's belly, Matt. 12: 40. Eliakim signifies the resurrection of the Lord, Isa. 22, 20; see ver. 21-24. The ark resting after the flood on Mount Ararat, on the seventeenth day of the seventh month; the very day Christ rose, as some think, Gen. 8: 4.—Jukes on Offerings. Aaron's rod that budded,—life springing out of death. "Just as Aaron was declared to be the man of God's choice in the matter of the priesthood, by the signs of resurrection life in his rod, which budded while all the other rods remained dead; so is Jesus declared to be the chosen one of God—his great high priest, the antitype of Aaron, by the resurrection from the dead; or, as it might have been rendered, "from among the dead ones."—A. L. Newton. The first-fruits offered as a pledge of the harvest, the morrow after the passover Sabbath, Lev. 23: 9-14. See 1 Cor. 15: 20, "Christ the first-fruits." The first-born, having the pre-eminence—the beginning of strength and highest in rank; see Col. 1: 18. Christ "the first-born from the dead;" Rev. 1: 6, "the first-begotten of the dead." The living bird let loose at the cleansing of the leper, Lev. 14: 53. The scapegoat probably, Lev. 16. The corn of wheat—first dying, then rising into life, John 12: 24. The temple destroyed and raised, John 2: 19. The time of Christ's resurrection is variously counted. The first day, the early morning, Luke 24: 1. As we now count the days, the resurrection of Christ was, as it were, a new starting-point of time. The third day from his death, according to the Hebrew mode of reckoning. "It is ten times expressly said that our Lord rose, or was to rise again, on the third day."

Bowes.

7180. CHRIST, Revelation of. A Jew was attracted into the hippodrome by hearing the singing. Once and again he came, the singing and the preaching having so great an effect upon him, until he felt impelled to enter the inquiry-room. Here he was met by one who asked him what he wanted. "Oh," said he, "I am very miserable; I hear the singing and the speaking, and I don't know what to do." The Christian worker called Mr. Moody, and the poor Jew told him the same story. "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved," said Mr. Moody. "Don't talk to me about Jesus Christ; I don't believe in him; I hate him." "Well, then, let us talk about the serpent that was lifted up in the wilderness; you know the people had only to look and live." And then Mr. Moody knelt down and prayed that this man might be enabled to see Jesus. Suddenly he exclaimed, "Oh! I looked first only at the serpent lifted up, but it all changed into Christ on the cross. I see only Christ on the cross." He rejoiced in Jesus his Saviour—no longer a Jew, but a trusting Christian.

7181. CHRIST, Satisfied with. An aged saint was asked what was the Gospel she believed, and how she believed it. Her simple reply was: "God is satisfied with his Son, that is the Gospel I believe; and I am satisfied with him too, that is how I believe it."

7182. CHRIST Saving. A gentleman in Philadelphia was a teacher of a class of boys on Sunday nights. He was requested to go and see one of their number who was sick. The gentleman hastened to his side, and inquired if he needed medicine or food. "No, Captain, it wasn't that I wanted ye for," replied the boy, "but I wanted to ax ye two questions. Didn't you tell us the other night as how Jesus Christ died for every fellow?" "Yes, I did, for Jesus Christ tasted death for every man." Billy, then said, "I thought so. Now I've another question. Did you tell us as how Jesus Christ saves every fellow that axes him?" "Yes, for every one that asketh receiveth." With a feeble but cheerful voice, the boy replied, "Then I know that he saves me, because I axes him." His head fell back upon his pillow of rags, and his happy spirit went to be with Jesus whom he trusted.

7183. CHRIST Scourged. Oh, until I came to read all about what Christ suffered, I never before realized what he had done for us. I never knew until I came to read all about the Roman custom of scourging what it meant by Christ being scourged for me. When I first read about that I threw myself on the floor and wept, and asked him to forgive me for not having loved him more. Let us imagine the scene where he is taken by the Roman soldiers to be scourged. The orders were to put forty stripes, one after another, upon his bared back. Sometimes it took fifteen minutes, and the man died in the process of being scourged. See him stooping while the sins of the world are laid upon him, and the whips come down upon his bare back, cutting clear through the skin and flesh to the bone. And, after they had scourged him, instead of bringing oil and pouring in into the wounds, he who came to bind up the broken heart and pour oil into its wounds—instead of doing this they dressed him up again, and some cruel wretch reached out to him a crown of thorns, which was placed upon his brow. The Queen of England wears a crown of gold, filled with diamonds and precious stones, worth $20,000,000; but when they came to crown the Prince of Heaven, they gave him a crown of thorns and placed them upon his brow, and in his hand they put a stick for a scepter.

Moody.

7184. CHRIST, Searching for. A man who was filling his barns with grain lost a bank note of large value. He knew that it was in the barn, and resolved to find it, if he had to remove every particle of hay and grain it contained. He removed bundle after bundle, and after a long and diligent search found the note. Some time after he became anxious about his soul. His son said, "Father, if you seek Jesus as you sought after that lost bank-note, you will be sure to find him." This led his father to concentrate all his energy in his search for Christ. He prayed, read the Scriptures, used the means of grace, and soon found the Saviour he sought.

7185. CHRIST, Service for. Brutus visiting Ligarius found him ill, and said, "What, sick, Ligarius?" "No, Brutus," said he, "if thou hast any noble enterprise in hand, I am well." Should the Lord Jesus condescend to us, we should be always ready with a like answer.

7186. CHRIST, Shelter in. When I was in England I had a great curiosity to visit the Zoological Gardens, because of a story I heard concerning them. There was a man who had a little dog which he had trained to run. So one day he made a bet about his dog's running, but when the time came for the race the little dog wouldn't run at all, and the man lost all his money. This so enraged the man that he beat the dog terribly, and at last he tucked him into the lion's cage. He thought the lion would make quick work of him, but the lion lapped the dog and made a pet of him, so at last the man wanted to get his dog back, and called to him, and tried by every means to make the little dog come out of the cage, but he wouldn't come. So the man went and told a man about it, and the man told the keeper, and when the keeper came, the man said to him, "That's my dog in the cage there, and I want you to get him out for me." Then the keeper said, "How came the dog there?" And the man had to tell, and the keeper said, "If you want your dog you can take him out of the cage." He could not take him out, and there he stayed for twenty years. The only safety is to keep close to Christ. The lion of the tribe of Judah conquered the lion of hell. Keep close to Christ. None shall pluck you out of his hand. It's no delusion! It has kept me for twenty years. If it's a delusion, it's a precious delusion.

Moody.

7187. CHRIST Smitten. Mr. Hanway, in his travels, has recorded this scene:—"A prisoner was brought, who had two large logs of wood fitted to the small of his leg, and riveted together; there was also a heavy triangular collar of wood about his neck. The General asked me if that man had taken my goods. I told him I did not remember to have seen him before. He was questioned some time, and at length ordered to be beaten with sticks, which was performed by two soldiers with such severity as if they meant to kill him. The soldiers were then ordered to spit in his face, an indignity of great antiquity in the East. This brought to my mind the sufferings recorded in the prophetic history of our Saviour, Isaiah 50:6."

7188. CHRIST, Sole Dependence in. Montmorency, Constable of France, being mortally wounded, was exhorted to die with the same courage which he had shown in his lifetime. To this he replied, "Gentlemen and fellow-soldiers, I thank you all very kindly for your anxious care and concern about me; but the man who has been enabled to endeavor to live well for four-score years past, can never need to seek now how to die well for a quarter of an hour. But observe, my having been enabled to endeavor to live well is not the ground of my dependence: no, my sole dependence is on Jesus Christ. It is by the grace of God, through him, that I now am what I am."

7189. CHRIST, Superiority of. The following is by a converted Chinaman: "A man had fallen into a deep, dark pit, and lay in its miry bottom groaning and utterly unable to move. Confucius walking by, approached the edge of the pit, and said, 'Poor fellow! I am sorry for you. Why were you such a fool as to get in here? Let me give you a piece of advice: If you get out, don't get in again.' A Buddhist priest next came by, and said, 'Poor fellow! I am very much pained to see you there. I think if you could scramble up two-thirds of the way, or even half, I could reach you and lift you up the rest.' But the man in the pit was entirely helpless and unable to rise. Next the Saviour came by, and, hearing the cries, went to the very brink of the pit, stretched down and laid hold of the poor man, brought him up and said, 'Go, and sin no more.'"

7190. CHRIST, Suffering for. We see what hazards men run to get temporary riches: to the bottom of rocks for diamonds, to the bowels of the earth for gold and silver; such affections have the saints had towards the gospel. If they must dig in mines for Christ (as it was an usual condemnation, Christiani ad metalla) they were most willing so to do: they had a treasure there which the emperor knew not of; they had infinite more precious wealth from thence than he. If they must fetch Christ in the fire, or wrestle for him, as for a precious prize, with the wild beasts of the earth—if they be not suffered to wear Christ, except they put off themselves—how willing, how thankful are they for so rich a bargain! “Look to your life,” said the governor to St. Cyprian, that blessed martyr, “be not obstinate against your own safety, but advise well with yourself.” “Fac quod tibi præceptum est,” saith the holy man; “in re tam justa nulla est consultatio,” “Sir, you are my judge, you are none of my counsellor; do the office which is committed to you; in so righteous a cause there is no further need of consultation.”

Bp. Reynolds.

7191. CHRIST a Teacher. The famous Ascham died 1568. The loss of a valuable instructor is a matter of great grief. Ascham had been tutor in the learned languages to Queen Elizabeth, who so much lamented his death, that she declared she would rather have lost ten thousand pounds than her tutor Ascham. Christian, rejoice! thy Great Teacher never dies; nor shall the knowledge he communicates ever be lost! Antisthenes taught rhetoric, and had among his pupils Diogenes; but when he had heard Socrates, he shut up his school, and told his pupils, “Go, seek for yourselves a master; I have found one.” Thus all who are convinced of their ignorance will renounce everything that would prevent them from sitting at the feet of Christ to learn of him. Philip wrote to Aristotle thus, “I inform you I have a son: I thank the gods, not so much for making me father, as for giving me a son in an age when he can have our Aristotle for his instructor.” How much more may the Christian feel grateful, not only that God has given him life and rational faculties, but that he has Christ for his teacher, for “Who teacheth like him?” Buck.

7192. CHRIST, Testimony to. The Council of Nice was instrumental in vindicating the divinity of Christ against Arianism, which affirmed that he was a mere creature, who once did not exist, who was made by God like other creatures, and who might have fallen into sin. Here Athanasius took his firm stand for Christ, from which neither intimidation, persecution, or banishment ever moved him. Athanasius contra mundum then meant Athanasius for Christ. In that council were many whose dearest friends were martyrs for Christ. Many demanded to be heard because of what they had suffered in the persecutions for him. They uncovered their bodies to show the wounds they had received for the Divine Man, whose omnipotent support they had felt in the hour of need. Others had been disfigured by having an eye plucked out, or a hand cut off, or a limb stiffened by searing the sinews of the leg, and could say, “Let these speak for Christ.” The formula of faith made under this influence in 325 expresses the orthodox belief of the word, and is most explicit testimony to the divinity of Christ.

7193. CHRIST, Thanking. A gentleman in England visited a company of gypsies, and found a lad alone and in bed, evidently in the last stage of consumption. His eyes were closed, and he looked as one already dead. Very slowly in his ear he repeated the Scripture, “God so loved the world that he gave his only-begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life.” He repeated it five times without any apparent response; he did not seem to hear even with the outward ear. On hearing it the sixth time he opened his eyes and smiled, and whispered, “And I never thanked him; but nobody ever told me! I ’turn him many thanks—only a poor gypsy chap! I see! I see! I thank him kindly!” He closed his eyes with an expression of intense satisfaction. The lips moved again. He caught, “That’s it.” Next day he was dead, or, rather, had fallen asleep in Christ. His father said he had been very “peaceable,” and had a “tidy death.”

7194. CHRIST, Touching. To touch Christ’s work is to touch Christ. Mark 5: 28.

Dr. Holme.

7195. CHRIST, Trampling on. I once heard of a father who had a prodigal boy, and the boy had sent his mother down to the grave with a broken heart, and one evening the boy started out as usual to spend the night in drinking and gambling, and his old father as he was leaving said, “My son, I want to ask a favor of you to-night. You have not spent an evening with me since your mother died, and now I want you to spend this night at home. I have been very lonely since your mother died. Now won’t you gratify your old father by staying at home with me?” “No,” said the young man, “it is lonely here, and there is nothing to interest me, and I am going out.” And the old man prayed and wept, and at last he said, “My boy, you are just killing me as you have killed your mother. These hairs are growing whiter, and you are sending me, too, to the grave.” Still the boy would not stay, and the old man said, “If you are determined to go to ruin, you must go over this old body to-night. I cannot resist you. You are stronger than I, but if you go out you must go over this body.” And he laid himself down before the door, and that son walked over the form of his father, trampled the love of his father under foot, and went out. And that is the way with sinners. You have got to trample the blood of God’s Son under your feet if you go down to death, to make light of the blood of the innocent, to make light of the wonderful love of God.

Moody.

7196. CHRIST, Transfiguration of. It was seemingly on the Sabbath-day (“after six days”) that this grand exception to the tenor of Christ’s earthly history was manifested. It was a rehearsal of his ascension. His form, which had been bent under a load of sorrow—a bend more glorious than the bend of the rainbow—now erected itself, like the palm-tree from pressure, and he became like unto “a pillar in the temple of his God.” His brow expanded; its wrinkles of care fled, and the sweat-drops of his climbing toil were transmuted into sparks of glory. His eye flashed forth like the sun from behind a cloud; nay, his whole frame became transparent, as if it were one eye. The light which had long lain in it concealed, was now unveiled in full effulgence: "His face did shine as the sun." His very raiment was caught in a shower of radiance, and became "white as no fuller on earth could whiten it." And who shall describe the lustre of his streaming hair, or the eloquent silence of that smile which sate upon his lips?

"Light o'erflow'd him like a sea, and raised his shining brow,
And the voice came forth, which bade all worlds the Son of God avow."

G. Gilfillan.

7197. CHRIST, Trust in. Dr. Wayland remarked shortly before his end, "I feel that my race is nearly run. I have indeed tried to do my duty. I cannot accuse myself of having neglected any known obligation. Yet all this avails nothing. I place no dependence on anything but the righteousness and death of Jesus Christ. I have never enjoyed the raptures of faith vouchsafed to many Christians. I do not undervalue those feelings, but it has not pleased God to bestow them upon me. I have, however, a confident hope that I am accepted in the beloved."

7198. CHRIST, Trusting. There is a story of Dr. Chalmers, who went to see a Scotch woman in her time of trouble about her sin. In the north of Scotland they spend a good deal of thought in just looking at themselves, and occupying themselves with their misgivings. This Scotch woman was trying to get faith. On his way he had to cross a stream over which there was nothing but a thin plank, and he thought it looked rotten and insecure; and he went up and put his foot upon the plank doubtfully, and feared to trust his weight upon it; and the Scotch woman, watching him from the window, saw that he was afraid to venture out on the plank, and she came out and shouted, "Just trust the plank, Doctor!" And the doctor did trust the plank, and walked over the stream in safety. Afterward he was talking with the woman. She hadn't the right kind of faith, she said, and was lamenting over her lot. The Doctor to explain to her what was the trust she ought to have, at last hit upon the circumstance of his crossing the plank, and, using the woman's queer Scotch expression, said to her: "Trust Christ, cannot you?" "Oh, Doctor, is that faith?" said she; "is it just to trust him?" "That is faith," said he, "just to trust him as I trusted that plank. It carried me over, and you trust God and he will carry you over." "Oh," said she, "I can do that." That means trust the plank. Just trust it, and it won't break under you. Moody.

7199. CHRIST United with Man. Two friends are said to come into Vulcan's shop, and to beg a boon of him: it was granted. What was it? that he would either beat them on his anvil, or melt them in his furnace, both into one. But without fiction, here is a far greater love in Christ; for he would be melted in the furnace of wrath, and beaten on the anvil of death, to be made one with us. And to declare the exceeding love, here were not both to be beaten on the anvil, or melted in the furnace; but without us, he alone would be beaten on the anvil, he alone melted that we might be spared.

Thomas Adams.

7200. CHRIST, Venturing on. Rev. Dr. Simpson, of Hoxton, England, spoke with disapprobation of a phrase often used by some good people, "venturing on Christ." "When I consider," said he, "the infinite dignity and all-sufficiency of Christ, I am ashamed to talk of venturing on him. Oh! had I ten thousand souls, I would, at this moment, cast them all into his hands with the utmost confidence." A few hours before his dissolution, he addressed himself to the last enemy in a strain like that of the apostle, when he exclaimed, "O death! where is thy sting?" Displaying his characteristic fervor, as though he saw the tyrant approaching, he said, "What art thou? I am not afraid of thee. Thou art a vanquished enemy through the blood of the cross."

7201. CHRIST, Visit of. How great a difference there is between the prisoner in his dungeon and the visitor that has come to see him. They are both within the walls of the dungeon: one who did not know, might suppose them under equal restraint; but one is the compassionate visitor who can use his freedom when he will, the other is fast bound there for his offences. So great is the difference between Christ, the compassionate visitor of man, and man himself, the criminal in bondage for his offence.

St. Augustine.

7202. CHRIST, Voice of. When we were in Brooklyn, I found a man in the inquiry room that was greatly troubled about his soul. He told me he had had a godly mother; that she had died and he had her picture put upon the wall, but he had been living such a miserable life he had to turn the face of that picture toward the wall; that mother's prayer haunted him so he could not sleep. That was the Son of God seeking for that young man through the picture on the wall.

Moody.

7203. CHRIST, Volunteering for. A young man went to his mother soon after the war began with the question, "Mother, may I volunteer?" He said, "I argue the matter for four plain propositions. First, my country needs me. Second, she calls me. Third, I am able to go. Fourth, I am willing. This makes the duty very clear to me, unless you, mother, interpose a veto; and I think you are too good a patriot to do that." She gave her consent and before he went, said, "You know, my son, how much I have wished to see you a Christian. Now I want you to look at the claims of Jesus exactly as you have looked at those of your country, 'simply and honestly,' and see if those same 'four plain propositions' will not lead you into the service of heaven." "I'll think of it, mother," was his answer, and they parted. He did not forget his promise. On his first Sabbath in camp he resolutely set himself to the fulfillment of his mother's request. Remembering how he had argued duty to his country, he brought before his mind in the same manner the subject of the divine claims upon his heart and life. "Does Jesus want me? Does he call me? Am I able so to serve him? Am I willing?" With an open Bible, the first three questions were clearly and quickly answered. At the last one he hesitated. But duty seemed so clear, that he dared not falter; and, falling on his knees, he gave himself to Christ. His next letter home announced him as a Christian soldier.

7204. CHRIST, the Way. The story is told that the young Irvings trotted on the sands, called the Solway Sands, which divide England from Scotland. Often the tide rolls in before persons are aware of it, cutting off all retreat, and many have been lost thereby. The two young Irvings had strolled on the sands, and been gathering sea-weed; when, at last, on a sudden, they perceived the tide had rolled in. I conceive the boys asking, "What is the 'way' by which we can escape?" And if a man in the same position as they had pointed out a path, he could not have said, "I am the way." That would have been inconsistent. But their uncle, who happened to see them on the other side, mounted a strong horse, dashed into the midst of the stream, caught up the two boys, placed them before him on his horse, and rode swiftly to shore. I think if that uncle had said to the boys, "I am the way," it would have been quite the proper way of speaking—because in this case he did it all. So Christ could not be "the way" unless he did it all. If he pointed to a something that we could do—then he would not be "the way;" but when he does it all, then it becomes the most fitting, highest use of words to say, "I am the way." If he died to put me into a salvable state, then he is not "the way;" if he died to put me in a position where I could save myself, then he is not "the way"—but if he died to save me, and has saved me, with nothing of my own, then are those words strictly true. Spurgeon.

7205. CHRIST, Will of. Men make their wills and testaments; and Christ makes his. What they bequeath, they cannot be compelled to do it. And what is bequeathed to us in this testament of Christ is altogether a free and voluntary donation. Other testators usually bequeath their estates to their wives and children, and near relations; so doth this testator: all is settled upon his spouse, the church, upon believers, his children. A stranger intermeddles not with these mercies. Men give all their goods and estate that can be conveyed to their friends that survive them. Christ giveth to his church, in the New Testament, three sorts of goods: all temporal good things, all spiritual good things, all eternal good things. No such bequests as these were ever found in the testaments of princes. All that kings and nobles settle by will upon their heirs, are naught to what Christ hath conferred in the New Testament upon his people. John Flavel.

7206. CHRIST, Worthiness of. A native of India named Brindelbund, had spent sixty or seventy years in the service of Satan. He was a byraggee,—that is, one who professes to have subdued his passions, and who was, as they express it, seeking some one who is worthy. He went to Outwa, where he attended Mr. Chamberlain's preaching and instructions. "I have been," said he, "many years going from one sacred place to another, seeking some one who is worthy, and to offer my flower." The sweetest flower, they say, is the human heart; this is their figurative way of talking. "I have been seeking some one to offer my flower who is worthy; but never have I found one till now. I have heard of Jesus; I give it him." The old man was faithful to his surrender—he never took his heart from Jesus. Talking to his Hindu brethren, he would say, "And whom do you need but him whom I have found?" Moister.

7207. CHRISTIAN, Almost. A preacher was speaking on "the almost Christian," and it happening to be just the time that the papers were full of the massacre at Cawnpore, he described the approach of Havelock's victorious troops, he drew a graphic picture of the suspense of the English prisoners in the city, how high their hopes ran when the guns told them of the nearer approach of what they hoped would prove a rescue—how the British rested for the night within a half a mile of their prison, and entered the city in the morning, only just too late. They were almost saved. Pilkington.

7208. CHRISTIAN, Blessedness of the. Christ begins his gospel with a blessing. His is the word of power. For him to declare blessed is to make blessed. His blessedness is more than happiness. Christ proclaims supreme, full, felicity in the sacred number, nine, of his beatitudes, and in their application to all the issues of life and to eternity. To be a true Christian is to have all things which could be blessings to us. To it nothing can be added. How blessed the privilege.

7209. CHRISTIAN, The Cheerful. John Bunyan tells us, that as Christian was going through the valley he found it a dreadful dark place, and terrible demons and goblins were all about him, and poor Christian thought he must perish for certain; but just when his doubts were the strongest, he heard a sweet voice; he listened to it, and he heard a man in front of him singing, "Yea, when I pass through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil." Now, that man did not know who was near him, but he was unwittingly singing to cheer a man behind. Christian, when you are in trouble, sing; you do not know who is near you. Sing! perhaps you will get a good companion by it. Sing! perhaps there will be many a heart cheered by your song. There is some broken spirit, it may be, that will be bound up by your sonnets. Sing! there is some poor distressed brother, perhaps shut up in the Castle of Despair, who, like King Richard, will hear your song inside the walls, and sing to you again, and you may be the means of getting him a ransom. Spurgeon.

7210. CHRISTIAN, Countersign of the. A Christian soldier said in a religious meeting, "This morning, on guard, I forgot my watchword. I was troubled; but, as I was thinking of it this thought came to me: I have another countersign,—Christ,—and with that there is no guarded line in earth or heaven which I cannot pass. When I had thought of that a little while, my other countersign came to mind and all was right."

7211. CHRISTIAN, Detention of the. An old divine compares God's treatment of the Christian to the course of a river. Its tendency is to go straight to its master, the ocean; but God sets a hill here and a mountain there, and thus compels it to make a long journey to fertilize and beautify the earth. So the young Christian "longs to depart and be with Christ," but his course is prolonged that he may carry blessings to all the associates of his life.

7212. CHRISTIAN, Faithful. I have read of that noble servant of God, Marcus Arethusius, minister of a church in the time of Constantine, who in Constantine's time had been the cause of overthrowing an idol's temple; afterwards, when Julian came to be emperor, he would force the people of that place to build it up again. They were ready to do it, but he refused; whereupon those that were his own people, to whom he preached, took him, and stripped him of all his clothes, and abused his naked body, and gave it up to the children, to lance it with their pen-knives, and then caused him to be put in a basket, and anointed this naked body with honey, and set him in the sun, to be stung with wasps. And all this cruelty they showed because he would not do anything towards the building up of this idol temple; nay, they came to this, that if he would do but the least towards it, if he would give but a half-penny to it, they would save him. But he refused all, though the giving of a half-penny might have saved his life; and in doing this, he did but live up to that principle that most Christians talk of, and all profess, but few come up to, viz., that we must choose rather to suffer the worst of torments that men and devils can invent and inflict, than to commit the least sin, whereby God should be dishonored, our consciences wounded, religion reproached, and our own souls endangered. Brooks.

7213. CHRISTIAN, Glory of the. His glory is from within. It is a radiation. Put him where you will, he shines, and cannot but shine. God made him to shine. For instance: imprison Joseph, and he will shine out on all Egypt, cloudless as the sky where the rain never falls. Imprison Daniel, and the dazzled lions will retire to their lairs, and the king comes forth to worship at his rising, and all Babylon bless the beauty of the brighter and better day. Imprison Peter, and, with an angel for a harbinger star, he will swell his aurora from the fountains of Jordan to the walls of Beersheba, and break like the morning over mountain and sea. Imprison Paul, and there will be high noon over all the Roman Empire. Imprison John, and the Isles of the Ægean and all the coasts around will kindle with sunset visions too gorgeous to be described, but never to be forgotten—a boundless panorama of prophecy, gliding from sky to sky and enchanting the nations with openings of heaven, transits of saints and angels, and the ultimate glory of the city and kingdom of God. Not only so; for modern times have similar examples—except examples in the church, and examples in the state. For instance, bury Luther in the depths of the Black Forest, and the "angel that dwelt in the bush" will honor him there; the trees around him will burn like shafts of ruby, and his glowing orbs will lume up again, round and clear as the light of all Europe. Thrust Bunyan into the gloom of Bedford jail—and as he leans his head on his hand, the murky horizon of Britain will flame with fiery symbols—"delectable mountains" and celestial mansions, with holy pilgrims grouped on the golden hills, and the bands of bliss, from the gates of pearl, hastening to welcome him home. Stockton.

7214. CHRISTIAN, God-bearing. Saint Ignatius, Bishop of Antioch, one of the apostolic fathers, because of his sanctity received the name of Theophorus, the God-bearer. Trajan is said to have asked him why he had the surname, Theophorus? He replied, because "I bore Christ in my heart." "Dost thou mean him that was crucified?" asked the emperor, scornfully. Ignatius answered, "The very same, who, by his death, overcame sin, and enabled those who bear him in their hearts to trample under foot all the powers of the devils." Then he was ordered to be taken to Rome and given to wild beasts. A fabulous writer says that after his death the name of God was found written upon his heart in letters of gold. He suffered martyrdom A. D. 107, being devoured by wild beasts in the Amphitheatre at Rome.

7215. CHRISTIAN, Growth of the. Here, no ornament to park or garden, stands a dwarfed, stunted, bark-bound tree. How am I to develop that stem into tall and graceful beauty, to clothe with blossom these naked branches, and hang them, till they bend with clustered fruit? Change such as that is not to be effected by surface dressing, or any care bestowed on the upper soil. The remedy must go to the root. You cannot make that tree grow upwards till you break the crust below, pulverize the hard subsoil, and give the roots room and way to strike deeper down; for the deeper the root, and wider spread the filaments of its rootlets, the higher the tree lifts an umbrageous head to heaven, and throws out its hundred arms to catch in dews, rain-drops, and sun-beams, the blessings of the sky. The believer in respect of character, a tree of righteousness, of the Lord's planting; in respect of strength, a cedar of Lebanon; in respect of fruitfulness, an olive; in respect of position, a palm-tree planted in the courts of God's house; in respect of full supplies of grace, a tree by the rivers of water, which yielded its fruit in its season, and whose leaf does not wither, offers this analogy between grace and nature, that as the tree grows best skyward that grows most downward, the lower the saint descends in humility the higher he rises in holiness. The soaring corresponds to the sinking. Dr. Guthrie.

7216. CHRISTIAN, Knowledge Necessary to a. A missionary says: "I used to speculate as to how much divine truth a man would have to know before he could become a Christian. India and the Telooongs have settled it. A man must know himself a sinner, and Jesus a Saviour; that is all."

7217. CHRISTIAN, Resources of the. The minister of Frederick the Great to the court of St. James, complained to his royal master that he could not maintain the equipage which characterized the representatives of other powers. That monarch replied, "Remember that you have Frederick and his hundred thousand Prussians to attend you." How much greater dignity is his who has the omnipotent God, the omnipresent Christ, and legions of angels for his defense?

7218. CHRISTIAN, Right Kind of. An officer was accosted by a brother officer thus—"You're the right kind of Christian,—not bothering people about their souls this way." The speaker himself made no pretensions to serious godliness; and the allusion was to certain officers who had a way of speaking out very intelligibly for Christ. Our friend had himself been converted; but, up to that time, he had been too timid to utter any articulate testimony. As his visitor left him that day, he began to reason with himself—"Well, if that man thinks I am the right kind of Christian, is time I was looking about me and considering my ways." It was a somewhat novel point of departure; but, from that hour, our friend has been another man, boldly confessing Christ and laboring to win souls. Power.

7219. CHRISTIAN, Royalty of a. An old African negro, who had long served the Lord, when on his death-bed was visited by his friends, who came around him lamenting that he was going to die, saying, "Poor Pompey! poor Pompey is dying." The old saint, animated with the prospect before him, said to them with much earnestness, "Don't call me poor Pompey. I king Pompey."

7220. CHRISTIAN, Shield of the. In the agonies of dissolution Epaminondas asks, "Is my shield safe? are the Thebans victorious?" Viewing his shield which was brought to him, and being informed that the Spartans were defeated, a gleam of joy prevailed for a moment over the languor of death. "Mine," said he, "is a glorious departure; I die in the arms of victory; tell me not that I am childless, for Leuctra and Mantinea (meaning his victories there) are immortal children." Thus the apostle could triumph: his shield was safe; his course finished with honor; leaving behind multitudes of spiritual children, as trophies of victory, who shall be his joy and crown of rejoicing in the day of the Lord Jesus. Buck.

7221. CHRISTIAN Soldier. The Christian is a member of Christ's Church militant, and his duty is ever to be fighting against sin, the world, and the devil. If you read St. Paul's description of the armor of the Christian man, you will find every place armed but one. There is a helmet for the head and greaves for the legs, and a breast-plate for the chest—but no armor for the back. His duty is to stand with his face to the foe. I well remember how in my school-boy days I was struck by the fact of the lords of Roslin all being laid in the vaults of the chapel dressed in their knightly armor. The Christian has not, it is true, to carry his warfare beyond the hour of death; but like that great Duke of Northumberland, who, when he came to die, insisted on being clothed in his armor, and, sitting on his bed, faced the last enemy lance in hand, we must, till the last breath pass from us, never cease from fighting against sin. J. G. Pilkington.

7222. CHRISTIAN, Three Eyes of a. A faithful man hath three eyes: the first, of sense, common to him with brute creatures; the second, of reason, common to all men; the third, of faith, proper to his profession; whereof each looketh beyond other, and none of them meddeth with others' objects. For, neither doth the eye of sense reach to intelligible things and matters of discourse; nor the eye of reason to those things which are supernatural and spiritual; neither doth faith look down to things that may be sensibly seen. Bp. Hall.

7223. CHRISTIAN, The True. He that can apprehend and consider vice with all her baits and seeming pleasures, and yet abstain, and yet distinguish, and yet prefer that which is truly better, he is the true wayfaring Christian. I cannot praise a fugitive and cloistered virtue unexercised, and unbreathed, that never sallies out and sees her adversary, but slinks out of the race where that immortal garland is to be run for, not without dust and heat. Milton.

7224. CHRISTIAN, Two Worlds of the. A Christian lives in two worlds at one and the same time—the world of flesh and the world of spirit. It is possible to do both. There are certain dangerous gases, which from their weight fall to the lower part of the place where they are, making it destructive for a dog to enter, but safe for a man who holds his head erect. A Christian, as living in the world of flesh, is constantly passing through these. Let him keep his head erect in the spiritual world, and he is safe. He does this so long as the Son of God is the fountain whence he draws his inspiration, his motives, encouragement, and strength. George Philip.

7225. CHRISTIANITY, Active. Suppose that a recluse had been discovered living alone on the side of the Alleghany mountains, in the times of the Revolution, and one of the soldiers, speaking to General Washington of him, had said: "That man—oh, what a patriot he can be, in his cabin, meditating upon his country's glory! If he was down in the camp, amid the roar of battle, or on the tedious march, he could not be a patriot!" What do you think about that? Would you not say of a patriot on the side of a mountain, that a toadstool or a mushroom was just as good, and that the man that took the front of the conflict was the patriot? Now I aver that while it may, in the providence of God, be the duty of some men to serve God by standing still, while there may be here and there a special case in which a good Christian is made out of a man that does nothing, there are far more chances of your being a Christian if you apply your powers to the active duties of life than if you do not. It is a dastardly thing for a man to run away from life, for the sake of not being tempted by it. Talmage.

7226. CHRISTIANITY, Confidence in. Two men were fellow-travelers upon the Western frontier, one of whom took every occasion to declare Christianity a delusion, and its professors hypocrites, and declared that he always took especial care of his valuables when in their company. One night they sought shelter at the uninviting cabin of a poor settler, and were welcomed to the best the place afforded. The suspicion of the travelers became aroused; this cordiality might be intended to deceive, and the loneliness of the place seemed to invite deeds of darkness. They resolved to take special precaution against surprise to have their weapons ready, and one was to watch while the other slept. Before retiring to rest the host, an old man, took down a well-worn Bible, read a portion, then prayed, asking that the strangers might have prosperity on their journey, and when their earthly journey should end, that they might have a home in heaven. Retired to their room, the sceptic, to whom fell the first watch, instead of priming his pistols, prepared for sleep. His companion reminded him of their arrangement, and the infidel confessed that he could but feel as safe where the Bible was read and such prayers offered as they had just listened to, as at a New England fireside.

7227. CHRISTIANITY, Diffusion of. A few persons of an odious and despised country could not have filled the world with believers, had they not shown undoubted credentials from the divine person who sent them on such a message. Addison.

7228. CHRISTIANITY, Early Conquests of. Arnobius, a heathen philosopher, who became a Christian, speaking of the power which the Christian faith had over the minds of men, says, "Who would not believe it, when he sees in how short a time it has conquered so great knowledge? Orators, grammarians, rhetoricians, lawyers, physicians, and philosophers, have thrown up those opinions which but a little before they held, and have embraced the doctrines of the gospel!" Tertullian says, "Though but of yesterday, yet have we filled your cities, islands, castles, corporations, councils, your armies themselves, your tribes, companies, the palace, the senate, and courts of justice; only your temples have we left you free."

7229. CHRISTIANITY, Evidence of. Dr. Cotton visited Dr. Young, author of the "Night Thoughts," about a fortnight before his last illness. The subject of conversation was "Newton on the Prophecies," when Dr. Young closed the conversation thus:—"My friend, there are three considerations upon which my faith in Christ is built, as upon a rock: The fall of man, the redemption of man, and the resurrection of man. These three cardinal articles of our religion are such as human ingenuity could never have invented; therefore they must be divine. The other argument is this: If the prophecies have been fulfilled, of which there is abundant demonstration, the scripture must be the word of God; and if the scripture is the word of God, Christianity must be true."

7230. CHRISTIANITY, Intellect and. It has been the fashion, and is now, to take it for granted that intellect has no brotherhood with Christianity, that by giving the heart to God intellect is enslaved, and all exercises of the mind are crippled. Is it so? We mourn over the fact that in many cases intellect has been given to Satan, that mental power has been perverted from the loftiest purposes, and not consecrated to purposes for which it was given. Thomas Moore stands in the foremost rank as a master of words, but some of his writings have no other purpose than putting a color upon vice. Of Percy Shelley we are ready to believe that when his body was recovered a Bible was found next his heart, and we are ready to believe, with Southey, that if he had lived longer he would have become a Christian; but we cannot forget that he had no hesitation in subscribing himself as scorning to have anything to do with religion. We acknowledge that Byron has scarcely an equal, but we cannot forget how the mighty power he possessed was debased and desecrated unto evil. We are inclined to believe that one page of his writings does more harm than all the rest put together have done good. But has intellect no brotherhood with religion? Have we no samples on the other side? We glory in the majestic verses and grand poetry of John Milton, but we glory most of all in that piety which dwelt in his heart as depicted in "Paradise Lost," yet regained. Pollock, Montgomery, Philip James Bailey are other cases in point, and with these in our mind, shall we say that intellect has no brotherhood with Christianity? Atheism and intellect have gone together; but intellect is highest when devoted to Christianity, and so long as the writings of the Prophet Isaiah remain, we shall see that the mightiest genius and the profoundest piety can go hand in hand together. Anon.

7231. CHRISTIANITY, Low Standard of. The reader is probably amazed at the paucity of large stars in the firmament of heaven! Will he permit me to carry his mind a little further, and either stand astonished at or deplore with me the fact that out of the millions of Christians in the vicinity and splendor of the eternal Sun of Righteousness, how very few are found of the first order? How very few can stand examination by the test laid down in the thirteenth chapter of the First Epistle to the Corinthians! How very few love God with all their heart, soul, mind, and strength, and their neighbor as themselves! How few mature Christians are found in the church! How few are in all things living for eternity! How little light, how little heat, and how little influence and activity are to be found among them that bear the name of Christ! How few stars of the first magnitude will the Son of God have to deck the crown of his glory! Few are striving to excel in righteousness; and it seems to be a principal concern with many to find out how little grace they may have and yet get to heaven. In the fear of God I register this testimony, that I have perceived it to be the labor of many to lower the standard of Christianity, and to soften down or explain away those promises of God that himself has linked with duties; and because they know that they cannot be saved by their good works, they are contented to have no good works at all; and thus the necessity of Christian obedience and Christian holiness makes no prominent part of some modern creeds. Let all those who retain the apostolic doctrine, that the blood of Christ cleanseth from all sin in this life, press every believer to go on to perfection, and expect to be saved while here below, into the fullness of the blessing of the gospel of Jesus.

Dr. A. Clark.

7232. CHRISTIANITY, Mission of. Christ appeared; the career of Paganism was checked, the fate of Judaism was sealed. A character and a religion were placed before the eyes of men hitherto inconceivable, in the beauty and philosophy of their nature. Unlike all other founders of a religious faith, Christ had no selfishness, no desire of dominance; and his system, unlike all other systems of worship, was bloodless, boundlessly beneficent, inexpressibly pure, and, most marvelous of all, went to break all bonds of body and soul, and to cast down every temporal and every spiritual tyranny.

William Howitt.

7233. CHRISTIANITY, Mocking. A play was arranged to be enacted in the theatre at Rome, burlesquing the Christian religion, for the entertainment of Diocletian, the Emperor. A great crowd was present. Genes, a clever mimic, had the leading part. The curtain rose, exposing Genes lying on a bed, sick and groaning. He moaned out: "I am weighed down; the burden of the past is on my conscience; my sins oppress me unendurably. Oh! that I could obtain relief—that I was light and free." "Why, how so, good fellow?" said the other actors: "if you are burdened, how can we lighten you?" "Ah! ah!" laughed the clown, "there is only one way to lighten him; we must take him to a carpenter and have him sawn and planed down." "No," said the sick man, "I wish to die a Christian; by that means only can I obtain relief." "Why, what do you want to be a Christian for?" "To fly to my God." "Call in a priest and an exorcist." In come two actors dressed in character. The priest sat down by the bed and said, "Why hast thou sent for me, my son?" "I desire the favor of Christ," replied Genes, "by which I may be born again to a new, a holier, and purer life." A great vat of water was placed on the stage, the usual formula of baptism was recited, the sick man was drawn out of bed and plunged into the water, amidst bursts of merriment from the audience, and afterwards he was clothed in white. In the next act, Roman soldiers rushed upon the stage, seized the new convert and drew him before the stall of Diocletian to be tried and sentenced. Genes shook off his guard and sprang upon a pedestal to address the crowd. "Sire, and all you present, hear what I say. I have ever hated the Christian name, and I have exulted when I have seen Christians brought before the magistrate. My parents and kinsmen have been Christians, and from them I heard all concerning the faith, and the manner of conducting the sacraments. But all I heard I turned to mockery, and this day have used my knowledge for the purpose of a merry jest against them. But, io! sire, as I lay on the bed the realities of sickness and approaching death stood naked before me. And all my sins from infancy rose up before me, filling a long dark void. Sire, believe me, when the water touched me and I renounced the evil one with my lips, my heart went with my words. And I saw a great light, and the darkness of sin seemed to roll away before the clear dawn of a heavenly light. And now, sire, and all you people who have been laughing so heartily, believe me when I say that I confess Christ as very God, and that he is the true light shining, the eternal truth and perfect goodness, and in him, and him only do I trust." There was an appearance of reality in the actor now. His tones, his look, his attitude, convinced all that this was no longer burlesque. Diocletian said to Genes, "Jesting may be carried too far." He ordered him behind the scenes and that the piece should be changed. "Sire, I am in earnest," said the actor. "Then I shall be in earnest also. Ho! let him be beaten." Blows were showered upon him, and the Emperor ordered that he should be taken before the prefect. He bore torture with great fortitude, saying, "There is no king but him I have seen, whom I adore: his I am and his I shall be. Bitterly do I repent that I know him only so late." His resolution being unalterable he was slain with the sword. The Holy Spirit made the form a power unto salvation.

7234. CHRISTIANITY, Morality and. About the time that Paul wrote, describing the moral corruption which prevailed in the city of Ephesus, Pliny, one of the wisest and most refined men of his age, speaks of the same city as "one of the luminaries of Asia." The one considered her as full of light, the other looked upon her as full of darkness. Both views were true, according to the standard by which the writers formed their judgment. Pliny saw her as the seat of the highest civilization that a people without revelation had attained. But in Paul's mind their impure and immoral deeds were made manifest, the false external of this world was judged. Underneath the glare of vain-glory he saw moral corruption. She was "a whited sepulchre, full of dead men's bones."

7235. CHRISTIANITY, Nothing Better than. Lord Chesterfield, when at Brussels, was invited by Voltaire to sup with him at a house of an infidel lady. The conversation happened to turn upon the affairs of England. "I think, my lord," said Madame C., "that the Parliament of England consists of five or six hundred of the best informed, and the most sensible men in the kingdom." "True, Madame, they are generally supposed to be so." "What, then can be the reason they tolerate so great an absurdity as the Christian religion?" "I suppose, madame," replied his lordship, "it is because they have not been able to establish anything better in its stead. When they can, I do not doubt that in their wisdom they will readily adopt it."

7236. CHRISTIANITY, Objection to. Mr. Brainerd when among the Indians, at one place where there was a great number, halted, and offered to instruct them in the truths of Christianity. "Why," said one of them, "should you desire the Indians to become Christians, seeing the Christians are so much worse than the Indians? The Christians lie, steal and drink, worse than the Indians. They first taught the Indians to be drunk. They steal to that degree, that their rulers are obliged to hang them for it; and that is not enough to deter others from the practice. But none of the Indians were ever hanged for stealing: and yet they do not steal half so much. We will not consent, therefore, to become Christians, lest we should be as bad as they. We will live as our fathers lived, and go where our fathers are when we die." He did all he could to explain to them that these were not Christians in heart, and that he did not want them to become such as these, yet he could not prevail.

7237. CHRISTIANITY, Permanence of. Christianity was the temple that was to be eternal, and on it, as unconscious builders, men were laboring in all the ages from the creation. And if so long in preparation, may we not anticipate it will be a finality? About the temples built by the kings of Oriental monarchies there were other lesser fabrics; but with the kingly one alone the idea of permanence was associated. So of St. Peter's at Rome and the Cathedral at Milan. The lesser fabrics have disappeared for ever. When Christianity was completed, its lesser structures and essential scaffoldings were all removed. Priests and smoking altars suddenly and forever disappeared. The temple of Christianity alone remains.

7238. CHRISTIANITY, Philanthropy of. Moravian missionaries in Greenland saw little fruit of their labor the first year. Toward its close the small-pox broke out among the natives in an awful manner, and the Moravians accommodated as many of the invalids as their houses would contain, surrendering to the afflicted even their only sleeping-chambers; and though unable to make themselves distinctly understood by words, they preached effectually by their conduct. One man, who had always derided them when in health, expressed his obligation to the minister shortly before he died. "Thou hast done for us," said he, "what our own people would not do; for thou hast fed us when we had nothing to eat; thou hast buried our dead, who would else have been consumed by the dogs, foxes, and ravens; thou hast also instructed us in the knowledge of God, and hast told us of a better life."

7239. CHRISTIANITY, Power of. Lucian and Marcian were heathen magicians of the city of Nicomedia. They were surprised to find that a simple Christian maiden could successfully resist their power. They burned their magical books, and were baptized in the name of Christ. In this name they went out to preach the Gospel to the Gentiles. In 250 they were arrested and asked why they preached Christ. Lucian answered, "Every man does well to try to draw his brother out of a dangerous error." They were cruelly racked and tortured, and reproached the judge, because when they were magicians and guilty of many crimes they were not punished, but now that they had become Christians and good citizens they were barbarously treated. They were threatened with greater torments if they would not deny Christ. Marcian answered, "We are ready to suffer, but we will not renounce the true God, lest we be cast into a fire which will never be quenched." They were then burned alive, and expired singing hymns of praise to God amid the flames.

7240. CHRISTIANITY, Rapid Progress of. The rapid progress of the gospel is recorded in the Holy Scriptures, and by profane writers. Tacitus, an historian of great reputation, and an enemy of Christianity, in giving an account of the fire which happened at Rome about thirty years after our Lord's commission to his apostles, asserts that the Emperor Nero, in order to suppress the rumors of having been himself the author of the mischief, had the Christians accused of the crime. "At first," he writes, "they were only apprehended who confessed themselves of that sect; afterwards a vast multitude were discovered by them." Pliny, the younger, also an enemy to Christianity, the Governor of Pontus and Bithynia, applied to the Emperor for directions as to his conduct towards the Christians. He wrote about eighty years after Christ's ascension. He says:—"Suspending all judicial proceedings, I have recourse to your advice; for it has appeared to me a matter highly deserving consideration, especially on account of the great number of persons who are in danger of suffering; for many, of all ages, and of every rank, of both sexes likewise, are accused and will be accused. Nor has the contagion of this superstition seized cities only, but the lesser towns also, and the open country. Nevertheless it seems to me that it may be restrained and corrected. It is certain that the temples, which were almost forsaken, are beginning to be more frequented; and the sacred solemnities, after a long intermission, are revived. Victims, likewise, are everywhere bought up; whereas, for some time, there were few to purchase them. Whence it is easy to imagine that numbers of men might be reclaimed, if pardon were granted to those that shall repent." Justin Martyr wrote about thirty years after Pliny, and one hundred and six after the ascension, and says:—"There is not a nation, either of Greek or barbarian, or any other name, even of those who wander in tribes, and live in tents, amongst whom prayers and thanksgivings are not offered to the Father and Creator of the universe, in the name of the crucified Jesus."

7241. CHRISTIANITY, Reason for Accepting. In one of the meetings held by the natives of the South Sea Islands to decide upon the adoption of the Christian religion, a noble chief arose and said: "It is my wish that the Christian religion should become universal among us. I look at the wisdom of these worshipers of Jehovah, and see how superior they are to us in every respect. Their ships are like floating houses, so that they can traverse the tempest-driven ocean for months with perfect safety; whereas, if a breeze blow upon our frail canoes, they are upset in an instant, and we are sprawling in the sea. Their persons, also, are covered from head to foot in beautiful clothes, while we wear nothing but a girdle of leaves. Their axes are so hard and sharp, that with them we can easily fell our trees and do our work; but with our stone axes we must dub, dub, dub, day after day, before we can cut down a single tree. Their knives, too, what valuable things they are! how quickly they cut up our pigs, compared with our bamboo knives! Now, I conclude that the God who has given to his white worshipers these valuable things must be wiser than our gods, for they have not given the like to us. We all want these articles, and my proposition is, that the God who gave them should be our God." This speech produced a powerful effect and the people gladly received the gospel.

7242. CHRISTIANITY, Reciprocity of. A Boston sea captain called at one of the Fiji islands. Supposing the people to be still cannibals, he armed his men for any emergency. He was greatly surprised on being accosted by the chief of the islands in English. He said, himself and people had become Christians through the labors of the missionaries. The captain became the chief's guest, and was requested to lead in family prayer. The captain said he had never prayed in his life, and could not pray. The converted chief knelt and prayed, not forgetting his white guest. Strange reciprocity! That captain found through the heathen's prayer what a Christian training had not imparted, become converted, and is now a missionary to the heathen. We help ourselves in helping others.

7243. CHRISTIANITY, Science and. A few evenings since my door-bell rang violently, and a young man, trembling in every limb, and with quivering lip, said, "Will you go and pray with a dying woman?" I said "Yes," and made all haste to the chamber of death. But how could I have gone had I been a mere preacher of science? What consolation and hope would disquisitions upon science, however elaborate and learned, have afforded that dying woman? I fancy she would have turned her pallid, ghastly face upon me in disappointment and reproach, and said, "Mock me not by reading my death-warrant. I know there is law. Law has placed me here, reduced me to a mere skeleton. Aye, it is the grasp of a broken law that wrings my soul with agony and rends it with fearful forebodings. But tell me, is there no hope? Is there no power above law, and mightier than law?" How my heart exulted that I could offer her a Saviour that was able to snatch her from the very jaws of death and bear her to the joys and blessedness of Paradise. And as I talked to her about Jesus her bosom heaved, her eyes filled with tears, her lips trembled in earnest prayer, and by faith grasping him she shouted in the swelling joy of conscious pardon and salvation, and died in the triumphs of faith. O what a difference there is between science and Christianity!

Dr. J. A. M. Chapman.

7244. CHRISTIANITY, Security of. The real security of Christianity is to be found in its benevolent morality, in its exquisite adaptation to the human heart, in the facility with which its scheme accommodates itself to the capacity of every human intellect, in the consolation which it bears to every house of mourning, in the light with which it lightens the great mystery of the grave.

Macaulay.

7245. CHRISTIANITY Shown. A native Christian missionary in India said: "I am, by birth, of an insignificant and contemptible caste; so low, that if a Brahmin should chance to touch me, he must go and bathe in the Ganges for the purpose of purification; and yet God has been pleased to call me, not merely to the knowledge of the Gospel, but to the high office of teaching it to others. My friends, do you know the reason of God's conduct? It is this. If God had selected one of you learned Brahmins, and made you the preacher, when you were successful in making converts, by standers would have said it was the amazing learning of the Brahmin, and his great weight of character, that were the cause; but now, when any one is converted by my instrumentality, no one thinks of ascribing any of the praise to me; and God, as is his due, has all the glory."

7246. CHRISTIANITY, Temporal Advantage of. A gentleman replied to one of Paine's tirades against religion and the Bible thus: "The Scotch are the greatest bigots about the Bible I ever met; it is their school-book, their houses and churches are furnished with Bibles, and if they travel but a few miles from home, their Bible is always their companion; yet, in no other country where I have traveled, have I seen the people so comfortable and happy. Their poor are not in such abject poverty as I have seen in other countries. By their bigoted custom of going to church on Sundays, they save the wages which they earn through the week, which, in other countries that I have visited, are generally spent by mechanics, and other young men, in taverns and frolics, on Sundays; and of all the foreigners who land on our shores, none are so much sought after for servants, and to fill places where trust is reposed, as the Scotch. You rarely find them in taverns, the watch-house, alms-house, bride-well, or prison. Now, if the Bible is so bad a book, those who use it most would be the worst of people; but the reverse is the case."

7247. CHRISTIANITY Tested. A clergyman, living in a community where scepticism and infidelity had led many astray, gave a series of discourses on the Evidences of Christianity. Of course more or less of his opposers were present, and on the last night of the series a prominent infidel came in. At the close of a very impressive meeting, the speaker said, in a spirit of tenderness, "There may be, and doubtless are some here to-night, who do not believe as I do, and who do not accept the truth of the Bible. If there are any such, or if there is one willing to come forward and test this question of such vital interest to every soul, I invite him to the platform." On the instant, the infidel referred to came forward and said, "I do not believe your doctrines; I cannot accept them." "But," said the clergyman, "you have denounced, for many years, that which you have never tested; are you willing that I, who have tried Christianity and feel its truths, shall be your teacher, and will you submit to my directions? You say that you are honest in your belief, and that in an honest spirit you will meet me." "I do thus meet you, and I will allow you to be my teacher." "Then," said he, "kneel by my side and repeat the simple words 'God be merciful to me a sinner!'" "But," was the reply, "I do not believe in your teachings." "Well, you say you are honest, and are willing to test this question; if so, you will heed my direction." The audience, in hushed expectation, heard the infidel as he sullenly kneeled, utter the words desired, with sarcastic defiance. "Again repeat those words," said his teacher in tones of utmost gentleness, and again, with a tone still more defiant, yet more subdued, the infidel repeated "God be merciful to me a sinner." Once more came the request to repeat the sentence, and before that audience, held by the power of the Holy Ghost, that petition went up in a tone of almost tenderness, certainly far different from the bravado with which it was at first repeated. A fourth time came the request, "Repeat it again;" and, with his strong frame quivering with emotion, the poor man poured out his soul's need in the prayer of the publican. At the fifth repetition, the man then and there, before the large assembly, offered up from his inmost soul the prayer which, when offered, meets with a forgiving Father's pardon. We give the simple facts, as told to us, and only ask the question of all unbelievers, "Why will you denounce a faith which you have never put to the test?"

Watchman and Reflector.

7248. CHRISTIANITY, Testing. A short time since, an aged man related to me his own history, which I give, as far as I can recollect, in his own words: "I did not believe in the Bible, or in the reality of religion, at all. I considered what was called Christian experience as a delusion, the effect of excitement upon the imagination, and Christians as a set of fanatics. I had studied sceptical writers, and was confirmed in my belief that death is an eternal sleep—no heaven, no hell. And yet, at times, as the years sped on, an occasional doubt would arise. The question would force itself on me, What if these things should prove true? Then what will become of me? After suffering long from these annoying doubts and suggestions, I at last resolved to try a method which would enable me to become entirely and forever free from them. I said to myself, 'I will secretly try the very method these Christians propose. They recommend prayer and Bible reading. I will test their own appointed way myself, and if there be anything in religion I will find it; if not, my mind shall never more again be disturbed by a doubt.' Accordingly, I secured a day of solitude, a Sabbath when all the members of the family were absent at church. I knelt and prayed: 'O Lord, if thou dost exist, hear me. If there be a heaven to gain, and a hell to shun, show it to me. I have never believed it, but if all these things be true, and the Bible true, reveal it unto me, and enlighten me.' Then I searched the Bible. Commencing with the New Testament, I read continuously chapter after chapter, with intense interest and absorbed attention, ever and anon asking God to show me the truth. The more I read the stronger my interest grew, and deeper and deeper the conviction, the astounding conviction fastened upon me, that all this is true! I have lived all my life believing lies! I am a sinner! I am lost! I examined the Bible throughout. I dwelt on the creation, the fall, the coming of Christ. Deeper and deeper grew the conviction of my guilt; my anxiety became intense, and I did not attempt to conceal it. Throughout every day of that week I spent all my time in searching the word of God and in prayer, sometimes spending the whole day alone in the wood, beseeching God to have mercy on my soul. At last, one Sabbath morning, just a week from the day I set apart to 'see if these things were true,' while riding to church, Christ revealed himself to me as a Saviour—my justification. The way of salvation seemed clear and plain, and I inwardly exclaimed, 'I know that my Redeemer liveth!' My soul was filled with unspeakable joy. 'My tongue broke forth in unknown strains, and sang redeeming grace.' I had, in truth, found out by my own experience the truth and reality of religion, and I soon commenced to tell others what a wondrous Saviour I had found."

Wm. Jones.

7249. CHRISTIANITY, Treatment of. Servile, and base, and mercenary is the notion of Christian practice among the bulk of nominal Christians. They give no more than they dare not withhold; they abstain from nothing but what they must not practice. When you state to them the doubtful quality of any action, and the consequent obligation to desist from it, they reply to you in the very spirit of Shylock,

"they cannot find it in the bond." In short, they know Christianity only as a system of restraint. She is despoiled of every liberal and generous principle; she is rendered almost unfit for the social intercourses of life, and is only suited to the gloomy walls of a cloister, in which they would confine her. Wilberforce.

7250. CHRISTIANITY, Trophies of. Ishoc el Ke-roony of Syria, a magician, and a member of the Greek church, was converted to Christ by the simple reading of the Bible, before he had even seen a missionary. He burned his books of magic, abandoned his church, and was cursed by the Greek priest. The head man of his town organized persecution against him, rooted up his crops, destroyed his cattle, nearly murdered him, leaving him for dead. This treatment went on for many years, he never daring to appear out after dark, till he was greatly reduced by his losses. He never swerved from the gospel principle of rendering good for evil, and of recommending Christ. At length his persecutor required his testimony in a suit at law. He stood up and testified to the truth, which won the case for his enemy. Yusef was now effectually subdued and became the strong friend of Ishoc, sending men and material to help build a house for Christian worship. Such is the power of true Christian conduct.

7251. CHRISTIANITY, Truth of. Athenagoras, a famous Athenian philosopher in the second century, not only doubted the truth of the Christian religion, but was determined to write against it. However, upon an intimate inquiry into the facts on which it was supported, in the course of his collecting materials for his intended publication, he was convinced by the blaze of its evidence, and turned his designed invective into an elaborate apology, which is still in existence. Whitecross.

7252. CHRISTIANITY, Zeal for. King Olaf, a notorious freebooter, after he began to rule in Norway, exhibited great regard for the ten commandments, so that he would not even whittle on Sunday. His zeal for the extension of Christianity was irresistible. The Saga says, "If any there were who would not renounce heathen ways, he took the matter so zealously in hand that he drove some out of the country, mutilated others of hands and feet, or stabbed their eyes out; hung up some, cut down some with the sword, and let none go unpunished that would not serve God." He went thus through the whole district, sparing neither great nor small. He had with him three hundred deadly men-at-arms. He went everywhere converting the people, severely punishing those who would not listen to his word. Occasionally the farmers combined against him to save their homesteads from the flames and from plunder, and their heads and feet from being hacked off by the over-zealous missionary king. Thus was Christianity extended among the Northmen in the tenth and eleventh centuries.

7253. CHRISTIANS, Advantage of. In a letter to John Sheppard, of Frome, Lord Byron said: "Indisputably, the firm believers in the Gospel have a great advantage over all others, for this simple reason—that if true, they will have their reward hereafter: and if there be no hereafter, they can be but with the infidel in his eternal sleep: having had the assistance of an exalted hope through life, without subsequent disappointment, since, at the worst for them, 'out of nothing, nothing can arise,' not even sorrow."

7254. CHRISTIANS, Attendants of. They say in England if a man walks he must be poor, if he sometimes calls a cab he is better off, if one footman rides behind him he is rich, but if two are on the back of his carriage he must have a great inheritance. God has no poor children; they all have a great inheritance; two footmen are always behind, "Goodness and mercy shall follow me all the days of my life." Or, goodness and mercy may be called God's watchdogs, following in the rear. Moody.

7255. CHRISTIANS, Comfort of. "For all I have preached, or written," said Rev. James Durham, "there is but one scripture I can remember, or dare grip to; tell me if I dare lay the weight of my salvation upon it, 'Him that cometh to me, I will in no wise cast out.'" His friend replied, "You may, indeed, depend upon it, though you had a thousand salvations at hazard." Joy lighted up the soul of the dying saint as he entered into the glory of eternity.

7256. CHRISTIANS, Contempt of. When a victim was slain for sacrifice, all the parts that were not fit to be offered on the altar were swept away from the floor of the temple, and cast out as pollution, and unfit to remain in the temple. "Now," says the apostle, "we are exactly like these parts of the sacrifice, which are cut off and cast away, and treated as unfit to be either dedicated to God, or employed in the service of man." A most expressive phrase, to denote the utter contempt in which the world held the apostles. Dr. Cumming.

7257. CHRISTIANS, Dwarfish. There was once in London a club of small men, whose qualification for membership lay in their not exceeding five feet in height; these dwarfs held, or pretended to hold, the opinion that they were nearer the perfection of manhood than others, for they argued that primeval men had been far more gigantic than the present race, and consequently that the way of progress was to grow less and less, and that the human race as it perfected itself would become as diminutive as themselves. Such a club of Christians might be established in most cities, and without any difficulty might attain to an enormously numerous membership; for the notion is common that our dwarfish Christianity is, after all, the standard, and many even imagine that nobler Christians are enthusiasts, fanatical and hot-blooded, while they themselves are cool because they are wise and indifferent, because they are intelligent. Spurgeon.

7258. CHRISTIANS, Endurance of. "I rode to Nallamaram," writes a missionary from India, "and saw some people of the congregation there, together with the catechist. The clothes of one of the women were rather dirty, and I asked her about it. 'Sir,' said she, 'I am a poor woman, and have only this single dress.' 'Well,' I asked her, 'have you always been so poor?' 'No,' said she; 'I had some money and jewels, but a year ago the thieves came and robbed me of all. They told me,' she continued, "'if you will return again to heathenism, we shall restore to you everything.'" 'Well,' said I, 'why did not you follow their advice? Now you are a poor Christian.' 'Oh, sir,' she replied, 'I would rather be a poor Christian than a rich heathen. Now I can say, respecting my stolen property, The Lord gave it, and the Lord has taken it again.'"

7259. CHRISTIANS, Failures of. A minister in whom the Rev. Andrew Fuller had once placed entire confidence, and with whom he had for a long series of years been very intimate, fell into an awful public sin, and threw a blasting mildew over religion throughout an extensive community. In the very midst of the intense excitement created by the sad event, came the season for a public meeting of ministers, annually held in connection with the church. Some of the neighboring clergymen proposed the omission of the service on account of the state of the public mind, but to this arrangement Mr. Fuller very decidedly objected. The usual session was held, and Mr. Fuller appointed to preach. A vast crowd assembled, expecting of course, some allusion to his former friend; nor were they disappointed. The sermon was on the sins of professors of religion—their frequency, causes, and awful result. His feelings throughout were very tender, and many of his hearers, both clergy and laity, were during the sermon mostly in tears. He, however, restrained his emotion within bounds till he approached the close of his sermon. Then addressing the unconverted part of his audience, he besought them not to become hardened in their guilt, or neglect to secure the salvation of their souls, because some who had borne the vessel of the Lord had sinned. "I need not," he added with great tenderness of spirit, "make a more distinct reference; but oh! remember that if I, and these my brethren in the ministry, and every other professing Christian in the world, were to make shipwreck of faith and character, and to fall into crime like poor —, religion would still be the same grand system of truth and morality, and you would be eternally lost if you reject it. The Lord Jesus Christ is the standard of character, and not poor sinners like us." Messenger.

7260. CHRISTIANS God's Hidden Treasure. "Thy hidden ones," Ps. 83: 3; "hidden" in respect to their safety; "hidden" in regard to their secrecy; "the world knoweth them not," 1 John 3: 1; "as unknown and yet well known," 2 Cor. 6: 9. Valuable things are often hidden: as in nature "full many a gem of purest ray serene," etc., like beautiful flowers behind the hedge; like beautiful shells beneath the sea; like beautiful diamonds beneath the earth. Men hide their valued treasures under lock and key, or in some safe hold. Eastern nations bury their treasures in the ground (Matt. 13: 44). The figure brings out many truths about the "hidden ones" of Christ's kingdom. Col. 3: 3, 4: "Your life is hid with Christ in God. When Christ—who is our life, shall appear, then," etc. The Christian is now in one sense like the manslayer in the city of refuge, hidden in safe keeping for a time; but the day is coming of "the manifestation of the son of God," when Christ will bring forth his own, and then shall the redeemed appear with the redeemer, and be partakers of his glory.

Bowes.

7261. CHRISTIANS God's Property. "Then shall ye be a peculiar treasure." The word peculiar, derived from Latin peculium, private property, has for its Hebrew equivalent segulah, which signifies wealth, and is used not only in the text quoted above, but also in Mal. 3: 17, with reference to the people of God's choice; and in the New Testament the Greek word contains the same idea of acquired property. See Acts 20: 28; 1 Pet. 2: 9, in which the pious Jew and the Christian are both God's peculiar people, for he has made them his own special property, consequently he exercises the most watchful care over them.

Biblical Treasury.

7262. CHRISTIANS, Inconsistencies of. In true kindness of heart, sweetness of temper, open-handed generosity, the common charities of life, many mere men of the world lose nothing by comparison with such professors; and how are you to keep the world from saying, "Ah! your man of religion is no better than others; nay, he is sometimes worse!" With what frightful prominence does this stand out in the answer, never-to-be-forgotten answer, of an Indian chief to the missionary who urged him to become a Christian. The plumed and painted savage drew himself up in the consciousness of superior rectitude; and with indignation quivering on his lip and flashing in his eagle eye, he replied, "Christian lie! Christian cheat! Christian steal!—drink!—murder! Christian has robbed me of my lands, and slain my tribe!" adding, as he turned haughtily away, "The Devil, Christian! I will be no Christian." Many such reflections teach us to be careful how we make a religious profession! And having made the profession, cost what it may, by the grace of God let us live up to it, and act it out. It is better not to vow, than, having vowed, not to pay.

Dr. Guthrie.

7263. CHRISTIANS, Making. A missionary says that he was once walking in his garden, when a poor Hindu boy, who had belonged to the mission school, came after him, and in a very gentle voice said. "If you please, sir, make me a Christian." The missionary was quite surprised at what he heard, and said to the little heathen boy, "I cannot make you a Christian, my dear child, but God can. You must ask God to forgive your sins for Jesus Christ's sake, and to send his Holy Spirit to live in your heart." Not a long time after, the same little boy came to the missionary and said, with a soft voice and a sweet smile on his face, "The Lord Jesus Christ himself has come to live in my heart." How is that?" asked the missionary. "I prayed," said the little boy, "as you told me; and I said, 'O, Lord Jesus Christ, if you please, make me a Christian.' And he was so kind as to hear me, and to come and live in my heart ever since."

7264. CHRISTIANS, Nominal. Many there are who, while they bear the name of Christians, are totally unacquainted with the power of their divine religion. But for their crimes the Gospel is in no wise answerable. Christianity is with them a geographical, not a descriptive, appellation. Faber.

7265. CHRISTIANS, Pagan. The Catholic missionaries, trying to convert a tribe of South American Indians, told them that their God would give them victory in battle. Thereupon they were baptized, and became Romanists. Soon after they went to try their new-found power in war against their old enemies. The result was they were badly defeated. Thereupon they threw off the religion which made large promises, but failed to perform them, and returned to their pagan gods.

7266. CHRISTIANS, Periodical. In some parts of the world there are certain boiling springs, called Geysers. Their peculiarity is, that at irregular intervals they send up spouts of boiling water, and then are silent for a considerable time. Travelers will tell you, that at the time when they are silent you will find it very difficult to believe that water would ever issue out of such an orifice at all. There was a revival some years ago, was there not? The gracious rain came down upon God's inheritance. How earnest you were!—how active! But the revival passed away, and your warmth and fervor and energy passed away with it, and those who look on you would find it very difficult to believe that you have ever been zealous in God's service at all. Dr. Punshon.

7267. CHRISTIANS, Rich. Often as the motley reflexes of my experiences move in long procession of manifold groups before me, the distinguished and world-renowned company of Christian mammonists appears to the eye of my imagination as a drove of camels heavily laden, yet all at full speed, and each in the confident expectation of passing through the eye of the needle, without stop or halt, both beast and baggage. Coleridge.

7268. CHRISTIANS, Riches of. The Emperor Decius called two Christian nobles of Corduna before him. He desired to execute them that he might obtain their wealth. He asked them where it was. They answered, "Here, these limbs are our treasures. Take them, break, spoil, hack, or burn them, that we may inherit eternal riches from our Lord." They suffered excruciating torments with anyielding consistency, and were finally beaten to death with crow-bars, and went to inherit eternal riches in glory.

7269. CHRISTIANS, Water-logged. A friend of mine said he was in Liverpool some time ago, and there was a vessel coming into the harbor.

It sailed right up the Mersey under full sail, and a little while after another vessel came in towed by a tug and sunken to the level of the water. He wondered it did not sink; and he went down to the water's edge and saw that they got it into the harbor with a great deal of difficulty, and he inquired and found that it was loaded with lumber. It had such material on board that it could not sink, and it had sprung a leak and had got water-logged. My friends, I think there are a good many of God's people that have got water-logged, and it takes all the strength of the church to look after those Christians that are water-logged, and so water-logged that they cannot go forth and do good to others—help the unfortunate, and lift up the poor drunkard, because they don't know whether they are saved themselves. The fact is they are off with the world; mingling with the world; acting, speaking, as though in the world, and they don't know whether they are saved themselves. Moody.

7270. CHRISTIAN UNION, Symbol of. It has been a frequent and a favorite metaphor, made use of by several eminent speakers and writers on this subject, to compare the fraternal union of churches, to the union of the colors in the rainbow; and a very beautiful metaphor it is. It was not till lately that the church of Christ has been at all entitled to this comparison; for if formerly it was like one, it was so distinct in its lines of color and with edges so sharp and defined, that they seemed to be intended to cut each other through the whole span of the arch. I should not admire such a rainbow as this; neither should I be much taken with a rainbow of one color only: I am afraid we should begin to dispute as to what color this should be; and if we agreed as to that, we should not long rest satisfied with it. One party would wish to have it enlivened with a little more red; and another would have it sobered with a little more purple. For my part I am contented with the rainbow of nature, with its distinct yet commingling hues; soft, beautiful, varied one. If we could see all the churches worthy to be compared to such an appearance, we say in the language of one of the writers of the Apocrypha "When thou seest the rainbow, bless him that made it; very glorious is it to behold, and the hands of the Almighty have bended it." I have no desire that the union of the churches shall be more perfect than this, till we enter into the colorless light of eternity, and see eye to eye, and face to face. Richard Watson.

7271. CHURCH Above and Below. The unity of the Church on earth with the Church unseen, is the closest bond of all; hell has no power over it; sin cannot blight it; schism cannot rend it; death itself can but knit it more strongly. Nothing is changed but the relation of sight; like as when the head of a far-stretching procession, winding through a broken hollow land, hides itself in some bending vale; it is still all one; all advancing together; they that are farthest on their way are conscious of their lengthened following.

they that linger with the last are drawn forwards as it were by the attraction of the advancing multitude. Dr. Manning.

7272. CHURCH an Ark. The Church has many times been compared by divines to the ark of which we read in the book of Genesis; but never was the resemblance more perfect than during that evil time when she rode alone, amidst darkness and tempest, on the deluge beneath which all the great works of ancient power and wisdom lay entombed, bearing within her that feeble germ from which a second and more glorious civilization was to spring. Macaulay.

7273. CHURCH, Arms of the. The Gauls were at a disadvantage when they fought the Romans, because their swords were short, blunt, pointless weapons, and the pikes of the Triarii were long and sharp, giving their adversaries a deep and terrible thrust. Many a believer has been worsted in conflict because of the bluntness of his weapon, caused by some unholy or imprudent deed, which has given the enemy an advantage in the strife. When we use the sword of reason, or science, or expediency, instead of the two-edged sword of the Spirit, which turns every way, it is no wonder that the foe gives the Church a deadly stab and drinks up some of her richest blood. Anon.

7274. CHURCH, Attendance at. Rev. Thomas Collins tells about a sick farmer, who relied much upon his punctual attendance at church. "Why," said the farmer, "if there were three absences half the parish would be asking after my health." Mr. Collins replied that "the church was a good place, and regular attendance a good thing; but church and market agree in one point; more go to each than ever do business at them. Do you always profit at church." "Not always, but church-going itself is something. My clergyman says: 'Neglecters of worship, like uncut rock in the delf, cannot be used; but worshipers, like quarried stones, lie ready at hand for the builder to place them in the wall.'" "Very good," said Mr. Collins, "and Christ the master builder is willing to put you in a place just now; but he himself, and he alone, must be your foundation." "Of course," was the reply, "I believe that." "A stone placed rests. Is your heart at rest? Does your faith make you happy?" asked Mr. C. "Happy! No. I am not happy. No man on earth is happy," he responded. "Nay, there I must contradict you; so resting on Jesus, I am happy, and thousands of others are so too." "Well, I expect I shall go to heaven." Mr. Collins replied, "Not unless heaven first comes to you. Does your corn ripen in the barn or on the ground? You, like it, must be ready here if you would be happy there."

7275. CHURCH, Attractions of the. There is a fable of Amphion, the son of Jupiter, which says that he moved great masses of stone, and raised the walls of Thebes, simply by making melody upon his lyre. The interpretation of the story is, that by the force of eloquence he constrained a wild, uncivilized people to unite themselves together in a league of brotherhood, and build a town strong enough to fortify themselves against their enemies. This is spiritualized in the history of the church.

7276. CHURCH, Baubles in the. When Oliver Cromwell was about to turn the members of Parliament out of their chamber, he pointed to the mace, and cried, "Take away that bauble!" When he shall come, who will effectually purge the church, he will say much the same of many ecclesiastical ornaments, now held in high repute. Gowns and altars, and banners, and painted windows, will all go at one sweep with "take away those baubles." Nor will the rhetorical embellishments and philosophies of modern pulpits be any more tenderly dealt with. "Take away this bauble" will be the signal for turning many a treasured folly into perpetual contempt. Spurgeon.

7277. CHURCH, Figures of the Biblical. Body of Christ, Eph. 1: 23—the emblem of union and subjection—many members under one head. Bride, the Lamb's spouse—wife, Rev. 19: 7; 21: 9; "my sister, my spouse," Cant. 4: 12—sister for purity, spouse for love; "a chaste virgin," 2 Cor. 11: 2. Building of God, 1 Cor. 3: 9; 1 Pet. 2: 5; Eph. 2: 21, 22. Candlestick, Rev. 1: 20; 2: 1. City, Heb. 12: 22; Rev. 21: 2—the emblem of order, security and harmony. Dove, Cant. 2: 14; 5: 2. Family, Eph. 3: 15—the dwelling place of order, affection and union. Fold, John 10: 16—the abode of peace and safety. Flock, 1 Pet. 5: 2. Garden, Cant. 4: 12; Isa. 58: 11—enclosed—fair—fragrant—fruitful. A house—habitation—household, Eph. 2: 19, 22. Lily, Cant. 2: 3. Temple, 1 Cor. 3: 16. Vineyard—Husbandry, Isa. 5: 1; 1 Cor. 3: 9. Burning bush, tabernacle, temple, apocalyptic city, New Jerusalem.

7278. CHURCH, A Bride. The journey which our divine lover took, was from heaven to earth; to win his bride, he exchanged the bosom of the eternal father to lie, a feeble infant, on a woman's breast. Son of God, he left the throne of the universe, and assumed the guise of humanity, to be cradled in a manger and murdered on a cross. In his people he found a bride deep in debt, and paid it all; under sentence of death, and died in her room; a lost creature, clad in rags, and he took of his own royal robes to cover her. To wash her, he shed his blood; to win her, he shed his tears; finding her poor and miserable and naked, he endowed her with all his goods; heir of all things, everything that he possessed as his father's son she was to enjoy and share with himself; for are not his people "heirs of God and joint heirs with Christ, if so be that we suffer with him, that we may be also glorified together."

Guthrie.

7279. CHURCH, Conquests of the. Plutarch says that nothing contributed more largely to the greatness and glory of Rome than the fact that when any people were conquered, instead of being destroyed, they were incorporated with her, and partook of the same privileges, and in time were allowed to share her honors. It is a parallel of the progress of the church.

7280. CHURCH, Contributing for a. A worthy Quaker who lived in a country town in England was rich and benevolent, and his means were put in frequent requisition for purposes of local charity or usefulness. The townspeople wanted to rebuild their parish church, and a committee was appointed to raise funds. It was agreed that the Quaker could not be asked to subscribe towards an object so contrary to his principles; but then, on the other hand, so true a friend to the town might take it amiss if he was not at least consulted on a matter of such general interest. So one of their number went and explained to him their project; the old church was to be removed, and such and such steps taken towards the construction of a new one. "Thee was right," said the Quaker, "in supposing that my principles would not allow me to assist in building a church. But didst thee not say something about pulling down a church? Thee may'st put my name down for a hundred pounds."

7281. CHURCH, Deadness in the. It was an Egyptian custom at festal banquets to introduce a corpse, and seat it at the table, to remind the guests of their mortality. Its fleshless, skinny hand rested on the board, but moved not the viands; the glassy eyeballs fixed their dead stare upon the guests, but the light of life, in which those orbs once swam, was extinguished forever. In such a presence the festivities proceeded. In such a presence proceed often the sacred festivities of Zion. I have seen a corpse at a sacramental supper, stone dead amidst the guests of Jesus. Not a tear on the cheek, nor a quiver of the lips when Jesus showed his wounds. The dull, dead, unlightened eye never sparkled, the bosom heaved not, the entombed tongue clove to the roof of its mouth, amid all the outbreak of a Saviour's love and tenderness! Alas! figures are inadequate to set forth the entire melancholy of the case.

F. F. Trench.

7282. CHURCH, Deliverance of the. A man, by a chain made up of several links, some of gold, others of silver, others of brass, iron, or tin, may be drawn out of a pit; so the Lord, by the concurrence of several unsubordinate things, which have no manner of dependence, or natural coincidency, amongst themselves, hath oftentimes wrought the deliverance of his Church, that it might appear to be the work of his own hand. Sometimes by ordering and arming natural causes to defend his Church, and to amaze the enemy. Thus the stars, in their courses, are said to fight against Sisera. A mighty wind from heaven, beating on their faces, discomfited them, as Josephus reports; so the Christian armies under Theodosius against Eugenius the tyrant, were defended by winds from heaven, which snatched away their weapons out of their hands; to make good that promise, "No weapon that is formed against thee shall prosper." So the Lord slew the enemies of Joshua with hail. And thus the Moabites were overthrown, by occasion of the sun shining upon the water. Sometimes by implanting fantasies and frightful apprehensions into the minds of the enemy, as into the Midianites and the Assyrians. Thus the Lord caused a voice to be heard in the Temple, before the destruction of Jerusalem, warning the faithful to go out of the city. Some times by stirring up and prospering weak and contemptible means, to show his glory thereby. The Medes and Persians were an effeminate and luxurious people; Cyrus a mean prince, for he was at this time emperor of the Medes or Persians, but only son-in-law to Darius or Cyaxares; and yet these are made instruments to dethrone that most valiant people, the Babylonians. As Jeremiah was drawn out of the dungeon by old rotten rags, which were thrown aside as good for nothing, so the Lord can deliver his Church by such instruments as the enemies thereof before would have looked upon with scorn, as upon lost and despicable creatures. For God, as he useth to infatuate those whom he will destroy; so he doth guide, with a spirit of wonderful wisdom, those whom he raiseth to defend his kingdom. The Babylonians were feasting, and counted their city impregnable, being fortified with walls and the great river; and God gave wisdom beyond the very conjectures of men, to attempt a business which might seem unfeasible in nature, to dry up Euphrates, and divide it unto several small branches: and so he made a way to bring his army into the city while they were feasting, the gates thereof being, in great confidence and security, left open.

Bp. Reynolds.

7283. CHURCH, Division in. A recent fable says: "A very hard-hearted clapper in an old church-tower professed the intensest distress because its bell was hopelessly cracked. Many people thought it a pitiable position, and wished the sad-hearted clapper a better bell. But just then the ghost of ancient Diogenes, the sage, floated in through the window, and whistled most angrily: 'Master Clapper, cease your noise, and remember, in the first place, you cracked the bell; and secondly, nobody would have known it had you not told them.' I have often observed that those who bemoan divisions in a church are they who make them; and I also observe sometimes that they who make them are most ready to publish the fact; I have observed another fact, viz., that all clappers are not of as good metal as the bells they crack."

7284. CHURCH, Diversity in the. In every corn field there are plants of sickly as well as of luxuriant appearance, supplying a fit emblem of the various characters which compose the true Church of Christ. Some indeed are stunted in their growth by various causes; others ripening in the full measure of the stature of Christ, having received a larger measure of the spirit of all grace, and engaged a more copious effusion of the beams of the Sun of Righteousness. Yet all these must be permitted to mingle together till the harvest. Each have their separate uses; and as the wise husbandman is content and thankful if the weeds do not overpower the corn, so the wise Christian will be grateful to God that errors both in doctrine and practice are not more abounding than they are, being satisfied that in the final issue and separation of the tares from the corn there will be nothing to complain of, but, on the contrary, that the purposes of God will work their way through all human hypocrisy and weakness, so as to fulfill the truth of the gracious promise.

Salter.

7285. CHURCH, False Alarm in the. During one of the wars between Austria and France a small company of French soldiers were very near falling into the hands of a much larger company of the enemy. But the shrewdness of a bugler saved them; for he, creeping around into the rear of the Austrians, sounded on his bugle a recall. They, supposing it to be from their own side, immediately ceased the attack on the French, and turned and fled in confusion, and the enemy pursued them with great vigor. So it happens that the Church of God is turned aside from its great advantages and great work by some cowardly foe, in the name and profession of a Christian, in their midst. Such men discourage every great enterprise. They urge the Church to "conservatism." They prevent, if possible, all attack on popular sins and follies, lest some godless rich man, or some empty-headed and empty-hearted woman of fashion, be driven out of the congregation. There are a good many cowardly professors, who are ready with Satan's bugles in their hands.

A. D. Vail.

7286. CHURCH, Foundations of the. A few years ago, in making a pedestrian excursion through the Green Mountain region, my friend and I came, one night, to the top of Mount Mansfield, and though the scene was very beautiful and the sunset very clear, that night there came on a furious storm. It seemed as if the little hotel in which we had been trying to sleep would be thrown from the mountain-top. We looked out of the little window down into the mountain-sides, and it was one vast sheet of lightning all the time. The thunders were harsh, and it seemed as if, in the violence of the storm, the mountain itself would fairly fall from its resting place. It was a fearfully stormy night. The next morning, however, we looked out of the same window. How calm and beautiful it all was! We looked down upon Lake Champlain, and the surface was just as smooth as if it had never been disturbed by the keel of a boat or a boatman's oar, and far to the north we could see the spires of Montreal standing up like silver needles in the far distance; and far across westward lay the Adirondack regions, the clouds of the night before skipping off as if ashamed that they had not done more damage; and looking eastward over the White Mountain range, the air was clear as crystal, and old Mansfield just as firm as ever. So, I thought, resting upon that firm mountain, is the Church of our Lord Jesus Christ. Scepticism may come with all the violence of its errors, temptations may assail, the thunder and lightning of opposition may come, the furious blasts may blow, and it would seem as if the Church were trembling and falling with the violence and the shock of the great tornado; but it does stand, and will stand, because it is founded upon a rock.

Dr. J. F. Hurs.

7287. CHURCH, Frozen. Look at that frozen stream. It moves not the mill which should grind the grain. The brook, which produces verdure on its banks while running, is useless to vegetation when frozen. The noble river, which bears millions of tons of freight, and myriads of passengers on its liquid bosom, is useless to steamboat and sailing vessel when bound in chains of frost. And what can a Church do for God or for souls when frozen by formality and pride? It may glitter brightly, but its influence will not hinder sinners from going to damnation.

E. Osborn.

7288. CHURCH, Invalids in the. I once read of a man who started with all his wealth for a fabulous country, where the people never died, and when he got there he found old great-great-grand people, who lived helpless, and had to be fed by their young descendants. It took one-half the population to feed the other half, and the Jew would not stay in that country. It seems to take half the church to take care of the other half.

A. G. Tyng.

7289. CHURCH, Leader of the. The army under the command of Paulus Æmilius, consisted of busy, talkative soldiers, each of them having some scheme of his own, and all being ready to advise their general. He gave them orders to the effect that each should keep his hand fit for action and his sword sharp, and leave the rest to him. Weapons of war are always prone to rust whilst soldiers debate and quarrel about plans of action. To be prepared for conflict is the duty of the Christian. But let our Leader be our only dictator, and, neither submitting plans to him, nor questioning his own plans, nor even submitting plans to ourselves, we shall be led on, under his high and sublime inspiration, to perfect victory.

Anon.

7290. CHURCH, Materials of a. In the second century, Celsus, a celebrated adversary of Christianity, distorting our Lord's expression, complained, "Jesus Christ came into the world to make the most horrible and dreadful society; for he calls sinners, and not the righteous, so that the body he came to assemble is a body of profligates, separated from good people, among whom they before were mixed. He has rejected all the good, and collected all the bad." "True," says Origen in reply, "our Jesus came to call sinners—but to repentance. He assembled the wicked—but to convert them into new men, or rather to change them into angels. We come to him covetous, he makes us liberal; lascivious, he makes us chaste; violent, he makes us meek; impious, he makes us religious."

7291. CHURCH, Membership in the. Many years ago I was on my way to Philadelphia, to fill a situation. In the car, same seat with myself, was a veteran Massachusetts man, who inquired of me my destination, my home, occu pation, etc. Rather suddenly changing the subject, he remarked:—"And your certificates—have you any?" "Yes, sir," and I handed him one in the handwriting of Wilbur Fisk. "Very good—very good; have you any other?" "Yes, sir," and I handed him one made out by Dr. Holdich. "Excellent—but have you no other?" "No more, sir." "None from your preacher?" "O, yes, I have one of that sort," said I, drawing it out instantly. "Well, sir, that is what I wished to see. Now let me give you a little advice. I am an old sea captain, and have seen a good deal of society, a good deal of the world, and a good deal of the church. I have found it good policy, in coming into port, always to tie my vessel up at once, fore and aft, to the spiles on the wharf, although it may cost me something for wharfage, instead of anchoring her in the stream, and letting her swing with the tide. You understand me, I see. Hand in your certificate, then, as soon as you reach Philadelphia." Allyn.

7292. CHURCH Militant. There was a small band of three hundred cavalry in the Theban army who proved a great terror to any enemy with whom they were called to fight. They were companions who had bound themselves together by a vow of perpetual friendship, determining to stand together until the last drop of their blood was spilled upon the ground. They were called "The Sacred Battalion," or "The Band of Lovers," and they were bound alike by affection for the State and fidelity to each other, and thus achieved wonders. The church are bound together by more sacred ties, and her annals show equal devotion.

7293. CHURCH, A Powerless. I have seen a large mill in which there was not a moving spindle. Its walls were beautiful and strong. Its machinery was wonderful in its completeness and variety. There was nothing wanting. Yet not a hum of noise was heard in the great building. There was not a shaft, or wheel, or spindle in motion. And when I inquired the cause I found that nothing was defective in the machinery. Nothing was broken or deranged. But when I went down to the engine room I found that the fires were all out. And that was the reason why the great mill was silent, and all that splendid machinery inoperative. Unless the fires were burning under the boilers the mill was useless. So there are churches with tall spires, strong walls, cushioned pews, magnificent adornings, many members, and perfect organizations, in which there is no motion, and no sign of life. And men wonder why it is, and can find no fault in the creed, in the organization, in the preaching or in the singing. But the fault lies further down—the fires are out. J. R. Miller.

7294. CHURCH, A Preaching. When Dr. Lyman Beecher was laboring most successfully in the city of Boston, he was asked how it was that he was able to accomplish so much. He replied, "It is not I that do it: it is my church. I preach as hard as I can on Sabbath, and then I have four hundred members who go out and preach every day of the week."

7295. CHURCH, Preservation of the. Christ preserves his church as a spark in the ocean, as a flock of sheep among the wolves. That the sea should be higher than the earth, and yet not drown it, is a wonder; so that the wicked should be so much higher than the church in power, and not devour it, is because Christ hath this inscription on his vesture and on his thigh: King of kings. They say lions are insomnes; they have little or no sleep; it is true of the Lion of the tribe of Judah; he never slumbers, nor sleeps, but watcheth over his church to defend it (Isa. 27: 2, 3): "Sing ye unto her, a vineyard of red wine; I the Lord do keep it; lest any hurt it, I will keep it day and night." If the enemies destroy the church, it must be at a time when it is neither night nor day, for Christ keeps it day and night. Christ is said to carry his church as the eagle her young ones upon her wings (Ex. 19: 4). The arrow must first hit the eagle before it can hurt the young ones, and shoot through her wings; the enemies must first strike through Christ before they can destroy his church. Let the winds and storms be up, and the church almost covered with waves, yet Christ is the ship of the church, and so long there is no danger of shipwreck. T. Watson.

7296. CHURCH, Pride in a. St. Pachomius built a fine church from his own design, and under his own supervision. When completed he entered it with some of his monks, and became conscious of the swelling of his heart, with pride at the beauty of the building which he had erected. He called to his companions, "Quick, get ropes, and pull these pillars out of the perpendicular, to tease my eyes whenever I enter this house of God."

7297. CHURCH, Purpose of the. Christ is the sun; his church is the moon, to reflect upon the world the light of the "Sun of Righteousness," during his absence in the heavens. In herself she has no light at all; without her sun she has virtually no existence; severed from him, she is nothing worth. The church has nothing whatever in herself which can radiate those beams of light, and life, and love, without which all is darkness within; yea, a darkness which may be felt. No doctrine will fully enlighten the mind, but the doctrine of Christ. No truth will dissipate the error of fallen nature's teachers, but the truth as it is in Jesus. The ordained purpose of God is, that the church upon earth should not dispense the heat of her absent sun, but continually, and unto all the ends of the earth, dispense his light. For this, and this alone, was the church ordained to exist in the world; this purpose must be sadly mistaken by those who virtually substitute the church for the Saviour; who, instead of holding her up in her true character, as the faithful reflector of the Sun of Righteousness, present her before us as a self-lighting instrument. Kida.

7298. CHURCH, Quiet of the. As we may say of a rock—nothing more quiet, because it is never stirred; and yet nothing more unquiet, because it is ever assaulted;—so we may say of the Church—nothing more peaceable, because it is established upon a rock; and yet nothing more unpeaceable, because that rock is in the midst of seas, winds, enemies, persecutions.

Reynolds.

7299. CHURCH, Separatists from the. One evening I went out with a shepherd to collect his sheep. After they had been gathered together, and were being driven off the moor, I observed that there were some among them who did not belong to his flock. I particularly noticed, also, that he paid no attention whatever to these wandering strangers, urged forward, though they were, by the barking dog, further and further from their rightful companions. At last, thinking I must have been mistaken in supposing they were not his, I pointed to one or two of them, and said, "Are those your sheep?" And he answered, "No." I said unto him, "Why, then, do you not separate them from the flock?" And he answered, and said, "They will find out directly they are not of us, and then they will go away of themselves." And immediately I remembered the words of John, and how he had said, "They went out from us, but they were not of us; for if they had been of us, they would no doubt have continued with us; but they went out that they might be made manifest that they were not all of us."

Anon.

7300. CHURCH a Tree. The church is a tree. Strip off its leaves, it is still a tree. It can put forth new leaves. Rob a church of its membership, the Bible and a ministry still remain, and new members may be won. Strip off the limbs of a tree, it may put forth others. Rob a church of its ministry, it can develop another. A church may lose its sacraments, and still be a church. Load a tree with poisonous vines, smother it with unclean things, it may possibly survive. So a church may be weighted down with auricular confessions, prayers to saints, and other superstitions, and yet it is possible they may die and it yet live and grow and clothe itself with beauty. But what of a tree without sap—a church without piety? Better root it up and occupy its place with another.

Dr. E. O. Haven.

7301. CHURCH, Victory of the. At the close of the war of 1866, the triumphant army of Prussia came to Berlin for a reception of welcome. As each regiment approached the city gate from the Thiergarten, it was halted by a choir, demanding by what right it would enter the city. The regiment replied in a song, reciting the battles it had fought, the victories it had won; then came a welcome from the choir, "Enter into the city." And so the next came up, reciting its deeds, and another, and another, each challenged and welcomed. They marched up the Linden between rows of captured cannon, with the banners they had borne and the banners they had taken, and they saluted the statue of grand old Frederick, the creator of Prussia. So, when all the fierce warfare of earth shall have been accomplished, and the kingdom of Christ assured, the phalanxes of his church shall go up to the city with songs and tokens of victory. They shall march in together, singing hallelujahs, and shall lay their trophies at the feet of him upon whose head are many crowns—King of kings and Lord of lords.

7302. CIRCUMSPECTION, Necessity for. Persons who want experience should be extremely cautious how they depart from those principles which have been received generally, because founded on solid reasons; and how they deviate from those customs which have obtained long, because in their effect they have proved good: thus circumspect should all persons be, who cannot yet have acquired much practical knowledge of the world; lest, instead of becoming what they anxiously wish to become, more beneficial to mankind than those who have preceded them, they should actually, though inadvertently, be instrumental towards occasioning some of the worst evils that can befall human society.

Bishop Huntingford.

7303. CIRCUMSTANCES, Adjustment to. If you cannot frame your circumstances in accordance with your wishes, frame your will into harmony with your circumstances.

Epictetus.

7304. CIRCUMSTANCES, Man the Creature of. To deny that man is, in a sense, the creature of circumstances, is equal to the denial that two and two make four; and to deny that man cannot make circumstances is equal to affirming that two and two make five.

J. Johnson.

7305. CIRCUMSTANCES, Master of. It is a painful fact, but there is no denying it, the mass are the tools of circumstances; thistle-down on the breeze, straw on the river, their course is shaped for them by the currents and eddies of the stream of life; but only in proportion as they are things, not men and women. Man was meant to be not the slave, but the master of circumstances; and in proportion as he recovers his humanity, in every sense of the great obsolete word—in proportion as he gets back the spirit of manliness, which is self-sacrifice, affection, loyalty to an idea beyond himself, a God above himself, so far will he rise above circumstances and wield them at his will.

Kingsley.

7306. CIRCUMSTANCES, Servants of. If a letter were to be addressed to that most influential word, circumstances, concluding thus: "I am, sir, your very obedient humble servant," the greater part of the world might subscribe it without deviating from the strictest veracity.

Horace Smith.

7307. CITIES, Benefit of. I bless God for cities. Cities have been as lamps of life along the pathway of humanity and religion. Within them science has given birth to her noblest discoveries. Behind their walls freedom has fought her noblest battles. They have stood on the surface of the earth like great breakwaters rolling back or turning aside the swelling tide of oppression. Cities, indeed, have been the cradles of human liberty. They have been the active centres of almost all church and state reformation. Having, therefore, no sympathy with those who, regarding them as the excrescences of a tree, or the tumors of disease, would raze our cities to the ground, I bless God for cities.

Guthrie.

7308. CITIES, Ignorance in. In cities, people are brought up in total ignorance of, and blamable indifference for, country affairs; they can scarce distinguish flax from hemp, wheat from rye, and neither from barley: eating, drinking, and dressing, are their qualifications; pastures, coppes, after-grass, innings harvest, are Gothic words to them. If to some of them you talk of weights, scales, measures, interest, and books of rates, to others of appeals, petitions, decrees, and injunctions, they will prick up their ears. They pretend to know the world, and, though it is more safe and commendable, are ignorant of Nature, her beginnings, growths, gifts, and bounties. This ignorance is often voluntary, and founded on the conceit they have of their own callings and professions.

La Bruyère.

7309. CITY, The Celestial. When you survey the spacious firmament, and behold it hung with such resplendent bodies, think—if the suburbs be so beautiful, what must the city be! What is the footstool he makes to the throne whereon he sits!

W. Secker.

7310. CITY, Sin in the. "Nine o'clock, all's well," once chanted the pacing watchman; but when he said, "All's well," the devil must have laughed in sardonic scorn: the red fires of his work were burning all over the crowded city. "Ten o'clock, and all's well;" and pious people said their prayers, and laid down to sleep; and here—and in this city alone—here two thousand dram-shops stood open, as he saw the sons of ministers and deacons, class-leaders, stewards, sons of very good people in the country turning in, well he knew for what they were in training. "Eleven o'clock, and all's well;" and yet theatres crowded with young men and women, boys and girls, lurid with the air of sin, redolent of blasphemy, the air thick with moral pollution, were in full blast; concert cellars gathered their motley crews; dance-houses rung with wassail cheer. The tempted, turned away from honest labor, sought in vain, crouched beside the wall, and an eager, hungry look was in their eyes. The devil must have laughed as he heard the drowsy watchman cry, "All's well," and saw good people sound asleep. "Twelve o'clock, and all's well." Once a year some churches hold a watch-night, and with solemn song and prayer live the old year out and the new year in. It is an event prepared for, talked of, got ready for, and remembered as an epoch. Now go out. Midnight! Hear the billiard balls as they are smitten; hark to the rattle of dice; hear the oaths and curses of men around their card table! The gambling hells keep watch-night seven times each week! Midnight! Yet through half-opened blinds streams the light of the house of the strange woman. Her doors are open, and from them there is a direct and short path to the shade of hell. On through the small hours, hot-footed, he keeps his way. Along his path is theft, and arson, and violence, ghastly murder, or outraged virtue; the sin-born babe is strangled; the wandering, homeless wretch takes his plunge into eternity to escape the starvation or retribution of time!

7311. CITY, Work in the. The reclaiming of men in the city is like digging out those noble monuments of the past so long buried amid the ruins of Nineveh. In excavating this vast population you have as it were laid bare the head of a huge winged bull, until you can observe that it has a human countenance and will well repay you for your toils. Are you going to congratulate yourselves that you have succeeded thus far? Why, there are the colossal feet, and the mighty wings, and all the rest of the body; all these are to be uncovered from the ruins, and the whole mass uplifted from the depth in which it lies imbedded. But, because you have done a little to bless London, and have brought a thousand, three thousand, ten thousand to hear the word of God, are you to sit down and say, "It is done." What is to be done with the rest of the three millions? Where are the other tens of thousands who are not hearing the word? Where is the great outlying mass of our leviathan city?

Spurgeon.

7312. CIVILITY, Neglected. An old man in the Olympic games, being desirous to see the sport, and unprovided of a seat, went about from place to place, was laughed and jeered at, but none offered him the civility; but when he came to the Spartans' quarter, all the boys, and some of the men, rose from their seats, and made him room. At this all the Greeks clapped and praised their behavior: upon which the good old man, shaking his hoary hairs, with tears in his eyes, said, "Good God! how well all the Greeks know what is good, and yet only the Lacedæmonians practice it!" And some say the same thing was done at Athens. For at the great solemnity of the Athenians, the Panatheniac festival, the Attics abused an old man, calling him as if they designed to make room for him, and when he came putting him off again; and when after this manner he had passed through almost all, he came to that quarter where the Spartan spectators sat, and all of them presently rose up and gave him place; the whole multitude, extremely taken with this action, clapped and shouted, upon which one of the Spartans said, "By heaven! these Athenians know what should be done, but are not much for doing it." A stranger being at Sparta, and observing how much the young men revered the old, said, "At Sparta alone it is desirable to be old."

Plutarch.

7313. CIVILIZATION, Current of. Civilization, like an immense stream, is carrying in its current science, power, and wealth, and any effort to oppose it must be utterly defeated.

Chevalier.

7314. CIVILIZATION, Future. There are half-a-dozen men, or so, who carry in their brains the ovarium eggs of the next generation's or century's civilizations. These eggs are not ready to be laid in the form of books as yet; some of them are hardly ready to be put into the form of talk. But as rudimentary ideas or inchoate tendencies, there they are; and these are what must form the future. Holmes.

7315. CIVILIZATION, Progress of. I think that the civilized world never was so happy in ancient times as it is now—relatively, I mean, compared with what civilization is now doing. If you go back two thousand years, even, you will find it to be so. Men like to praise old times. They like to praise, for instance, the good, old hearty days of England, before King Henry VIII. reigned, when there was simplicity, and when there was a rude yeomanry virtue, and when men were gay and happy. I tell you that were you to take these men up, and carry them back there, and let them sleep where men slept then, and let them eat what men ate then, and let them do what men had to do then, and take away from them what men did not have then, but do have now, you would hear the most piteous moaning and whining and complaining that ever afflicted your ears. For we have grown in the number of enjoyments, in the refinements of sensibility, in the realization of life, in all the sweet elements that go to constitute satisfaction in life. No pen can record, no tongue can tell, the growth that has been made in five hundred years.

Beecher.

7317. CLEANLINESS, Advantages of. With what care and attention do the feathered race wash themselves and put their plumage in order; and how perfectly neat, clean, and elegant do they appear! Among the beasts of the field we find that those which are the most cleanly are generally the most gay and cheerful, or are distinguished by a certain air of tranquillity and contentment; and singing birds are always remarkable for the neatness of their plumage. So great is the effect of cleanliness upon man, that it extends even to his moral character. Virtue never dwelt long with filth; nor do I believe there ever was a person scrupulously attentive to cleanliness who was a consummate villain. Rumford.

7318. CLEANLINESS, Experiment of. When Isaac Hopper met a boy with a dirty face or hands, he would stop him, and inquire if he ever studied chemistry. The boy, with a wondering stare, would answer, "No." "Well then, I will teach thee how to perform a curious chemical experiment," said Friend Hopper. "Go home, take a piece of soap, put it in water, and rub it briskly on thy hands and face. Thou hast no idea what a beautiful froth it will make, and how much whiter thy skin will be. That's a chemical experiment: I advise thee to try it."

Life of Isaac T. Hoffer.

7319. CLEMENCY, Benefit of. Alphonsus, King of Naples and Sicily, was asked why he was so favorable to all men, even to those most notoriously wicked. He answered, "Because good men are won by justice; the bad by clemency." Some of his Ministers complained to him of his lenity, which they said was more than became a Prince: "What, then!" exclaimed he; "would you have lions and tigers to reign over you? Know you not that cruelty is the attribute of wild beasts—clemency that of man?"

7320. CLEMENCY, Example of. A slave upset the boiling hot contents of a dish upon Hasan, the son of Ali, as he sat at table. He fell at his master's feet and began to repeat a passage from the Koran, "Paradise is for those who bridle their anger." Hasan replied, "I am not angry." "And for those who forgive men," continued the slave. "I forgive you," said Hasan. The slave finished the passage, saying, "For God loveth the beneficent." "Since it is so, I give you your liberty and four hundred pieces of silver," said Hasan.

7321. CLEMENCY, Noble. Louis the Twelfth the heir apparent to the throne of France, was persecuted and imprisoned by Charles the Eighth, the reigning king, the nobles and people uniting in the persecution. But Charles dying suddenly, Louis ascended the throne, much to the discomfiture of those who had been his enemies. Some sought to insinuate themselves into his good graces, while those that stood by him in adversity began to exalt themselves, and begged for the estates of their enemies. The king made this reply to those that urged their claims, "Ask something else of me, and I will show that I have respect unto your merits; but of this say no more, for the King of France doth not concern himself with the injuries of the Duke of Orleans"—his title before he came to the crown.

7322. CLERGY, Labors of the. A person expressed regret to Dr. Johnson that he had not become a clergyman, because he considered the life of a clergyman an easy and comfortable one. The Doctor made this reply: "The life of a conscientious clergyman is not easy. I have always considered a clergyman as the father of a larger family than he is able to maintain. No, sir, I do not envy a clergyman's life as an easy life, nor do I envy the clergyman who makes it an easy life."

7323. CLERGY, Office of the. Ministers of the gospel in this quarter of the globe resemble the commanders of an army stationed in a conquered country, whose inhabitants, overawed and subdued, yield a partial obedience: they have sufficient employment in attempting to reconcile the affections of the natives, and in carrying into execution the orders and regulations of their Prince; since there is much latent disaffection, though no open rebellion, a strong partiality to their former rulers, with few attempts to erect the standard of revolt.

Robert Hall.

7324. CLERGY, Snare of the. Before I parted with honest Glascott, I cautioned him much against petticoat snares. He has burnt his wings already. Sure he will not imitate a foolish gnat, and hover again about the candle! If he should fall into a sleeping lap, he will soon need a flannel night-cap and a rusty chain to fix him down like a church-Bible to the reading-desk. No trap so mischievous to the field-preacher as wedlock, and it is laid for him at every hedge-corner. Matrimony has quite maimed poor Charles (Wesley) and might have spoiled poor John (Wesley) and George (Whitefield), if a wise master had not graciously sent them a brace of ferrets.

John Berridge.

7325. CLOSET, Communion of the. Bengel was much given to intercessory prayer. One who was anxious to find out his secret, watched him, unobserved, in his hours of retirement. "Now," said he, "I shall hear Bengel pray." The aged saint sat long comparing Scripture with Scripture, till the hour of midnight sounded. Nature seemed exhausted. He folded his arms over the open word, and looking up, gave utterance to these words: "Lord Jesus, thou knowest me; we are on the same old terms." In a few moments he was sleeping soundly.

7326. CLOSET, Importance of the. The closets of God's people are where the roots of the church grow. And if the roots be not nourished, there can be no tree with branches and fruit. In many senses the root of the plant is the most important part of it. Men do not see it. It is hidden away down under the ground. Yet in the dark it works away, and in its secret laboratory it prepares the life which goes up into the plant or tree, and manifests itself in trunk and branches, in leaves and fruits. The beautiful leaf-fabrics are woven down in the looms of that dark earth-factory. The colors that tint the flowers are prepared in that lowly work-shop. The little blocks that are piled in silence, one by one, as the fabric of the tree goes up, are hewn out in the secret quarries of the roots. He that would bless a tree must first bless its roots. So it is in the spiritual life. It is not the closet which men see. It is not a man's secret, personal religious life which the world understands and praises. Yet it is in the closet that the roots of his life grow. And if the roots be not nourished, then the tree will soon die.

J. R. Miller.

7327. CLOSET, Meeting Christ in the. About the middle of the fifteenth century, in one of the retreats of his order, a pious recluse, as he used to walk with his brethren in the cloisters or in the garden, would sometimes stop and say, "Dear brethren, I must go: there is some one waiting for me in my cell." Those who heard him knew with whom he wished to commune.

This monk was Thomas á Kempis, the supposed author of that religious classic, "The Imitation of Christ."

7328. CLOSET, Secret of the. "Mother," said a girl, "I want to know the secret of your going away alone every night and morning." "Why, my child?" "Because it must be to see some one you love very much." "And what leads you to think so?" "Because I have always noticed that when you come back you appear to be more happy than usual." "Well, suppose I do go to see a friend I love very much, and that, after seeing him and conversing with him, I am more happy than before, why should you wish to know anything about it?" "Because I wish to do as you do, that I may be happy also." "Well, my child, when I leave you in the morning and evening, it is to see my blessed Saviour; I go to pray to him; I ask him for his grace to make me happy and holy; I ask him to assist me in all the duties of the day, and especially to keep me from committing any sin against him; and, above all, I ask him to have mercy on your soul, and to save you from the ruin of those who go down to hell." "Oh! that is the secret," said the child, "then I must go with you."

7329. CLOUDS, Transformation of. Did I mention to you what I thought as I saw the picture of the German painter some time ago? I could not make out what he meant by it. It was called "Cloud Land," and it seemed nothing but cloud upon cloud. As I looked I saw that every cloud turned into an angel or an angel's wing; and the whole picture, which at first seemed only a mass of gloom, looked out upon me with a hundred angels' eyes. So with all clouds, if God comes nigh to us by them; look at them and they turn into angels. They are not desirable in themselves. We foolish men would walk always in day brightness—we do not want clouds—but God knows their value, else he would never send them to us.

E. P. Hood.

7330. CLOUDS, Vanishing. More than once we had noticed in our early mornings dull masses of cloud in the sky. As the sun got up and gathered strength, these all vanished. They did not drift away, or pass to a different region of the heavens; but they vanished on the spot, such was the absorbing power of the desert sun. Clouds that would have brought a whole day's rain in our climate disappeared. We recognized the figure in Job,—"As the cloud is consumed and vanisheth, so he that goeth down to the grave shall come up no more."

Bonar.

7331. COLD, Effect of. Very striking and curious is the story of Dr. Solander's escape, when in company with Sir Joseph Banks, among the hills of Terradel Fuego. They had walked a considerable way through swamps, when the weather became suddenly gloomy and cold, fierce blasts of wind driving the snow before it. Finding it impossible to reach the ships before night, they resolved to push on through another swamp into the shelter of a wood, where they might kindle a fire. Dr

Solander, well experienced in the effects of cold, addressed the men, and conjured them not to give way to sleepiness, but at all costs to keep in motion. "Whoever sits down," said he, "will sleep, and whoever sleeps will wake no more." Thus admonished and alarmed, they set forth once more; but in a little while the cold became so intense as to produce the most oppressive drowsiness. Dr. Solander was the first who found the inclination to sleep—against which he had warned the others so emphatically—too irresistible for him, and he insisted on being suffered to lie down. In vain Banks entreated and remonstrated; down he lay upon the snow, and it was with much difficulty that his friend kept him from sleeping. One of the black servants began to linger in the same manner. When told that if he did not go on he would inevitably be frozen to death, he answered that he desired nothing more than to lie down and die. Solander declared himself willing to go on, but said he must first take some sleep. It was impossible to carry these men, and they were therefore both suffered to lie down, and in a few minutes were in a profound sleep. Soon after some of those who had been sent forward to kindle a fire returned with the welcome news that a fire awaited them a quarter of a mile off. Banks then happily succeeded in awakening Solander, who, although he had not been asleep five minutes, had almost lost the use of his limbs, and the flesh was so shrunk that the shoes fell from his feet. He consented to go forward, with such assistance as could be given; but no attempts to rouse the black servant were successful, and he, with another black, died there.

Banks.

7332. COMFORT, Abiding. I have taken much pains to know everything that was esteemed worth knowing amongst men; but with all my disquisitions and reading, nothing now remains with me to comfort me, at the close of life, but this passage of St. Paul—"It is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptation, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners:" to this I cleave, and herein I find rest. Selden.

7333. COMFORT, Greatest. Believe me, I speak it deliberately, and with full conviction, I have enjoyed many of the comforts of life, none of which I wish to esteem lightly. Often have I been charmed with the beauties of nature, and refreshed with her bountiful gifts. I have spent many an hour in sweet meditation, and in reading the most valuable productions of the wisest men. I have often been delighted with the conversation of ingenious, sensible, and exalted characters: my eyes have been powerfully attracted by the finest productions of human art, and my ears by enchanting melodies. I have found pleasure when calling into activity the powers of my own mind; when residing in my own native land, or traveling through foreign parts; when surrounded by large and splendid companies—still more, when moving in the small endearing circle of my own family; yet, to speak the truth before God, who is my judge, I must confess I know not any joy that is so dear to me; that so fully satisfies the inmost desires of my mind; that so enlivens, refines, and elevates my whole nature, as that which I derive from religion, from faith in God: as one who not only is the parent of men, but has condescended, as a brother, to clothe himself with our nature. Nothing affords me greater delight than a solid hope that I partake of his favors, and rely on his never failing support and protection. He, who has been so often my hope, my refuge, my confidence, when I stood upon the brink of an abyss, where I could not move one step forward; he who, in answer to my prayer, has helped me when every prospect of help vanished; that God who has safely conducted me, not merely through flowery paths, but likewise across precipices and burning sands. May this God be thy God, thy refuge, thy comfort, as he has been mine. Lavater.

7334. COMFORT, Personal. For the enjoyment of real personal comfort, I would rather, infinitely rather, be the occupant of the poorest hut, with its homeliest fare, in the coldest and bleakest cleft that flanks the sides of the Shihallion or Ben Nevis, than be the possessor of the stateliest palace, with its royal appurtenances, in the plains of Bengal. Dr. Duff.

7335. COMFORT in Trial. In the exhaustless catalogue of heaven's mercies to mankind, the power we have of finding some germs of comfort in the hardest trials must ever occupy the foremost place; not only because it supports and upholds us when we most require to be sustained, but because in this source of consolation there is something, we have reason to believe, of the Divine Spirit; something of that goodness which detects, amidst our own evil doings, a redeeming quality; something which, even in our fallen nature, we possess in common with the angels; which had its being in the old time when they trod the earth, and lingers on it yet, in pity. Dickens.

7336. COMFORTS, Carnal and Godly. Carnal comforts, like comets, appear for a time, and then vanish; when the portion of a saint, like a true star, is fixed and firm. A worldling's wealth lieth in earth, and, therefore, as wares laid in low, damp cellars, corrupts and moulders; but the godly man's treasure is in heaven, and, as commodities laid up in high rooms, continueth sound and safe. Earthly portions are often like guests which stay for a night, and away, but the saint's portion is an inhabitant that abides in the house with him forever. Swinmock.

7337. COMFORTS, Divine. In the multitude of our thoughts within us, the divine comforts do delight our souls; and it is they only that can do it. Miserable are all other comforters; and vain is all the comfort that they administer. Neither philosophic discourses, nor the common arts of diversion, music, dancing, drinking, or gaming, can afford any great or long relief to a troubled spirit: its weight will soon make way through these slight things, and indeed will never find a stay strong enough to bear it up, till it repose itself upon the divine comforts. After all experiments, its last sanctuary must be in God and religion. Norris.

7338. COMFORTS, How We Lose Our. The planet Venus teaches an important lesson to the followers of Christ, viz: that the earth was never yet known to come between her and the sun. Whence the languor, and the spiritual declensions, the darkness, and the soul distresses, of many a child of light? Come they not, very frequently, from giving way to earthly cares, earthly joys, and earthly pursuits? We let these things shut out the sun. No wonder that we move heavily, and walk in the dark, while we cultivate that "friendship with this world, which is enmity with God." But if, on the contrary, our affections are set on things above—if our treasure and our hearts are with Christ in heaven—we shall, probably, "walk in the light," and enjoy an abiding perception of interest in his precious blood which "cleanseth from all sin." Salter.

7339. COMMANDMENTS, Breach of Each of the. As David with a little stone slew Goliath, because his forehead was open, so can our enemy easily deal with us if he observe any faculty naked and neglected. The actual and total breach of any one commandment—total, I mean, when the whole heart doth it, though haply it execute not all the obliquity which the compass of the sin admits—is an implicit, habitual, interpretative, and conditional breach of all; his soul stands alike disaffected to the holiness of every commandment, and he would undoubtedly adventure on the breach of this if such exigencies and conditions as misguided him in the other should thereunto as strongly induce him. He that hath done any one of these abominations hath done all these abominations on God's account. There being then in a Christian man a suitable life and vigor of holiness in every part, and a mutual conspiring of them all in the same ways and ends, there must needs likewise be therein an excellent beauty.

Bp. Reynolds.

7340. COMMANDMENTS, Breaking the Ten. Lord Eldon told Mr. Spence, the queen's counsel, that he was first brought into notice on the northern circuit by breaking the ten commandments: "I'll tell you how it was. I was counsel in a cause, the fate of which depended upon our being able to make out who was the founder of an ancient chapel in the neighborhood. I went to view it. There was nothing to be observed which gave any indication of its date or history. However, I observed that the ten commandments were written on some plaster, which, from its position, I conjectured might cover an arch. Acting on this, I bribed the clerk with five shillings to allow me to chip away part of the plaster; and after two or three attempts I found the keystone of an arch, on which were engraved the arms of an ancestor of one of the parties. This evidence decided the cause, and I ever afterwards had reason to remember, with some satisfaction, my having on that occasion broken the ten commandments." Life of Lord Eldon.

7341. COMMANDMENTS, Burden of the. The Talmud reckons the laws of Moses to be six hundred and thirteen in number; i. e., the positive at two hundred and forty-eight, and negative three hundred and sixty-five. "To keep so many laws," said the Jews, "is an angel's work." Hence they had much question which was the great commandment, so that they might keep that in lieu of the whole. Lange.

7342. COMMANDMENTS, Disposing of the. Pericles told the ambassadors who came to him, desirous of making some changes in the Lacedemonian laws, that it was against the law to take down any of the tablets upon which a decree of the people was written. One of the ambassadors said there was no reason for taking them down, but "he could turn the other side outward—and there was no law against that." Too many treat the Commandments of God in the same way. They will not deny them altogether, but they cover them up, so that they may not be troubled by them.

7343. COMMANDMENTS, Rejecting the. An Antinomian called on Rowland Hill, to bring him to account for his too severe and legal Gospel. "Do you, sir," asked Mr. Hill, "hold the Ten Commandments to be a rule of life to Christians?" "Certainly not," replied the visitor. The minister rang the bell, and on the servant making his appearance, he quietly added, "John, show that man the door, and keep your eye upon him until he is beyond the reach of every article of wearing apparel or other property in the hall."

7344. COMMANDMENTS, Shortening the. The Abbe Boileau stated that the Jesuits had lengthened the creed and shortened the decalogue.

7345. COMMANDMENTS, Suppressed. As the second commandment so expressly forbids the use of images in the worship of God, the Roman Catholics omit it in their catechisms and books of devotion, and divide the tenth into two. The Rev. Mr. Temple, missionary at Malta, relates the following fact: "My teacher, a native of Italy, came into my room one morning, and took up a tract then lying on the table, and immediately cast his eyes upon the Ten Commandments, which I had inserted at the end. As soon as he had read the second commandment, he confessed much astonishment and asked whether this was part of the decalogue? I immediately showed him this commandment in Archbishop Martini's Italian translation of the Latin Vulgate. He could not suppress his feelings of surprise on reading this in the Italian Bible, and in a version, too, authorized by the Pope. "I have lived," said he, "fifty years; have been publicly educated in Italy; have had the command of a regiment of men, and fought in many campaigns; but, till this hour, I never knew that such a commandment as this is written in the pages of the Bible." Whitecross.

7346. COMMANDMENTS, Value of. The Queen does not make requests, does not even offer gifts; she commands those whom she favors to accept what she desires to bestow. Such is the formula which has grown into use as the most fitting medium for conveying a sovereign's gifts. The form is seemly, and the idea in which it originated is just. Yet the command of the sovereign is in its essence a bounty bestowed, is the greatest favor that a subject can receive. So when the King eternal means to confer on his child the richest privilege, he throws it into the form of a command. Arnott.

7347. COMMENDATION, Excessive. It is always esteemed the greatest mischief a man can do to those whom he loves, to raise men's expectation of them too high by undue and impertinent commendations. Sprat.

7348. COMMERCE and Christianity. Have you ever watched, in the balmy spring-time, the bee as it flits from flower to flower? and are you aware that not only is it gathering honey for its own use, but also that it conveys to the flowers that pollen or farina which causes the seed to germinate? Just so our merchants and mariners, in their eager pursuit after wealth, carry with them from shore to shore the seeds of the gospel of truth. And as we doubt not that God placed the honey in the heart of the flower for the very purpose of attracting thither the busy insect which should convey to it the seed of reproduction, so he has distributed in different regions of the world those various products—the cotton, the silk, the tea, the coffee, the indigo, the ivory, and the gold—which shall tempt the enterprising trafficker, and open the way to the missionary who shall sow the regenerating seed of life in the hearts of men.

Canon Melvill.

7349. COMMUNION, Divine. How many beautiful expressions suggest sweet thoughts as to the believer's near communion with God: Abiding before God, Ps. 61: 7; under the shadow of the Almighty, Ps. 91: 1; in the light, 1 John 2: 10; in the love of Jesus, John 15: 4, 10; as the branch in the vine, John 15: 4, 5; the beautiful emblems of constant nourishment, calm security, and upholding trust. Dwelling in the secret place of the Most High, Ps. 91: 1; in God, 1 John 4: 16; implying the ideas of refuge and rest. Delighting in the Lord, Ps. 37: 4; Isa. 58: 14—"If desire be love in motion, like a bird on the wing; delight may be compared to love at rest, rejoicing in its own happiness." Drawing near, Ps. 73: 28; as with Abraham's reverence and confidence, Gen. 18: 23. Entering into the holiest, Heb. 10: 19. Fellowship, 1 Cor. 1: 9; 1 John 1: 3; symbolized by eating and drinking together, as in the ancient sacrifices, and now in the Lord's Supper. Sitting in heavenly places in Christ Jesus, Eph. 2: 6, our heart and hope being there already. Bowes.

7350. COMMUNION, Open. One of our Baptist friends, Dr. Colver, visited his son's farm in Illinois. He found the gate at the usual place in front of the house, but the fence was down all along the road. He could have entered anywhere else just as well as at the gate. To him this farm seemed like an open communion church. It has a door, but is open all around.

Dr. Holme.

7351. COMMUNION, Renewal of. In one of the coal-pits of the north, while a considerable number of the miners were down below, the top of the pit fell in, and the shaft was completely blocked up. Those who were in the mine gathered to a spot where the last remains of air could be breathed. There they sat and sang and prayed after the lights had gone out, because the air was unable to support the flame. They were in total darkness, but a gleam of hope cheered them when one of them said he had heard that there was a connection between that pit and an old pit which had been worked years ago. He said it was a long passage through which a man might get by crawling all the way, lying flat upon the ground; he would go and see if it were passable. The passage was very long, but they crept through it, and at last they came out to light at the bottom of the other shaft, and their lives were saved. If my present way of access to Christ as a saint is blocked up by doubts and fears, if I cannot go straight up the shaft and see the light of my Father's face, there is an old working, the old-fashioned way by which sinners have gone of old, by which poor thieves go, by which harlots go. I will creep along it, lowly and humbly; I will go flat upon the ground; I will humble myself till I see my Lord, and cry, "Father, I am not worthy to be called thy son; make me as one of thy hired servants, so long as I may but dwell in thy house." In our very worst cases of despondency we may still come to Jesus as sinners. "Jesus Christ came into the world to save sinners." Call this to mind, and you may have hope. Spurgeon.

7352. COMMUNION, Sacramental. Especially in acts of sacramental communion with his Lord does the Christian gather up and consecrate the powers of his life-long communion with heaven. Then it is that he has most vivid impressions of the nearness of God to his soul, a most comfortable assurance of strength for his need. Bp. Mackarness.

7353. COMPANION, A Wise. In his company you learn how trees have tongues, sermons are found in stones, books in the running brooks, and good in everything. To him a blade of grass is a volume—a handful of simple flowers a library. A wise, communicative companion is a priceless treasure, not to be compared with rubies, precious stones, or indeed anything that this world has to offer. J. Johnson.

7354. COMPANIONS, Bad. A heathen named Bias was at sea with a number of wicked men, when a great storm arose, and they began to call loudly upon their gods for deliverance. Bias called out to them, "Forbear prayer, hold your tongues; I would not have the gods notice that you are here; they surely would drown us all if they should." Such is a heathen's conception of the danger of bad associations.

7355. COMPANIONS, Wicked. The impious lives of the wicked are as contagious as the most fearful plague that infects the air. When the doves of Christ lie among such pots, their yellow feathers are sullied. You may observe that in the oven the fine bread frequently hangs upon the coarse, but the coarse very seldom adheres to the fine. If you mix an equal portion of sour vinegar and sweet wine together, you will find that the vinegar will sooner sour the wine than the wine sweeten the vinegar. That is a sound body that continues healthful in a pest-house. It is a far greater wonder to see a saint maintain his purity among sinners than it is to behold a sinner becoming pure among saints. Christians are not always like fish, which retain their freshness in a salt sea; or, like the rose, which preserves its sweetness among the most noisome weeds; or, like the fire, which burns the hottest when the season is coldest. A good man was once heard to lament "that, as often as he went into the company of the wicked, he returned less a man from them than he was before he joined with them." The Lord's people, by keeping evil company, are like persons who are much exposed to the sun, insensibly tanned. Secker.

7356. COMPANY, Caution Regarding. Be cautious with whom you associate, and never give your company or your confidence to persons of whose good principles you are not certain. No person that is an enemy to God can be a friend to man. He that has already proved himself ungrateful to the Author of every blessing, will not scruple, when it will serve his turn, to shake off a fellow-worm like himself. He may render you instrumental to his own purposes, but he will never benefit you. A bad man is a curse to others; as he is secretly, notwithstanding all his boasting and affected gaiety, a burden to himself. Shun him as you would a serpent in your path. Be not seduced by his rank, his wealth, his wit, or his influence. Think of him as already in the grave; think of him as standing before the everlasting God in judgment. The awful reality will instantly strip off all that is now so imposing, and present him in his true light, the object rather of your compassion, and of your prayers, than of your wonder or imitation. Bishop Coleridge.

7357. COMPANY, Dangerous. Sir Peter Lely made it a rule never to look at a bad picture, having found by experience that whenever he did so, his pencil took a taint from it. "Apply this," adds Bishop Horne, "to bad books and bad company."

7358. COMPANY, How to Please. He that would please in company must be attentive to what style is the most proper. The scholastic should never be used but in a select company of learned men. The didactic should seldom be used, and then only by judicious aged persons, or those who are eminent for piety or wisdom. No style is more extensively acceptable than the narrative, because this does not carry an air of superiority over the rest of the company, and therefore is most likely to please them. For this purpose we should store our memory with short anecdotes and entertaining pieces of history. Almost every one listens with eagerness to extemporary history. Vanity often co-operates with curiosity, for he that is a hearer in one place, wishes to qualify himself to be a principal speaker in some inferior company, and therefore more attention is given to narrations than anything else in conversation. It is true, indeed, that sallies of wit and quick replies are very pleasing in conversation, but they frequently tend to raise envy in some of the company, but the narrative way neither raises this, nor any other evil passion, but keeps all the company nearly upon an equality and if judiciously managed, will at once entertain and improve them all. Johnson.

7359. COMPANY, Protection Against Bad. Rev. John Elliot was asked by a pious woman, who was vexed with a wicked husband, and bad company frequently infested her house on his account, what she should do? He answered, "Take the Holy Bible into your hand when bad company comes in, and that will soon drive them out of the house."

7360. COMPANY, Public. A religious judge, who had accepted an invitation to a public dinner, said to a scrupulous friend, "While I feel it my duty to attend on such an occasion, I certainly have as little pleasure in it as you have. But there is one way in which I find I can be present at such meetings, and yet receive no injury from them. I endeavor to conceive to myself the Lord Jesus seated on the opposite side of the table, and to think what he would wish me to do and to say, when placed in such a situation, and as long as I can keep this thought alive on my mind, I find I am free from danger."

7361. COMPANY, Rule for. Hippocratidas, a Spartan, met a youth attended by his friend, and the youth blushed deeply at the encounter. Hippocratidas said, "You should keep such company that whoever sees you, you will have no reason to change color."

7362. COMPANY, Vicious. A husbandman fixed a net in his field to catch the cranes that had come to feed on his new sown corn. When he went to examine the net, and see what cranes he had taken, a stork was found among the number. "Spare me," cried the stork, "and let me go; I am no crane. I have eaten none of your corn; I am a poor innocent stork, as you may see—the most pious and dutiful of birds. I honor and succor my father and mother. I—" But the husbandman cut him short "All this may be true enough, I dare say; but this I know, that I have caught you with those who were destroying my crops, and you must suffer with the company in which you were taken." Æsop.

7363. COMPASSION, Overcome. It is said that during the first five years of his reign, the Emperor Nero was very compassionate. When the sentence of execution against a malefactor was taken to him to sign, he exclaimed, "Quam vellem me nescire literas;" (would that I could neither read nor write). Afterwards he became the personification of cruelty, torturing the innocent, and lighting his gardens in Rome with burning Christians.

7364. COMPASSION, Practical. An old soldier who had been disabled in the wars, and who had no longer any means of support, was playing his violin, one evening, on the Prater in Vienna. His dog held his hat, but no one dropped anything into it. The old man was tired and hungry; he had not the strength to play, and in despair he sat down on a stone. A passer-by noticed him, stopped, looked at him, then said: "Lend me your violin a little while." Having tuned it, he said again, "You take the money and I'll play." And he began to play. The people who stopped to stare at a gentleman playing a violin out in the street remained to listen, delighted with the strains they heard. The crowd grew larger and larger. The hat filled up fast, not only with coppers, but also with silver and even gold. The dog began to growl, the hat had never before been so heavy to hold. The old man was told to empty its contents into his pockets, which he did, and it began to fill again. After playing a national air, the gentleman handed back the violin and disappeared before he could be thanked. "Who is it?" every one asked. "It is Armand Boucher, the famous violin player," replied some one. "He has done this for charity, let us follow his example." So saying the speaker made a new collection and gave the proceeds to the astonished soldier, who, through the kindness of Boucher, was now out of want.

Anon.

7365. COMPASSION, Self-Sacrificing. Dominic, the founder of the order of the preaching friars, appears to have been a very tender-hearted man. He met a woman who wept bitterly because her brother was enslaved among the Moors. Dominic offered himself for sale to redeem the man, and would have accomplished it, but was prevented by some of his friends. He sold his clothes and his books to procure food for the starving in a time of famine. Being remonstrated with, he said, "How can I peruse dead parchment when breathing men are perishing?" On one of his preaching excursions, the gables of a distant village came in view. He said to his companions, "Look at those roofs! What sorrows and cares, what sins and difficulties they cover! Oh! to lighten and remit some of them as we pass by." He died at Bologna in 1221, while his friars were reciting the service for a departing soul; "Come to his aid, saints of God! Come, angels of the Lord, and bear his soul into the presence of the Most High!"

7366. COMPASSION, Tears of. Josephus says that Titus Vespasian, the Roman General, wept at the overthrow of Jerusalem, and the burning of the temple, and cursed the obstinacy of the Jews, who had compelled it. Christ wept over it also in compassion.

7367. COMPETENCE, Desirable. Abundance is a trouble, want a misery, honor a burthen, baseness a scorn, advancements dangerous, disgrace odious. Only a competent estate yields the quiet of content. I will not climb, lest I fall, nor lie on the ground, lest I am trod on. I am safest while my legs bear me. A competent heat is most healthful for my body: I would desire neither to freeze nor to burn. Warwick.

7368. COMPETITION, Considerate. Cyrus, when a young stripling, was most worthy of admiration, who would never challenge his equals and playfellows to any exercise wherein he excelled, but to such only wherein he knew himself to be inferior; unwilling that they should fret for the loss of the prize which he was sure to win, and loath to lose what he could himself gain from the others' better skill. Plutarch.

7369. COMPLAINING, Habit of. Every one must see daily instances of people who complain from a mere habit of complaining.

Graves.

7370. COMPLAINING, Self. I will not be as those who spend the day in complaining of headache; and the night in drinking the wine that gives the headache. Goethe.

7371. COMPLAINT, Foolishness of. We do not wisely when we vent complaint and censure. Human nature is more sensible of smart in suffering than of pleasure in rejoicing, and the present endurances easily take up our thoughts. We cry out for a little pain, when we do but smile for a great deal of contentment.

Feltham.

7372. COMPLAINT, Noisy. As some oxen were dragging a wagon along a heavy road, the wheels set up a tremendous creaking. "Brute!" cried the driver to the wagon; "why do you groan, when they who are drawing all the weight are silent?" Those who cry loudest are not always the most hurt. Æsop.

7373. COMPLAINT, Useless. The soldiers in the late war showed remarkable fortitude. Their sufferings and privations were many and great, but they never complained. It is the study of a soldier's life to endure hardship. When asked why they never complained, one answered, "We've been where it did no good to complain." If people in the common walks of life would learn this lesson, half their ills would vanish.

7374. COMPLAISANCE, Cultivate. Complaisance, though in itself it be scarce reckoned in the number of moral virtues, is that which gives a lustre to every talent a man can be possessed of. It was Plato's advice to an unpolished writer, that he should sacrifice to the Graces. In the same manner I would advise every man of learning, who would not appear in the world a mere scholar, or philosopher, to make himself master of the social virtue which I have here mentioned. Complaisance renders a superior amiable, an equal agreeable, and an inferior acceptable. It smooths distinction, sweetens conversation, and makes every one in the company pleased with himself. It produces good nature and mutual benevolence, humanizes the fierce, and distinguishes a society of civilized persons from a confusion of savages. Addison.

7375. COMPLIMENT Unscriptural. The first time Father Seraphin preached before Louis XIV., he said to this monarch, "Sire, I am not ignorant of the custom according to the prescription of which I should pay you a compliment. This I hope your Majesty will dispense with; for I have been searching for a compliment in the Scriptures, and unhappily I have not found one."

7376. COMPOSURE, Philosophic. Pyrrhon, being at sea and in great danger, by reason of a tempest that arose, took particular notice of a hog that was on board, which all the while very unconcernedly fed upon some corn which lay scattered about; he showed it to his companions, and told them that they ought to acquire by reading and philosophy such an apathy and unconcernedness in all accidents and dangers as they saw that poor creature naturally have. Plutarch.

7377. CONCEIT, Advantage of. Little localized powers, and little narrow streaks of specialized knowledge, are things men are very apt to be conceited about. Nature is very wise: but for this encouraging principle how many small talents and little accomplishments would be neglected! Talk about conceit as much as you like, it is to human character what salt is to the ocean; it keeps it sweet and renders it enduring. Say rather it is like the natural unguent of the seafowl's plumage, which enables him to shed the rain that falls on him and the wave in which he dips. When one has had all his conceit taken out of him, when he has lost all his illusions, his feathers will soon soak through, and he will fly no more. Conceit is just as natural a thing to human minds as a centre is to a circle. But little-minded people's thoughts move in such small circles that five minutes' conversation gives you an arc long enough to determine their whole curve. An arc in the movement of a large intellect does not differ sensibly from a straight line. Holmes.

7378. CONCEIT, Example of. "Is not this great Babylon that I have builded?" An old farmer walked out over his broad acres and said aloud, "Whose fine farm is this?" With great complaisance he answered himself: "Squire Doubleday's." "Whose elegant mansion is that yonder?" Stroking his breast he answered, "Squire Doubleday's." There is a Squire Doubleday in every man. Dr. Holme.

7379. CONCEIT, Fable of. A gnat that had been buzzing about the head of a bull, at length settling himself down upon his horn, begged his pardon for incommoding him; "but if," says he, "my weight at all inconveniences you, pray say so and I will be off in a moment." "Oh, never trouble your head about that," says the bull, "for 'tis all one to me whether you go or stay; and, to say the truth, I did not know you were there." The smaller the mind the greater the conceit. Æsop.

7380. CONCESSION, Duty of. A Welsh preacher stated that men's treatment of one another was inferior to that of the brutes. "Two goats," he said, "met upon a bridge so narrow that they could not pass each other. And how do you think they acted? I will tell you. One goat laid down and let the other leap over him. Ah, beloved, let us live like goats."

7381. CONCESSION, The First. A woodman came into a forest to ask the trees to give him a handle for his axe. It seemed so modest a request that the principal trees at once agreed to it, and it was settled among them that the plain homely ash should furnish what was wanted. No sooner had the woodman fitted the staff to his purpose, than he began laying about him on all sides, felling the noblest trees in the wood. The oak now seeing the whole matter too late, whispered to the cedar, "The first concession has lost all; if we had not sacrificed our humble neighbor, we might have yet stood for ages ourselves." Æsop.

7382. CONDEMNATION, Dying. Jeine, a chief of one of the South Sea Islands, had manifested strong opposition to the introduction of Christianity. During his last sickness he often expressed a wish that he had died ten years before. Then the influence of the Holy Spirit was at work on his heart, but he had quenched its light, increased his guilt, and was stung by an upbraiding conscience.

7383. CONDEMNATION, Freed from. A Welshman heard a woman preach. She said, "There is no condemnation to them that are in Christ Jesus." That impressed him. He said, "I could think of nothing else all night. I could not sleep. I knew nothing of Christ's atonement, and I was very unhappy in my mind. I was led to read God's Word, and at length found comfort and peace."

7384. CONDEMNATION, Record of. A book-keeper handed his employer a sheet saying, "The trial-balance." The merchant had dreaded to know the truth, but it was even worse than he feared. His frame shook and his heart fainted under the revelation. He fell into a dangerous fever and in his delirium kept repeating, "The trial-balance, the trial-balance." At length he began to mend. His mind turned from his accounts with men to his standing with God. His conscience condemned him, and declared his trial-balance with God to be in a worse case. "I know it," said he. "O, shall I be an everlasting bankrupt?" He sorrowed deeply for his sins. Christ with all his great treasure appeared for him and paid the debt. He felt himself forgiven and looked with the assurance of hope to the great reckoning day.

7385. CONDITION, Improvement of. If an excellent sculptor be employed to carve a statue, whatsoever the materials be, he may use as much skill in carving on an ordinary stone as upon the finest marble. So, whatsoever thy condition is in the world, thou mayest glorify God in it, and bring praise to his name, and show as excellent grace as in the highest condition. He that grinds at the mill may glorify God as well as he that sits upon the throne. Dr. Bates.

7386. CONDITION, Optional. Great numbers who quarrel with their condition, have wanted not the power, but the will, to obtain a better state. They have never contemplated the difference between good and evil sufficiently to quicken aversion or invigorate desire; they have indulged a drowsy thoughtlessness or giddy levity; have committed the balance of choice to the management of caprice; and when they have long accustomed themselves to receive all that chance offered them, without examination, lament at last that they find themselves deceived. Rambler.

7388. CONFESSING CHRIST Boldly. Auxensius was a great commander under the Emperor Lycinius. Lycinius came one day into the court of his palace, where there was a great bath, and some vines growing about it, with the image of Bacchus set up among the vines. The emperor commanded Auxensius to draw his sword and cut off a bunch of grapes, which, as soon as he had done, he ordered him to offer it at the feet of Bacchus, which was as much as to acknowledge him to be a god. Auxensius answered, "I am a Christian; I will not do it." "What! not do it at my command?" saith the emperor; "then you must quit your place." "With all my heart, sir," said the Christian soldier, and, in token of it, put off his belt, which was the same as giving up his commission, and departed rejoicing that he was enabled to withstand the temptation. Buck.

7389. CONFESSING CHRIST, Difficulties of. The difficulties attending an open confession of Christ are the occasion of multitudes making shipwreck of their souls. In many hopeful characters that scripture, "the fear of man bringeth a snare," is verified. Cato and the philosophers of Rome honored the gods of their country, though unbelievers in the superstitions of their country. Plato was convinced of the unity of God, but durst not own his convictions, but said, "It was a truth, neither easy to find, nor safe to own." And even Seneca, the renowned moralist, was forced by temptation to dissemble his convictions, of whom Augustus saith, "He worshipped what himself reprehended, and did what himself reproved." And at the interruption which was given to the progress of the Reformation by the return of the Papists to power—some, as they went to mass, would exclaim, "Let us go to the common error." Thus, conviction is not conversion where there is no confession of Christ. Salter.

7390. CONFESSING CHRIST Faithfully. According to tradition, a woman of ill-repute named Afra, was accused of Gaius, the judge of Rhætia, Germany, of being a Christian. He summoned her before him and said, "Sacrifice to the gods, for it is better for thee to live than to perish by torture." She answered, "My sins suffice which I have committed in ignorance, without my adding this also, which thou commandest me to do." "Go to the capitol and sacrifice." "Christ is my capitol, whom I hold ever before my eyes; to whom I daily confess my misdeeds and offer myself as a willing sacrifice." "As I hear, thou art a courtesan. Sacrifice, then, for thou hast no part with the God of the Christians." "My Lord Jesus Christ said that he came down from heaven to save sinners." "Sacrifice, and thou wilt regain the love of thy lovers, and they will pour their money into thy lap," "I will never receive their money; what money I had I have cast away as dross!" "Thou canst be no Christian, thou who art a harlot." "My only title to the name is through the mercy of God." "How knowest thou that Christ accepts thee?" "In that he suffers me to confess him before thy judgment seat." "These are fables, mere fables; sacrifice!" "Christ is my salvation, who, hanging on the cross, promised salvation to the confessing thief." "Do not keep me so long arguing with you: sacrifice, and have done with this folly, or I will have thee tortured and burned alive." "Let the body that has sinned, suffer." Thus she passed the examination before the judge, made a glorious confession, and was condemned to be bound to a stake and burned, and quickly passed from the flames to heaven, to be confessed by Christ, before his father and the holy angels, A. D. 303.

7391. CONFESSING CHRIST, Neglect of. Christ asked the question, "Where are the nine?" You have read of the story of the cleansing of the ten lepers—you know how the God of glory had compassion upon them. His command was, "Go show yourselves to the priests;" and so they went—behold, the leprosy was all gone. It must have been a wonderful sight. They are going along the road; all at once one discovers the great change that has been wrought in him, and he stops suddenly. "Brothers, my leprosy is gone," he cries; "I am perfectly well, look." And another then sees his altered condition, and he cries out, "And I am well, too." And another, "Why, see! my fingers were nearly rotted off, and now the disease is all gone." So they all look at themselves, and the great truth bursts upon them that they have been made well. Nine of them continue on their journey, but one poor man turns back, and falls at the feet of Jesus and glorifies God. Perhaps he did not find his Lord right away; perhaps he had to search for him; but find him he did, and gave him the glory. Christ after seeing him alone at his feet out of all he had conferred the great boon upon, asked in astonishment, "Were there not ten cleansed? but where are the nine?" Well, I don't know what became of them. Perhaps they went and joined some church; at any rate, that is the last we hear of them. So the people think that if they join some church that is all that is required of them. Ha! my friends, "where are the nine?" If the Lord has cleansed you, why don't you lift up your voice in his praise, and give thanks? Why do you bury your talents? Why don't you confess Christ? It is sweet to Christ to have men confess him. One day he said, "Whom do men say that I am?" He wanted them to confess him. But one said, "They say thou art Elias," and another, "That thou art Jeremiah;" and another, "Thou art St. John the Baptist." But he asked, "Whom do you say that I am?"—turning to his disciples. And Peter answers, "Thou art the Son of the living God." Then our Lord exclaimed, "Blessed art thou, Simon Barjonas." Yes, he blessed him right there because he confessed him to be the Son of God. He was hungry to get some one to confess him. Then let every one take his stand on the side of the Lord; confess him here on earth, and he will confess you when you get to heaven. He will look around upon you with pride, because you stood up for him here. If you want the blessing of heaven and the peace that passeth all understanding, you must be ready and willing to confess him. Do you know how Peter fell? He fell as ten thousand people fall, because they don't confess the Son of God. Moody.

7392. CONFESSING CHRIST, Result of. A woman, whom I know, found peace with God in a prayer-meeting—went home, and told her friends what great things the Lord had done for her. A deep impression was made upon their minds by her statements; and in less than six months, her husband, her father, her brother, her lodger, and two of her sisters were brought to the Saviour, and admitted into his church, as the result of her Christian exertions. Robert Young.

7393. CONFESSON, Bar of. A person whom I once knew, was roused from a habit of indolence and supineness to a serious concern for his eternal welfare. Convinced of his depraved nature and aggravated guilt, he had recourse to the Scriptures and to frequent prayer; he attended the ordinances of Christianity, and sought earnestly for an interest in Christ, but found no steadfast faith, and tasted very little comfort. At length he applied to an eminent divine, and laid open the state of his heart. Short but weighty was the answer: "I perceive, sir, the cause of all your distress: you will not come to Christ as a sinner. This mistake lies between you and the joy of religion; this detains you in the gall of bitterness, and take heed, oh take heed, lest it consign you to the bond of iniquity." This admonition never departed from the gentleman's mind, and it became the means of removing the obstacles of his peace. Hervey.

7394. CONFESSON, Biblical. Lev. 1:4; 16:21. The Jews say that when Aaron confessed the sins of the people, and laid his hands upon the head of the victim, he was to press with all his might. "I have sinned." A confession uttered by men of all classes;—by Pharoah, the hardened rebel; by Balaam, the specious deceiver; by Achan; by Saul (three times); and by Judas, the arch traitor; as also by Job; by David; by the Prodigal. Gen. 3. Reluctance to confession began with the first sin. "They sewed fig leaves together," to hide their shame; and, when summoned before the Lord, hid themselves amongst the trees of the garden; and then Adam blamed Eve, and Eve blamed the serpent; but there was no frank and contrite confession of their sin. Neh. 9:3. A remarkable instance of sincere and earnest confession. Having separated themselves from all strangers, and thereby given proof of their sincerity, they stood and confessed their sins "one fourth part of the whole day." Ps. 32:3-5. Stifled convictions, like all humors in the body, and unclean wounds, gender discomfort and distress; and yet sinners little think how closely confession and pardon lie together. See 2 Sam. 12:13; Job 33:27, 28; 1 John 1:9; Jer. 3:12, 13. Prov. 28:13. A house is not clean, though all the dust be swept together, if it lie still in a corner within doors, nor if there hang cobwebs about the walls, in how dark corners soever; a conscience is not clean, though the sin brought to our memory be confessed, unless it be forsaken. Dan. 9. It is observable that we have one of the fullest confessions of sin from Daniel; almost, if not the only, saint of whom we have any lengthened history which contains the record of no failing. Judas—an example of confession drawn forth by remorse with no prayer for pardon. Bowes.

7395. CONFESSON, Escape by. A certain king, named Asmodeus, established an ordinance by which every malefactor taken and brought before the judge should distinctly declare three truths against which no exception could be taken, or else be capitally condemned. If, however, he did this, his life and property should be safe. It chanced that a certain soldier transgressed the law, and fled. He hid himself in a forest, and there committed many atrocities, despoiling and slaying whomsoever he could lay his hands upon. When the judge of the district ascertained his haunt, he ordered the forest to be surrounded, and the soldier to be seized, and brought, bound, to the seat of judgment. "You know the law," said the judge. "I do," returned the other; "if I declare three unquestionable truths, I shall be free; but if not, I must die." "True," replied the judge; "take, then, advantage of the law's clemency, or undergo the punishment it awards without delay." "Cause silence to be kept," said the soldier, undauntedly. His wish being complied with, he proceeded in the following manner: "The first truth is this: I protest before ye all that from my youth up I have been a bad man." The judge, hearing this, said to the bystanders, "He says true." They answered, "Else he had not been in this situation." "Go on, then," said the judge. "What is the second truth?" "I like not," exclaimed he, "the dangerous situation in which I stand." "Certainly," said the judge, "we may credit thee. Now, then, for the third truth, and thou hast saved thy life." "Why," he replied, "if I once get out of this confounded place, I will never willingly re-enter it." "Amen," said the judge. "Thy wit hath preserved thee; go in peace." And thus he was saved. The emperor is Christ; the soldier is any sinner; the judge is a wise confessor. If the sinner confess the truth in such a manner as not even demons can object, he shall be saved—that is, if he confess and repent.

From Gesta Romanorum.

7396. CONFESSION, Feigned. A lady once went to Charles Wesley, complaining that she was the chief of sinners—the worst of transgressors—utterly lost and helpless. “I have no doubt, madame,” replied he, “that you are bad enough.” She instantly flew into a passion; declared that she was no worse than her neighbors, and scolded the preacher as a slanderer.

7397. CONFESSION, Hypocritical. You have heard, no doubt, of beggars who tie a leg up when they go a-begging, and then make a hideous lamentation of their lameness. Why, this is just your case, sir, when you go to church a-praying, which is begging; you tie your righteous heart up, and then make woful outcry for mercy on us miserable sinners. O, sir, these tricks may pass a while unnoticed, but Jesus Christ will apprehend such cheats at last, and give them their desert.

John Berridge.

7398. CONFESSION, Inconsistent. A Neapolitan peasant went to his priest, saying, “Father, have mercy on a miserable sinner! It is the holy season of Lent, and while I was busy at work, some whey spurring from the cheese-press flew into my mouth, and, wretched man, I swallowed it! Free my distressed conscience from its agonies by absolving me from my guilt!” “Have you no other sins to confess?” said his spiritual guide. “No, I do not know that I have committed any other.” “There are,” said the priest, “many robberies and murders from time to time committed on your mountains, and I have reason to believe that you are one of the persons concerned in them.” “Yes,” he replied, “I am, but these are never accounted as a crime; it is a thing practised by us all, and there needs no confession on that account.”

7399. CONFESSION, Need of. I once saw a daughter in one of my meetings with tears trickling down her cheeks. I asked her what was the matter? Is there any one you cannot forgive? “Yes,” she said, “my mother, who sits in the seat yonder. I have not spoken to her for years. We quarreled a great many years ago?” After a great struggle she went to her mother, threw her arms about her, and cried out, “Will you forgive me!” Down they went on their knees together, and confessed their sins, and were made happy in Jesus. We must confess to our friends. Moody.

7400. CONFESSIOAL, Philosophy of the. The confessional is a kind of insurance office, where periodical exposure of the heart to a man is the premium paid for fancied impunity in hiding that heart altogether from the deeper scrutiny of the all-seeing God. Popish transgressors have no particular delight in confession for its own sake. Confession to the priest is felt and dreaded as an evil. The devout often need spurring to make them come. And when they come, it is on the principle of submitting to the less evil in order to escape the greater. The incoming of the Heart Searcher is feared and loathed, like a deadly and contagious disease. A quack comes up, and by dint of bold profession, persuades the trembler that voluntary inoculation with the same disease in a milder form will secure exemption from the terrible reality. The guilty, although he does not like to have his conscience searched—because he does not like to have his conscience searched, submits to the searching of his conscience. The pretending penitent accepts the scrutiny by a man, in the hope of escaping thereby the scrutiny of God. The impudent empiric tells his patient that if he submit to inoculation, the small-pox will never come. Behold the confessional. Arnott.

7401. CONFIDENCE, Childish. A little orphan child, who was taken into a strange family, when being put to bed the first night after she was undressed, knelt down to say her evening prayers and repeated the words which her mother had taught her. Then she added a prayer of her own: “Oh God, make these people just as good to me as my dear father and mother were. Please do it, Jesus.” And then, after pausing a moment, she exclaimed, “Of course, you will.” That’s the way: of course you will. Let us have faith, and he will grant our request. Moody.

7402. CONFIDENCE, Comfort of. Mr. Laurence, who was a sufferer for conscience’ sake, if he would have consulted with flesh and blood, as was said of one of the martyrs, had eleven good arguments against suffering, viz: a wife and ten children. Being once asked how he meant to maintain them all, he cheerfully replied, “They must all live on Matt. 6: 34, ‘Take therefore no thought for the morrow,’” &c. A gentleman said to a poor minister, “I wonder, Mr. W., how you contrive to live so comfortably; methinks, with your numerous family, you live more plentifully on the providence of God, than I can with all the benefits of my parish.” Buck.

7403. CONFIDENCE, Experience and. Hannibal, when in exile, advised Prusias, King of Bithynia, with whom he had sought refuge, to give battle. Prusias told him that the oracle did not favor success. Hannibal, indignant, replied, “Wilt thou rather give credit to the liver of a calf than to an old and experienced commander?” The two Spains taken from the Romans, Gaul and Liguria, Cannae and Capua, all subdued; a new passage made over the Alps, and the victory at Lake Trasimene, were all too fresh in his memory, to lead him to trust in unreliable omens, rather than his own well-tryed power.

7404. CONFIDENCE, Over. They have succeeded in arousing us, and impressing on our minds the truth of the Irish maxim, “that despising is all very well in its way, but that the only safe plan after all is to thrash your enemy first, and despise him afterwards.” Newland

7405. CONFIDENCE, Support of. A ship was once tossing on the stormy seas; the angry waves dashed over the deck, and the captain said the danger of shipwreck was great, and that they must leave the vessel for the boat. But the boat looked a tiny thing to trust to, and many stout hearts feared. One of the first who ventured into it, as it lay alongside the reeling ship, and while the billows seemed to play with it as you might play with a shuttlecock, was a pale, delicate woman, with a child in her arms and another clinging to her dress. She did not cry nor scream, but was very still, and the children were still also; indeed, the baby slept. "Are you not afraid?" said a gentleman to the little quiet boy, who neither spoke nor sobbed. "I do not like the storm," he said, "but mother is here." "And are you not afraid?" asked the same gentleman of the child's mother. She shook her head, and pointing upward, said, "God is ruling the storm, sir, and I am not afraid, for he is my Father." The voice was scarcely to be heard amid the howling of the mighty wind and raging sea; but the gentleman was struck with the trust of the child in his mother, and the faith of the mother in God.

S. S. Treasury.

7406. CONFIDENCE, Three Epochs of. People have generally three epochs in their confidence in man. In the first they believe him to be everything that is good, and they are lavish with their friendship and confidence. In the next, they have had experience, which has smitten down their confidence, and they then have to be careful not to mistrust every one, and to put the worst construction upon everything. Later in life, they learn that the greater number of men have much more good in them than bad, and that, even when there is cause to blame, there is more reason to pity than condemn; and then a spirit of confidence again awakens within them. Miss Bremer.

7407. CONFINEMENT, Solitary. About ten years ago, a young American from New York, Walter Hastings by name, dining in London, in company with Lord G——, expressed the opinion that solitary confinement in a dark cell was not so dreadful a punishment as had been represented. His Lordship—so goes the tale—offered Hastings £10,000 if he would undergo entire seclusion for ten years. The proposition being agreed to, a cell was fitted up in Lord G——'s town house. It was from twelve to fifteen feet square. The prisoner was to be allowed candles, a few books, writing materials, plain food, the latter served by a man who was not to be seen. In this way Hastings has been living for a decade of years, his term expiring about the first of the present month. He is now released, and has received, we suppose, his hard-earned money. He emerges from his dungeon in rather a dilapidated condition, appearing, though only thirty-five, like a man of sixty-five years of age, his frame stooping and his steps tottering, his face sallow, his hair and beard white, his voice tremulous, and speech hesitating.

N. Y. Tribune.

7408. CONSCIENCE, Aberrations of. The compass of a wooden ship will keep true to the pole unless there is something in the cargo to deflect it. It is found to be very difficult to make a compass that will work reliably on an iron vessel. We remember when Captain Murray of the ill-fated Atlantic showed us the compass of that luxurious steamship which was his especial pride and thought to be perfect. That compass failed to do perfect work, and the noble ship was wrecked upon the rocks because of it. The conscience is the compass by which man steers his bark. It is a defective thing. Base metal in the cargo has often destroyed its polarity and hurled its possessor upon the rocks. Perfect consciences are rare, and those so esteemed fail at the most important crisis. The compass is sometimes elevated on iron ships so as to get above disturbing influences. It is an example for us. We must get up so near God as to be above earthly allurements.

7409. CONSCIENCE, Accusing. On one occasion, when I was at sea, a young gentleman rushed from his bed, while yet asleep, to the middle of the cabin, and, pointing to the floor, exclaimed, "There's the blood! there's the blood! yes, there's the blood!" Some of us rose, and finding that he was asleep, we awoke him and got him back to his bed. In the morning, a sprightly young gentleman, who had got intimate with him, was requested to ascertain the cause of the terrifying dream. In the evening he told us that the gentleman was an officer in the army, on his way to join his regiment in Sicily; that some time ago he had shot a brother officer in a duel, and ever since he had been disturbed in his rest, appearing downcast and sad even when perfectly awake. He said it had been his custom every night to fasten his leg to the bed post, or to anything to which he could tie it, to prevent his getting out of bed; "but I found," said he, "nothing of the kind in the ship bed."

Campbell.

7410. CONSCIENCE, Action of. The unanswerable reasonings of Butler never reached the ear of the gray-haired pious peasant, but he needs not their powerful aid to establish his sure and certain hope of a blessed immortality. It is no induction of logic that has transfixed the heart of the victim of deep remorse, when he withers beneath an influence unseen by mortal eye, and shrinks from the anticipation of a reckoning to come. In both the evidence is within, a part of the original constitution of every rational mind, planted there by him who framed the wondrous fabric. This is the power of conscience: with an authority which no man can put away from him it pleads at once for his own future existence, and for the moral attributes of an omnipresent and ever-present Deity. In a healthy state of the moral feelings, the man recognizes its claim to supreme dominion. Amid the degradation of guilt it still raises its voice and asserts its right to govern the whole man; and though its warnings are disregarded, and its claims disallowed, it proves within his inmost soul an accuser that cannot be stilled, and an avenging spirit that never is quenched.

Dr. Abercrombie.

7411. CONSCIENCE, Awe of. Every man who is about to do a wicked action should, above all things, stand in awe of himself, and dread the witness within him, who sits as a spy over all his actions, and will be sure, one day or other, to accuse him to himself, and put him on such a rack as shall make him accuse himself to others too.

Pythagoras.

7412. CONSCIENCE, Biblical Examples of. Adam and Eve smitten with shame and fear. They knew that they were naked, and hid themselves, Gen. 3: 7-10. Esau sold his birthright with profane indifference; yet what would he not have given years afterwards, could he have changed his father's mind? What bitter tears a few moments' pleasure cost him then! Gen. 25: 29-34; 27; Heb 12: 16, 17. Jacob, who obtained the birthright and the blessing by mean and ungenerous artifice, was filled with alarm when conscience awoke after twenty years. It is striking to compare Jacob's bold confidence when pursued by Laban, and charged with theft, Gen. 31: 36-42, with his fear and alarm when about to meet Esau, Gen. 32: 7, 8; 11. Judah, when he recognized his own signet and bracelets and staff, Gen. 38: 26. Joseph's brethren—A remarkable instance of the avenging power of conscience, long after the perpetration of a crime. Thirteen years after Joseph's brethren, with un pitying cruelty, plotted to take away his life, they stood before their brother; and, though by a circumstance which had no connection with their sin, conscience brought home the keen remembrance of long-forgotten guilt. Happily Joseph forgave them, and returned good for evil; but seventeen years of kindness could not drown the voice of conscience—when Jacob was dead, their fears revived again 50: 15. Saul, smitten by David's generous kindness—conscience rebuked the cruel king, 1 Sam. 24: 16-19; 26: 21. Ahab—"Hast thou found me, O mine enemy?" 1 Kings 21: 20. Why should Ahab address Elijah as an "enemy," when a short time before they had parted as friends? The very spot where they met gives the answer. It was in the vineyard of Naboth the Jezreelite, which Ahab had obtained by the murder of Naboth. Zimri—"Had Zimri peace, who slew his master?" 1 Kings 16: 18. Can there be peace in the breast when there is guilt on the conscience? Remember Joram's question and Jehu's answer, 2 Kings 9: 22. Herod—"It is John whom I beheaded: he is risen from the dead," Mark 6: 26. Herod was, Josephus says, a Sadducee (see Matt. 22: 23). Why, then, should he fear? It is a striking proof how little the sophistries of infidelity can withstand the awakening power of conscience. Judas, in the very moment of his success, found his bitterest remorse, Matt. 27: 3, 4; Prov. 5: 22. Felix, the judge, trembling before the prisoner, because he was the slave of a guilty conscience, Acts 24: 25. Bowes.

7413. CONSCIENCE, Bonds of. The knot that binds me by the law of courtesy, pinches me more than that of legal constraint, and I am much more at ease when bound by a scrivener than by myself. Is it not reason that my conscience should be much more engaged when men simply rely upon it? In a bond my faith owes nothing, because it has nothing lent it. Let them trust to the security they have taken without me; I had much rather break the walls of a prison, and the laws themselves, than my own word.

Montaigne.

7414. CONSCIENCE, A Condemning. If our conscience condemn us justly, our case is sad; because God knows more of us than we do of ourselves, and can charge us with many sins that conscience is not privy to.

Gurnall.

7415. CONSCIENCE Converted. Two infidel neighbors resided in New England. One of them heard the Gospel message, and believed unto eternal life. A short time afterwards the converted man went to the house of his infidel neighbor, and said to him, "I have come to talk to you. I have been converted." "Yes, I heard that you had been down there, and gone forward for prayers," said the sceptic with a sneer; "and I was surprised, for I had thought you were about as sensible a man as there was in town." "Well," said the Christian, "I have got a duty to do to you, and I want you to stop talking, and hear me. I have not slept much for two nights for thinking of it. I have got four sheep in my flock that belong to you. They came into my field six years ago, and I knew they had your mark on them, and I took them and marked them with my mark; and you inquired all round, and could not hear anything of them. But they are in my field with the increase of them, and now I want to settle this matter. I have laid awake nights and groaned over it, and I have come to get rid of it; and now I am at your option. I will do just what you say. If it is a few years in the State's prison, I will suffer that. If it is money or property you want, say the word. I have a good farm, and money at interest, and you can have all you ask. I want to settle this matter up, and get rid of it." The infidel was amazed. He began to tremble. "If you have got them sheep, you are welcome to them. I don't want nothing of you, if you will only go away; a man who will come to me as you have, something must have got hold of you that I don't understand! You may keep the sheep, if you will only go away." "No," said the man, "I must settle this matter up, and pay for the sheep—I shall not be satisfied without; and you must tell me how much." "Well," said the sceptic, "if you must pay for them, you may give me what the sheep were worth when they got into your field, and pay me six per cent. interest on the amount, and go off, and let me alone." The man counted out the value of the sheep, and the interest on the amount, and laid it down, and then doubled the whole.

Anon.

7416. CONSCIENCE Defined. Conscience is a Latin word, though with an English termination, and, according to the very notation of it, imports a double or joint knowledge; to wit, one of a divine law or rule and the other of a man's own action, and so is properly the application of a general law to a particular instance of practice. The law of God, the example, says, "Thou shalt not steal;" and the mind of man tells him that the taking of such a thing from a person lawfully possessed of it is stealing. Whereupon the conscience, joining the knowledge of both these together, pronounces in the name of God that such a particular action ought not to be done. And this is the true procedure of conscience, always supposing a law from God before it pretends to lay any obligation upon man. Conscience neither is nor ought to be its own rule. South.

7417. CONSCIENCE, Deflections of. A staunch Cunarder steamship left her dock in Liverpool for New York, had a fair voyage, and by the reckoning made with sextant and compass, was within two hundred miles of Nantucket shoals. Suddenly the look-out cried, "Land ho!" The engines were reversed instantly, and the ship was found to be within two lengths of the shoals, from which her Captain thought her two hundred miles distant. Nothing but timely warning by a vigilant look-out and prompt action saved the ship from fearful wreck. The cause of the alteration of the compass was sought, and found to be a single nail driven before leaving Liverpool, by the carpenter, in putting up a stove. It had done its work steadily and surely upon the needle, and nearly hurled the ship upon the rocks. Conscience is the needle. Some little secret sin is the nail. The conscience deflected from right by any sin, great or small, will surely wreck its possessor upon the rocks of eternal ruin.

7418. CONSCIENCE, Delights of. A palsy may as well shake an oak, or a fever dry up a fountain, as either of them shake, dry up, or impair the delight of conscience. For it lies within, it centres in the heart, it grows into the very substance of the soul, so that it accompanies a man to his grave, he never outlives it; and that for this cause only, because he cannot outlive himself. South.

7419. CONSCIENCE, Derivation of. We all know that this word comes from con and scio; but what does that "con" intend? "Conscience" is not merely that which I know, but that which I know with some other; for this prefix cannot, as I think, be esteemed superfluous, or taken to imply merely that which I know with or to myself. That other knower whom the word implies is God; his law making itself known and felt in the heart; and the work of conscience is the bringing of the evil of our acts and thoughts as a lesser, to be tried and measured by this as a greater—the word growing out of and declaring that awful duplicity of our moral being which arises from the presence of God in the soul—our thoughts, by the standard which that presence implies, and as the result of a comparison with it, "accusing or excusing one another." Trench.

7420. CONSCIENCE, Disordered. The hands of a watch or clock indicate the time, and to be true the works must be in good order and carry forward the hands just as fast as time itself goes. If it be out of order, it will stop; or if it continues to run, its index will be false and deceptive. Conscience is represented by the works of the watch, consciousness by the hands. If it is an enlightened and true conscience, regulated by the word of God, the index of consciousness will be true. If it is disordered, it is altogether unreliable, and he who trusts it will make certain failure. A false watch has cost many a man delay, and often more serious consequences. A disordered conscience has prevented many from doing good and gaining heaven.

7421. CONSCIENCE, Fidelity to. The Emperor Vespasian was very anxious to get a law passed which he knew Helvidius would be sure to oppose. He sent a request to him not to attend the Senate that day. Helvidius answered, "It is certainly in the power of the Emperor to deprive me of my senatorship; but so long as I continue a member of that body, I cannot neglect my duty by absenting myself from it." "Well," says Vespasian, "I am content that you shall be there, provided you will be sure not to speak in the debates that shall arise to-day." Helvidius engaged that he would remain silent, provided his opinion was not asked. "Nay," said Vespasian, "but if you are there you must be consulted." "And if I be," replied Helvidius, "I must give my advice freely, according to what I conceive to be just and reasonable." "Do that at your peril," said Vespasian, "for be assured that if you are against what I propose, your head shall answer for it." "Sire," replied Helvidius, "did I ever tell you that I was immortal? If I consider it my duty, consistent with what I owe to the gods and to my country, to oppose your measure, no threat of personal resentment shall influence me; and if you wreak your vengeance on my head, posterity will judge between us."

7422. CONSCIENCE, Five Kinds of. There be five kinds of consciences on foot in the world; first an ignorant conscience, which neither sees nor says anything, neither beholds the sins in a soul, nor reproves them. Secondly, the flattering conscience, whose speech is worse than silence itself, which, though seeing sin, soothes the man in the committing thereof. Thirdly, the seared conscience which has neither sight, speech nor sense in men that are past feeling. Fourthly, a wounded conscience, frightened with sin. The last and best is a quiet and clear conscience, pacified in Christ Jesus. Of these the fourth is incomparably better than the three former, so that a wise man would not take a world to change with them. Yea, a wounded conscience is rather painful than sinful, an affliction, no offense, and is in the ready way, at the next remove, to be turned into a quiet conscience. Thos. Fuller.

7423. CONSCIENCE, Guilt of. A man of good reputation, being in great destitution, stole a lamb to keep his children from starving. When it was cooked and placed upon the table he could not ask a blessing over it as was his wont. In great confusion he went to the owner confessed his sin and promised restitution.

7424. CONSCIENCE, Heathen. Mr. Campbell, a traveler in Africa, says, "I remember, when traveling from Lattakoo to Kurreechane, high up in the interior of South Africa, my party was joined by about forty or fifty persons from different tribes, some of them with a view of visiting friends higher up the country, and to be under the protection of our guns during the journey; others from having heard that we shot rhinoceroses, elephants, etc., for the sake of their skins, teeth, etc., but that we did not eat their carcasses—the last indulged the hope that they might eat the animals when they happened to be shot. When any of those nations, on their plundering expeditions, happened to kill, or rather murder a man, the honorable deed is recorded by a deep slash being cut on the fleshy part of their body. By these marks we knew that the major part of the new comers who have joined us were murderers. I observed some who had three, four, or five of those scars. Now these people were generally afraid to go to sleep in the night-time; but, in little parties around fires, they tried to keep up the most boisterous talk as long as they could, until break of day. One night, the wind being quite still, their noise was such that I found it impossible to sleep. I arose, and begged them to be quiet and go to sleep. 'Oh,' said they, 'there is a king to the right of us, a bad man, who has his spies; and were we to sleep he would come and murder us all.' About ten nights after they were continuing as bad as ever; I begged them now to be still, especially as they had got beyond the country of him of whom they were afraid. 'Oh! but,' said they, 'we are getting opposite to a worse king, to the left of us—Makkabba, king of the Waketsens.' How different was the case with my Hottentots, about twenty of whom traveled with me! Not any of them were murderers; every night did they sleep as sound as wolves, though they never were so far from their own country before."

7425. CONSCIENCE, Indestructibility of. Man's conscience was once the vicegerent of Deity; what conscience spoke within was just the echo of what God said without; and even now, conscience in its ruin has enough of its pristine eloquence and surviving affinity to God never to be altogether and always silent. The passions try to make conscience a sort of citizen-king, putting it up and down as they please; but it will not quietly submit; it resists the authority of the passions; it insists upon supremacy; it cannot forget its noble lineage and its erst holy function derived from God. As long as man can gratify his passions, and give an opiate to conscience, so long it will be partially quiet. But a day comes when the passions must be laid, and when every beat of the heart, like the curfew bell, will tell you that the time for extinguishing their fires is come, and then and there conscience will re-assert its lost supremacy, grasp its broken sceptre, and refusing to be put down, it will remit its true and eternal utterances; and reason of righteousness, and temperance, and judgment; and prove that man may peradventure live without religion, but die without it he rarely can. A death-bed is the hour when conscience reasserts its supremacy, however stupefied it may have been with the opium of half a century, and reminds its possessor of all behind and before. In such a case there are two resources: either the Romish priest, with a strong opiate, under which man will die deluded and deceived; or the blood of Jesus, with pardon for the sin, and therefore peace for the conscience, which is the joyful sound of forgiveness. Dr. Cumming.

7426. CONSCIENCE, Jesus Whispering. "What is conscience?" asked a Sunday-school teacher one day of his class. Several of the children answered, some one thing and some another, until a little timid child spoke out: "It is Jesus whispering in our hearts."

7427. CONSCIENCE, Liberty of. The clap-trap cry of those who would put down doctrine is "liberty"—liberty to think as you like, and to do as you will, to believe or not believe. There are some who say it is necessary there should be teachers in the church to instruct their hearers that black is white, alongside of those who hold by the old truth. The claim for such liberty reminds me of an occurrence some years ago in Ratcliffe Highway. A man had a menagerie of wild beasts; and the elephant, fumbling about his trunk one night, got hold of the peg which fastened up his den. So he got out, and being a member of the Liberation Society, he proceeded to let out the lions, the wolves, and the jackals. There was soon a terrible noise in the back yard; and the master, waking up, rushed in among the animals with his whip, and soon had them back to their respective quarters. But for his promptness, there might have been great mischief done to the people of London. The teachers of false doctrine are playing the part of the elephant, and the lies which they are letting loose upon society must be hunted back to their dens. There must be no liberty to pull up the buoys and to destroy the lighthouses of the Christian church.

7428. CONSCIENCE, No Compulsion of. Certain persons attempted to persuade Stephen, King of Poland, to compel some of his subjects, who were of a different religion, to embrace his. He answered, "I am King of men, and not of consciences. The dominion of conscience belongs exclusively to God."

7429. CONSCIENCE, Obedience to. Lord Erskine, when at the bar, was remarkable for the fearlessness with which he contended against the bench. In a contest with Lord Kenyon, he explained his rule and conduct at the bar in the following terms: "It was the first command and counsel of my youth, always to do what my conscience told me to be my duty, and leave the consequences to God. I have hitherto followed it, and have no reason to complain that any obedience to it has been even a temporal sacrifice; I have found it, on the contrary, the road to prosperity and wealth, and I shall point it out as such to my children."

Percy.

7430. CONSCIENCE, Power of. About seven-teen years ago, a young man in the town of Sheffield was sent to get change at a neighboring shop for a ten-pound note, when by mistake he was paid ten guineas, which he received, and said nothing on the subject. Of late he has been converted to God, and having an uneasy conscience on account of this transaction, felt desirous of making restitution. But the person from whom he received the money being dead, he was unable for some time to obtain any information concerning the family. At length he discovered where the son resided, and having ascertained that neither of the parents were living, he sent a person to inform him of the circumstance, and to pay to him the extra ten shillings which had been received of his father at the time stated, with interest if required, adding that he could not be happy until he had paid the sum. The son expressed pleasure in witnessing such an instance of the grace of God, but said he would not take the interest, and that the ten shillings should be given to the cause of Christ. He has since presented it to the Wesleyan Missionary Society, as God's own peculiar property. I understand the same person has made restitution in several other cases of a like nature.

Wm. Dawson.

7431. CONSCIENCE, Protecting the. Every man should take heed to the way in which he treats his conscience. When we put a lighthouse on the coast, that in the night mariners may explore the dark and dreadful way of the sea, we not only swing glass around about it to protect it, but we enclose that glass itself in a net-work of iron wire, that birds may not dash it in, that summer winds may not sweep it out, and that swarms of insects may not destroy themselves and the light. For if the light in the lighthouse be put out, how great a darkness falls upon the land and upon the sea! And the mariner, waiting for the light, or seeing it not, miscalculates and perishes. A man's conscience ought to be protected from those influences that would diminish its light, or that would put it out.

Anon.

7432. CONSCIENCE, Question of. Two learned men were conversing about what course they should pursue in reference to a matter upon which they had conscientious scruples. One of them said, "By my faith, I must live." The other replied, "I hope to live by my faith too, though I dare not swear by it." The one who determined to venture his temporal interest for conscience' sake, lived to see the other begging while he had power to contribute to his relief.

7433. CONSCIENCE, Record of. As the words that are written with the juice of a lemon cannot be read when they are written, but may be plainly and distinctly seen if you hold the paper to the fire, so the least letters in the book of our conscience, yea, the least notes and points and scratches, which neither any other nor ourselves see well now, shall easily be discerned by the fire of the last judgment.

Featley.

7434. CONSCIENCE, Rousing the. As gentle remedies are not sufficient for grievous maladies, but we must adopt those which physicians style powerful ones; for poisonous cancers prepared oils are not sufficient; we must use fire and iron; so, for certain souls, deeply rooted in vice, slight motives will not suffice, but the strong maxims of hell and eternity are necessary. These peals of thunder can arouse sinners from their profound lethargy; these bridles can rein in certain furious passions, and bring to pass that man do not plunge himself into wickedness. For this reason the Holy Spirit admonishes us always to keep our minds on the maxims of eternity, if we do not wish to fall into sin. "Memorare novissima tua et in eternum non peccabis." (Eccles. vii.)

Ignatius.

7435. CONSCIENCE, A Sick. Bp. Bramble, of Derry, Ireland, a persecutor of Christ's faithful ones, was smitten with sickness. Dr. Maxwell having been called, asked him what his particular complaint was. "It is my conscience," he replied. "I have no cure for that," said the doctor.

7436. CONSCIENCE, Sting of. How small things may annoy the greatest! Even a mouse troubles an elephant, a gnat a lion, a very flea may disquiet a giant. What weapon can be nearer to nothing than the sting of this wasp? Yet what a painful wound hath it given me! That scarce visible point, how it envenoms, and rankles, and swells up the flesh! The tenderness of the part adds much to the grief. If I be thus vexed with the touch of an angry fly, how shall I be able to endure the sting of a tormenting conscience?

Bishop Hall.

7437. CONSCIENCE, Tortures of. Imagine what sharp and intolerable pains those martyrs sustained, who, as the Apostle tells us (Heb. 11, 37), were sawn asunder. Or, suppose that thou thyself wert now under the ragged teeth of a saw, drawn to and fro upon the tenderest parts of thy body: tearing thy flesh, thy nerves, and sinews; grating and jarring upon thy very bones: yet all the extremity of this is nothing to what torments the conscience feels, when God causeth his sword to enter into it, to rive it up; when he makes deep and bloody wounds in it, and instead of pouring in healing balm, with a heavy hand chafes them with fire and brimstone.

Bishop Hopkins.

7438. CONSCIENCE, Voice of. Theodore Parker gives an incident of his own experience when he was but four years old. He went with his father to a distant part of the farm, and, in returning home alone, passed a pond hole. A rhodora in full bloom attracted his attention, and drew him to the water side. There he saw a spotted turtle sunning himself. He had never yet killed anything, but he had seen other boys, and he felt a disposition to follow their example. He raised the stick which he had in his hand, and was about to strike the turtle, when a voice within him, clear and loud, said, "It is wrong." He wondered at the new emotion, and hastened home to ask his mother what it was that had said "It is wrong." She took him up in her arms, wiped a tear from her eye, and said, "Some men call it conscience, but I prefer to call it the voice of God in the soul of man. If you listen, and obey it, then it will speak clearer and clearer, and always guide you right. But if you disobey, then it will fade out, little by little, and leave you all in the dark, and without a guide. Your life depends on your heeding that little voice." He says no event of his youth made such a lasting impression upon him.

7439. CONSCIENTIOUSNESS, Pagan. Seneca acquired great wealth as the preceptor of the Emperor Nero, but neither this nor the luxury and effeminacy of a court produced any alteration in his mode of life. He continued to the last to live abstemiously, correctly, and free from flattery and ambition. "I had rather," said he to Nero, "offend you by speaking the truth than please you by lying and flattery." When Seneca perceived that his favor was on the decline, and that his enemies were constantly reminding the emperor of the wealth which he had amassed, he offered to make a full surrender of all the gifts which had ever been conferred upon him. The tyrant not only declined the offer, but protested that his friendship for him remained the same. The continual machinations of his enemies were at length so successful that the emperor condemned him to death. Seneca received the mandate with calmness and composure, and only asked to be allowed to alter his will. The officer entrusted with the execution of the sentence refused to grant such permission. Seneca then, addressing his friends, said that "since he was not allowed to leave any other legacy, he requested they would preserve the example of his life, and exercise true fortitude." Anon.

7440. CONSCIOUSNESS, Interrupted. The following case which M. Cromaz gave in to the Academy of Science, is the most extraordinary instance of interrupted consciousness I have ever heard of. "A nobleman of Lausanne, as he was giving orders to a servant, suddenly lost his speech and all his senses. Different remedies were tried without effect for six months, during all of which time he appeared to be in a deep sleep or delirium, with various symptoms at different periods, which are particularly specified in the narrative. At last, after some surgical operations, at the end of six months, his speech and senses were suddenly restored. When he recovered, the servant to whom he had been giving orders when he was first seized with the distemper, happening to be in the room, he asked whether had executed his commission; not being sensible, it seems, that any interval of time, except a very short one, had elapsed during his illness. He lived ten years after, and died of another disease. I mention this, chiefly to the reader's amusement: he may consider the evidence, and believe or disbelieve as he pleases. But that consciousness may be interrupted by a total delirium, without any change in our notions of identity, I know by my own experience. I am therefore fully persuaded that the identity of this substance, which I call my soul, may continue even when I am unconscious of it; and if for a shorter space, why not for a longer?" Buck.

7441. CONSECRATION, Complete. A young Indian chief in Upper Canada, whose family were reduced almost to starvation, went out to hunt, but all game seemed to avoid him. He thought the Great Spirit must be angry with him and that he would secure his favor by an offering. So he took his blanket, laid it on a log, and said, "Here, Great Spirit, accept this blanket, and bless poor Indian, that he may find food, and that his wife and family may not starve." The offering did not suffice. A tomahawk hung in his belt. He advanced as before, and laid it upon the log, and said, "O, Great Spirit, take my tomahawk; it is all poor Indian has. He has nothing else to give; take it and bless me, and give me food for my children." But no answer came. There was his gun, his only means of obtaining game, his sole support, and hitherto his unfailing friend. How could he spare that? Must he part with that also? He paused, but pressed down by his forlorn condition, almost hopeless, he took the gun in his hand, and laid it on the log, and sobbed out, "O, Great Spirit, take my gun too! it is all poor Indian has: he has nothing more. Take it, and bless poor Indian, that his wife and children may not starve." Still the messenger of love came not. Almost broken-hearted, he started to his feet, a ray of light flashed through his mind. He would go to that rude altar again and offer himself up to the Great Spirit. So he sat down on the log with his blanket, his tomahawk, and his gun by his side, and said, "Here, Great Spirit, poor Indian has given up all that he has: he has nothing more; so take poor Indian too, and bless him, that he may find food for his famishing family, that they may not starve." In a moment a change came over him. His soul was filled with happiness such as he had never felt before. A deer came bounding towards him from the thicket; he raised his gun and secured him. Thus was his offering accepted and his prayer answered. On returning to his family the Indian told them what had happened; thinking that if he left the blanket, the tomahawk, and the gun on the log, they would be of no use to any one, he took them with him, and told the Great Spirit that he would take care of them for him, and use them subject to his will, and that henceforth he would regard himself, and all that he had, as belonging to him. Afterwards he heard the Christian missionary exhorting the people to give themselves to Christ. He related the above story of himself which helped him to give all to Christ and live for him.

7442. CONSECRATION, Covenant of. This is the marriage covenant: "Thou shalt be for me, and not for another; so will I be for thee." Hos. 3: 3. Ah, what a life is the life of a Christian! Christ all for you, and you all for him. Blessed exchange! "Soul," saith Christ, "all I have is thine." "Lord," saith the soul, "and all I have is thine." "Soul," saith Christ, "my person is wonderful, but what I am, I am for thee; my life was spent in labor and travail, but it was for thee." "And, Lord," saith the believer, "my person is vile, and not worth thy accepting; but such as it is, it is thine; my soul, with all and every faculty; my body, and every member; my gifts, time, and all my talents, are thine."

John Flavel.

7443. CONSECRATION, Custom of. It was the custom of the Jews to select the tenth of their sheep after this manner: the lambs were separated from the dams, and enclosed in a sheepcote, with only one narrow way out; the dams were at the entrance. On opening the gate, the lambs hastened to join the dams; and a man placed at the entrance, with a rod dipped in ochre, touched every tenth lamb, and so marked it with his rod, saying, "Let this be holy." Hence, saith the Lord by the prophet Ezekiel, "I will cause you to pass under the rod." See Lev. 27:32; Jer. 33:13.

Biblical Treasury.

7444. CONSECRATION, Emblem of. Travelers have said that they have discovered gardens of Solomon, which were of old enclosed as private places wherein the king walked in solitude; and they have also found wells of a most deliciously cold water, dexterously covered, so that no person unacquainted with the stone in the wall, which either revolved or slid away with a touch, could have found the entrance to the spring. At the foot of some lofty range of mountains a reservoir received the cooling streams which flowed from melted snows; this reservoir was carefully guarded and shut out from all common entrance, in order that the king alone might enter there, and might refresh himself during the scorching heats. Such is the Christian's heart. It is a spring shut up, a fountain sealed, a garden reserved for Jesus only. O come, Great King, and enjoy thy possessions.

Spurgeon.

7445. CONSECRATION, Entire. Ralph Wells, at a late session of his Grace Mission Sunday-school, had on his blackboard the words: "See that Jesus gets it all." What did they mean? Little Emma, a child of the mission, brought into the school from a low dance-house, lay dying. Her parents were very poor. Left alone with her grandmother, she said, "Granny, will you bring me my purse?"—a gift from the school at the last Christmas anniversary. The little purse was brought to her, when, counting out therefrom forty-eight cents, she said, "Granny, this is my money that I have saved for Jesus to give to the mission-school; dear Granny, see that Jesus gets it all!"

7446. CONSECRATION, False. In 1478, a solemn deed was drawn up, signed, sealed, and recorded, in which Louis XI. conveyed to the Virgin Mary the whole county of Boulogne, France, but reserved to himself for his own use all the revenues thereof. He deluded himself with the idea that he had done a generous and pious thing by the Virgin, when he had done nothing. This king has a long line of followers, who professedly give all to God, but, in reality, give him nothing. If vengeance should be executed, the fate of Ananias would fall upon many.

7447. CONSECRATION, Life of. Consecration is not wrapping one's self in a holy web in the sanctuary, and then coming forth after prayer and twilight meditation, and saying, "There, I am consecrated." Consecration is going one into the world where God Almighty is, and using every power for his glory. It is taking all advantages as trust funds—as confidential debts owed to God. It is simply dedicating one's life, in its whole flow, to God's service.

Beecher.

7448. CONSECRATION, Monastic. Plato, of Constantinople, was of noble family, and a great favorite with the Emperor and the members of his court. He had a large fortune and brilliant prospects opened to him. Putting aside the love of pleasure, wealth and the lure of ambition, and freeing all his slaves, he put off his worldly garments and had his flowing hair shorn off. He went to Theoctistus, the abbot of the monastery of Symbols, and offered himself, saying, "Father, I give thee all—mind, body, will; use thy servant as it pleases thee." He was accepted on these conditions. His obedience was tested in every way. He was made to grind the corn, and carry the water, and do the most menial service, in striking contrast with his former life. He did all obediently and cheerfully, and soon won promotion. He died in 794, and is enrolled among the saints of the Greek church.

7449. CONSIDERATION, Want of. A fox had fallen into a well, and had been casting about for some time how he should get out again; when at length a goat came to the place, and wanting to drink, asked Reynard whether the water was good, and if there was plenty of it. The fox, dissembling the real danger of his case, replied, "Come down, my friend; the water is so good that I cannot drink enough of it, and so abundant that it cannot be exhausted." Upon this the goat, without any more ado, leaped in; when the fox, taking advantage of his friend's horns, as nimbly leaped out, and coolly remarked to the poor deluded goat, "If you had half as much brains as you have beard, you would have looked before you leaped."

Æsop.

7450. CONSISTENCY, Advantage of. Some of the Romans who had fought against Hannibal fled in the time of battle. The Commonwealth refused to buy them back at the smallest price, rather allowing them to be put to death or sold as slaves. A few who escaped begged with tears and lamentations to be admitted again into the army; when the Senate decreed that the Commonwealth had no need of the service of cowards, but that if Marcellus chose to employ them it was on condition that no crowns or honorary rewards should be bestowed upon them. When the soldiers of the Cross turn cravens in the fight, they are not refused admission again into the ranks, but they fight under a disadvantage.

Anon.

7451. CONSISTENCY, Biblical. Void of offence.

Acts 24. Becoming, Rom. 16: 2. Blameless and harmless, without rebuke, unblamable, Eph. 1: 4; like Zacharias and Elizabeth, Luke 1: 6. Honest (estimable), Acts 6: 3. Of good behaviour, 1 Tim. 3: 2. Walking worthy of God—of the Lord—of our vocation—as children of light—walking circumspectly. Titus 2: 8. "That he that is of the contrary part may be ashamed, having no evil thing to say of you." Of the cautions, 1 Tim. v: 14; Rom. 14: 16, 21; 1 Pet. 2: 12, 15; 3: 16. James 1: 27. "To keep himself unspotted from the world." To walk through a polluting world without catching its pollution, like the little band of Sardinian Christians, who "even in Sardis" had not defiled their garments, Rev. 3: 4. Examples—Jehoshaphat, 2 Chron. 17: 3, 4. Nehemiah, see Neh. 5: 9–11, 14–18; 6: 3, 9, 11; 13: 11, 30. Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego, Dan. 3: 16–18. Daniel, 1: 8; 6: 3, 4, 5, 10. St. Paul—see his constant commendation of Christian consistency in the many texts quoted above. Few men can appeal to their own personal consistency of life with the same confidence that St. Paul could. See Acts 23: 1; 24: 16; 1 Cor. 4: 16; 9: 1; 2 Tim. 3: 10. Bowes.

7452. CONSISTENCY Demanded. Except you make religion your business, all is in vain. While you halt and halve it in religion, you come but half way to heaven. Settle it upon your hearts, that, except you are throughout religious, you are religious to no purpose. Be sure you shall never come to heaven except you seek it in God's order. It were not suitable to the wisdom of God so to undervalue Christ and his glory as to throw them away on those that account other matters better worthy their pains and care. Alleine.

7453. CONSISTENCY, Duty of. Honorable actions ought to succeed honorable sayings, lest they lose their reputation. Cato the Elder.

7454. CONSISTENCY, Final. Everywhere, in public and in private, Elias Hicks lifted up his voice against the sin of slavery. He would eat no sugar that was made by slaves, and wear no garment which he supposed to have been produced by unpaid labor. In a remarkable manner he showed the "ruling passion strong in death." A few hours before he departed from this world his friends, seeing him shiver, placed a comfortable over him. He felt of it with his feeble hands, and made a strong effort to push it away. When they again drew it up over his shoulders he manifested the same symptoms of abhorrence. One of them, who began to conjecture the cause, inquired, "Dost thou dislike it because it is cotton?" He was too far gone to speak, but he moved his head in token of assent. When they removed the article of slave produce, and substituted a woolen blanket, he remained quiet and passed away in peace. Life of Isaac T. Hopper.

7455. CONSOLATION, Failure of. Cicero was overwhelmed with grief at the death of his daughter Tullia, in whom his heart was bound up. He resorted to pagan philosophy for comfort. He wrote a book containing all the consolation which the religion or philosophy of his time afforded, but found no relief, and declared that his grief was incurable. His only comfort was found in a resolution to erect a monument to his daughter's memory, in the gardens of Rome.

7456. CONSOLATION, Form of. A form of consolation for the dying, said to be written by Anselm, Archbishop of Canterbury, in 1100, is as follows:—"Go to, then, as long as thou art in life—put all thy confidence in the death of Christ alone—confide in nothing else—commit thyself wholly to it—mix thyself wholly with it—roll thyself wholly on it; and if the Lord God will judge thee, say, 'Lord, I put the death of our Lord Jesus Christ between me and thy judgment, otherwise I contend not with thee;—and if he say, 'Thou art a sinner,' reply, 'Put the death of our Lord Jesus Christ between me and my sins;—and if he say, 'Thou hast deserved damnation,' let thine answer be, 'Lord, I spread the death of our Lord Jesus Christ between me and my demerits; I offer his merits for the merits I should have had, and have not.' If he still insist that he is angry at thee, reply again, 'Lord, I put the death of the Lord Jesus Christ between me and Thine anger.'"

7457. CONSOLATION, Heathen. Plutarch had an only daughter, Timoxena, who died at the age of two years. To her bereaved mother he wrote, "Consider that death has deprived your Timoxena only of small enjoyments. The things she knew were of but little consequence, and she could be delighted only with trifles." He saw no kind shepherd carrying the lamb in his arms, and had not faith to say, "We shall go to her." Of this lady it is said she bore herself in bereavement as becomes the wife of a philosopher, not giving way to the extravagance of grief, but arranging her house so that those who visited her found no more disorder than if nothing distressing had happened.

7458. CONSOLATION, Oriental. In an Eastern garden walked the monarch Selim. His head was bent, and his brow was troubled. He was mourning for his son, the child of his love, and the one object that had made the joy of his life. In vain the flowers, like censers filled with incense, offered him their perfume; in vain the vine wooed him to rest under the shadow of its shining leaves; in vain the rivulets to cheer him sent forth a tinkling murmur through the groves; the heart of the king was sad; and he found that love is better than wealth and dominion. Near him walked the sage, Adam Ben David, a man of reverend mien, whose long white beard covered his breast and told of years of experience and thought. As his sovereign passed him, he bowed his head and cried, "May the king live forever!" "Nay, not so," said the monarch; "for life is bitter when the sunshine of life is gone." "Is thine heart, O king, troubled for the child?" "My heart is troubled for the child, and I am filled with grief." "Yet the child is not dead—he only sleepeth." But the king was not comforted, and the tears rolled down his cheeks. Then Adam Ben David spoke again, and said, "Seest thou, O king, yonder almond tree? It is covered with its pale pink blossoms now, but soon the flowers will fall from its branches, and thou wilt see only the green leaves. Then thou mayest say that the blossoms are dead, and that they have been in vain. But it will not be so, and when the time of harvest is come the fruit will take the place of the flowers, and thou wilt grieve no more for the blossoms of spring." "But, my child!" said the monarch. "Nothing can bring him back again." "Nay," the sage replied, "he blossomed as a flower in thy garden, O king, until thy God took him to be perfected in the garden above. Perchance had he lived with thee he would have been only a withered flower; but now will he be one of the fruits that grow upon the tree of life." Then the heart of the king was comforted.

Anon.

7459. CONSOLATION, Pagan. An African woman having lost her child by death, went to the priest with her tale of sorrow. The fetishman asked her what she had brought him as a fee. Having given him a satisfactory present, he said, "Take courage, I will make it all right for you, and I will bring the spirit of your child back again to you." Taking one of his little wooden images, the priest performed his diabolical incantations over it, and then handed it to the deluded mother, assuring her that he had "brought the spirit of her child back again into it," and advised her to take it home and console herself with the thought that her child was still with her. She took the image, fondled it in her arms, caressed it, and carried it on her back as she had been wont to do her baby, under the conviction that his spirit animated the idol. Then she would take it down, look at it, and talk to it after this manner: "Now, my child, cannot you speak to me? Tell me what you have seen in the spirit land. I know you have come back again. Cannot you speak to me?" &c. But there was no response, and the poor distressed mother shed abundance of tears. Some time afterwards, she came under the sound of the Gospel and found true comfort in Jesus. The image she had received from the priest was brought with many others to be burned in the presence of the missionary, but it was saved from the fire to show to the friends of missions in England, as an illustration of the folly of African idolatry and superstition.

Moister.

7460. CONSOLATION, Satisfactory. Friends visiting Mr. Venn in his last illness tried to encourage him by recalling his great labors and usefulness. He exclaimed, "Miserable comforters are ye all! I have had many to visit me, who have endeavored to comfort me by telling me what I have done. 'He hath spoiled principalities and powers; he hath made a show of them openly, triumphing over them in his cross.' This is the source of all my consolation; and not anything I have done."

7461. CONSOLATION, Source of. Our consolations come sweetest when immediately derived from the fountain-head. Springs fail; the fountain never can nor will.

Whitefield.

7462. CONSTANCY, Example of. Arcadius suffered martyrdom for obstinate refusal to adore the gods of Rome about 260. The order of execution was that he should be slowly dismembered. His fingers were first taken off, joint by joint; then his toes; then his hands at the wrists; then his feet at the ankles. Extending his hands for amputation, he prayed, "Thy hands have made me and fashioned me; O give me understanding that I may keep thy law." At this his tongue was ordered to be cut out. He was thrown upon his back, and his legs were amputated at the knees and his arms at the elbows. What remained of these members was cut off at the thighs and the shoulders. He expired in a pool of blood, with his limbs cut in small fragments scattered about him. These were gathered up and buried by Christians, who glorified God for such an example of unyielding constancy.

7463. CONSTANCY, Loyal. King John left Hubert Burgh, Governor of Dover Castle. King Lewis, of France, invested the town, but found it a difficult thing to take. He sent for Hubert and told him he should put his brother Thomas, who was his prisoner, to death, with great torture, if he did not surrender. But this did not move him. He then offered him a large sum of money; but he refused all offers, preserving his loyalty as impregnable as his fortress.

7464. CONTEMPLATION of Death. Scarce anything is more necessary for weak and timorous believers to meditate on, than the time of their separation. Our hearts will be apt to start and boggle at the first view of death; but it is good to do by them as men use to do by young colts—ride them up to that which they fright at, and make them smell it, which is the way to cure them. "As bread," saith one, "is more necessary than other food, so the meditation of death is more necessary than many other meditations." Every time we change our habits, we should realize therein our great change: our souls must shortly leave this, and be lodged for a longer season in another mansion. When we put off our clothes at night, we have a fit occasion to consider that we must strip nearer one of these days, and put off, not our clothes only, but the body that wears them too.

Flavel.

7465. CONTEMPLATION of God. An artificer takes it ill if, when he hath finished some curious piece of work, and sets it forth to be seen, as Apelles was wont to do, men slight it, and take no notice of his hand work. And is there not a woe to such stupid persons as "regard not the work of the Lord, neither consider the operation of his hands?" (Isa. 5: 12.) Asino quisquam narrabat fabulam, at ille movebat aures, is a proverb among the Greeks.

Trapp.

7466. CONTEMPLATION of Heaven. It was an excellent saying of Lewis Bayyer, emperor of Germany, "Such goods are worth getting and owning as will not sink or wash away if a shipwreck happen, but will wade and swim out with us." "It is recorded of Lazarus that, after his resurrection from the dead, he was never seen to laugh; his thoughts and affections were so fixed in heaven, though his body was on earth, and therefore he could not but slight temporal things, his heart being so bent and set upon eternals." Earth could but be a gloomy place to one who had spent even a few days amid the glories of Paradise. If absence from it made him sad, the thought of gaining it and enjoying its inconceivable pleasures forever, should make us glad.

7467. CONTEMPLATION, Pleasure of. There is a sweet pleasure in contemplation. All others grow flat and insipid on frequent use; and when a man hath run through a set of vanities in the declension of his age, he knows not what to do with himself, if he cannot think. Blount.

7468. Contemplation, Rules for. Conceive of things clearly and distinctly, in their own nature; conceive of things completely, in all their parts; conceive of things comprehensively, in all their properties and relations; conceive of things extensively, in all their kinds; conceive of things orderly, or in a proper method.

Dr. Watts.

7469. CONTENTION, Rule for. Whatever mitigates the woes or increases the happiness of others is a just criterion of goodness; and whatever injures society at large, or any individual in it, is a criterion of iniquity. One should not quarrel with a dog without a reason sufficient to vindicate him through all the courts of morality.

Goldsmith.

7470. CONTENTION, Useless. Phocion was asked by the Senate of Athens concerning a demand which Alexander had made of them for a supply of ships. He told the senators that they should either have the sharpest swords, or remain upon good terms with those that had. It is well to count your resources and consider the result before going to battle.

7471. CONTENTMENT, Attainment of. That happy state of mind, so rarely possessed, in which we can say, "I have enough," is the highest attainment of philosophy. Happiness consists, not in possessing much, but in being content with what we possess. He who wants little always has enough.—Zimmerman.—They that deserve nothing should be content with anything.

Mason.

7472. CONTENTMENT, Benefits of. An unquiet mind makes but a slow recovery. Contentment is the best food to preserve a sound man, and the best medicine to restore a sick man. It resembles the gilt on nauseous pills, which makes a man take them without tasting their bitterness. Contentment will make a cottage look as fair as a palace. He is not a poor man that hath but little, but he is a poor man that wants much. Never complain of thy hard fortune, Christian, so long as Jesus is thy friend.

Secker.

7473. CONTENTMENT, Biblical. 1 Tim. 6: 8. "Having food and raiment, let us be therewith content." "Food and raiment,"—a portion enough for the exile-wanderer, Gen. 28: 20; for the stranger, whom the Lord loves and provides for, Deut. 10: 18. As God provided for Israel in the wilderness, and they never wanted bread from heaven, and their raiment waxed not old, neither did their foot swell, for forty years, Deut. 8: 4; so let our daily bread be the ground of our contentment, as provided by him. Let us receive whatever God may send us as "food convenient," Prov. 30: 8 ("food of my allowance," marg.) Ps. 37: 16. "A little that the righteous hath." "A little, with the fear of the Lord," Prov. 15: 16; "even a dinner of herbs where love is," Prov. 15: 17; "a dry morsel," Prov. 17: 1; or "a handful with quietness," Eccles. 4: 6; is "better" "than the riches of many wicked," if they bring no contentment; "better than great treasure, and trouble therewith," Prov. 15: 16; "than a house full of sacrifices (good cheer, marg.) with strife," 17: 1; than "both hands full with travail and vexation of spirit," Eccles. 4: 6. "A little." Our wants are really few and simple. "Man wants but little here, nor wants that little long."—(Young.) "Nature is content with little, grace with less, sin with nothing."—(Watson.) Gen. 33: 9, 11. "I have enough." So two brothers both exclaimed; and it is a strange thing in this murmuring world to find two brothers both uttering such a sentiment! But in the Hebrew there is a striking difference, not marked in our version. Esau said to Jacob, "I have enough,"—the Hebrew "rah" means much—"I have much;" but Jacob said, "I have enough,"—"kol"—all—everything. Esau had much, but Jacob had everything, because he had all in God, and God in all.—Brooks.

Prov. 13: 15. "The righteous eateth to the satisfying of his soul." Our English word satisfaction well expresses true contentment, from the Latin satis (enough), and facio (to make). "So behave thyself in thy course of life as at a banquet. Take what is offered with modest thankfulness, and expect what is not yet offered with hopeful patience."—Quarles. "The nature of true content is to fill all the chinks of our desires, as the wax does the seal."—(Adams.) "I never complained of my lot," said the Persian poet, Sadi, "but once—when my feet were sore, and I had no money to buy shoes; but I met a man without a foot, and I became content with my lot when I saw him."

Bowes.

7474. CONTENTMENT, Case of. I am a true laborer: I earn that I eat, get that I wear, owe no man hate, envy no man's happiness, glad of other men's good, content with my own harm, and the greatest of my pride is to see my ewes graze, and my lambs suck.

Shakspeare.

7475. CONTENTMENT, Christian. The Duke of Conde, when in poverty and retirement, was one day observed and pitied by a lord of Italy, who, out of tenderness, wished him to take better care of himself. The good duke answered, "Sir, be not troubled; and think not that I am ill provided of conveniences; for I send a messenger before me, who makes ready my lodgings, and takes care that I be royally entertained." The noble asked him who was his messenger? He replied, "The knowledge of myself; and the thoughts of what I deserve for my sins, which is eternal torments; and when, with this knowledge, I arrive at my lodging, how unprovided soever I find it, methinks it is better than I deserve; and as the sense of sin, which merits hell, sweetens present difficulties, so do the hopes of the heavenly kingdom."

Whitecross.

7476. CONTENTMENT, Condition of. A man that had health and riches, and several houses, all beautiful and well furnished, often troubled himself and his family by removing from one of them to another. On being asked by a friend why he removed so often from one house to another, he replied, "It was in order to find content in some of them." But his friend, knowing his temper, told him, if he would find content in any of them, he must leave himself behind.

7477. CONTENTMENT, Delusive. As for a little more money and a little more time, why it's ten to one if either one or the other would make you a whit happier. If you had more time, it would be sure to hang heavily. It is the working man is the happy man. Man was made to be active, and he is never so happy as when he is so. It is the idle man is the miserable man. What comes of holidays, and far too often of sight-seeing, but evil? Half the harm that happens is on those days. And, as for money—don't you remember the old saying, "Enough is as good as a feast?" Money never made a man happy yet, nor will it. There is nothing in its nature to produce happiness. The more a man has, the more he wants. Instead of its filling a vacuum, it makes one. If it satisfies one want, it doubles and trebles that want another way. That was a true proverb of the wise man, rely upon it: "Better is little with the fear of the Lord, than great treasure, and trouble therewith." Franklin.

7478. CONTENTMENT, Examples of. Bishop Berkeley, of Cloyne, was so entirely contented with his diocese, that when offered a bishopric much more lucrative than that he possessed, he declined it saying: "I love my neighbors, and they love me; why then should I begin, in my old days, to form new connexions, and tear myself from those friends whose kindness is to me the greatest happiness I enjoy?" Plutarch, being asked why he resided in his native city, so obscure and so little, answered, "I stay, lest it should grow less."

7479. CONTENTMENT, Godliness with. 1 Tim. 6: 6—"Godliness with contentment is great gain." The apostle, observe, puts godliness first. Real contentment is the offspring of true godliness. "Contentment,"—literally self-sufficiency, rendered "sufficiency," 2 Cor. 9: 8. Godly contentment is independent of outward circumstances. It is "the bird that sings so sweetly in the breast," as Luther says. "A good man shall be satisfied from himself," Prov. 14: 14. No worldly gain can satisfy man's heart. Israel murmured as much when they had manna as when they had not; and rich men as much troubled with what they possess as poor men for what they want. . . . But when piety cometh, content follows it. If you find small peace in the world, you shall have great peace in conscience. As Philip said, "Lord, show us the Father, and it sufficeth us." Adams.

7480. CONTENTMENT, Imperfect. There is no estate of life so happy in this world as to yield a Christian the perfection of content; and yet there is no state of life so wretched in this world but a Christian must be content with it. Though I can have nothing here that may give me true content, yet I will learn to be truly contented here with what I have. What care I though I have not much; I have as much as I desire, if I have as much as I want; I have as much as the most, if I have as much as I desire.

Warwick.

7481. CONTENTMENT, Lesson of. Near Cato's country seat was a cottage, formerly belonging to Marius Curius, who was thrice honored with a triumph. Cato often walked thither, and reflecting on the smallness of the farm and the meanness of the dwelling, used to meditate on the peculiar virtues of the man, who, though he was the most illustrious character in Rome, had subdued the fiercest nations, and driven Pyrrhus out of Italy, cultivated this little spot of ground with his own hands, and after three triumphs retired to his own cottage. Here the ambassadors of the Samnites found him in the chimney corner dressing turnips, and offered him a large present of gold; but he absolutely refused it, remarking, "A man, who can be satisfied with such a supper, has no need of gold: and I think it more glorious to conquer the possessors of it, than to possess it myself." Full of these thoughts, Cato returned home; and taking a view of his own estate, his servants, and his manner of life, increased his labor, and retrenched his expenses.

7482. CONTENTMENT, Measure of. Hagar said, "Give me neither poverty nor riches," and this will ever be the prayer of the wise. Our incomes should be like our shoes: if too small, they will gall and pinch us; but if too large, they will cause us to stumble and to trip. But wealth after all is a relative thing, since he that has little and wants less is richer than he that has much but wants more. True contentment depends not upon what we have, but upon what we would have: a tub was large enough for Diogenes, but a world was too little for Alexander. Colton.

7483. CONTENTMENT, Promotion of. One of the directions given by Plutarch for the promotion of tranquillity was, not to compare one's fortune to those in a superior condition, but to those of inferiors. When thou art surprised into a false admiration of him who is carried in his sedan, cast thine eyes downward upon the slave who supports his luxury.

home. How much happier is he who has God for his father, Christ for his brother, saints and angels for his associates, and heaven for his everlasting home?

7485. CONTENTMENT, Secret of. Some years ago I became acquainted with a youth who was lame from his birth—grew almost to manhood a cripple—and as his reason dawned and his observation extended, he sat by the window, propped up in his chair, and looking out upon the streets, saw the boys playing as they came and went, and said to himself, "Why has God made me thus? Why have I not feet and legs to run and jump as other boys? O God!" he said, "I am angry with you! Away with God! away with religion!" He was full of sharpness, and sourness, and complaint. His disposition was bitter, and this bitter disposition shed bitterness on all the world around. But a friend came in one day to see him, and loaned him "The Wide, Wide World." Aquilla read this book, and it opened new thoughts to him—new thoughts of God and creation and man; and, step by step, he was led along until he became a penitent, and saw himself a sinner condemned. Step by step he was led along, until Jesus was offered to him as a Saviour for condemned and penitent sinners, and his faith laid hold upon Christ. The burden of sin was removed; his heart was renewed; the love of God was shed abroad in his heart by the Holy Ghost; and now, as he looked out and saw the boys and girls skipping and hopping, he said, "All right." As he sat in his chair, day by day, and looked upon the beautiful sky and green earth, and knew himself condemned to be a cripple for life, he said, "It is all right. God has done it. My Father has done it. I love him. He loves me. He can but do all things for my good." Now, this is just the way religion works. Dr. Ridgway.

7486. CONTRITION, Biblical. The gracious sorrow of a penitent heart. EXPRESSED by many different terms in Scripture—"Godly sorrow," 2 Cor. 7: 10, "Godly," because God is its author—object—end. It comes from God and leads to God. It has regard to God in Christ. It works "repentance unto salvation not to be repented of," not like the "sorrow of the world," which "worketh death." "A broken heart and contrite spirit," Ps. 51: 15; 34: 18—a heart broken and melted by the Spirit's power. Our two English words form an apt illustration, "broken" and "contrite," like a stone taken from the quarry, broken by the hammer, and then ground to powder. The Hebrew word for broken, Ps. 51: 17, is that from which our word shiver is probably derived. Mourning, 2 Cor. 7: 7, as parent birds passionately cry for the loss of their young. In Zech. 12: 10, we find a figure stronger still. Ezek. 7: 16—mourning for iniquity, like the plaintive melancholy of doves of the valley. Rending the heart, with true deep grief, not as the Jews used often to rend their garments with sham repentance, Joel 2: 13. Smiting upon the breast, Luke 18: 13; upon the thigh, Jer. 31: 19. Girded with sackcloth, Ezek. 7:

18; Jonah 3: 8. Afflicting the soul, Lev. 16: 29. Humbling the heart, Ps. 35: 13; Lam. 3: 20; 2 Kings 22: 19. Weeping, Jer. 50: 4. Bemoaning, Jer. 31: 18. Repenting in dust and ashes, Job. 42: 6. Bowes.

7487. CONTRITION, Eloquence of. When King Henry II., in the ages gone by, was provoked to take up arms against his ungrateful and rebellious son, he besieged him in one of the French towns, and the son being near to death, desired to see his father, and confess his wrongdoing; but the stern old sire refused to look the rebel in the face. The young man being sorely troubled in his conscience, said to those about him, "I am dying, take me from my bed, and let me lie in sackcloth and ashes, as token of my sorrow for my ingratitude to my father." Thus he died, and when the tidings came to the old man outside the walls, that his boy had died in ashes, repentant for his rebellion, he threw himself upon the earth, like another David, and said, "Would God I had died for him." The thought of the boy's broken heart touched the heart of the father. If ye, being evil, are overcome by your children's tears, how much more shall your Father who is in heaven find in your bemoanings and confessions an argument for the display of his pardoning love through Christ Jesus our Lord? This is the eloquence which God delights in, the broken heart and the contrite spirit.

Spurgeon.

7488. CONTRITION, Transient. See the ice, how hard it is! But twelve o'clock comes, and there is a great heat from the sun, the ice cracks; but the sun goes down, and at night it is as hard as ever. How often is it so under the influence of instruction! A powerful appeal often produces a melting of the heart; the tears, apparently of contrition, flow; but the instruction ended, the tears are dried up, and the heart becomes as hard as ever.

Thos. Jones.

7489. CONTROVERSY, Advantage of. Have we not a remarkable likeness between the natural body and that spiritual body the church? Poison, deadly, subtle poison, is lurking in the system. Does the heart continue to beat, do the lungs continue to play, with their ordinary calmness? Not so: nature, as we speak, exerts herself to the utmost to cast out the venom: she excites the system; she accelerates the action; and the man is in a fever. But the fever itself is no disease. Treat it so, and you miserably fail. But assist nature in her struggle, and by God's grace, you may hope to succeed. Thus, in the Church, irregularity of action is, I do not deny, the symbol of disease. There is something wrong somewhere when it occurs. But suppress it, and who may tell the consequences? The fever of controversy, and irritations, and clamor, are better than the cold of death. Anon.

7490. CONTROVERSY, Benefits of. You never need think you can turn over any old falsehood without a terrible squirming and scattering of the horrid little population that dwells under it. Every real thought on every real subject knocks the wind out of somebody or other. As soon as his breath comes back, he very probably begins to expend it in hard words. These are the best evidences a man can have that he said something it was time to say. Dr. Johnson was disappointed in the effect of one of his pamphlets. "I think I have not been attacked enough for it," he said; "attack is the reaction; I never think I have hit hard unless it rebounds." If a fellow attacked my opinions in print, would I reply? Not I. Do you think I don't understand what my friend the Professor long ago called the hydrostatic paradox of controversy? Don't know what that means? Well, I will tell you. You know that if you had a bent tube, one arm of which was of the size of a pipistem, and the other big enough to hold the ocean, water would stand at the same height in one as in the other. Controversy equalizes fools and wise men in the same way—and the fools know it.

Holmes.

7491. CONTROVERSY, Damage of. I cannot but see, and that with trouble and regret, how much Christianity has in almost all times suffered by those nice and subtle, by those obstinate and passionate disputes, with which writers have even oppressed and stifled the most practical subjects; and do most earnestly desire to see the spirit of polemical divinity cast out of the Church of Christ, and that of a practical and experimental one established in the room of it.

Lucas.

7492. CONTROVERSY, Love of. What Tully says of war may be applied to disputing—it should be always so managed as to remember that the only true end of it is peace: but generally true disputants are like true sportsmen—their whole delight is in the pursuit; and a disputant no more cares for the truth than the sportsman for the hare.

Pope.

7493. CONVERSATION, Ability in. Burke is an extraordinary man. His stream of talk is perpetual; and he does not talk from any desire of distinction, but because his mind is full. He is the only man whose common conversation corresponds with the general fame which he has in the world. Take him up where you please, he is ready to meet you. No man of sense could meet Burke by accident under a gateway, to avoid a shower, without being convinced that he was the first man in England. If he should go into a stable, and talk a few minutes with the hostlers about horses, they would venerate him as the wisest of human beings. They would say, "We have had an extraordinary man here."

Dr. S. Johnson.

7494. CONVERSATION, Benefit of. Conversation with men of a polite genius is another method for improving our natural taste. It is impossible for a man of the greatest parts to consider anything in its whole extent, and in all its variety of lights. Every man, besides those general observations which are to be made upon an author, forms several reflections that are peculiar to his own manner of thinking; so that conversation will naturally furnish us with hints which we did not attend to, and make us enjoy other men's parts and reflections as well as our own.

Addison.

7395. CONVERSATION, Christian. There is so much correspondence betwixt the heart and tongue, that they will move at once. Every man, therefore, speaks of his own pleasure and care. If the heart were full of God, the tongue could not refrain to talk of him: the rareness of Christian communication argues the common poverty of grace. If Christ be not in our hearts, we are godless; if he be there without our joy, we are senseless; if we rejoice in him, and speak not of him, we are shamefully unthankful. I will think of thee always, O Lord; so it shall be my joy to speak of thee often; and if I find not opportunity, I will make it.

Bishop Hall.

7496. CONVERSATION, Deficiency in. Some men are very entertaining for a first interview, but after that they are exhausted, and run out; on a second meeting, we shall find them very flat and monotonous; like hand organs, we have heard all their tunes.

Colton.

7497. CONVERSATION, Faults of. One must be extremely exact, clear and perspicuous in everything one says; otherwise, instead of entertaining or informing others, one only tires and puzzles them. The voice and manner of speaking, too, are not to be neglected; some people almost shut their mouths when they speak, and mutter so, that they are not to be understood; others speak so fast and sputter that they are not to be understood neither; some always speak as loud as if they were talking to deaf people, and others so low that one cannot hear them. All these habits are awkward and disagreeable; and are to be avoided by attention; they are the distinguishing marks of the ordinary people, who have had no care taken of their education. You cannot imagine how necessary it is to mind all these little things; for I have seen many people, with great talents, ill-received, for want of having these talents too; and others well-received, only from their little talents, and who had no great ones.

Lord Chesterfield.

7498. CONVERSATION a Fine Art. Some persons seem to think that absolute truth, in the form of rigidly-stated propositions, is all that conversation admits. This is precisely as if a musician should insist upon having nothing but perfect chords and simple melodies,—no diminished fifths, no flat sevenths, no flourishes, on any account. Now it is fair to say, that, just as music must have all these, so conversation must have its partial truths, its embellished truths, its exaggerated truths. It is in its higher forms an artistic product, and admits the ideal element as much as pictures or statues. One man who is a little too literal can spoil the talk of a whole tableful of men of esprit,—"Yes," you say, "but who wants to hear fanciful people's nonsense? Put the facts to it, and then see where it is!" Certainly, if a man is too fond of paradox—if he is flighty and empty—if, instead of striking those fifths and sevenths, those harmonious discords, often so much better than the twined octaves, in the music of thought,—if, instead of striking these, he jangles the chords, stick a fact into him like a stiletto. But remember that talking is one of the fine arts—the noblest, the most important, and the most difficult—and that its fluent harmonies may be spoiled by the intrusion of a single harsh note. Therefore conversation which is suggestive rather than argumentative, which lets out the most of each talker's result of thought, is commonly the pleasantest and the most profitable. Holmes.

7499. CONVERSATION, Habits of. Tasso's conversation was neither gay nor brilliant. Dante was either taciturn or satirical. Butler was sullen or biting. Gray seldom talked or smiled. Hogarth and Swift were very absent-minded in company. Milton was unsociable, and even irritable, when pressed into conversation. Kirwan, though copious and eloquent in public addresses, was meagre and dull in colloquial discourse. Virgil was heavy in conversation. La Fontaine appeared heavy, coarse, and stupid; he could not speak and describe what he had just seen; but then he was the model of poetry. Chaucer's silence was more agreeable than his conversation. Dryden's conversation was slow and dull, his humor saturnine and reserved. Corneille in conversation was so insipid that he never failed in wearying: he did not even speak correctly that language of which he was such a master. Ben. Johnson used to sit silent in company and suck his wine and their humors. Southey was stiff, sedate, and wrapped up in asceticism. Addison was good company with his intimate friends, but in mixed company he preserved his dignity by a stiff and reserved silence. Fox, in conversation, never flagged; his animation and variety were inexhaustible. Dr. Bentley was loquacious. Grotius was talkative. Goldsmith wrote like an angel, and talked like poor Poll. Burke was eminently entertaining, enthusiastic, and interesting in conversation. Curran was a convivial deity; he soared into every region, and was at home in all. Dr. Birch dreaded a pen as he did a torpedo; but he could talk like running water. Dr. Johnson wrote monotonously and ponderously, but in conversation his words were close and sinewy; and if his pistol missed fire, he knocked down his antagonist with the butt of it. Coleridge, in his conversation, was full of acuteness and originality. Leigh Hunt has been well termed the philosopher of hope, and likened to a pleasant stream in conversation. Carlyle doubts, objects, and constantly demurs. Fisher Ames was a powerful and effective orator, and not the less distinguished in the social circle. He possessed a fluent language, a vivid fancy, and a well-stored memory. Chambers.

7500. CONVERSATION, Influence of. Conversation opens our views, and gives our faculties a more vigorous play; it puts us upon turning our notions on every side, and holds them up to a light that discovers those latent flaws which would probably have lain concealed in the gloom of unagitated abstraction. Melmoth.

7501. CONVERSATION, Introduction of. I shall never forget the manner in which a thirsty individual once begged of me upon Clapham Common. I saw him with a very large truck in which he was carrying an extremely small parcel, and I wondered why he had not put the parcel into his pocket and left the machine at home. I said, "It looks odd to see so large a truck for such a small load." He stopped, and looking me seriously in the face, said: "Yes, sir, it is a very odd thing; but do you know I have met with an odder thing than that this very day. I've been about, working and sweating all this 'ere blessed day, and till now I haven't met a single gentleman that looked as if he'd give me a pint of beer till I saw you." I considered that turn of the conversation very neatly managed, and we, with a far better subject upon our minds, ought to be equally able to introduce the topic upon which our heart is set.

Spurgeon.

7504. CONVERSATION, Stock. The profuse talker is of such a disposition that, if any discourse happen from which he might be able to learn something and inform his ignorance, that he refuses and rejects, nor can you hire him even to hold his tongue; but after his rolling and restless fancy has mustered up some few obsolete and all-to-be-tattered rhapsodies to supply his vanity, out he flings them, as if he were master of all the knowledge in the world. Just like one amongst us who, having read two or three of Ephorus' books, tired all men's ears, and spoiled and broke up all the feasts and societies wherever he came, with his continual relation of the battle of Leuctra and the consequences of it; by which means he got himself a nickname, and every one called him Epaminondas. Plutarch.

7505. CONVERSION, Believing for. I once noticed a lady who sat down by the side of the pulpit, and every time I would look down her eyes would be riveted upon me. She looked so intent, trying to catch every word, that one day I said to her, "My friend, are you a Christian?" "Oh, no," she said, "I have been seeking Christ these three years, but cannot find him." I said, "There is some mistake about that;" and she answered, "Do you mean that I have not been seeking him?" "I know he has been looking for you for twenty years." She asked, "What am I to do, then?" "Do! Do nothing; probably that is the trouble, that you have been trying to do." "But how am I to be saved?" she asked. "You are to believe on him, and stop trying." She said, "Believe! believe! believe! I have heard that word until my head swims; everybody says it, and I am none the wiser." I said, "I will drop that word for another. The word believe is used in the New Testament, and the word trust in the Old. I will say to you, Trust the Lord now to save your soul." "If I say I will trust him, will he save me?" she asked. "If you really do trust him, he will save you." She said, "I trust the Lord to save me; now I do not feel any different"—just so in one breath. I told her, "I think you have not been looking for Christ; you have been looking for feeling. God does not tell you to feel; he tells you to trust him, and you are to let the feelings take care of themselves." "I have heard people say they felt happy when they became Christians." "Well, wait till you become a Christian, and then you may talk about a Christian's experience; you must trust the Lord that he will keep you." She sat there five minutes, and then put out her hand to me, and said, "I trust the Lord Jesus Christ to save my soul now." That was all there was to it, no praying, no weeping. The next night I was preaching she was in front of me, and I could see eternity written on her face, and the light from fields of glory in her eyes. Moody.

7506. CONVERSION, Biblical. It is described as a turning from sin back to God, Acts 3: 26; 1 Thess. 1: 9. A translation, Col. 1: 13. A restoration to a right mind, Ps. 19: 7. A healing, Isa. 6: 10. A resurrection and re-animation, Ezek. 37: 1-10.

7507. CONVERSION, Changed by. A young apprentice in New England was converted and applied for admission into a church. The pastor inquired of his employer to learn the genuineness of his conversion. Pointing to an iron chain hanging up in the room, "Do you see that chain?" said he. "That chain was forged for him. I was obliged to chain him to the bench by the week together, to keep him at work. He was the worst boy I had in the establishment. No punishment seemed to have any salutary influence upon him. I could not trust him out of my sight; but now, sir, he is completely changed; he has really become a lamb. He is one of my best apprentices. I would trust him with untold gold. I have no objection to his being received into communion. I wish all my boys were prepared to go with him."

7508. CONVERSION, Change of. A minister sought earnestly to reform a profligate. At length he met the rebuff, "It is all in vain, doctor, you can not get me to change my religion." "I do not want that; I wish religion to change you," replied the minister.

7510. CONVERSION, Conquests of. I had the privilege of dedicating a beautiful country church in my State, in a neighborhood surrounded almost entirely with infidels. The preacher directed my attention to a tall, manly, vigorous man in the congregation, and said he would give me his history when the service was over. He was, it seems, a violent, passionate, close-fisted man. Not a solitary farthing could anybody get out of him for the salvation of souls or the elevation of humanity. He went to the altar a few months ago, said the minister, and gave his heart to Jesus. The infidels in the community said, "Wait a little while—touch his pocket and you will see where his religion is." "Presently," continued my friend, "I came to him with my subscription paper, and spoke of the difficulties and embarrassments under which we labored in the neighborhood for the want of a church." "Well," said the man, "let us build a house." "What will you give?" inquired the preacher. "Fifty dollars," was the prompt reply, and the minister passed through the community with the subscription paper, at the head of which was this amount, written in the gentleman's own handwriting, which surprised everybody. A few days afterward the most trying circumstance of his life occurred. His dear wife trembled for him. "O my husband!" she exclaimed, "don't go." His reply was, "I must go; my duty calls me there; I am perfectly cool and collected. I shall become excited, but I will not say a word or do a thing out of the way." He passed through the fiery ordeal without the least taint of anger upon him. The community then said, "Surely there is something in this; you have reached his pocket, you have conquered his anger, and you have subdued the man. There is power in this gospel of Christ." A few weeks after my visit there, I received the sad intelligence that that gentleman had been buried. He had gone out into the forest, and, unfortunately, a tree fell upon him and crushed him to the earth, and yet did not entirely destroy him. They carried him to the house, and sent for a physician and the minister. He calmly asked for the Bible, and read in a clear voice a chapter in John's gospel. After shutting the Bible, he closed his hands upon his breast, "and such a prayer," said my ministerial brother, "I never heard from mortal lips, for his wife, his children, for his pastor, for the church, and for his infidel friends." In a moment or two after saying Amen, he closed his eyes, and sweetly fell asleep in Jesus. The infidels said, "There is something in religion." A few weeks since I met with that good pastor again. I inquired what about his infidel neighbors, and he replied, "All of them but one are happily converted to God."

Bishop Bowman.

7511. CONVERSION, Cowper's. Cowper, the poet, speaking of his religious experience, says: "The happy period which was to shake off my fetters, and afford me a clear opening of the free mercy of God in Christ Jesus, was now arrived. I flung myself into a chair near the window, and seeing a Bible there, ventured once more to apply to it for comfort and instruction. The first verse I saw was the 25th of the third of Romans: 'Whom God hath set forth to be a propitiation through faith in his blood, to declare his righteousness for the remission of sins that are past, through the forbearance of God.' Immediately I received strength to believe, and the full beams of the sun of righteousness shone upon me. I saw the sufficiency of the atonement he had made, my pardon sealed in his blood, and all the fullness and completeness of his justification. In a moment I believed and received the Gospel."

7512. CONVERSION, O. Wesley's. Charles Wesley had been for years groping in spiritual darkness,

"Without one cheering beam of hope,
Or spark of glimmering day."

On a bright morning in May, 1738, he awoke, wearied and sick at heart, but in high expectation of the coming blessing. He lay on his bed "full of tossings to and fro," crying out, "O Jesus, thou hast said, 'I will come unto you;' thou hast said, 'I will send the comforter unto you;' thou hast said, 'My Father and I will come unto you, and make our abode with you.' Thou art God who canst not lie. I wholly rely upon thy promise. Accomplish it in thy time and manner." A poor woman, Mrs. Turner, heard his groaning, and, constrained by an impulse never felt before, put her head into his room and gently said, "In the name of Jesus of Nazareth, arise and believe, and thou shalt be healed of all thine infirmities." He listened, and then exclaimed, "Oh that Christ would but thus speak to me!" He inquired who it was that had whispered in his ear these life-giving words. A great struggle agitated his whole man, and in another moment he exclaimed, "I believe! I believe!" He then found redemption in the blood of the Lamb, and experienced the forgiveness of sins. The hymn he wrote to commemorate the anniversary of his spiritual birth shows the mighty change that had taken place, and is best expressed in his own language—

"O for a thousand tongues to sing!"

Stevens.

7513. CONVERSION, Crime and. A Jew in Paris

stole a Bible for the silver clasps which bound it; then he tore off and sold. For the book itself he could get no sufficient price, and retained it. From curiosity he began to read it, became interested, then convinced of its truths, and then embraced Christianity.

7514. CONVERSION, Deliverance of. The legend says that Jerome Emiliani, while a soldier, was captured and cast into a noisome dungeon heavily chained, having his feet linked together and fastened to a stone. There he reviewed his past life, felt its evils, perceived his lost opportunities, and resolved to reform and make some amends for the evil he had done. He also made a vow to be fulfilled in case of his deliverance. Then he found the key which unlocked his fetters. A fair form stood by him and helped him to cast off his chains, opened the dungeon doors, and led him forth to freedom and safety. After this miraculous deliverance Jerome cast off the chains of his old evil habits, as he had done the fetters in the prison and lived a noble life, caring for the sick. The chain and ball which he wore are said to have been hung up in the chapel of the Virgin at Treviso, as a memorial of his deliverance. He died of the plague, caught in taking care of others, near Venice, in 1537.

7515. CONVERSION, Detained for. Rev. Dr. Cleveland related the following incident at a New York anniversary: In a revival of religion in the church of which he was pastor, he was visited one morning by a member of his church, a widow, whose only son was a sailor. With a voice trembling with emotion, she said, "Dr. Cleveland, I have called to entreat you to join me in praying that the wind may change." He looked at her in silent amazement. "Yes," she exclaimed earnestly, "my son has gone on board his vessel; they sail to-night, unless the wind changes." "Well, madam," said the Doctor, "I will pray that your son may be converted on this voyage; but to pray that God would alter the laws of the universe on his account, I fear, is presumption." "Doctor," she replied, "my heart tells me differently. God's Spirit is here. Souls are being converted here. You have a meeting this evening, and if the wind should change, John would stay and go to it; and I believe if he went, he would be converted. Now, if you cannot join me, I must pray alone, for he must stay." "I will pray for his conversion," said the Doctor. On his way to the meeting, he glanced at the weather-vane, and, to his surprise, the wind had changed, and it was blowing landward. On entering his crowded vestry, he soon observed John sitting upon the front seat. The young man seemed to drink in every word, rose to be prayed for, and attended the inquiry-meeting. When he sailed from port, the mother's prayers had been answered; he went a Christian.

7516. CONVERSION, Different Ways of. Sometimes you will have impetuous and heavy showers bursting from the angry clouds; they lash the plains and make the rivers flow; a storm brings them, and a deluge follows them. At other times, thin gentle dews are formed in the serene evening air; they steal down by slow degrees with insensible stillness; so subtle that they deceive the nicest eye, so silent that they escape the most delicate ear; and when fallen, so very light, that they neither bruise the tenderest, nor oppress the weakest flowers; a very different operation! yet each concurs in the same beneficial end, and both impart fertility to the lap of nature. So I have known some persons reclaimed from the unfruitful works of darkness, by violent and severe means. The Almighty addressed their stubborn hearts as he addressed the Israelites of Sinai, with lightning in his eyes, and thunder in his voice. The conscience, smitten with a sense of guilt and apprehension of eternal vengeance, trembled through all her powers; just as that strong mountain tottered to its centre, pangs of remorse and agonies of fear preceded their new birth. They were reduced to the last extremities, almost overwhelmed with despair, before they found rest in Jesus Christ. Others have been recovered from a vain conversation, by methods more mild and attractive. The "Father of Spirits" applied himself to their teachable minds in "a still small voice." His grace came down like the rain into a fleece of wool; or as these softening drops which now water the earth. The kingdom of God took place in their souls, without noise or observation. They passed from death unto life, from a carnal to a regenerate state, by almost imperceptible advances. The transition resembled the growth of corn: was very visible when effected, though scarcely sensible while accomplishing. Salter.

7517. CONVERSION, Double. An unconverted man and his wife attended one of the services at a camp-meeting, where she was powerfully convicted, and resolved to present herself for prayers at the altar. Her husband did his utmost to dissuade her, and used his authority, saying, "Never return to my house if you go." She resolved to give all for Christ and went. The peace of God soon rested upon her. Her first exclamation was "Where is my husband?" "Here I am," said he. Deeply convicted himself by the Spirit, he yet resisted by opposing his wife. He was now weeping and crying for mercy by her side at the altar, and was saved. God gives us the friends we give up for him.

7518. CONVERSION, Dreams and. A candidate for admission to Church membership under the Rev. Rowland Hill being required to give some account of his experience, related a dream by which he had been affected and led to serious inquiry, to the hearing of sermons, etc. When he had ended, Mr. Hill said, "We do not wish to despise a good man's dreams by any means; but we will tell you what we think of the dream, after we have seen how you go on when you are awake."

7519. CONVERSION, Early. Alfred Cookman was converted at the age of ten years. His father was the pastor of the Methodist Episcopal church at Carlisle, the seat of Dickinson College. Much spiritual interest had been awakened among the students. On one occasion many of them bowed at the altar, and no little interest was naturally felt in their behalf. It was hardly possible to overestimate the amount of good that might result from the personal consecration of these educated young men to the Master's service. But in that congregation, quite overlooked, attracting only the peculiar attention of one Christian person at the time, was one little lad, not yet twelve years of age. He did not make himself conspicuous by the position he took, or by any marked demonstration of feeling on his part, but in a distant corner of the church, kneeling alone, he wept and prayed and earnestly cried, "Precious Saviour, thou art saving others, oh! wilt thou not save me?" There was one Christian man, who, amid the excitement of the hour, and the intense feeling aroused by the presence of the penitent students, saw the little fellow, and appreciated his situation. He drew near and tenderly laid his hand upon him. It was a pious elder in the Presbyterian church in Carlisle. With a warm heart and with gentle words he unfolded, to the faith of the weeping boy, the simple and wonderful plan by which God saves us, when we trust in him who died for us, as our Saviour. "I will believe," the sobbing child responded: "I do believe; I now believe that Jesus is my Saviour—that he saves me—yes, even now." And faith, in the trusting boy, brought its promised result of peace and love and joy. Many years after, as he recurred to this hour, he writes, "I love to think of it; it fills my heart unutterably full of gratitude, love and joy. 'Happy day; oh! happy day, when Jesus washed my sins away.'" Dr. Ridgeway.

7520. CONVERSION, Evidence of. A servant accustomed to disregard her mistress' direction to sweep under the door-mat was converted. She applied for admission to Mr. Spurgeon's church. He asked her, "Why do you think you are a Christian?" She knew nothing of doctrine, but showed the influence of religion on her heart in her answer, "Because, sir, I now always sweep under the door-mat."

7521. CONVERSION, Example of. A Boston sea-captain was an inveterate sinner. He was intemperate, passionate, profane, and violently opposed to religion. His wife was a Christian woman, and never failed to pray for him for twenty-three years, though often well-nigh disheartened by his constant and increasing wickedness. At length he forbade her attending the prayer-meetings of the church to which she belonged, of which Dr. Wm. Butler was then pastor. She laid her case anew in God's hands, and awaited the result. When the time for the next meeting came, he proposed to go in her place. She feared that he would disturb the meeting, and expected that he would make it a new subject of ridicule. He went, and, while listening to the prayers, the Holy Spirit began to open his eyes to see his own many and aggravated sins. On his return home, he had nothing to say to his wife in ridicule of the meeting, as she expected. Next day he went to his work as pilot on a ferry-boat between Boston and Chelsea with a heavy heart. His burden was great, and he began to think of Christ. As he was making the last trip for the day, a great change came over him. He thought the trip but a moment, but found it had occupied the usual time. He hastened home, and told his wife to bring him the Bible. She expected only a renewal of old scenes of blasphemy. He took the book, and saying, "We must have family prayers," read a lesson, and then prayed. He gave up his drink, tobacco, and profanity, or rather his love for those sins was all taken from him. He arose the next morning at 3 o'clock, and, with a lantern in his hand, called on his next-door neighbor, a deacon, for whom he had always indulged great dislike. Half dressed, the deacon came to see what was wanted at that untimely hour. "Deacon," said he, "I have come to tell you that the Lord converted my soul yesterday." "Praise the Lord, brother!" was the answer. The rejoicing wife called on Dr. Butler to ask him to go and see her greatly-changed husband. He found him at his post joyful in his new experience, overflowing with love, and wondering at the grace of God which had found him after he had gone round the world committing the vilest sins. His was a Paul-like conversion, a miracle of grace.

7522. CONVERSION, Experience of. The reality of religious experience often finds confirmation in the fresh phrases used by new converts. An old woman, who until those days of grace, for a lifetime had neglected worship, rose up to tell how she had been "renewed in the spirit of her mind." "I feel," said she, "just as if I was somebody else." A little girl, with ecstasy in her beaming eyes, exclaimed, "O, I do like Jesus!" "Why?" "Because he likes me."

S. Coley.

7523. CONVERSION, An Indian's. The following is the experience of Peter Jacobs, a Chippewa Indian of Canada, as given at Exeter Hall, London, in 1843: "When I was in my heathen state, I heard a missionary speak of a beautiful heaven where nothing but joy was to be experienced, and of the awful flames of hell into which the wicked shall be cast if they do not believe on the Lord Jesus Christ. I made inquiry if there was any possibility of a Chippewa Indian getting to heaven. I was told that heaven was open to all believers in Christ Jesus. I was very glad when I understood this; I began to pray. I said, 'O Christ, have mercy upon me, poor sinner, poor Indian!' This was the beginning of my prayer and the end of my prayer. I could not pray any more, because I did not know any more English. I thought if I prayed in Chippewa, Christ would not understand me. Christ affected my heart very much. I felt just like the wounded deer. When we shoot a deer in the heart with bow and arrow, he runs away as if he was not hurt; but when he gets to the hill, he feels the pain, and lays down on that side where the pain is most severe. Then he feels the pain on the other side, and turns over, and so he wanders about till he dies. I felt pain in this way; I felt pain in my heart, but could not get better. I went with Peter Jones to dine with a gentleman, and before dinner Peter Jones said grace in English. I thought God would understand that. But he said grace after meat in Chippewa; and I thought, if God understands your Chippewa, he will understand mine. I then went up into a stable where hay was kept, and there I prayed, 'O my heavenly Father, now have mercy upon me, for the sake of thy son Jesus Christ.' Then I prayed again, 'O Jesus, the Saviour of the world, I did not know that thou didst die for me personally. Now, O Jesus, the Saviour of the world, apply now thy precious blood to my heart, that all my sins may depart!' I wanted rest and sleep, but I could not rest. Like the wounded deer, I turned from side to side and could not rest. At last I got up at midnight and walked about my room: I made another effort to pray, and said, 'O Jesus, I will not let thee go until thou bless me;' and before break of day I found that my heavy heart was taken away, and I felt happy—I felt the joy which is unspeakable and full of glory. Then I found Jesus was sweet indeed to my soul."

7524. CONVERSION, Interest in Thy. You remember the occasion when the Lord met with thee. O, little didst thou think what a commotion was in heaven. If the queen had ordered out all her soldiers, the angels of heaven would not have stopped to notice them. If all the princes of earth had marched through the streets, with all their jewelry, and robes, and crowns, and all their regalia, their chariots, and their horsemen; if the pomp of ancient monarchs had risen from the tomb; if all the mighty of Babylon, and Tyre, and Greece had been concentrated in one great parade; yet not an angel would have stopped in his course to smile at these poor, tawdry things; but over you, the vilest of the vile, the poorest of the poor, over you angelic wings were hovering, and concerning you it was said on earth and sung in heaven, hallelujah, for a child is born to God to-day!

Spurgeon.

7525. CONVERSION, Joy of. We are told of some Turks, who have, upon the sight of Mahomet's tomb, put out their eyes, that they might not defile them, forsooth, with any common object, after they had been blessed with seeing one so sacred. I am sure many gracious souls there have been, who, by a prospect of heaven's glory set before the eyes of their faith, have been so ravished by the sight that they desired God even to seal up their eyes by death, with Simeon, who would not by his good will have lived a day after that blessed hour in which his eyes beheld the salvation of God.

W. Gurnall.

7526. CONVERSION, Judson's. Adoniram Judson, the illustrious American missionary, was a minister's son. He was very able and very ambitious. He was early sent to college. In the class above was a young man of the name of E., brilliant, witty, and popular, but a determined deist. Between him and the minister's son there sprang up a close intimacy, which ended in the latter gradually renouncing all his early beliefs, and becoming as great a sceptic as his friend. He was only twenty years of age, and you may be sure it was a terrible distress and consternation which filled the home circle, when, during the recess, he announced that he was no longer a believer in Christianity. More than a match for his father's arguments, he steeled himself against all softer influences, and with his mind made up to enjoy life and see the world, he first joined a company of players at New York, and then set out on a solitary tour. One night he stopped at a country inn. Lighting him to his room, the landlord mentioned that he had been obliged to place him next door to a young man who was exceedingly ill, in all probability dying, but he hoped that it would occasion him no uneasiness. Judson assured him that, beyond pity for the poor sick man, he should have no feeling whatever. Still the night proved a restless one. Sounds came from the sick chamber—sometimes the movements of the watchers, sometimes the groans of the sufferer, and the young traveler could not sleep. "So close at hand, with but a thin partition between us," he thought, "there is an immortal spirit about to pass into eternity; and is he prepared?" And then he thought, "For shame of my shallow philosophy! What would E., so clear-headed and intellectual, think of this boyish weakness?" And then he tried to sleep, but still the picture of the dying man rose up to his imagination. He was a "young man," and the young student felt compelled to place himself on his neighbor's dying bed, and he could not help fancying what, in such circumstances, would be his thoughts. But the morning dawned, and in the welcome daylight his "superstitious illusions fled away." When he came down stairs, he inquired of the landlord how his fellow-lodger had passed the night. "He is dead!" was the answer. "Dead!" "Yes; he is gone, poor fellow; the doctor said he would probably not survive the night." "Do you know who he was?" "O, yes; it was a young man from Providence College, a very fine fellow; his name was E." Judson was completely stunned. Hours passed before he could quit the house; but when he did resume his journey, the words dead! lost! lost! were continually ringing in his ears. There was no need for argument. God had spoken, and from the presence of the living God the chimeras of unbelief and the pleasures of sin alike fled away. The religion of the Bible he knew to be true; and, turning his horse's head toward Plymouth, he rode slowly homeward, his plans of enjoyment all shattered, and ready to commence that rough and uninviting path which, through the death-prison at Ava and its rehearsal of martyrdom, conducted to the grave at Maulmain. Dr. James Hamilton.

7527. CONVERSION, Knowledge of. If (as they affirm) the change from bad to good were either so quick and sudden, as that he that was extremely vicious in the morning may become eminently virtuous at night, or that any one going to bed wicked, might chance to rise a virtuous man next morning, and, having all the former days' errors and imperfections absolutely removed out of his mind, might say to them, as it is in the poet,

Vain dreams! farewell, like spectres haste away
At the new light of virtue's glorious day;

do you think that any one in the world could be ignorant of so extraordinary a conversion, and perfectly shut his eyes upon the beams of virtue and wisdom so fully and manifestly breaking in upon his soul? In my opinion, if any person should have Cæneus's foolish wish, and be changed (as it is reported he was) from one sex to the other, it is more probable that such a one should be altogether ignorant of the metamorphosis than that any should, from a lazy, unthinking, debauched fellow, commence a wise, prudent, and valiant hero, and from a sottish bestiality advance to the perfection of divine life, and yet know nothing of the change. Plutarch.

7528. CONVERSION, Late. A clergyman was called in to visit a poor dying woman, who was quite ignorant of the truth. After conversing with her on the depravity of human nature and the way of salvation by Jesus Christ—that it was all of grace, and that there was no limitation as to person or state—the woman listened to every word with great attention; the tears began to trickle down her cheeks; and at last she said, "I know nothing of the man of whom you have been speaking;" immediately adding, "I was never brought up in the way of religion; never taught to know a letter of a book, nor yet attend a place of worship." The clergyman visiting her the next day began to discourse upon the suitableness, the ability, and willingness of Jesus to save perishing sinners. "And do you think, sir," said she, "he will save such a vile wretch as I am?" He observed, the promise ran thus, "Him that cometh unto me, I will in no wise cast out." Here she found a basis to rest on. Her knowledge of divine things rapidly increased; and she gave evidence of having become a Christian.

7529. CONVERSION, Liberty in. When we see a casket wrenched open, the hinges torn away, or the clasp destroyed, we mark at once the hand of the spoiler; but when we observe another casket deftly opened with a master-key, and the sparkling contents revealed, we note the hand of the owner. Conversion is not, as some suppose, a violent opening of the heart by grace, in which will, reason, and judgment are all ignored or crushed. This is too barbarous a method for him who comes not as a plunderer to his prey, but as a possessor to his treasure. In conversion, the Lord who made the human heart deals with it according to its nature and constitution. His key insinuates itself into the wards; the will is not enslaved but enfranchised; the reason is not blinded but enlightened, and the whole man is made to act with a glorious liberty which it never knew till it fell under the restraints of grace.

Spurgeon.

7530. CONVERSION, Need of. A man may beat down the bitter fruit from an evil tree until he is weary; whilst the root abides in strength and vigor, the beating down of the present fruit will not hinder it from bringing forth more. This is the folly of some men; they set themselves with all earnestness and diligence against the appearing eruption of lust, but leaving the principle and root untouched, perhaps unsearched out, they make but little or no progress in this work of mortification.

John Owen.

7531. CONVERSION, Occasion of. Earl Fitzhardinge was led to Christ through the remark of Rev. Morton Brown, after a business call. "I hope, my Lord, you will forgive me, but I feel constrained, as a Christian minister, to observe that you yourself have a soul to be saved or lost." When the Earl became ill he sent for the faithful minister, the only man who had ever spoken to him about his soul. To whom else should he turn for help from his burden of sin? He died in Christian triumph. On his death-bed he said, "All is peace! all is right! I had always thought religion was a melancholy thing, but I now find it is the only thing worth living for. Here am I, a poor penitent sinner, clinging to the cross of Christ."

7532. CONVERSION, Opportune. At a meeting held in Edinburgh by Messrs. Moody and Sankey, a miner, in his working clothes was sitting near the front, obviously most attentive and impressed. At the close of the meeting he rose to go away; but after walking down the passage, he turned and sat down again. His friend came up to him and said, "Come awa' hame, John." "No," said he, "I came here to get good, and I have na' taken it 'a in yet." So he waited. There was more prayer and another hymn, and special conversation with himself. His heart was touched and changed; with his hard, rough grip, he shook the minister's hand, and said, "I have wondered if this might be true; now I believe it. It has brought peace to my soul. I know and trust my Saviour." On the next day while working a mass of coal or rock fell on him. The injuries were fatal. Death was close at hand. A fellow-workman approached him. "Bend down your ear to me," said the dying man, and then he added, "Oh, Andrew, I'm glad I settled it last night."

Anon.

7533. CONVERSION, Preaching and. A convert from heathenism answering a missionary's question as to the means of his conversion, said, "Master missionary, do you remember a sermon you preached here, on the glories of heaven?" "I remember it well," said the minister. "Master missionary, do you remember a sermon you preached on the terrors of hell?" "I remember it well," was the answer of the missionary. Again the convert said, "Master missionary, do you remember the sermon you preached on the words of Jesus 'I am the way?' And so do I," said the happy Christian, "and that which you said was the means of my conversion." "My word shall not return unto me void."

7534. CONVERSION, Primitive. "The power of the Logos does not produce poets; it does not create philosophers, nor able orators; but by forming us anew, it makes mortal men immortal. It transports us from the earth beyond the limits of Olympus. Come and submit yourselves to its influence. Become as I am, for I too was as you are. This has conquered me; the divinity of the doctrine, the power of the Logos. As a master serpent-charmer lures out and frightens away the hideous reptile from his den, so the word drives the fearful passions of our sensual nature from the most secret recesses of the soul." Justin Martyr, the supposed author of the above, sought God in the study of the Stoic, Pythagorean and Platonic philosophies. At last he met a venerable Christian, who called his attention to the sacred writings and to Christ. As he read these a fire was kindled in his soul. He says, "I was once an admirer of the doctrines of Plato and heard the Christians abused; but when I saw them meet death and all that is accounted terrible among men, without dismay, I knew it impossible that they should live in sin; I despised the opinion of the multitude; I glory in being a Christian, and take every pains to prove myself worthy of my calling." He was the first of the apostolic fathers. He wore the garb of a Platonic philosopher till his death, by martyrdom, which occurred about A. D. 167.

7535. CONVERSION, Providential. In the city of Philadelphia, there was a mother that had two sons, who were breaking her heart, and she went into a little prayer-meeting and got up and presented them for prayer. They had been on a drunken spree and she knew their end would be a drunkard's grave, and she went among these Christians and said, "Won't you just cry to God for my two boys?" The next morning those two boys had made an appointment to meet each other on the corner of Market and Thirteenth streets—though not that they knew anything about our meeting—and while one of them was there at the corner, waiting for his brother to come, he followed the people who were flooding into the depot building, and the spirit of the Lord met him, and he was wounded and found his way to Christ. After his brother came he found the place too crowded to enter, so he too went curiously into another meeting and found Christ, and went home happy; and when he got home he told his mother what the Lord had done for him, and the second son came in with the same tidings. I heard one get up afterward to tell his experience in the young convert's meeting, and he had no sooner told the story than the other got up and said: "I am that brother, and there is not a happier home in Philadelphia than we have got;" and they went out bringing their friends to Christ.

Moody

7536. CONVERSION, Restraints of. The suspension of the ferocity of the savage animals during their continuance in the ark, is an apt figure of the change which takes place in sinners when they enter the true ark, the Church of Christ. It may also serve to remind us of the hypocrite's outward good behavior, though his nature is not changed. Salter.

7537. CONVERSION, Seeking. A soldier sought Mr. Wm. Reynolds and said, "My friend, I want a discharge." Supposing he meant a discharge from the army, he said he was afraid that would be hard to obtain, as he appeared to be recovering. "Oh," said the soldier, "that's not what I mean; I want a discharge from the devil's army. I've been fighting and serving in the ranks for twenty-five years, and I'm tired and sick of the service. I want to leave his ranks and enlist under the banner of the cross, and fight for Jesus the balance of my life." He became "a soldier of the cross."

7539. CONVERSION, A Slave's. Cambo, a negro slave, gave the following account of his conversion:—"While in my own country (Guinea), me had no knowledge of the being of a God; me thought me should die like the beasts. After me was brought to America, and sold as a slave, as me and another servant of the name of Bess was working in the field, me began to sing one of my old country songs, 'It is time to go home,' when Bess say to me, 'Cambo, why you sing so for?' Me say, 'Me no sick, me no sorry, why me no sing?' Bess say, 'You better pray to your blessed Lord and Massah, to have mercy on your soul.' Me look round, me look up, me see no one to pray to; but the words sound in my ears, 'Better pray to your Lord and Massah.' By and by me fell bad—sun shine sorry—birds sing sorry—land look sorry, but Cambo sorrier than them all. Ther me cry out, 'Mercy, mercy, Lord! on poor Cambo!'—By and by water come in my eyes, and glad come in my heart. Then sun look gay—woods look gay—birds sing gay—land look gay, but poor Cambo gladder than them all. Me love my Massah some; me want to love him more."

7540. CONVERSION, Sudden. Gelasius was a comic actor in the theatre, at Heliopolis. A burlesque of Christian ordinances was one day given for the entertainment of the heathen audience. A large bath tub was placed on the stage filled with warm water. In this Gelasius was dipped by the other actor, who pronounced over him the usual formula, "I baptize thee in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost." When he came forth he was arrayed in white, after the custom with the newly baptized. A great change was observed in his appearance. His jesting air was gone, and his face wore a look of deep seriousness. He announced his conversion, saying, "I am a Christian. I will die as a Christian." When they heard this, and understood that he was in earnest, the mob rushed upon the stage, seized him, dragged him forth in his white robe, and stoned him to death, A. D. 297.

7541. CONVERSIONS, Superficial. The Russians remained pagans until the tenth century. At that time they attracted the attention of several religions. An emissary of Mohammedanism visited King Vladimir, but the king did not like their prohibition of pork and wine. Next came a representative of the Pope, who spoke for his religion, but King Vladimir was not favorably impressed by it. Next came a Jew, who spoke of the one true God and his laws. The king asked for their country. The Jew explained that they had a country but their God became angry with them and drove them from it. "What," said Vladimir, "you wish to teach others—you whom God has rejected and dismissed? If God had loved you and your law he would never have scattered you abroad; do you wish that we should suffer the same?" The Greek church was represented to him by a philosopher, who showed a picture of the last judgment to the king, and so explained it as to make him exclaim, "Happy are those who are on the right; woe to the sinners who are on the left." The king then sent a deputation to inquire into the Mohammedan and Greek religions. They came back disgusted with the first, but charmed with the second. They were astonished at the richness of the church which they visited in Constantinople, then the most gorgeous in the world, and were awestruck at the ceremonies which they beheld. The white sleeves of the priests they mistook for wings. At this they said to their guides, "All that we have seen is awful and majestic; but this is supernatural. We have seen young men with wings in dazzling robes, who without touching the ground chanted in the air, Holy! holy! holy! and this is what has most surprised us!" The Greeks replied, "What! do you not know that angels come down from heaven to mingle in our services?" "You are right," said the Russians, "send us home again: we need no further proof." Upon their glowing report in favor of the Greek religion, the king resolved to adopt it. In order to get it he thought he must conquer some Christian city, which he did; reducing Cherson in 922. Thereupon he was baptized, and taking with him a Christian wife and some priests, returned to set up the new religion in his empire. He proceeded at once to destroy the idols of heathenism. He ordered the wooden image of Prun to be dragged over the hills at the tails of horses, to be scourged at the same time by mounted pursuers, and then to be cast into the Dneiper. The people seeing the helplessness of the god under this gross insult, abandoned it with contempt. He then ordered all the people of Kieff to prepare for baptism. The people utterly ignorant of the meaning of the rite flocked with their families to the river, and standing in the water up to their necks, holding their children in their arms, were baptized in crowds, without giving them individual names. This kind of conversion is easy under despotic rule, and has proved a curse and hindrance to true religion.

7542. CONVERSION, Time of. He that is locked up in a dungeon, or otherwise immured within some darksome place, can, and may, easily discover the very moment of time, when either the least beam of the sun, or glimmer of skylight, shall break in upon him; whereas, on the other side, he that is in the open air is very sensible that the day is broke, that the sun is up, but cannot make out any certain account of the springing of the one, or the rising of the other. Thus it is in the matter of our spiritual calling; it is possible that a man may know the very time and moment when the day-spring from on high did visit him, when it was the good pleasure of God to dart into his soul the grace of his blessed Spirit, as in the case of St. Paul, the good centurion, the jailer, the Jewish converts, and some others. Salter.

7543. CONVERSION, Transformation of. The transformation of the natural into the spiritual man is one of the most wonderful achievements of divine grace, and this is the illustration that Taylor gives of it: "St. Jerome tells us of the custom of the Empire when a tyrant was overcome; they used to break the head of the conqueror, and so it passed wholly for the new prince. So it is in the kingdom of grace. Sin is overcome, and a new heart is put into us, so that we may serve under a new head; instantly we have a new name given us, and we are esteemed a new creation."

Papers on Preaching.

7544. CONVERSION, Unintentional. A profligate young man was passing the church of a popular preacher in Philadelphia at the time of service, when one of his companions challenged him to enter. He answered "No, I would not go into such a place if Christ himself was preaching." Some weeks after he was led by the Holy Spirit to enter the church in spite of his resolution. He was struck with awe at the solemn silence of the place, though it was much crowded. The new-comer's attention was caught by the text, "I discerned among the youths a young man void of understanding." Prov. 7: 7. His conscience was smitten by the power of truth. He saw that he was the young man described. A view of his profligate life passed before his eyes, and, for the first time, he trembled under the feeling of sin. He remained in the church till the preacher and congregation had passed out; then slowly returned to his home. He had early received infidel principles, but the Holy Spirit led him to a life of virtue and holiness.

7545. CONVERSION, Unwilling. During the progress of a revival in Kansas, the church was crowded and aisles filled with extra seats. One of these was occupied by a well-known judge. All were invited to stand up who wished to be prayed for. Some one whispered to him, "Won't you get up? We want to clear the aisle." He declined, thinking that to rise then would lead the people to think that he had decided to seek religion. The pressure was such as to force the chair from under him, and he was compelled to stand up. His tall figure was at once observed by all, and prayer was offered for him. Thus involuntarily he became the subject of prayer. Christian laborers came to encourage him and congratulate him on his stand for religion. He felt himself committed. The holy spirit said, "Why not now?" He responded, "It shall be now." He crossed the line of destiny, and stood on the salvation side, wondering at the providence and mercy of God. God saves many who never intended to seek him. They become willing in the day of his power. The judge found what he did not seek, as have thousands, who from curiosity stood by the way as Jesus passed by.

7546. CONVERT, Crisis of the. Gen. Sherman, in his "Memoirs," calls attention to a very wise observation of Gen. Grant, made to him after the close of the first day's battle of Shiloh. He said, "At the crisis of the battle it often happens that both sides seem to be defeated. The side that is able, at this point, to renew the attack, is sure to win." This was true at Fort Donelson, and Shiloh, and many great battles. And there is a grand point here for the battle of life and the victory over sin in these tactics of the enemy. We are all very weak after a hard fight, and then become easily demoralized by things we could easily meet under ordinary circumstances. Young converts are specially sensitive after these fights with Satan, and above all times they need the sympathy and encouragement of older Christians. We need after the battle to stand with our armor on. After you have gone through a great ordeal, and have preserved your integrity, then beware you do not fall before some inferior force. A. D. Vail.

7547. CONVERT, Enthusiastic. While Mr. Moody was laboring in Manchester, a young man, who struggled hard to enter in at the strait gate towards the close of the meeting, passed through amid many demonstrations of sacred joy. The next day Mr. Moody referred to his case in the course of his address, and whilst he was depicting the gladness produced by his newly gotten pardon, the young man himself sprang from his seat, and with overwhelming emotion cried out in the presence of thousands, "That's me! that's me!"

water, he was taken out, and restoratives promptly applied to rekindle, if possible, the spark of life. I waited with many more at the door of the building to ascertain whether he was likely to recover. Several came out, but to tell of no hope. At length a person carried out of the house, the bearer of better tidings, "He has drawn a breath! he has drawn a breath!" The crowd caught and quickly echoed the cry. I thought of the joy that is felt in heaven when a penitent sinner is seen crying for mercy; for just as an infant begins to breathe when it enters the world, so does the sinner begin to pray when he is newly born to God. It is at that very moment that he draws his first spiritual breath. E. Cornwall.

7549. CONVERT, Love for a. There is a parable of much tenderness, which explains why a proselyte is dearer to the Lord than even a Levite. Such proselyte is compared to a wild goat, which, brought up in the desert, joins itself freely to the flock, and which is cherished by the shepherd with especial love; since that his flock, which from its youth he had put forth in the morning and brought back at the evening, should love him was nothing strange; but this, that the goat, brought up in deserts and mountains, should attach itself to him, demanded an especial return of affection. R. C. Trench.

7550. CONVERT, Mock. In a Swiss village lived a pious pastor, whose preaching was greatly blessed, many being converted under his ministry. There lived in the same place an abandoned man, who turned the most serious matters into ridicule, and made a laughing-stock of the preacher's expressions. One morning he went early to the public-house, and began to intoxicate himself with liquor, profaning the name and word of God, and ridiculing the term conversion. "Now," said he, "I myself will become a convert," turning himself from one side to the other, and dancing about the room with a variety of foolish gestures. On going out of the room he fell down stairs, broke his neck, and died.

7551. CONVERT, A Persecuted. On the morning which succeeded the memorable night of Captain Hedley Vicars' conversion, he bought a large Bible, and placed it open on the table in his sitting-room, determined that an "open Bible" for the future should be his "colors." "It was to speak for me," he said, "before I was strong enough to speak for myself." His friends came as usual to his rooms, and did not altogether fancy the new colors. One remarked that he had "turned Methodist," and with a shrug retreated. Another ventured on the bolder measure of warning him not to become a hypocrite: "Bad as you were, I never thought you would come to this, old fellow." So, for the most part, for a time, his quarters were deserted by his late companions. During six or seven months he had to encounter no slight opposition at mess, and "had hard work," as he said, "to stand his ground." But the promise did not fail—"The righteous shall hold on his way, and he that hath clean hands, shall wax stronger and stronger." Power.

7552. CONVERT, Whitefield's. Whitefield had just finished one of his sermons, when a man came reeling up to him and said, "How do you do, Mr. Whitefield?" Whitefield replied, "I don't know you, sir." "Don't know me! why you converted me so many years ago in such a place." "I should not wonder," replied Mr. Whitefield, "you look like one of my converts, for if the Lord had converted you you would have been a sober man."

7553. CONVERTS, Romish. Concerning the Roman Catholic mission to Congo, in Western Africa, commenced as early as 1490, a traveler says: "The presentation of beads, Agne Dei, images of the Madonna and saints; the splendid processions, the rich furniture, and solemn ceremonials of the church, dazzled the eyes of the savage natives, and made them view the gospel only as a gay and pompous pageant, in which it would be an amusement to join. The sacrament of baptism, to which the Catholics attach great importance, was chiefly recommended by a part of the ritual that consisted in putting into the mouth a certain quantity of salt, which in Congo is an extremely rare and valued commodity; and the missionaries were not a little disconcerted to find that the very form by which the natives expressed the holy ordinance was 'to eat salt.' Thus an immense body of people were speedily baptized and called Christians, but without any idea of the duties and obligations which the sacred name imposes."

7554. CONVERTS, Service of. They not only lay down their arms, and fight no more against Christ, but repair to his camp, and fight for Christ with those weapons before employed against him: as it is said of Jerome, Origen, and Tertullian, that they came into Canaan laden with Egyptian gold; that is, they came into the church full of excellent learning and abilities, with which they eminently served Jesus Christ. John Flavel.

7555. CONVERTS, Trials of. There is an insect which is accustomed to deposit its eggs in the very core of the plumula, or primary shoot of wheat, so that this shoot is completely destroyed by the larvæ. Did the plant possess no means within itself, no means of repairing this injury, the whole previous labor of the husbandman would, in this case, have been in vain. But this destruction occurring in the spring of the year, when the vegetable power of the plant is in its greatest vigor, an effect is produced somewhat analogous to that of heading down a fruit tree. Shoots immediately spring up from the knots, the plant becomes more firmly rooted, and produces probably a dozen stems and ears when but for the temporary mischief it might have sent forth one only. Thus may it often occur that those early trials which appear almost to destroy the faith of young believers are their best friends. Duncan.

7556. CONVICTION, Biblical Figures of. Is set forth by different figures and expressions: Wakening from sleep, 1 Cor. 15: 34; Eph 5: 14. "Pricked in the heart," Acts 2: 37

It is important to observe the contrast between the effects of St. Peter's sermon on the day of Pentecost, when great numbers were "pricked in their hearts," and the effect produced on two other occasions, when many were "cut to the heart," Acts 5: 33; 7: 54. In the former case the effect was a salutary conviction of sin, leading to immediate inquiry, "What must we do?" In the others it led only to rage against the preachers—"They took counsel to slay them;" "they gnashed on" Stephen "with their teeth." Smiting—As if with holy anger and penitent shame; upon the breast, like the publican, Luke 18: 13; and the Jews, 23: 48; or on the thigh, like Ephraim, Jer. 31: 19. David's heart smote him, 1 Sam. 24: 5; 2 Sam. 24: 10. Digging deep, Luke 6: 48. The prodigal son.—The beautiful parable of the prodigal son, affords an illustration of the risings of conviction in an awakened conscience. "When he came to himself," Luke 15: 17. What is sin but a state of unconscious sleep and blind infatuation? Conviction is the sleeper roused to thought and terror and concern. The Acts of the Apostles might well be studied as a record of the different results of conviction. How strikingly it shows that conviction of sin is not conversion, as we see in the case of Felix trembling under Paul's preaching, 24: 25; compared with those who heard Peter preach at Pentecost, 2: 37; with Lydia, 16: 14; or with the Philippian jailer, 16: 25-34. It is the work of the Holy Ghost, John 16: 8.

Bowes.

7557. CONVICTION, Cowper's. Cowper said, "One moment I thought myself shut out from mercy by one chapter, and the next by another. The sword of the spirit seemed to guard the tree of life from my touch, and to flame against me in every avenue by which I attempted to approach it. I particularly remember, that the parable of the barren fig-tree was to me an inconceivable source of anguish; and I applied it to myself, with a strong persuasion in my mind, that when our Saviour pronounced a curse upon it, he had me in his eye, and pointed that curse directly at me."

7558. CONVICTION, Description of. An Irish soldier, who had formerly been in the navy, was asked how he came to think of coming to Christ after so many years of careless trifling. He said, "The Lord got his grapnel-irons a hold of me; he pulled on the starboard side, and then he pulled on the larboard side, till I could not hold out any longer, and so I surrendered the ship."

Harris.

7559. CONVICTION, Light in. "You see not the motes in the air, though numerous as the leaves of the forest, till the glowing ray reveals them to the eye. The river seems to flow stainless and clear till the wondrous microscope displays to the view a hundred loathsome creatures enclosed in every drop that glitters beneath the sun." You discover not the sin of your heart till the Holy Spirit throws its light upon it.

7560. CONVICTION, Need of. Till God show you the face of sin in the glass of the law, making the scorpions and serpents that lurk in the law and in your own consciences, come hissing about you, and smiting you with their deadly stings; till you have had some sick nights and sorrowful days for sin, you will never go up and down seeking an interest in the blood of his sacrifice with tears. But if ever this be thy condition, then wilt thou know the worth of a Saviour, then wilt thou value the blood of sprinkling.

John Flavel.

7561. CONVICTION, Quenched. I knew a man that was once, as I thought, hopefully awakened about his cordition. Yea, I knew two that were so awakened. But in course of time they began to draw back, and to incline again to their lusts. Wherefore, God gave them up to the company of three or four men, who, in less than three years, brought them round to the gallows, where they were hanged like dogs, because they refused to live like honest men.

Bunyan.

7562. CONVICTION, Relief from. A young man, whose soul was passing through the deep waters of conviction, retired to a grove to pray. Ease from his heavy burden was all he desired, and he deliberately asked God to give him quiet by taking his Holy Spirit from him. It was a fearful prayer, but it was answered. He arose with all his burden gone. For twenty years he lived on, careless and unconcerned, and when death came to him he related this fact in his history to a friend standing beside him. "I know," he said, "that I shall soon be in hell. Nothing can save me. My doom is sealed, and yet I am quite indifferent to the future."

William Jones.

7563. CONVICTION, Repentance and. Two brothers started to go West to seek their fortune. One had money, the other had not. When they got to the frontier the one without money murdered the other, and taking his money fled to California. Doctors took the head of the murdered man and preserved it in alcohol. No proof of the murder could be found. No one was present when the deed was done. The brother was accused, but declared his innocence. No eye was there but his and God's. He was brought before jury and judge, and declared his innocence. The dead face of his brother was brought into court. He gazed on it, he fainted, and fell to the floor, and confessed his sin. There is a time when all these unconfessed sins will come in before us, tramp, tramp, tramp, till they all come back. When a man comes and throws himself on his knees in the inquiry room, there is hope of him.

Moody.

7564. CONVICTION, Revelations of. The law is only God's looking-glass dropped down from heaven to enable man to see himself. When a man measures himself by himself, or by his neighbor, he is all right, but when he measures himself by God he appears bad. A little while before the Chicago fire I promised one morning to take my children out riding. My boy clapped his hands and said, "Papa, won't you take me to Lincoln Park to see the bears?" I promised I would. Soon after I went out the boy teased his mother to get him ready so as not to lose any time. To please him she did so. Then he wanted to go out and play, and she let him go. He got into the dirt and got covered with it. When I drove up I refused to take him in. He asked, "Why?" I told him his face was dirty, but I couldn't get him to believe it until I took him inside and held him before a looking-glass. That stopped his mouth at once. But I didn't take the looking-glass to wash his face with.

Moody.

7565. CONVICTION and Salvation. A poor Indian, who had been a very wicked man, but who had become pious, was desired to tell how it was that he had been led to Christ. He said, "I was in the mud, I tried to get out, and I could not. I tried the harder, and the harder I tried the faster I sunk. I found I must put forth all my strength; but I went down deeper, and deeper, and deeper. I found I was going all over in the mire; I gave the death-yell, and found myself in the arms of Jesus Christ."

7566. CONVICTION, Siege of. Psalms 110: 3. "Thy people shall be willing in the day of thy power, or of thine armies." The Lord Jesus sent forth his armies of prophets, apostles, evangelists, pastors, teachers, under the conduct of his spirit, armed with that two-edged sword, the word of God. But that is not all; he causes armies of conviction and spiritual troubles to begird and straiten them on every side, so that they know not what to do. These convictions, like a shower of arrows, strike into their consciences. By these convictions he batters down all their vain hopes, and levels them with the earth. Now all their weak pleas and defences, from the general mercy of God, the example of others prove but as paper walls. These shake their hearts, even to the very foundation, and overturn every high thought that exalts itself against the Lord. The day in which Christ summons the soul by such messengers as these, is a day of distress within; yea, such a day of trouble, that none is like it. But though it be so, yet Satan hath so deeply intrenched himself in the mind and will, that the soul yields not at the first summons, till its provisions within are spent, and all its towers of pride and walls of vain confidence be undermined by the gospel, and shaken down; and then the soul sees its need of Christ. Oh, now 't would be glad of terms, any terms, if it may but save its life; let all go as prey to the conqueror. Now it sends many such messages as these to Christ, who is come now to the very gates of the soul; "Mercy, Lord, mercy; oh were I assured thou wouldst receive, spare and pardon me, I would open to thee next moment!" Thus the soul is "shut to the faith of Christ," Gal. 3: 23, reduced to the greatest strait and loss; and now the merciful king, whose only design is to conquer the heart, hangs forth the white flag of mercy before the soul, giving hope that it shall be spared, pitied and pardoned, though so long in rebellion against him, if yet it will yield itself to Christ. Now the will spontaneously receives Christ: that royal fort submits and yields; all the affections open to him.

John Flavel.

7567. CONVICTION, Treatment of. In St. Denis Hotel, in Broadway, New York, I was summoned to visit a sick young man, who came from Charleston with a widowed mother. I had known her there. They had been at Saratoga, and had come back to New York, and in this hotel the young man was lying to die. His mother had sent for another clergyman to visit him, and that clergyman said that the poor young man was crazy; and when I asked that religious brother, "What did you do to him?" he said, "Do? I tried to pacify him; I tried to quiet him; I said, 'We will not talk, but say a little prayer,' and I left him in peace." His mother was not satisfied, and sent for me. He lay before me, a splendid youth of nineteen, his eyes like jets of the brilliancy of a diamond. "Dr. Tyng," said the young man, "my mother has always told me that I must be converted; that I could not be saved except I was converted. I am not converted. How can I be converted? Can I be converted? O, tell me—how, how can I be converted?" I sat by the side of that youth, and told him the story of Jesus. I showed him the simplicity of the gospel plan of salvation. I bade him realize that his heavenly Father had received and accepted him in Christ when Christ willingly died to bear his load, and he was to come in the simplest faith of a little child, and rest himself gratefully, hopefully upon it. We spent an hour in conversation. Twenty-four hours after I called again. O, how changed that face! It shone like an angel's. He reached out his long, tapering hand to me with the sweetest possible smile, and said, "O, sir, I understand it! I understand it. Love for Jesus is conversion! Love for Jesus is conversion! Sir, all night I was asking Jesus to let me love him; to show me how to love him; and I feel to-day as if my whole soul was overflowing with love to Jesus. Is that conversion?" "My dear Julian, that is conversion."

Dr. S. H. Tyng.

7568. CONVICTION, Two Voices in. A convicted German soldier said that there were two voices in him; one telling him to go on in sin and fear nothing; the other calling on him to reform, and serve Christ. So it is in conviction. St. Paul found it so. See seventh chapter of Romans. Satan pleads pleasure and self-indulgence, protests against reform, but the conscience and the Holy Spirit cry "Repent and reform." He "mounts the chariot of the sun" who obeys the good voice.

7569. CONVICTION, Unexpected. When Whitefield was preaching at Exeter, a man went with his pockets filled with stones, intending to throw them at the preacher. No sooner was the text announced, than he pulled out a stone; but God sent the word into his heart. The stone soon fell to the ground, and after the sermon the man went up to Whitefield, confessing his intention, and saying, "Sir, I came here intending to give you a broken head, but God has given me a broken heart." The man afterwards became a Christian.

7570. CORNER-STONE, Christ the. When the temple was built, a stone, intended by the original designers for this purpose, seems to have been rejected by the builders, and cast aside as useless; but, either from necessity, or from some divine intimation, it was sought out and employed as God directed. Now, this event was a type, and its fulfillment is given by Christ himself, according to the harmonious account of three evangelists, to show that his treatment had been symbolized and predicted. Peter, in one of his addresses to the rulers, elders, and scribes, affirms: "This is the stone which was set at naught of you builders, which is become the head of the corner." Christ is thus called a corner-stone. 1. In reference to his being the foundation of the Christian faith; Eph. 2: 20. 2. In reference to the importance and conspicuousness of the place he occupies; 1 Pet. 2: 6. 3. As a projecting corner-stone is likely to be stumbled against, so it is not surprising that the doctrine of Christ, and him crucified, would prove an offence, and a stone of stumbling to unbelievers. Biblical Treasury.

7571. CORRECTION, Gracious Reception of. Demetrius, in a speech relating to a gift of corn to the hungry Athenians, spoke incorrectly. Some one gave him the right word, to which he responded. "For this correction I bestow upon you five thousand bushels more."

7572. CORRECTION, Severity in. Rev. Andrew Fuller, at a meeting of ministers, took occasion to correct an erroneous opinion, delivered by one of his brethren; and he laid on his censure so heavily, that Dr. Ryland called out, "Brother Fuller! brother Fuller! you can never admonish a mistaken friend, but you must take up a sledge-hammer and knock his brains out!"

7573. CORRECTION, Wisdom in. Correction is like physic, not to be given without good advice and caution; if it be too frequent, it works no more than our meat with us; some faults that are lesser, may be pardoned without danger (Eccles. 7: 21). We use a difference when we go about to hew a rugged piece of timber, and to smooth a little stick, which you can bend as you please. A fit season must be observed. Cut your trees at some time of the year, and you kill them; prune them at other times, and they thrive much the better. Horses too strait reined in, are apt to rise up with their forefeet; when they are allowed convenient liberty with their heads they go better.

7574. CORRUPTION, Keeping down. Swinnock. My gardeners were removing a large tree which grew near a wall, and as it would weaken the wall to stub up the roots, it was agreed that the stump should remain in the ground. But how were we to prevent the stump from sprouting, and so disarranging the gravel walk. The gardener's prescription was to cover it with a layer of salt. I mused awhile, and thought that the readiest way to keep down my ever-sprouting corruptions in future would be to sow them well with the salt of grace. O Lord, help me so to do.

7575. CORRUPTION, Natural. Spurgeon. The corrupt heart is like an ant's nest, on which, while the stone lieth, none of them appear; but take off the stone, and stir them up but with the point of a straw, you will see what a swarm is there, and how lively they be. Just such a sight would thy heart afford thee, did the Lord but withdraw the restraint he has laid upon it, and suffer Satan to stir it up by temptation. If I wished to destroy an idol temple, I would not begin by stripping off some of its gew-gaw ornaments, but strike at once at the foundation. It is alike useless to endeavor to detach worldly men from the pleasures and vain amusements with which they glorify their idol, the world; we must overthrow the stony foundation of nature's corruption. Salter.

7576. CORRUPTIONS, Destruction of. When Sir Christopher Wren was engaged in demolishing the ruins of old St. Paul's in order to make room for his new cathedral, he used a battering-ram with which thirty men continued to beat upon a part of the wall for a whole day. The workmen, not discerning any immediate effect, thought this a waste of time; but Wren, who knew that the internal motion thus communicated must be operating, encouraged them to persevere. On the second day, the wall began to tremble at the top, and fell in a few hours. If our prayers and repentances do not appear to overcome our corruptions, we must continue still to use these gracious battering-rams, for in due time, by faith in Jesus Christ, the power of evil shall be overthrown. Lord, enable me to give hearty blows by the power of thy Holy Spirit until the gates of hell in my soul shall be made to totter and fall.

7577. CORRUPTIONS, Discovery of. Spurgeon. In regard to our corruptions, we may learn something from the difference of glasses. You behold yourselves in your common looking-glasses, and see yourselves so fine that you admire your persons and dress. But when you view yourself in a microscope, how much may you behold in that fine skin to be ashamed of! What disfigurement to the eye! And instead of smoothness, irregularity, uncomeliness, and even impurity. So, if you will look upon yourself through the glass of faith, that glass would show you much of the corruption of your sinful nature still cleaving to you—your tempers crooked, your graces misshapen and deformed, and so much corruption cleaving to every action of your lives that would make you sin-sick that you have known God so long, and are like him so little.

7578. CORRUPTIONS, Indulgence of. Salter. The man of the world in the olden time bowed to the fallen statue of Jupiter, by way of bespeaking the favor of the god in the event of his being again lifted on his pedestal. What are those provisions for the flesh, which too many Christians so readily make, but a kind of homage to the old man whom they profess to have renounced?

7579. COURAGE, Biblical. Spurgeon. A lion, Prov. 28: 1; 2 Sam. 17: 10. A goodly horse in the battle, Zech. 10: 3. A soldier, brave and fearless. See Deut. 20: 5. A defended city and iron pillars, and brazen walls, Jer 1: 18. Setting the face like a lion, 1 Chron. 12; 8. Setting the face like flint, Isa. 50: 7. Setting the face like adamant, "harder than flint," Ezek. 3: 9. "Valiant for the truth," Jer. 9: 3; Heb. 11: 34. "Not ashamed," Rom. 1: 16; 2 Tim. 1: 8; 1 Pet. 4: 16. Not afraid, nor dismayed, nor confounded." "In nothing terrified," Phil. 1: 20-28. 2 Pet. 1: 5. "Add to your faith virtue." Christian manliness or courage. Observe the connection—courage, the result of faith, tempered by knowledge, or moral discernment, enlightened by conscientiousness, and leading to love. 2 Tim. 1: 7. 1 Chron. 19: 13. A beautiful exemplification of the wise remark, "Duties are ours, results are God's." "Be of good COURAGE." It is important to observe how frequently this, or some similar charge, was given to many chief ministers and leaders of the church at the commencement of their work; as in the case of Moses, Joshua, Solomon, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, the Apostles, the Seventy, St. Paul, &c. Like the oft repeated charge, "Be strong." Bowes.

7580. COURAGE, Christian. Soon after the beginning of the reign of bloody Mary in England, an officer was sent to bring Bishop Latimer to London, of which he had notice six hours before he arrived. Instead of fleeing, he prepared for his journey to London; and, when the officer arrived, he said to him, "My friend, you are welcome. I go as willingly to London, to give an account of my faith, as ever I went to any place in the world. And I doubt not, but as the Lord made me worthy formerly to preach the Word before two excellent princes, he will now enable me to bear witness to the truth before the third, either to her eternal comfort or discomfort." As he rode on this occasion through Smithfield, he remarked "that Smithfield had groaned for him a long time."

7581. COURAGE, Fear and. At a certain engagement between the Moslems and the infidels the latter thought the former only an insignificant handful, and Abu Jahl said, "one camel would be as much as they could all eat." After a while they seemed to see two Moslems to one of themselves. Their courage had given place to fear and changed the picture.

7582. COURAGE, Justice and. Agesilaus being asked which was the better virtue, courage or justice, said, "Courage would be good for nothing, if there were no justice; and if all men were just, there would be no need of courage."

7583. COURAGE, Martyrs'. When the executioner went behind Jerome of Prague to set fire to the pile, "Come here," said the martyr, "and kindle it before mine eyes; for if I dreaded such a sight, I should never have come to this place when I had a free opportunity to escape." The fire was kindled, and he then sang a hymn, which was soon finished by the encircling flames. Algerius, an Italian martyr, thus wrote from his prison a little before his death: "Who would believe that in this dungeon I should find a paradise so pleasant; in a place of sorrow and death, tranquillity, and hope and life; where others weep, I rejoice." Wishart, when in the fire which removed him from the world, exclaimed, "The flame doth torment my body, but no whit abates my spirits."

7584. COURAGE, Ministerial. About 1645, Dr. Harris, minister of Hanwell, England, frequently had military officers quartered at his house. A party of them indulged much in swearing. The doctor noticed this, and on the following Sabbath preached from these words: "Above all things, my brethren, swear not." This so enraged the soldiers, who judged the sermon was intended for them, that they swore they would shoot him if he preached on the subject again. He was not to be intimidated; and on the following Sabbath he preached from the same text, and inveighed in still stronger terms against the vice of profanity. As he was preaching, a soldier levelled his carbine at him, but he went on to the conclusion without the slightest hesitation.

7585. COURAGE, Rash. "A soldier in the Spartan army possessed extraordinary beauty of person, and at the same time remarkable daring of character. When called to fight he stripped off his clothes, anointed his body with oil, and, taking a spear in one hand and a sword in the other, rushed into the thick of the fight, striking down his adversaries on every hand. He returned from the battle without a single wound, marvelously preserved from danger. He was honored with a chaplet for his valor, but at the same time was fined a thousand drachmas for daring to go forth without his armor." Take to yourselves the whole armor of God, and then go forth to the battle with sin.

7586. COURAGE, Successful. "The soldiers of Sylla, when digging trenches at the order of their master, begged him to lead them against the enemy. He interpreted their request into an unwillingness to work, and, pointing to a very difficult position that required to be taken, bade them to show their valor by advancing sword in hand and seizing the post at once. The spirit of the men carried them forward, and, despite the difficulties in the way, they gained the spot." A dauntless spirit is half the battle, and often wins unexpected successes.

7587. COURAGE, Test of. A monk repeatedly besought his abbot, the wise Pachomius, to pray that he might become a martyr. The abbot reproved him, saying, "This is mere pride." Still the monk desired to be a martyr. So one day the abbot said, "Go thy way, my son; behold, now is the accepted time! behold, now is the day of salvation! nevertheless, be not high-minded, but fear!" and he sent him out to cut rushes on the banks of the Nile. There came along a band of negroes, who seized him, tied his hands behind him, and carried him away to the mountains. They placed him before a fetish, and insisted upon his adoring it. He stoutly refused. The negroes joined in their death song, and danced around him, brandishing their swords and spears. Martyrdom lost its attractions to the monk. His courage gave way, and he fell down before the idol. After this he was permitted to return to his companions, which he did less self-confident and much ashamed.

7588. COURAGE, True. An officer rode up to a battery of cannon, who, observing another officer at his side looking pale, turned in his saddle to accost him, saying, "You are afraid!" "True," replied his comrade, "and were you as much afraid as I am you would turn tail!"

7589. COURAGE, Victorious. There is a story of a young man that came up with a little handful of men to attack a king who had a great army of 3,000 men. The young man had only 500, and the king sent a messenger to the young man, saying that he need not fear to surrender, for he would treat him mercifully. The young man called up one of his soldiers and said: "Take this dagger and drive it to your heart;" and the soldier took the dagger and drove it to his heart. And calling up another, he said to him, "Leap into yonder chasm," and the man leaped into the chasm. The young man then said to the messenger, "Go back and tell your king I have got 500 men like these. We will die, but we will never surrender. And tell your king another thing, that I will have him chained with my dog inside of half an hour." And when the king heard that, he did not dare to meet them, and his army fled before them like chaff before the wind, and within twenty-four hours he had that king chained with his dog. Moody.

7590. COURTESY, Examples of. During the Roman social war the commanders of the hostile armies met at a place midway between the camps. Scato, the Marsian general, asked a consul of the other side how he should address him. Sextus Pompeius, the Roman general, answered for the consul,—"As a friend by inclination; as an enemy from necessity."

7591. COURTESY, Power of. Courtesy allured men's minds, as fair flowers do their eyes. Alexander the Great got the hearts of his foot-soldiers by calling them his fellow footmen. Aristotle, the better to insinuate into his hearers, read not to them, as other philosophers used to do, from a lofty seat or desk, but walking and talking with them familiarly, as with his friends, in Apollo's porch, he made them great philosophers. Vespasian was as highly esteemed by the people for his courtesy as Coriolanus condemned and condemned of all for his rusticity. With one churlish breath Rehoboam lost ten tribes, whom he would and might not recover with his blood. The Turks' salutation at this day is, Salaum aleek, Peace be to thee: the reply is Aleek salaum, Peace be to thee also. Charles V. was renowned for his courtesy: when he passed by John Frederick, the Elector of Saxony, he ever put off his hat and bowed to him, though he were his prisoner, and had been taken by him in battle. And when he had in his power Melancthon, Pomeran, and other divines of the reformed religion, he courteously dismissed them. As he is the best Christian that is most humble, so is he the truest gentleman that is most courteous. Your haughty upstarts the French call gentle-villains.

Trapp.
7592. COURTSHIP AND MARRIAGE. "Their courtship was carried on in poetry." Alas! many an enamored pair have courted in poetry, and after marriage lived in prose. J. Foster.

7593. COVENANT, Comfort of the. William Lyford was asked a short time before dissolution the reason of his hope for the future. Stretching forth his hand he said, "Here is the grave, the wrath of God, and devouring flame, the just punishment of sin, on the one side; and here am I, a poor sinful soul, on the other side. But this is my comfort, the covenant of grace, which is established upon so many sure promises, hath saved all. There is an act of oblivion passed in heaven; 'I will forgive their iniquities, and their sins will I remember no more!' This is the blessed privilege of all within the covenant, among whom I am one."

7594. COVENANT, Types of the. Hagar, the handmaid, and a bond-woman, stands the perfect type of the covenant of law; Sarah, the true wife, and a free-woman, the representative of the covenant of grace. The first son, Ishmael, born according to nature, a type of the Jew, who by natural birth came into covenant. The second son, Isaac, born contrary to nature, of parents who were "as good as dead," a type of the resurrection life of this dispensation, the life from above springing out of death. Gal. 4: 21-31. A. Jukes.

7595. COVETOUSNESS, Absorption of. Take the case of a strictly honest man possessed by this passion. He becomes the very type of rapacious grasping, greedy hoarding, and intolerable meanness. On a recent railroad ride, a plain, intelligent old gentleman, whom I invited to share my seat, gave me the history of such a man, a German by birth, who began his career in his adopted country penniless. He invested the first few hundred dollars he saved in a small farm in western New York. To this he added from year to year, until he became known as one of the most thrifty farmers in all the State. He shaved notes; he took advantage of his neighbors' necessities in buying and selling cattle and lands. His life was an "enormous suction" of everything within his reach. After he became a millionaire, he would mow all day at the head of his twenty men, and keep his accounts nights and Sundays. He never was known to give a dollar to any benevolent object. At last he died, "as a fool dieth," from overwork in carrying railroad ties upon his shoulders from morning to night for two weeks, in order to show a posse of men in his employ that the timbers were not too heavy for one man to handle. He left one million eight hundred thousand dollars personal property, besides his immense farms. Jeremiah must have had such a man before his eye when he wrote, "As the partridge sitteth on eggs and hatcheth them not" (the poor silly bird not knowing that they were addled from the start), "so he that getteth riches, and not by right, shall leave them in the midst of his days, and at his end shall be a fool."

President Foss.

7596. COVETOUSNESS, Baseness of. Caligula, emperor of Rome, seemed to be inflamed with the passion for touching money. He would frequently walk upon heaps of gold, and as the pieces lay spread out in a large room, he would roll himself over them naked. He forced men in their sickness to make him their heir, and if they recovered after making their wills, he poisoned them. The palace was made a common brothel that his revenues might be increased thereby.

7597. COVETOUSNESS, Biblical Emblems and Expressions of. Wolves—Proverbial for their rapacity and savage nature, Ezek. 22: 27. Greedy dogs, that can never have enough, Isa. 56: 11. The horseleech (or bloodsucker), Prov. 30: 15, with its two-forked tongue, which gorges blood, and having emptied itself, craves for more. The four insatiable things: the grave—the barren womb—the parched land—the fire, Prov. 30: 15, 16. The man "greedy of gain," Prov. 1: 19; 15: 27; "hasting to be rich," Prov. 28: 22; who "enlargeth his desire as hell" (or the grave); that is (insatiable) as death, that "cannot be satisfied," Hab. 2: 5; who makes "gold his hope," Job 31: 24; and turns "aside after lucre," 1 Sam. 8: 3; whose eye is evil, Prov. 28: 22; and whose heart "walketh after his eyes," Job 31: 7. The Greek word ordinarily used for covetousness means "a desire of having more than belongs to one."—Parkhurst.—The covetous man's desire is "only to have enough;" but what is enough? The pleasure of what we have, is lost by coveting more. Another Greek word is also used, which means the love of silver or money; see 2 Tim. 3: 2, where this is marked as a prominent sign of "the last days;" see Eccles. 5: 10; 1 Tim. 6: 10. Our English word miser is not more nearly allied in sound than it is in sense to its derivation—miser. Few men have brought more bitter fruit than covetousness. Examples are Lot—Laban—Baalam—Achan—Saul—Ahab—Gehazi—Haman—Rich young ruler—Pharisees—Ananias and Sapphira.

Bowes.

7598. COVETOUSNESS, Blight of. The covetous man is like the spider. He does nothing but lay his wits to catch every fly, gaping only for a booty of gain; so yet more in that whilst he makes nets for these flies, he consumeth his own bowels, so that which is his life is his death. And yet he is at least to be pitied, because he makes himself miserable; like wicked Ahab, the sight of another man's vineyard makes him sick; he wants it for himself. He hates his neighbors as bad as he is hated by them, and would sell his best friend, if he had one, for a groat. He pines his body that he may damn his soul; and whenever disappointed of his expected gain, through the accursed discontent of his mind, he would dispatch himself, but that he is loth to cast away the money on a cord. Bp. Hall.

7599. COVETOUSNESS, Fatal. In the siege of Cassilinum, Hannibal so reduced the citadel that there was a great famine. One soldier possessed a mouse that he might have eaten, and so appeased his cruel hunger, but he preferred selling it to a comrade for two hundred pence. He was destroyed by the famine, and did not live to enjoy his money, while if he had not sold the mouse, it is said he might have saved his own life.

7600. COVETOUSNESS, Folly of. Covetous men must be the sport of Satan, for their grasping avarice neither lets them enjoy life nor escape from the second death. They are held by their own greed as surely as beasts with cords, or fish with nets, or men with chains. They may be likened to those foolish apes which in some countries are caught by narrow-necked vessels; into these corn is placed, the creatures thrust in their hands, and when they have filled them they cannot draw out their fists unless they let go the grain; sooner than do this they submit to be captured. How much covetous men are like these beasts.

Spurgeon.

7601. COVETOUSNESS, Fruitlessness of. Rich people who are covetous are like the cypress tree: they may appear well, but are fruitless; so rich persons have the means to be generous, yet some are not so; but they should consider they are only trustees for what they possess, and should show their wealth to be more in doing good, than merely in having it. They should not reserve their benevolence for purposes after they are dead; for those who give not till they die, show that they would not then, if they could keep it any longer.

Bp. Hall.

7602. COVETOUSNESS, No Cure for. The great and learned Hippocrates wished a consultation of all the physicians in the world, that they might advise together upon the means how to cure covetousness. It is now above two thousand years since he had this desire. After him a thousand, and a thousand philosophers have employed their endeavors to cure this insatiable dropsy. All of them have lost their labor therein; the evil rather increases than declines under the multitude of remedies. There have been a number in former ages sick of it; and this wide hospital of the world is still as full of such patients as ever it was.

Wanley.

7603. COVETOUSNESS, Penalty of. Marcus Crassus, a Roman, was possessor of three hundred talents, when called to be consul. By covetous practices he became owner of vast estates, kept an open feast for all Rome upon a thousand tables, and gave to every citizen corn to support him three months. Before entering upon a Parthian expedition he was worth seven thousand one hundred talents. Thirsting for gold he led his army against the Parthians, by whom he was overthrown. His head was chopped off and molten gold poured down his throat by Surinas, the Parthian General—in mockery of Crassus' unquenchable avarice.

7604. COVETOUSNESS, Punishment of. An oriental story says many years ago there lived in Egypt an old man named Amin. A time of great famine came upon the land, just as there was once in the days of Joseph. Amid had a great store of wheat in his granaries. When bread began to get scarce, his neighbors came to him to buy grain. But he refused to sell it to them. He said he was going to keep his stock till all the rest of the grain in the land was gone, because then he could get a higher price for it. Many died; and yet this selfish man kept his stores locked up. At last the starving people were ready to give him any price he asked for his grain. He took the great iron key of his vast granary. He opened the door and went in. Worms had entered the great heaps of his once beautiful grain, and destroyed it all. Hungry as the people were, they yet raised a great shout of gladness at what had happened. But such was the effect of the disappointment on the old man himself, that he fell dead at the door of his granary. His selfishness killed him.

7606. COVETOUSNESS, Snare of. Do you know how they catch monkeys in Africa? They get plenty of cocoa nuts, and scoop them out, leaving a little hole just large enough for monkey to put his paw in. Rice and dried fruit are thrust into the cocoa nut; something, at any rate, which monkeys are fond of, and they are then scattered about in the woods. Pretty soon the monkeys come out of their hiding-places and peep around. Not a person in sight. They spy, however, the cocoa nuts with their sharp, bright eyes, and having a good deal of curiosity, jump down to examine them. "Ah! ah! something good!" they chatter away. In go their paws through the hole, grabbing the rice and dried fruit. But they cannot get their paws out again. Of course they cannot while they hold on so. They are caught. Ah, monkey, you are caught! The man will capture you. You did not think, I dare say; yet this does not help you. But let go! let go! It is not too late yet! Monkey will not let go. The man will have him sure and fast.

S. S. Advocate.

7607. COWARDICE, Asnamed of. A Michigan soldier lay wounded in the hospital at Gettysburg. His regiment had been ordered to fall back, and in doing so he had been wounded in the back. To him this was a disgrace, and troubled him greatly. The chaplain reasoned with him and explained all the circumstances to his parents. With the love and tenderness that flows from a mother's heart, she wrote him that for thirty months he had been an active volunteer; now he was to be a suffering one. She prayed that God would comfort him. The father wrote, "As to David's wound in his back, it need give him no uneasiness. None who know him will suppose it to be there on account of cowardice." On a pleasant

September day David's ransomed spirit went home to be with Jesus.

7608. COWARDICE, Cause of. "I am in the habit," writes a sea-captain, "of reading the Scriptures to the crew. I have suffered much lately at sea, having been dismasted, and had all my boats washed away, a little to the westward of Cape Clear. I then had an opportunity of seeing who was trustworthy, and I found the most unprincipled men the most useless and the greatest cowards in this awful gale, and the Bible men altogether the reverse, most useful and courageous."

7609. COWARDICE, Instructive. A fawn one day said to her mother, "Mother, you are bigger than a dog, and swifter and better winded, and you have horns to defend yourself; how is it that you are so afraid of the hounds?" She smiled and said, "All this, my child, I know full well; but no sooner do I hear a dog bark, than somehow or other, my heels take me off as fast as they can carry me." Æsop.

7610. COWARDICE, Penalty of. It is said that a tall, stalwart Indian is often seen about the streets of Virginia City, dressed in calico, like a squaw. He is compelled by the Piutes to wear woman's clothes for cowardice shown in battle several years since. If all of us who have been cowards in the conflicts of life were compelled to wear calico, what a terrible figure prints would reach! Anon.

7611. COWARDICE, Religious. A coward in the field is like the wise man's fool: his heart is at his mouth, and he doth not know what he does profess; but a coward in his faith is like a fool in his wisdom: his mouth is in his heart, and he dare not profess what he does know. I had rather not know the good I should do, than not do the good I know. It is better to be beaten with few stripes than with many. Warwick.

7612. CREATION, Benevolence in. We are raised by science to an understanding of the infinite wisdom and goodness which the Creator has displayed in all his works. Not a step can we take in any direction without perceiving the most extraordinary traces of design; and the skill everywhere conspicuous is calculated in so vast a proportion of instances to promote the happiness of living creatures, and especially of ourselves, that we feel no hesitation in concluding that, if we knew the whole scheme of Providence, every part would appear to be in harmony with a plan of absolute benevolence. Independently, however, of this most consoling inference, the delight is inexpressible of being able to follow the marvelous works of the Great Author of nature, and to trace the unbounded power and exquisite skill which are exhibited by the minutest as well as the mightiest parts of his system. Brougham.

7613. CREATION, Comfort from. When Mr. Simeon, of Cambridge, was on his dying bed, his biographer relates that, "after a short pause, he looked round with one of his bright smiles, and asked, 'What do you think especially gives me comfort at this time? The creation! Did Jehovah create the world or did I? I think he did; now if he made the world, he can sufficiently take care of me." Take as an illustration of the power of God as a creator, the inconceivable velocity with which he made the heavenly bodies to move through infinite space. The velocity of a ship is from eight to twelve miles an hour; of a race-horse from twenty to thirty miles; of a bird, say from fifty to sixty miles; and of the clouds, in a violent hurricane, from eighty to one hundred miles an hour. The motion of a ball from a loaded cannon is incomparably swifter than any of the motions now stated; but of the velocity of such a body we have a less accurate idea; because, its rapidity being so great, we cannot trace it distinctly by the eye, through its whole range, from the mouth of the cannon to the object against which it is impelled. By experiments, it has been found, that its rate of motion is from 480 to 800 miles in an hour, but it is retarded every moment, by the resistance of the air and the attraction of the earth. This velocity, however, great as it is, bears no sensible proportion to the rate of motion which is found among the celestial orbs. That such enormous masses of matter should move at all, is wonderful: but when we consider the amazing velocity with which they are impelled, we are lost in astonishment. The planet Jupiter, in describing his circuit round the sun, moves at the rate of 29,000 miles an hour. The planet Venus, one of the nearest and most brilliant of the celestial bodies, and about the same size as the earth, is found to move through the spaces of the firmament at the rate of 76,000 miles an hour; and the planet Mercury, with a velocity of no less than 103,000 miles an hour, or 1,750 miles in a minute, a motion two hundred times swifter than that of a cannon ball. These velocities will appear still more astonishing, if we consider the magnitude of the bodies which are thus impelled, and the immense forces which are requisite to carry them along in their courses. However rapidly a ball flies from the mouth of a cannon, it is the flight of a body only a few inches in diameter; but one of the bodies, whose motion has been just now stated, is eighty-nine thousand miles in diameter, and would comprehend, within its vast circumference, more than a thousand globes as large as the earth! The planet Saturn, one of the slowest moving bodies of our system, a globe 900 times larger than the earth, is impelled through the regions of space at the rate of 22,000 miles an hour, carrying along with him two stupendous rings, and seven moons larger than ours, through his whole course round the central luminary. Were we placed within a thousand miles of this stupendous globe (a station which superior beings may occasionally occupy), where its hemisphere, encompassed by its magnificent rings, would fill the whole extent of our vision; the view of such a ponderous and glorious object flying with such amazing velocity before us, would infinitely exceed every idea of grandeur we can derive from terrestrial scenes, and overwhelm our powers with astonishment and awe. Under such an emotion, we could only exclaim, "Great and marvelous are thy works, Lord God Almighty!" The ideas of strength and power implied in the impulsion of such enormous masses of matter through the illimitable tracts of space, are forced upon the mind with irresistible energy, far surpassing what any abstract propositions or reasonings can convey; and constrain us to exclaim, "Who is a strong Lord like unto thee? Thy right hand is become glorious in power! The Lord God omnipotent reigneth!" Illustrations of Truth.

7614. CREATION, Commanding. Such is the dependence amongst all the orders of creatures; the inanimate, the sensitive, the rational, the natural, the artificial; that the apprehension of one of them is a good step towards the understanding of the rest. And this is the highest pitch of human reason—to follow all the links of this chain till all their secrets are open to our minds, and their works advanced or imitated by our hands. This is truly to command the world; to rank all the varieties and degrees of things so orderly, one upon another, that standing on the top of them we may perfectly behold all that are below, and make them all serviceable to man's life. And to this happiness there can be nothing else added, but that we make a second advantage of this rising ground, thereby to look the nearer into heaven, an ambition which, though it was punished in the old world by a universal confusion, when it was managed with impiety and insolence, yet, when it is carried on by that humility and innocence which can never be separated from true knowledge, when it is designed not to brave the Creator of all things, but to admire him the more, must needs be the utmost perfection of human nature. Sprat.

7615. CREATION, a Continual Miracle. How close does it bring the Creator to us to regard him, not so much as having made the world, as still engaged in making it; i. e., by supplying the life on which its laws, and thus its being and incidents, depend. It is an ill-constructed theology which regards God as having created only in past ages. A gorgeous sunset, the leafing of a tree in the sweet spring-time, betokens the Divine hand no less palpably than did the miracles which provided the hungry multitudes of Galilee with food. "Depend upon it" (says an eloquent preacher), "it is not the want of greater miracles, but of the soul to perceive such as are allowed us still, that makes us push all the sanctities into the far spaces we cannot reach. The devout feel that wherever God's hand is, there is miracle; and it is simply an undevoutness which imagines that only where miracle is, can there be the real hand of God. He who will but discern beneath the sun, as he rises any morning, the supporting finger of the Almighty, may recover the sweet and reverent surprise with which Adam gazed on the first dawn in Paradise; and if we cannot find him there,—if we cannot find him on the margin of the sea, or in the flowers by the wayside—I do not think we should have discovered him any more on the grass of Gethsemane or Olivet.

Grindon

7616. CREATION, Government of. The history of creation is itself the history of God's government; and nothing short of absolute idiotism, rather than mere ignorance, could believe it possible that this incalculably complicated, multifarious, and inconceivably extended universe could preserve its order without a government. MacCulloch.

7617. CREATION, Immensity of. About the time of the invention of the telescope, another instrument was formed, which laid open a scene no less wonderful and rewarded the inquisitive spirit of man. This was the microscope. The one led me to see a system in every star, the other leads me to see a world in every atom. The one taught me that this mighty globe, with the whole burden of its people and its countries, is but a grain of sand on the high field of immensity; the other teaches me that every grain of sand may harbor within it the tribes and the families of a busy population. The one told me of the insignificance of the world I tread upon; the other redeems it from all its insignificance, for it tells me that in the leaves of every forest, and in the flowers of every garden, and in the waters of every rivulet, there are worlds teeming with life, and numberless as are the glories of the firmament. The one has suggested to me that beyond and above all that is visible to man there may be fields of creation which sweep immensely along, and carry the impress of the Almighty's hand to the remotest scenes of the universe; the other suggests that within and beneath all that minuteness which the aided eye of man has been able to explore there may be a region of invisibles; and that, could we draw aside the mysterious curtain which shrouds it from our senses, we might see a theatre of as many wonders as astronomy has unfolded, a universe within the compass of a point so small as to elude all the powers of the microscope, but where the wonder-working God finds room for the exercise of all his attributes, where he can raise another mechanism of worlds, and fill and animate them all with the evidence of his glory. Chalmers.

7618. CREATION, Provisions of. The manner in which the Creator has contrived a supply for the thirst of man in sultry places is worthy of admiration. He has placed amidst the burning sands of Africa a plant whose leaf, twisted round like a cruet, is always filled with a large glassful of fresh water. The gullet of this cruet is shut by the extremity of the leaf itself, so as to prevent the water from evaporating. He has planted, in some other districts of the same country, a great tree, called by the negroes Boa, the trunk of which, of a prodigious bulk, is naturally hollowed, like a cistern. In the rainy season it receives its fill of water, which continues fresh and cool in the greatest heats, by means of the tufted foliage which crowns its summit. In some of the parched rocky islands of the West Indies there is found a tree called the Water Lianno, so full of sap, that if you cut a single branch of it, as much water is immediately discharged as a man can drink at a draught, and it is perfectly pure and limpid. St. Pierre.

7619. CREATOR, Evidence of a. See here, I hold a Bible in my hand, and you see the cover, the leaves, the letters, the words, but you do not see the writers or the printer, the letter-founder, the ink-maker, the paper-maker, or the binder. You never did see them, you never will see them, and yet there is not one of you who will think of disputing or deaying the being of these men. I go further, I affirm that you see the very souls of these men, in seeing this book, and you feel yourselves obliged to allow that, by the contrivance, design, memory, fancy, reason, and so on. In the same manner, if you see a picture, you judge there was a painter; if you see a house, you judge there was a builder of it; and if you see a room contrived for this purpose, and another for that—a door to enter, and a window to admit light, a chimney to hold fire, you conclude that the builder was a person of skill and forecast, who formed the house with a view to the accommodation of its inhabitants. In this manner examine the world, and pity the man who, when he sees the sign of a wheatsheaf, hath sense enough to know that there is a joiner, and somewhere a painter, but who, when he sees the wheatsheaf itself, is so stupid as not to say to himself, "This had a wise and good creator." Robert Robinson.

7620. CREATOR, Question of the. "Who made you?" was asked of a small girl. She replied, "God made me that length," indicating with her two hands the ordinary size of a new-born infant, "and I grewed the rest myself." This was before Topsy's time, and is wittier than even "Spects I grewed," and not less philosophical than Descartes' nihil with Leibnitz's nisi as its rider. Horæ Subsecivæ.

7621. CREATOR, Remember Thy. A missionary in South Australia gave the text, "Remember now thy Creator in the days of thy youth," to a boy who was utterly destitute of religious education or influence. The boy promised never to forget the text. Two years after the missionary learned that the boy had become a faithful Christian, and that he attributed his conversion to the stranger who had given him the text.

7622. CREDULITY, Folly of. Those people who are alarmed and perplexed at the danger of having to judge for themselves in religious matters, think to escape that danger by choosing to take some guide as an infallible one, and believe or disbelieve as he bids them. What is this but crossing the crazy bridge in a sedan-chair? In determining to believe whatever their guide affirms, they are in reality choosing to make every single exercise of faith which follows that original determination; and they are choosing to believe he is infallible into the bargain. There are at least as many chances of error as before against every single article of faith in the creed which they adopt upon their guide's authority; and there are also additional chances against that authority itself. Thus, in order to get over more safely, they put not only their own weight, but that of the sedan-chair also, upon the tottering arch. Excelsior.

7623. CRIME, Avenged. Crime has often been clad in royal purple, and has often trampled on innocence with impunity; but the purple has mouldered away, the crime remained a crime, and from the blood of persecuted innocence has arisen a triumphant avenger. In vain vice sharpened its murderous axe, and doomed virtue to die in the flames; though trembling cowards burnt incense before the ruthless tyrant, the sinner's pride was soon laid low, and the funeral pile of slandered innocence was changed into a throne of glory!

Zschokke.

7624. CRIME, The Bible and. A gentleman lately presented a Bible to a prisoner under sentence of death. He exclaimed, "O, sir, if I had had this book, and studied it, I should never have committed the crime of which I am convicted!"

7625. CRIME, Cause of. Sir Matthew Hale, one of the oldest Chief Justices of England, gave the following testimony against strong drink: "The places of judicature, which I have long held in this kingdom, have given an opportunity to observe the original cause of most of the enormities that have been committed for the space of twenty years, and by due observation I have found that if the murders and manslaughters, burglaries and robberies, the riots and tumults, the adulteries, fornications, rapes, and other enormities that have happened in that time, were divided in five parts, four of them have been the issues and products of excessive drinking—of tavern or ale-house drinking."

7626. CRIME, Expiating. A traveler among the Alps relates that in the midst of a strange solitude they encountered a cross. The guide said, "I myself erected this cross." "For what purpose?" inquired the traveler. "In fulfillment of a vow that I had made." "Why did you make the vow?" "I met with an accident here." "Indeed, of what nature?" "I killed a man." "You?" "Yes, sir, there," and he pointed to the cross. Upon various points of the mountain ridges he had erected twenty-nine of these crosses. The morality and religion of such a being belong to the darkest times.

7627. CRISES, Eventful. A switchman slept when he should have watched for the coming train. The consequence was a collision with frightful loss of life. A little sleep did it. A young man whose heart was tender resolved to serve Christ. His old comrades invited him to have "one more" good time with them. He yielded and began a series of dissipations which ended in his becoming a murderer and a suicide. A young man started for a place of amusement on a Sunday, and on the way was invited to attend a religious service. He accepted and became a Christian and a missionary martyr. He was the Rev. John Williams, of Raratonga. A reformed drunkard commenced to make New Year's calls, resolved to taste no liquors. The ridicule of a thoughtless young woman overcame him. He was carried home drunk, and died a few months later cursing his tempter.

7628. CRISES, Important. There are moments that are worth more than years. We cannot help it; there is no proportion between spaces of time in importance nor in value. A straggled, unthought-of five minutes may contain the event of a life. And this all-important moment, disproportionate to all other moments, who can tell when it will be upon us?

Dr. Arnold.

7629. CRISES, Mementos of. When traveling among the Alps, we often saw a small black cross planted upon a rock, or on the brink of a torrent, or on the verge of the highway, to mark the spot where men have met with sudden death by accident. Solemn reminders these of our mortality! but they led our mind still further: for we said within us, if the places where men seal themselves for the second death could be thus manifestly indicated, what a scene would this world present! Here the memorial of a soul undone by yielding to a foul temptation, there a conscience seared by the rejection of a final warning, and yonder a heart forever turned into stone by resisting the last tender appeal of love. Our places of worship would scarce hold the sorrowful monuments which might be erected over spots where spirits were forever lost—spirits that date their ruin from sinning against the gospel while under the sound of it.

Spurgeon.

7630. CRISIS, The American. These are the times that try men's souls. The summer soldier and the sunshine patriot will, in this crisis, shrink from the service of his country; but he that stands it now deserves the thanks of men and women. Tyranny, like hell, is not easily conquered; yet we have this consolation, that the harder the conflict the more glorious the triumph. What we obtain too cheap we esteem too lightly.

Thomas Paine's "Crisis," Dec., 1776.

7631. CRISIS, Life's. The minute is coming when we have crossed the line of doom. Take that pitiful steamer, the Atlantic, that was wrecked off the coast of Newfoundland three years ago this month. There it was in the fog; it had been in the fog three days, and just plying along toward the shore and toward the rocks. There was just one moment when they could have stopped and reversed their engines, and saved the steamer, and there was one moment when it was too late. There was one moment when it crossed the line, and 500 souls went down to a watery grave. There is a crisis in every man's life when he can stop. You can just stop to-night and say, "By the grace of God I will stop to-night, and I will just turn my face toward God." There isn't anything to hinder you; you can to-night just change your company; leave the world and join God's people.

Moody.

7632. CRITICISM, Check to. A Spartan, being told that Philip had demolished the City of Olynthus, remarked, "But he cannot build another such." The critic's work is that of demolition. It is always easier to tear down than to build up. It may abate our conceit to try seriously to do as well as the one we criticise.

7633. CRITICISM, Muddy. Robert Hall did not like Dr. Gill as an author. When Mr. Christmas Evans was in Bristol he was talking to Mr. Hall about the Welsh language, which he said was very copious and expressive. "How I wish, Mr. Hall, that Dr. Gill's works had been written in Welsh!" "I wish they had, sir; I wish they had with all my heart, for then I should never have read them. They are a continent of mud, sir." Gregory.

7635. CRITICISM, Rule for. Apollodorus, the painter, who first invented the mixing of colors and the softening of shadows, was an Athenian. Over his works there is this inscription:

'Tis no hard thing to reprehend me;
But let the men that blame me mend me.

Plutarch.

7636. CRITICS, Qualities of. The pre-eminent quality needed to their vocation is Christian love to the neighbor. The primary office of a critic is not, as many seem to think, to detect imperfections. That is a very shallow mind which seeks to distinguish itself by facility in finding errors. The first duty of the critic is to create happiness, where it may be done faithfully, and to shrink from giving pain, where it can honestly be avoided. Steadfastly to adhere to this, the highest principle of criticism, requires, however, too noble a nature to be met with frequently. "A true critic," says Addison, "ought to dwell upon excellencies rather than defects; to discover the concealed beauties of a writer; and communicate to the world such things as are worth its observation." The rule applies universally. Rightly to comprehend and estimate things, whether in art, literature, or nature, we must train ourselves to admiration of excellence. The contrary course serves only to blind and darken, He who does not strive to rise above nature will sink below it.

Grindon.

7637. CROSS, All-sufficiency of the. The Cross of Christ is the invincible sanctuary of the humble, and the dejection of the proud, the victory of Christ, the destruction of the devil, the confirmation of the faithful, the death of the unbeliever, the life of the just. It is the key of Paradise, the weak man's staff, the convert's convoy, the upright man's perfection, the soul and body's health, the prevention of all evil, and the procurer of all good. Quarles 7638. CROSS, Apparition of the. Constantine saw in mid-heaven, above the brightness of the sun at noon-day, a cross of wondrous shape, and on it read the legend, "In this sign conquer!" The army also saw it. Before the battle of the Milvian bridge, he put the cross, with the name of Christ upon it, in place of the Roman eagle on his standards. His soldiers hailed it as a symbol of divine protection and pledge of victory. This occurred in 312. When Julian the Apostate came to the throne, he caused the removal of the cross from the standards, and substituted for it the images of his heathen gods. Christian soldiers in his army often refused to bear them, and on this account suffered martyrdom. Such were Bonosus and Maximilian, who refused to carry images of Jove and Hercules on their standards, and after excruciating torture with loaded thongs, and then upon the rack, steadfastly affirmed, "We will have nothing to do with your standards loaded with idols!" Rather than handle the idols, they went to their death A. D. 363.

7639. CROSS, Bearing the. Mr. Simeon of Cambridge, conversing with Mr. Gurney, made the following remarks:—"Should you see a poor maniac knocking his head against a wall, and beating out his brains, you would not be angry with him however he might taunt you. You would pity him from your very soul; you would direct all your energies to save him from destruction! So it will be with you: the world will mock and trample on you; a man shall come, and, as it were, slap you on the face. You rub your face, and say, 'This is strange work; I like it not, sir.' Never mind, I say, this is your evidence; it turns to you for a testimony. If you were of the world, the world would love its own, but now you are not of the world, therefore the world hateth you. Many years ago, when I was an object of much contempt and derision in this university, I strolled forth one day, buffeted and afflicted, with my little Testament in my hand. I prayed earnestly to my God, that he would comfort me with some cordial from his word, and that on opening the book I might find some text which should sustain me. The first text which caught my eye was this, 'They found a man of Cyrene, Simon by name; him they compelled to bear his cross.' You know Simon is the same name as Simeon. What a world of instruction was here—what a blessed hint for my encouragement! To have the cross laid upon me, that I might bear it after Jesus—what a privilege! It was enough. Now I could leap and sing for joy as one whom Jesus was honoring with a participation in his sufferings. My dear brother, we must not mind a little suffering. When I am getting through a hedge, if my head and shoulders are safely through, I can bear the pricking of my legs. Let me rejoice in the remembrance that our holy Head has surmounted all his sufferings and triumphed over death. Let us follow him patiently, we shall soon be partakers of his victory."

F. F. Trench.

7640. CROSS, Olinging to the. A great crucifix stood up at the outskirts of Noyon, France, and there at midnight the moonlight showed a woman kneeling, with her arms thrown around the tree, and her head bent to the ground; and I could not but hope that she was a true penitent, in error, but still clinging with her heart to Christ as she clung with her arms to the cross; any way, at that midnight hour, in that lonely spot, a woman bowed by some secret grief to the earth, and seeking relief in prayer under the shadow of that lofty cross and its divine burden, was a solemn and touching sight.

Guthrie.
7641. CROSS, Denial and the. A good old lady said, "The reason why professing Christians cannot take up their daily cross is, because they do not deny themselves. If they would first deny themselves, then they would be ready to take up their every cross, and perform every known duty. We must attend to all our duties in the order in which they are placed in the Bible. 'If any man will come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross daily, and follow me.'"

7642. CROSS, Glorifying in the. It is an old and useful observation, that many of the most excellent objects in the world are objects whose excellency does not appear at first view; as, on the other hand, many things of little value appear more excellent at first than a nearer view discovers them to be. There are some things we admire, because we do not know them, and the more we know them the less we admire them; there are other things we despise through ignorance, because it requires pains and applications to discover their beauty and excellence. This holds true in nothing more than in that glorious, despised object mentioned in the text, Gal. 6: 14. There is nothing the world is more divided about in its opinions than this. To the one part it is altogether contemptible; to the other, it is altogether glorious. The one part of the world wonders what attractions the other finds in it; the other part wonders how the rest of the world are so stupid as not to see them; and are amazed at the blindness of others, and their own former blindness.

M'Laurin.
7643. CROSS, Glory of the. Its glory produces powerful effects wherever it shines. They who behold this glory are transformed into the same image, 2 Cor. 3: 18. An Ethiopian may look long enough to the visible sun before it changes his black color; but this does it. It melts cold and frozen hearts; it breaks stony hearts; it pierces adamant; it penetrates through thick darkness. How justly it is called marvelous light! 1 Pet. 2: 9. It gives eyes to the blind to look to itself; and not only to the blind but to the dead! It is the light of life; a powerful light. Its energy is beyond the force of thunder; and it is more mild than the dew on the tender grass. It communicates a glory to all other objects, according as they have any relation to it. It adorns the universe; it gives a lustre to nature, and to Providence: it is the greatest glory of the lower world that its Creator was for a while its inhabitant. A poor landlord thinks it a lasting honor to his cottage that he has once lodged a prince or emperor: with how much more reason may our poor cottage, this earth, be proud of it, that the Lord of glory was its tenant from his birth to his death? Yea, that he rejoiced in the habitable parts of it, before it had a beginning, even from everlasting! Prov. 8: 31.

M'Laurin.
7644. CROSS, Index of the. It is related of the celebrated scholar, Humboldt, that when he was traveling in tropical America, going chiefly by night to avoid the heat of the day, that his superstitious guides greatly revered the constellation of the Southern Cross, and directed their course by it. At that time this constellation reached the mid-heavens just before the break of day, so that its passage over the meridian was an indication that morning was approaching. He says frequently, when he was following after his train, and wearied by a night-long tramp, he could hear the guides shout, "Courage, comrades, the Cross begins to bend." So may the Christian soldier hear and regard this voice in the hour of his trials. In the darkness, and the weariness of life-long labor, it is enough to know that the cross bends at the earnest pleading of faith and uplifted prayer to God. You know where your strength lies, where you may burnish your weapons, where you may, indeed, stand forth renewed perpetually in the strength of grace. The cross of Christ is with us, and the power of that cross is efficacious to save to the uttermost.

Dr. Curry.
7645. CROSS, The Key of Paradise. We do not sail to glory in the salt sea of our own tears, but in the red sea of a Redeemer's blood. We owe the life of our souls to the death of our Saviour. It was his going into the furnace which keeps us from the flames. Man lives by death; his natural life is preserved by the death of the creature, and his spiritual life by the death of the Redeemer.

Secker.
7646. CROSS, Legend of the. A procession of Christians, singing hymns, having a cross carried at their head, come to a place called Te-tramphodos, where stood a statue of Venus and a marble altar. As the cross was borne along the idol fell down of itself, and was broken in pieces.

7647. CROSS, Might of the. The cross was two pieces of dead wood; and a helpless, unresisting Man was nailed to it; yet it was mightier than the world, and triumphed, and will ever triumph over it.

Hare.
7648. CROSS, Our Only Hope in the. On a rude cross by the side of an Italian highway is the motto Spes unica. The cross is the altar upon which the atonement for our sins was made.

7649. CROSS, Power of the. There is an Irish fable to the effect that Forannan, abbot of Waulsor, felt called to leave his native isle. He went to the sea shore with twelve companions, and not being able to procure a boat, they made a huge wooden cross, and casting it into the sea, and standing on it were wafted to the Flemish shore. Probably a raft of timbers laid crosswise has grown into a cross.

7650. CROSS, Refuge of the. A popular allegorical picture represents a huge cross hewn out of the rock standing upon the rugged shore of a stormy sea. A half-drowned female clings to it as her only hope, while another clutches her garments in the desperate struggle for safety. That sea is life and that cross is Christ.

7651. CROSS, Resting Upon the. Often does the wanderer, 'mid American forests, lay his head upon a rude log, while above it is the abyss of stars: so the weary, heavy-laden, dying Christian leans upon the rugged and narrow cross, but looks up the while to the beaming canopy of immortal life—to "those things which are above." G. Gilfillan.

7652. CROSS, Our Sins on the. We must nail our sins to the cross of Christ, force them before the tree on which he suffered; it is such a sight as sin cannot abide. It will begin to die within a man upon the sight of Christ on the cross, for the cross of Christ accuseth sin, shames sin, and by a secret virtue feeds upon the very heart of sin. We must use sin as Christ was used when he was made sin for us; we must lift it up, and make it naked by confession of it to God; we must pierce the hands and feet, the heart of it by godly sorrow, and application of threatenings against it, and by spiritual revenge upon it. Byfield.

7653. CROSS, Soldiers of the. A brave warrior of old time being delayed, prayed to the gods that the battle might not be ended before his arrival. The true soldier loves the warfare, despises its perils, and glories in its hardships. The Christian's Leader bore his own cross, and perished upon it. To follow his steps must be our pleasure.

7654. CROSS, Taking up the. The old crusaders used to wear a cross upon their shoulders. This was their badge of service. Peter the hermit tore up his gown and distributed the pieces among the enthusiastic volunteers. It was then the fashionable and honorable thing. So to-day a profession of religion and pew in some church is the passport to respectability. The cross is the ornament of pride or adornment of beauty, with no thought of its sacred import and responsibility, "a cheap substitute for a struggle never made, and a crown never striven for."

7655. CROSS, Traces of the. Thor the thunderer, the Scandinavian hero god, was always represented with a hammer in his hand. With this hammer he crushed the head of the great Midgard serpent, destroyed the giants, and restored to life the dead goats which drew his car, and consecrated the pyre of Baldur. Thor's hammer was a cross. As such it appears on old Scandinavian coins. So says Baring-Gould in his "Legends of the Cross." The sign of the cross was made by the Scandinavians, and may have been copied by the Christians from them. On the destruction of the temple of Serapim in Egypt, A. D. 389, a sign resembling the cross was found engraved upon the stones. It was interpreted to mean, "The life to come." The heathen claimed it as a symbol of their god Serapis. Sozomen, Socrates and Rufinus relate this. Rufinus says, "The Egyptians are said to have the sign of the Lord's cross among those letters which are called sacerdotal, of which letter or figure this they say is the interpretation, 'The life to come.'" Baring-Gould says that the cross was a religious symbol to the lake-dwellers, that beneath it they laid their dead to rest, and trusted in it to guard and revive the loved ones whom they committed to the dust. Mortillet, who investigated the tombs of the lake-dwellers in Italy, concludes that the cross was a religious emblem, of frequent use, a thousand years before Christ.

7656. CROSS, Use of the. God's scholars have learned to think of the cross that it is the frame-house in the which God frameth his children like to his son Christ; the furnace that fineth God's gold; the highway to heaven; the suit and livery that God's servants are served withal; and the earnest and beginning of all consolation and glory. Bradford.

7657. CROSS, Victory of the. This is the weapon that has won victories over hearts of every kind, in every quarter of the globe. Greenlanders, Africans, South-Sea Islanders, Hindoos, Chinese, all have alike felt its power. Just as that huge iron tube, which crosses the Menai Straits, is more affected and bent by half an hour's sunshine than by all the dead weight that can be placed in it, so in like manner the hearts of savages have melted before the cross when every other argument seemed to move them no more than stones. "Brethren," said a North American Indian after his conversion, "I have been a heathen; I know how heathens think. Once a preacher came and began to explain to us that there was a God; but we told him to return to the place from whence he came. Another preacher came and told us not to lie, nor steal, nor drink; but we did not heed him. At last, another came into my hut one day, and said, 'I am come to you, in the name of the Lord of heaven and earth. He sends to let you know that he will make you happy, and deliver you from misery. For this end he became man, gave his life a ransom, shed his blood for sinners.' I could not forget his words. I told them to the other Indians, and an awakening begun among us. I say, therefore, preach the sufferings and death of Christ our Saviour, if you wish your words to gain entrance among the heathens." Never did the devil triumph so thoroughly as when he persuaded the Jesuit missionaries in China to keep back the story of the cross. Ryle.

7658. CROWN, Biblical. The emblem of honor—favor—royalty—perpetuity. Used frequently in the Book of Proverbs; applied to a virtuous wife—a wise man's riches—the righteous man's hoary head—the prudent man's knowledge—the old man's children's children. THE BELIEVER'S crown of grace and of glory;—a crown of beauty, Ezek. 16: 12. The description of the church's glory; applicable, also, in a general sense, to the honor put on every true believer. A crown of gold, Rev.

4: 4; upon the twenty-four elders, who are spoken of as part of the redeemed, 5: 8. A crown of righteousness, 2 Tim. 4: 8. A crown of life, James 1: 12; Rev. 2: 10. A crown of rejoicing, 1 Thess. 2: 19; Phil. 4: 1. A crown of glory, 1 Pet. 5: 4. Bowes.

7659. CROWN, Incorruptible. Petrarch, the celebrated poet, was crowned with laurels at Rome. The ceremony of his coronation (says Gibbon) was performed in the capital, by his friend and patron the supreme magistrate of the republic. Twelve patrician youths were arrayed in scarlet; six representatives of the most illustrious families, in green robes, with garlands of flowers, accompanied the procession. In the midst of the princes and nobles, the senator count of Anguillara, a kinsman of the Colonna, assumed his throne, and at the voice of a herald Petrarch arose. After discoursing on a text of Virgil, and thrice repeating his vows for the prosperity of Rome, he knelt before the throne, and received from the senator a laurel crown, with a more precious declaration, "This is the reward of merit." The people shouted, "Long life to the capital and the poet!" A sonnet in praise of Rome was accepted, as the effusion of genius and gratitude; and after the whole procession had visited the Vatican, the wreath was suspended before the shrine of St. Peter. In the act or diploma which was presented to Petrarch, the title and prerogative of poet-laureate are received in the capital after the lapse of 1,300 years, and he receives the perpetual privilege of wearing, at his choice, a crown of laurel, ivy, or myrtle; of assuming the poetic habit, and of teaching, disputing, interpreting, and composing, in all places whatsoever; and on all subjects of literature. The grant was ratified by the authority of the senate and people; and the character of citizen was the recompense of his affection for the Roman name. They did him honor, but they did him justice. In the familiar society of Cicero and Livy he had imbibed the ideas of an ancient patriot, and his ardent fancy kindled every idea to a sentiment, and every sentiment to a passion. Petrarch, however, we are told, felt that such honors were incapable of conferring true happiness, and far exceeded his desert. "I blushed," says he, "at the applauses of the people, and the unmerited commendations with which I was overwhelmed." A sentiment becoming a man whose mind was deeply imbued with religion; who had, on another occasion, said, "Let us read the historians, the poets, and the philosophers, but let us have in our hearts the gospel of Jesus Christ: in which alone is perfect wisdom and perfect happiness." Let the Christian, from the above instance, endeavor to realize the thought of wearing a brighter crown than that of a laurel, a crown of glory that will not fade away. Let him bear in mind the goodness of him, who even now crowneth his life with loving kindness and tender mercies. Buck.

7660. CROWN, Reward of the. A worthy Christian woman of France was the subject of much persecution. She was imprisoned and attempts were made upon her life. Her little daughter cut out a great number of paper crosses and fastened them on to her mother's dress. Then she made a crown and placed it upon her mother's head and said "After the cross cometh the crown." It was an allegory of her mother's life here and reward in eternity.

7661. CROWNS, Distribution of. Forty brave soldiers of the Thundering Legion were called to adjure Christ or die. One of them said "Let us ask God to send us forty, to our crowns together." They were sentenced to be exposed, naked, on the ice of a lake through an extremely cold winter night. On the shore was a small building lighted and warmed, and into its comforts any one might run. So cold was the night that people kept close about the fires in their houses. The heroes of Jesus Christ stood in prayer on the ice, or ran about to keep warm, encouraging each other to play the man, and resisting the charm of the warm and gleaming hut on the shore, till they fell benumbed into their last sleep. The soldier who kept the fire on the shore slept and had this vision. He stood and gazed upon the exposed confessors. Then an angel descended with a dazzling crown in his hand; he brought one, and another, and another, till the soldier perceived that he was distributing the diadems of victory to the faithful martyrs. Nine and thirty crowns were brought, but he came not again to bring the fortieth. Then he awoke and said, "What may this mean?" A movement revealed the entrance of one of the confessors who could not endure, who sought the relief of the fire. Then he who had dreamed went forth and took the place of the apostate. The cold was still resistless and the northern blast unendurable. Many of the sufferers were unconscious; others were praying, "Forty wrestlers we have entered the arena; let forty victors receive the prize." He had aroused the judge, professed that he was a Christian, received the same sentence as the others and stood among them awaiting the coming of the angel with the fortieth crown. Morning at last broke. A few survived. Their limbs were broken and all were cast into a fire and burned. Such is the beautiful legend of the martyrs of the Thundering Legion, showing strength of purpose, power of grace, and the might of prayer.

7662. CROWNS, Expecting. Mr. Wardrobe was dying in the arms of a friend, and when he was informed there was no hope for him, he raised himself up, and in a rapture of joy exclaimed, "Crowns! crowns! crowns of glory shall adorn this head of mine ere long!" Rising higher, he added, "Palms! palms! palms ere long shall fill these hands of mine," and thus triumphantly he passed over the river to join the conquerors before the throne. Whitefield diamonds. The crown of France contains 5,352 diamonds. But the crown of the poorest of God's saints is one solid gem, not to be compared for beauty and value with all the diamonds in the world; for the Lord of Hosts is for a crown of glory and for a diadem of beauty to the residue of his people.

7663. CROWNS, Jeweled. It is said that the crown of Ivan contains 841 diamonds. The crown of Peter contains 887 diamonds. The crown of England contains 1,700 diamonds. The Imperial crown of Russia contains 2,500

7664. CRUCIFIXION, Application of the. An irreligious German minister sat opposite a picture of Christ on the cross, under which was the inscription, "I did this for thee; what hast thou done for me?" It was fastened by the Holy Spirit upon his conscience. In his thoughts by day and dreams at night the one question was, "What hast thou done for me?" He felt the burden removed and rejoiced. He died not long after triumphing in redeeming love.

7665. CRUCIFIXION, Cruelty of. Of all the devices of a cruel imagination, crucifixion is the masterpiece. Other pains are sharper for a time, but none are at once so agonizing and so long. One aggravation, however, was wanting, which, owing to the want of knowledge in painters, is still, we believe, commonly supposed to have belonged to the punishment. The weight of the body was borne by a ledge which projected from the middle of the upright beam, and not by the hands and feet, which were probably found unequal to the strain. The frailty of man's frame comes at last to be its own defence; but enough remained to preserve the pre-eminence of torture to the cross. The process of nailing was exquisite torment, and yet worse in what ensued than in the actual infliction. The spikes rankled, the wounds inflamed, the local injury produced a general fever, the fever a most intolerable thirst; but the misery of miseries to the sufferer was, while racked with agony, to be fastened in a position which did not permit him even to writhe. Every attempt to relieve the muscles, every instinctive movement of anguish, only served to drag the lacerated flesh, and wake up new and acuter pangs; and this torture, which must have been continually aggravated until advancing death began to lay it to sleep, lasted on an average two or three days. Fontenelle.

7666. CRUCIFIXION, Impressing the. A little girl asked her mother, who had a withered hand, how it became so deformed. Her mother told her that her crib took fire and in rescuing her she had burned herself. "It was for you my child, that this poor hand suffered." But for this loving interposition the child would have been burned up. Then the mother told her of the exposure of her soul to sin and death and that Christ came to her rescue. She added that when we get to heaven and behold the wounds of Christ, and ask, what are these wounds? he will reply "I was wounded for your transgressions; I was bruised for your iniquities."

7667. CRUCIFIXION, Pre-eminence of the. If you have not yet found out that Christ crucified is the foundation of the whole volume, you have read your Bible hitherto to very little profit. Your religion is a heaven without a sun, an arch without a keystone, a compass without a needle, a clock without spring or weights, a lamp without oil. It will not comfort you. It will not deliver your soul from hell. Ryle.

7668. CRUEL, Death of the. William the conqueror, extremely alarmed on his death-bed, entreated the clergy to intercede for him. "Laden with many and grievous sins," he exclaimed, "I tremble; and being ready to be taken soon into the terrible examination of God, I am ignorant what I should do. I have been brought up in feats of arms from my childhood; I am greatly polluted with effusion of much blood; I can by no means number the evils I have done these sixty-four years, for which I am now constrained, without stay, to render an account to the just judge."

7669. CRUELTY, Barbarous. Alexander, the Tyrant of Phærae, was noted for his savage cruelties. He buried men alive, others he dressed in skins of wild animals, and hunted them with dogs or shot them with arrows. Having summoned the friendly people of Malibœa and Scotusæ to meet him in assembly, he caused his guards to surround them and slay them all with the sword. He slew his uncle Polyphron with a spear, and afterwards adorned it with garlands, and offered sacrifice to it as to a god. He ran out of the theatre during the performance of an affecting piece, lest the citizens should see him weep who had never pitied those he had slain.

7670. CRUELTY, Delight in. Mark Antony caused the heads of those he had proscribed to be brought to him while he was at table, and entertained his eyes a long while with that sad spectacle. Cicero's head being one of those that was brought to him, he ordered it to be put on the very pulpit where Cicero had made speeches against him. Agrippina, the mother of Nero, who was afterwards emperor, sent an officer to put to death Lollia Paulina, who had been her rival for the imperial dignity. When Lollia's head was brought to her, not knowing it at first, she examined it with her own hands, till she perceived some particular feature by which the lady was distinguished.

7671. CRUELTY, Domitian's. The Emperor Domitian, in the beginning of his reign, promised tranquillity to the people, but their expectations were soon disappointed. Among other cruelties, he invited his senators to a grand feast. When they arrived at the palace, they were introduced into a large gloomy hall, hung with black, and lighted with a few glimmering tapers. In the middle were placed a number of coffins, on each of which was inscribed the name of some one of the invited guests. On a sudden, a number of men burst into the room, clothed in black, with drawn swords and flaming torches, and after they had for some time terrified them, they permitted them to retire, who, no doubt, were happy to escape with their lives. Thus does the tyrant, the god of this world, often act towards men. He promises and invites them to a rich banquet, but, alas! it is only in the end to terrify and destroy them. Let us, then, watch and pray, lest he should get an advantage of us, and we fall victims to his wiles. Buck.

7672. CRUELTY, Example of. Several wagoners coming from Breslau to Silesia, upon their way in the Duke of Saxony's country, perceived a stag with a man upon his back, running with all his might: coming near the wagons he suddenly fell down: the wagoners drawing nigh him, the poor man sitting upon his back made pitiful complaint, how that the day before he was by the Duke of Saxony, for killing a deer, condemned to be bound with chains upon that stag, his feet bound fast under the stag's belly with an iron chain soldered, and his hands so chained to the horns. The miserable man begged earnestly that they would shoot him, to put him out of his pain; but they durst not, fearing the duke. Whilst they were talking with him the stag got up again, and ran away with all his might. The wagoners computed that he had run in sixteen hours twenty-six Dutch miles in the least, which makes near one hundred of our English miles in a direct line. The miseries which that poor creature did and must undergo, especially if the stag killed him not in running, cannot be expressed, hardly imagined. Mercurius Politicus, 1655.

7673. CRUELTY, Papal. The massacre of St. Bartholomew's was instigated by Catherine, a bigoted Catholic, who persuaded her son, Charles IX. of France, a young and vacillating prince, to exterminate the heretics in his realm. He gave the order with an oath, "Kill all—all—all, so that not one be left to reproach me." At three o'clock on Sunday morning, August 24, 1572, at the pre-arranged signal of the ringing of bells, the Catholic party, with the sign of the cross in their caps, to distinguish them, began the merciless slaughter of the non-resisting Huguenots, striking down alike men, women, and children. For three days the horrid work went on. The blood of forty thousand victims of bigotry stains the page of history as the result of the king's bloody mandate.

7674. CRUELTY Requested. A gentleman had seven sons born dumb. The father was constantly sorrowing over them, and could not comprehend why God visited him so dreadfully, more than other fathers. One day he accompanied them to a neighboring farm, where an old Swiss sold refreshments. He looked with much feeling at his sons, who sat blooming and healthy round the table. The tears started in his eyes, and he exclaimed, "O God! why have I deserved this?" The old Swiss, who had overheard him, drew him on one side, and said, "I see you are downcast at the affliction of your sons; but I do not wonder at it. Do you not remember (I knew you from your youth) when a boy, how you laid snares for the birds, and when caught, tore their tongues out of their mouths, and then with malignant joy let them fly again? How often have I not warned you? Oh, the birds under the heavens, who could not praise God with their tongues, have accused you, and you shall never hear the sweet name of father from the lips of your children." Whitecross

7675. CRUELTY, Retribution for. Richard I was besieging a castle with his army, when the besieged offered to surrender if he would grant them quarter. He, however, refused their request, and threatened to hang every one of them. Upon this, a certain soldier on the ramparts charged his bow with a square arrow and, praying that God would vouchsafe to direct the shot, and deliver the innocent from oppression, he discharged the shaft upon the ranks of the besiegers. The arrow struck the king himself, inflicting a wound, of which he soon afterwards died, and the objects of his vengeance were thus delivered. Speed.

7676. CRUELTY, Romish. John Lambert suffered in the year 1538. No man was used at the stake with more cruelty than this holy martyr. They burnt him with a slow fire by inches; for if it kindled higher and stronger than they chose, they removed it away. When his legs were burnt off, and his thighs were mere stumps in the fire, they pitched his poor body upon pikes, and lacerated his broiling flesh with their halberts. But God was with him in the midst of the flame, and supported him in all the anguish of nature. Just before he expired, he lifted up such hands as he had, all flaming with fire, and cried out to the people with his dying voice, "None but Christ! None but Christ!" He was at last beat down into the fire, and expired. Whitecross.

7677. CRUELTY, Spanish. The manner in which the remorseless Spaniards tortured their unoffending victims, natives of the West Indies, was worthy of the goodness of such a cause. They seized upon them by violence, distributed them like brutes into lots, and compelled them to dig in the mines until death, their only refuge, put a period to their sufferings. It was also a frequent practice among them, as one of their own historians informs us, to murder hundreds of these poor creatures merely to keep their hands in use. They were eager in displaying an emulation which of them could most dexterously strike off the head of a man at a blow, and wagers frequently depended upon this horrid exercise. It is impossible for words to express the indignation and disgust excited by such merciless cruelty. If any of these unhappy Indians, goaded by their sufferings and driven to despair, attempted resistance or flight, their unfeeling murderers hunted them down with dogs which were fed on their flesh. Weakness of age or helplessness of sex were equally disregarded by these monsters, and yet they had the impudence to suppose themselves religious and the favorites of heaven! Some of the most zealous of these adorers of the Holy Virgin forced their unhappy captives into the water, and after administering to them the rites of baptism, cut their throats the next moment to prevent their apostasy! Others made and kept up a vow to hang or burn thirteen every morning in honor of Christ and his twelve apostles! Bridges.

7678. CULTURE, Advantages of. Cultural that is the talismanic word. See what it did with the country-lad who brought milk into Sheffield every morning—it found him “whittling sticks,” it converted him into Sir Francis Chantrey, the most eminent of English sculptors. Culture! it is your true philosopher’s stone. Its magic influence will cause the clownish clod-hopper to cast his ill-manners and stultified notions as the caterpillar casts its skin, and walk forth erect in all the manly consciousness of possessed intelligence and refined amiabilities.

J. Johnson.

7679. CULTURE, Importance of. Lyncurgus, the Lacedemonian law-giver, once took two whelps of the same litter, and ordered them to be bred in a quite different manner; whereby the one became dainty and ravenous, and the other of a good scent and skilled in hunting; which done, awhile after he took occasion thence in an assembly of the Lacedemonians to discourse in this manner: “Of great weight in the attainment of virtue, fellow-citizens, are habits, instruction, precepts, and indeed the whole manner of life—as I will presently let you see by example.” And, withal, he ordered the producing those two whelps into the midst of the hall, where also there were set down before them a plate and a live hare. Whereupon, as they had been bred, the one presently flies upon the hare, and the other as greedily runs to the plate. And while the people were musing, not perfectly apprehending what he meant by producing those whelps thus, he added, “These whelps were both of one litter, but differently bred; the one, you see, has turned out a greedy cur, and the other a good hound.” And this shall suffice to be spoken concerning custom and different ways of living.

Plutarch.

7680. CULTURE, Intellectual. A cultivated mind may be said to have infinite stores of innocent gratification. Everything may be made interesting to it by becoming a subject of thought or inquiry. Books, regarded merely as a gratification, are worth more than all the luxuries on earth. A taste for literature secures cheerful occupation for the unemployed and languid hours of life; and how many persons in these hours, for want of innocent resources, are now impelled to coarse and brutal pleasures! How many young men can be found who, unaccustomed to find a companion in a book, and strangers to intellectual activity, are almost driven, in the long dull evenings of winter, to haunts of intemperance and depraved society!

Anon.

7681. CULTURE, Surface. Mere surface culture is as thriftless in education as in agriculture. “Plough deep,” says Cobbett, “if you want satisfactory crops:” and the remark applies to minds as well as soils. A woman who has nothing better to recommend her than the superficial graces, so assiduously taught in finishing schools, will not long retain the affection she may have had the adroitness to inspire.

Anon.

7682. CUMBERER, Thoughts of a. An opposer of religion went into his wood lot one Sunday morning to cut down the dead timber for fire wood. Finding a dry tree he said to himself “I will cut this down, it is dead and dry, and only fit to burn.” At the same time the thought came into his mind, “The tree represents me; I am dead and dry, fit only to burn.” With every blow of his axe the question echoed, “Am not I a dead tree, fit only to burn? Will not God say concerning me, ‘Cut him down’ for he cumbereth the ground?” Anxiety or account of his exposed condition fastened itself resistlessly upon him. He shouldered his axe and returned home, and besought God to have mercy, and found peace and hope.

7683. CUP, The Overflowing. In the East, the people frequently anoint their visitors with some very fragrant perfume, and give them a cup or a glass of some choice wine, which they are careful to fill till it runs over. The first was designed to show their love and respect; the latter to imply that while they remained there, they should have an abundance of every thing. Mr. Griffin, in his “Memoirs of Captain James Wilson,” gives the following statement in the captain’s own words:—“I once had this ceremony performed on myself in the house of a great and rich Indian, in the presence of a large company. The gentleman of the house poured upon my hands and arms a delightful odoriferous perfume, put a golden cup into my hands, and poured wine into it till it ran over; assuring me, at the same time, that it was a great pleasure to him to receive me, and that I should find a rich supply in his house.”

7684. CUP, Tasting the. The cup-bearer of an oriental king carried the cup upon the three fingers of his left hand, and held his right over it to keep it from falling. Before giving it to the king, he poured a little of the wine into his left hand and drank it, to assure the king that it did not contain poison. To this custom may be referred the question of Christ, “Are ye able to drink of the cup that I drink of?”

7685. CURE, Divine. Just at the time the plague was raging worst, a stranger appeared and told them there was a cure. He said that there was a plant which healed this disorder, and he described it. He mentioned that it was a lowly plant, not conspicuous nor very arresting to the eye—that it had a red blossom and sweet-scented leaves, and a bruised-looking stem, and that it was evergreen. He told a number of other particulars regarding it, and as he could not tarry longer at that time, he left a paper in which, he said, they would find a full description of it, and directions how to find it. The tidings diffused considerable activity through the sickly colony. A plant of such efficacy deserved the most diligent search. Almost all agreed that it must be far away; but a discussion arose whether it lay beyond the cliffs or across the sea. Most thought the latter, and some set to work and built a ship, and when they had launched her, they named her Ecclesia, and hoisted a red-cross flag, and sent round word that the fine ship Ecclesia was about to set sail in search of the famous plant, and all who wished to escape the plague were invited to take passages in this good ship. A few others, however, thought the ship was going the wrong way, and that they would have better success by trying to get over the cliffs. This was an arduous enterprise, for the precipices were beetling, steep, and extremely high. A few attempts were made to climb by ravines and gullies, which, however, ended in walls of glassy smoothness; and after many weariful efforts, the climbers either grew dizzy and fell back, or allowed themselves to slide down again to the crumbing debris at the bottom. But others, more inventive, busied themselves constructing artificial wings and aerial engines of various kinds (Imitatio Christi, asceticism, penitential prayers, and such like), and some of them answered exceedingly well for a little, and rose so high that their neighbors really thought they would reach the top; but after reaching a certain height, whether it was owing to the weakness of the materials, or a powerful current which they always met at a certain elevation, and which by a sort of draught blew them back from the brow of the mountain, they uniformly found themselves again on the spot from which they first ascended. A long time had now passed on, and multitudes had died of the plague without clearer views of the specific plant, when a poor sufferer, who had already gone a fruitless expedition in the ship, and from the severity of his anguish was eager in trying every scheme, lay tossing on his bed. He got hold of a large paper roll which lay on a shelf beside him. It was very dirty, and the ink was faded, but to while away the time he began to unfold it, and found from the beginning that it was the book of the Balm of Gilead. He at once suspected that it was the book which the stranger had left so long ago, and wondered how they had suffered it to fall aside; and he had not read far when it told him that if he would only read on, it would put him on the way of finding the plant of renown. It gave a full description—many particulars of which he had never heard before,—and as he advanced in his feverish earnestness, unrolling it fold by fold, and reading rapidly as he went along, hoping that it would tell him the very spot where he should look for it, he found the plant itself! There it lay in the heart of the long-neglected volume; and Luther's eye glistened as he read, "Christ is the end of the law for righteousness to every one that believeth." "But where is Christ to be found? Must I ascend the height or descend into the deep? Must I climb those cliffs or cross that sea? Oh, no. Christ is here—nigh me—God's present gift to me conveyed in the volume of this book. I see him. I accept him. I believe." From that moment Christ was Luther's righteousness, and in the flash of sudden joy with which he discovered the Lord his righteousness, though it did not strike him at the moment, Luther's eternal life began.

Dr. Hamilton.

7686. CURE, The Sinner's. Suppose I am dying with consumption which I inherited from my father or mother. I did not get it by any fault of my own, by any neglect of my health; I inherited it, let us suppose. I go to my physician, and to the best physicians, and they all give me up. They say I am incurable; I must die; I have not thirty days to live. Well, a friend happens to come along and looks at me and says: "Moody, you have got the consumption." "I know it very well; I don't want any one to tell me that." "But," he says, "there is a remedy—a remedy, I tell you. Let me have your attention. I want to call your attention to it. I tell you there is a remedy." "But, sir, I don't believe it. I have tried the leading physicians in this country and in Europe, and they tell me there is no hope." "But you know me, Moody; you have known me for years." "Yes, sir." "Do you think, then, I would tell you a falsehood?" "No." "Well, ten years ago I was as far gone. I was given up by the physicians to die, but I took this medicine and it cured me. I am perfectly well—look at me." I say that it is a very strange case. "Yes, it may be strange, but it is a fact. That medicine cured me; take this medicine and it will cure you. Although it has cost me a great deal, it shall not cost you anything. Although the salvation of Jesus Christ is as free as the air, it cost God the richest jewel of heaven. He had to give his only son; give all he had; he had only one son, and he gave him. Do not make light of it, then, I beg of you." "Well," I say, "I would like to believe you, but this is contrary to my reason." Hearing this, my friend goes away and brings another friend to me, and he testifies to the same thing. He again goes away when I do not yet believe, and brings in another friend, and another, and another, and another, and they all testify to the same thing. They say they were as bad as myself; that they took the same medicine that has been offered to me, and it cured them. He then hands me the medicine. I dash it to the ground; I do not believe in its saving power; I die. The reason is, then, that I spurned the remedy. So it will not be because Adam fell, but that you spurn the remedy offered to you to save you. You will have darkness rather than light. How, then, shall you escape if ye neglect so great salvation? There is no hope for you if you neglect the remedy. It does no good to look at the wound. If we are in the camp and are bitten by the fiery serpents, it will do no good to look at the wound. Looking at a wound will never save any one. What we must do is to look at the remedy, to look away to him who hath power to save you from your sin. Moody.

7687. CURIOSITY, Danger of. Curiosity is the spiritual drunkenness of the soul; and look, as the drunkard will never be satisfied, be the cup never so deep, unless he see the bottom of it, so some curious Christians, whose souls are spread with the leprosy of curiosity, will never be satisfied till they come to see the bottom and the most secret reasons of all God's dealings towards them; but they are fools in folio, who affect to know more than God would have them. Did not Adam's curiosity render him and his posterity fools in folio? And what pleasure can we take to see ourselves every day fools in print? As a man by gazing and prying into the body of the sun may grow dark and dim, and see less than otherwise he might, so many by a curious prying into the secret reasons of God's dealings with them, come to grow so dark and dim, that they cannot see those plain reasons that God hath laid down in his word why he afflicts and tries the children of men. Brooks.

7688. CURIOSITY Defined. Curiosity is a desire to know why and how; such as is in no living creature but man: so that man is distinguished, not only by his reason, but also by this singular passion, from other animals; in whom the appetite of food, and other pleasures of sense, by predominance, take away the care of knowing causes; which is a lust of the mind, that, by a perseverance of delight in the continual and indefatigable generation of knowledge, exceedeth the short vehemence of any carnal pleasure. Hobbes.

7689. CURIOSITY, Scope of. What can limit the excursive flight of human curiosity? It dives into the bowels of the earth, explores the mine, and speculates on the formation of the world itself. The sea forms no obstacle to its career. It visits the equator and the poles, and circumnavigates the globe. Nor does it take a cursory flight only, which seems merely to measure space; it pauses to meditate and to inquire. There is not an animal that traverses the desert, there is not an insect that crawls on the ground, there is not a flower that blooms in the air, there is not a stone cast carelessly along our path, but it stops, and interrogates, and forces to declare its nature. You behold it scaling the heavens, measuring the magnitudes and distances of the celestial bodies, and even determining their weight. In short, every sound, every motion, every attitude attracts its attention. And shall man, while he thus casts an inquisitive eye on everything around him, be incurious only about himself? Shall the lord of the lower world busy himself in acquiring a knowledge of the properties, habits, and functions of the beasts which perish, while he is careless about the qualities of that superior mind which has elevated him to the rank of their master, and which betokens a dignity and a destination far beyond the limits of their nature? Shall he immerse himself in the contemplation of corporeal beings, and never once inquire into the operations of that finer spirit which actuates himself, and makes him to be what he is?

7690. CURIOSITY, Ubiquitous. Aristophanes the comedian said, concerning Cleon, that "his hands were in Petolia, and his soul in Thieftown;" so the hands and feet, eyes and thoughts of inquisitive persons are straggling about in many places at once. Neither the mansions of the great nor the cottages of the poor, nor the privy chambers of princes, nor the recesses of the nuptial alcove, can escape the search of their curiosity. Plutarch.

7691. CURSE, A Sinner's. Two neighbors, one a professor and the other a neglecter of religion, living on opposite sides of the same street, were dying at the same time. One of them said of the other, "I feel that I am dying. Thomas over the way, I hear, is going, too. They say he is going to heaven; it may be so. I know that I am going to hell. He must have known that I was perishing; but he never warned me of my danger, or told me of the way of escape. We were together almost every day, and we talked of the weather, and the markets, and politics, and a thousand other things; but he never spoke to me about my soul. His silence I regarded as the sanction of my sin. I could account for it in no other way. He may be going to heaven; but he will be followed to heaven with the curses of my lost soul!"

7692. CURSES, Biblical. The Woes of Scripture, Isa. 5: 28: 1; 29: 1; 30: 1; 31: 1; 33: 1; Hab. 2; Matt. 23; Luke 6: 24-26. Gen. 3: 14-19. The first curse pronounced when our first parents fell. Deut. 11: 29; 27: 13. The curses pronounced from Mount Ebal. It is observed by some that, under the law, the curses were first pronounced, and afterward the blessings; whilst, when Christ came, his teaching began with blessing, Matt. 5, and ended with pronouncing woes, Matt. 23. Yet even on Mount Ebal Joshua was told to build an altar, and offer burnt offerings and peace offerings, Joshua 8: 33. Numb. 5: 11-31. "The bitter water that causeth the curse." Isa. 43: 28. "I have given Jacob to the curse." Jacob—God's own long-favored people—once so blessed! Mark 11: 12-14, 20, 21. The fig tree cursed; no doubt representing the curse upon the Jewish nation—one of the only two miracles of destruction our Lord is recorded to have wrought. Obs. how speedy was the curse in taking effect, and how complete, ver. 20—"In the (next) morning . . . they saw the fig tree dried up from the roots." Zech. 5: 2, 3. The "flying roll" . . . "the curse that goeth forth over the face of the whole earth," &c. Difficult as it may be to fix the exact interpretation of the symbol, three things seem clearly hinted at—(1.) From its large size, it points out the vast extent of the many curses pronounced by God against sin and sinners, (2.) its "flying" may intimate that the Divine curse is continually hovering over the head of the impenitent, and may any moment fall upon them, John 3: 36; (3.) that the curse of God is sure to find out every sinner, though a man may "hold himself guiltless" (see marg.), and will "enter into the house," and destroy all the comfort and credit and reliance of the transgressor. Gen. 3: 14; Isa. 65: 25. The serpent first and longest cursed. Gen. 3: 15. We cannot fail, in thinking of the curse, to observe how, even from the first, Divine mercy was mingled with judgment. When man fell, the curse was forthwith pronounced; but it was not pronounced first upon Adam or the woman, but upon the serpent; and with the pronouncing of the first curse was mingled the announcement of the first promise. Gal. 3: 13. We cannot but observe how complete is the redemption brought in by Christ. In every point, it has been said, he met the curse. One part of the curse was death. The Redeemer died; and when, in after times, one particular kind of death was especially pronounced accursed, he died that death. The serpent was, at the first, pre-eminently cursed. He made the uplifted serpent the emblem of his own sacrifice, John 3: 14, 15. Thorns were another effect of the curse. He wore a crown of thorns, he sweat the bloody sweat. In all and every point he met the curse, and took it in our stead upon himself.

Bowes.

7693. CURSES, Causeless. He that is cursed without a cause, whether by furious imprecations or solemn anathemas, the curse will do him no more harm than the sparrow that flies over his head. It will fly away like the sparrow or the wild swallow, which go nobody knows where, until they return to their proper place, as the curse will return to him that uttered it.

M. Henry.

7694. CURSES, Divine. They are not merely imprecations, impotent and fruitless desires; they carry their effects with them and are attended with all the miseries denounced by God.

Cruden.

7695. CURSES, Human. These are hurled at us, either because we have done the right thing, or they are uttered without reason or feeling. There are men who are so in the habit of using profane language, that it almost flows from their lips without malice or meaning; and there are those who regard profane language as an indication of manly courage and gentlemanly bearing. Human curses are oftentimes more an honor than a disgrace. The greatest souls have always lived under the ban of their age.

Dr. Thomas.

7696. CURSES, Reflex. According to fable, a bee took an offering of honey to Jupiter, which so pleased him that he promised to grant the bee whatever she should ask. The bee said, "O glorious Jove, give thy servant a sting, that when any one approaches my hive to take the honey, I may kill him on the spot." Jupiter answered her, "your prayer shall not be granted in the way you wish, but the sting you ask for you shall have; and when any one comes to take away your honey, and you sting him, the wound shall be fatal, not to him, but to you, for your life shall go with your sting." So it is to this day. He that curses others curses himself.

7697. CUSTOM, Compliance with. Alcibiades, who, when he dwelt at Athens, was as arch and witty as any Athenian of them all, kept his stable of horses, played the good fellow, and was universally obliging; and yet the same man at Sparta shaved close to the skin, wore his cloak, and never bathed but in cold water. When he sojourned in Thrace, he drank and fought like a Thracian; and again, in Tissaphernes's company in Asia, he acted the part of a soft, arrogant and voluptuous Asiatic. And thus, by an easy compliance with the humors and customs of the people amongst whom he conversed, he made himself master of their affections and interests. So did not the brave Epaminondas nor Agesilaus, who, though they had to do with great variety of men and manners, and cities of vastly different politics, were still the same men, and everywhere, through the whole circle of their conversation, maintained a part and character worthy of themselves. And so was Plato the same man at Syracuse that he was in the Academy, the same in Dionysius' court that he was in Dion's.

7698. DANCING, Demoralization of. "I was called," says a minister, "in the early part of my ministry, to stand beside the bed of a beautiful young mother whose life was fast ebbing away. Deep, hopeless anguish, was riveted on her countenance. Death was knocking for admission. I asked her if she was willing that I should pray with her. Her reply was, 'I have no objection, but prayers will be of no avail now; it is too late, too late; I must die; I am lost! lost for ever!' I prayed earnestly with her, but her hard heart was untouched; there was in it no fountain of love to its Maker; it was 'too late.' What was the cause of her cold and careless indifference? Listen, mothers, and from her who, 'being dead, yet speaketh,' learn a lesson. This lovely mother was, at a very early period of her life, deeply and seriously impressed with the importance of religion, and the arrows of conviction were fastened in her heart. 'My mother,' says she, 'sent me to the dancing school, and I danced all my convictions away.' As she lived, so did she die—without Christ in the world."

7699. DANCING, Evil Influence of. When I hear of a dancing party I feel an uneasy sensation about the throat, remembering that a far greater preacher had his head danced off in the days of our Lord. However pleasing the polkas of Herodias might be to Herod, they were death to John the Baptist. The caperings and wantonings of the ball-room are death to the solemn influences of our ministry, and many an ill-ended life first received its bent for evil amid the flippancies of gay assemblies met to trip away the hours.

Spurgeon.

7700. DANCING, Habit of. The city of Sybaris boasted of its prosperity and power. At one time it sent out three hundred thousand men against the Crotonians. They had taught their horses at a certain tune to rise on their hind feet and on their fore feet to keep a kind of time with the music. A minstrel who had been ill-used amongst them, fled to Crotona, and told them "If they would make him their captain he would put all the enemy's horse, their chief strength, into their hands." They agreed to the terms, and he immediately began to teach the tune to all the minstrels in the city. When the Sybarites came up to a close charge, at a signal given, the minstrels began to play, and all the horses began to dance. Thus rendered unserviceable, they became an easy prey to the enemy.

7701. DANCING, History of. Dancing is very nearly as old as the world. The Hebrews danced when they emerged from the Red Sea, and about the golden calf, which was not their maiden effort. The young maidens of Silo were enjoying the dance in the field, when they were surprised by the youths of the tribe of Benjamin, and carried off by force, according to the counsel of the ancients of Israel; David danced before the ark; Socrates learned dancing from Aspasia; the soldiers of Crete and of Sparta went dancing into an assault, etc. But we leave this point of animated archaeology to be resolved by others. Dancing probably originated in certain gestures which indicated contentment, pain, joy—just as music was born of certain analogous sounds. Plato, Socrates, Lycurgus, and others, held dancing in great veneration. We are further informed that in old Chinese books dancing and music are described as the two most important departments of public affairs. Under the Romans, however, dancing had degenerated; and we are reminded that Cicero addressed a grave reproach to the Consul Gabinus for having danced.

Helps.

7702. DANCING, Prohibition of. A young lady requested her father to permit her to learn to dance. He replied, "No, my child: I cannot comply with a request which may subject me to your censures at some future period." "No, father: I will never censure you for complying with my request." "Nor can I consent," replied the father, "to give you an opportunity. If you learn, I have no doubt but you will excel; and when you leave school, you may then want to go into company to exhibit your skill. If I then object to let you, as I most likely should, you would very naturally reply, 'Why, father, did you first permit me to learn, if I am not permitted to practise?'" This reply satisfied her. She afterwards adopted for the government of her own family, the rule "Never to comply with a request which may subject me to any future reflections from my children."

7703. DANCING, Prescription of. Dancing is an amusement which has been discouraged in our country by many of the best people, and not without some reason. Dancing is associated in their minds with balls; and this is one of the worst forms of social pleasure. The time consumed in preparing for a ball, the waste of thought upon it, the extravagance of dress, the late hours, the exhaustion of strength, the exposure of health, and the languor of the succeeding day,—these and other evils connected with this amusement are strong reasons for banishing it from the community. Channing.

7704. DANDY, Description of a. A dandy is a clothes-wearing man—a man whose trade, office, and existence consist in the wearing of clothes. Every faculty of his soul, spirit, person, and purse, is heroically consecrated to this one object—the wearing of clothes wisely and well; so that, as others dress to live, he lives to dress. He is inspired with cloth, a poet of cloth. Carlyle.

7705. DANGER, Confidence in. Under the persuasion that no disaster can reach us without the permission of him who watches over us with an eye that never slumbers, and a tenderness which nothing but guilt can withdraw from us, we can face those unknown terrors from which pagan philosophy turned away dismayed; we can look forward, unmoved, into futurity, and contemplate all the possible contingencies that may befall us, with intrepidity and unconcern; with the cheerfulness of a mind at perfect ease, reposing itself in full confidence and security on the great Disposer of all human events. Bishop Porteus.

7706. DANGER, Escape from. Two vessels, in a gale off the southern coast, and wrapped in the darkness of the night, were sailing toward each other. The commanders knew it not, until suddenly, from the deck of one of the ships, rang out the trumpet-shout, "Hard-a-larboard!" The officer had caught sight of the approaching craft through the gloom, when near the prow of his own. Instantly was heard in response the thrilling words, "Hard-a-larboard!" Every heart on those ships was still, as the white-robed arms of the leviathans of the sea-wave seemed to interlock in a terrific struggle, then part forever. Each swept onward toward its destined port, bearing the pale spectators of the scene. Those ships had doubtless often been in danger, but never before nor afterward was such threatened destruction warded off by a breath through the speaking-trumpet, and escaped by so small a margin of deliverance. We believe that in heaven every ransomed soul will see in the life-voyage, among many dangers encountered, some single peril of decisive interest. It may have been the avoiding of a meeting with a dangerous companion, or stopping at the entrance of a theatre, when the forces of evil were in wait for him, turning, as it were, a hairbreadth aside, because upon the inward ear fell, just in time, the warning tones of the silver trumpet, borne by them of whom it is written: "And he shall give his angels charge concerning thee, to keep thee in all thy ways, lest at any time thou dash thy foot against a stone." That escape will have a solitary importance in all the earthly past, and will send up to the throne a strain of highest thanksgiving. Such was its relation to life; to have failed of deliverance then was certain ruin forever. Some Christians can now look back upon this moment of dark and awful peril. Multitudes are daily passing safely, or making shipwreck, at such critical moments in probation. Messenger.

7707. DANGER, Everywhere. A shipwrecked sailor clinging to fragments of the wreck looked down into the water and saw the sharks in great numbers waiting for their prey. Could we see how we are environed with dangers we should be appalled. By night and by day, on land and on sea, sheltered or exposed, calamities, sickness, temptation, destruction, hover near to seize us as their prey. Our safety is in our omnipresent God who has said "Thou shalt not fear."

7708. DANGER, Exposure to. When the instructed Christian sees his surroundings, he finds himself to be like a defenceless dove flying to her nest, while against her tens of thousands of arrows are leveled. The Christian life is like that dove's anxious flight, as it threads its way between the death-bearing shafts of the enemy, and by constant miracle escapes unhurt. The enlightened Christian sees himself to be like a traveler, standing on the narrow summit of a lofty ridge; on the right hand and on the left are gulfs unfathomable, yawning for his destruction; if it were not that by divine grace his feet are like hinds' feet, so that he is able to stand upon his high places, he would long ere this have fallen to his eternal destruction.

Spurgeon.

7709. DANGER, Ignoring. Those people are in the road to ruin, who say to their ministers, as the Jews did of old to their Prophets: "Prophecy not;" or, what amounts to the same thing, "Speak unto us smooth things, prophecy deceits." I well remember having read, in an ancient author, the following remarkable and appropriate account: "News came to a certain town, once and again, that the enemy was approaching; but he did not then approach. Hereupon, in anger, the inhabitants enacted a law, that no man, on pain of death, should bring again such rumors, as the news of an enemy. Not long after, the enemy came indeed; besieged, assaulted, and sacked the town; of the ruins of which nothing remained, but this proverbial epitaph—"Here once stood a town that was destroyed by silence." Anon.

7710. DANGER, Insufficient Protection from. When the lofty spire of old St. Paul's was destroyed by lightning, there were many superstitious persons who were amazed beyond measure at the calamity, for in the cross there had long been deposited relics of certain saints, which were counted fully sufficient to avert all danger of tempests. With what amazement will ignorant, self-righteous sinners see their own destruction come upon them, notwithstanding all the refuges of lies in which they trusted.

Spurgeon.

7711. DANGER, Keep Clear of. A vessel was approaching the dangerous point, Cape Hatteras. The outline of the rock coast was in view. Suddenly the order was given to tack and the vessel stood out into the broad ocean, leaving the coast far astern. "Is not the water deep enough to make a closer run to the shore?" asked a passenger, who was impatient to get a good sight of land after the three days' voyage. "Certainly," answered the captain, gazing off to the south at the signs of an approaching storm. "But why, then, did we tack here?" asked the man. "Because," replied the captain, "if in running close to the cape we had become in any way disabled, we might have drifted on the rocks and have been wrecked. A good sailor, when possible, stands out from danger." The seaman's greatest danger is when near the rock or sandy shores. He keeps out in the wide sea for safety. So it is with the Christian. Out on the sea of truth and love it is safe.

7712. DANGER, Playing with. A mother visited a menagerie with her infant in her arms. As they stood by the tiger's cage, the animal, apparently quiet, permitted the caresses of the child, and the mother, thinking it under the control of its keeper, and caged by iron bars, relaxed her vigilance, when suddenly the tiger seized the child, and in one fatal moment it became its prey. Keep away from the drinking and gambling saloon, and the house of the strange woman, or in an unexpected moment they will turn and rend you.

7713. DANGER, Protection from. "It shall not come nigh thee." The words came to our mind the other day as, sitting in the family room of a depot dwelling, a low rumble of an approaching express train suddenly fell upon the ear, growing louder and louder into a very thunder, as the huge and impetuous monster rushed by, within a few feet of our chair. The building shook as by an earthquake; the furniture rattled as if by hands. How near, and yet how secure! Guided by the firm and glistening rails, the mighty train swept on, restrained from inflicting the ruin which it was quite in its power to do. Of how many of the calamities and sorrows of this life is it true that, guided by the unerring lines of God's providence, they come very near us, and yet touch us not, because it is not his will. "A thousand shall fall at thy side, and ten thousand at thy right hand, but it shall not come nigh thee."

The Congregationalist.

7714. DANGER, Reckless of. Some distance above the falls of Niagara is a ferry which is always considered very dangerous by the most experienced boatmen. The current may seize a boat and shoot it like an arrow down the rapids toward the great fall. A young man from foolish bravado resolved to try the ferry in his boat alone. Old boatmen warned him, but he was deaf alike to counsel and entreaty. He launched his boat, and rowed bravely, but all his efforts were powerless against the current, which swept him against the rocks above the falls. His boat was crushed, and he caught hold of a projecting rock. Report of his danger ran through the town, and the people flocked in crowds to the shore. Thousands of dollars were offered for his rescue. But it was impossible. No help could reach him. Just so soon as his strength gave out he must go over the fall. For twenty-four hours he hung upon the brink of fate, and then his strength gave way, and with an awful shriek he went over the fall and into eternity. Thus myriads are hanging on the rocks of sin. Their doom is sure and will be soon.

7715. DANGER, Shelter from. There is an ancient fable which says that the dove once made a piteous complaint to her fellow birds, that the hawk was a most cruel tyrant, and was thirsting for her blood. One counseled her to keep below—but the hawk can stoop for its prey; another advised her to soar aloft—but the hawk can mount as high as she. A third bade her hide herself in the woods, but alas! these are the hawk's own estates, where he holds his court. A fourth recommended her to keep in the town, but there man hunted her, and she feared that her eyes would be put out by the cruel falconer to make sport for the hawk. At last one told her to rest herself in the clefts of the rock, there she would be safe, violence itself could not surprise her there. The meaning is easy; reader, do not fail to catch it, and to act upon it. The dove is thy poor defenceless soul. Satan is thy cruel foe; wouldst thou not escape from him? Thy poverty cannot protect thee, for sin can stoop to the poor man's level and devour him in the cottage, and drag him to hell from a hovel. Thy riches are no security, for Satan can make these a snare to thee, and if thou shouldst mount ever so high, the bird of prey can follow thee and rend thee in pieces! The busy world with all its cares cannot shelter thee, for here it is that the great enemy is most at home; he is the prince of this world, and seizes men who find their joys therein as easily as a kite lays hold upon a sparrow. Nor can retirement secure you, for there are sins peculiar to quietude, and hell's dread vulture soars over lonely solitudes to find defenceless souls, and rend them in pieces. There is one defence. O may you and I fly to it at once! Jesus was wounded for sin; faith in him saves at once and forever.

Spurgeon.

7716. DANGER, Shield from. Artemon was a very skillful engineer, but of a very timorous disposition. Foolishly afraid of his own shadow he scarcely ever stirred out of his house. Two men stood over him at all times, with a brazen shield, so that nothing should fall upon him, and if necessity called him from home, he would be carried in a litter so near the ground that it would not harm him if he should fall. How happy are they who can say, "The Lord God is my sun and my shield."

7717. DANGER, Spiritual. I remember five or six years ago being in Chamounix, Switzerland, and the day before our arrival a young man and woman had arrived from London. They were making their bridal tour, and they had attempted to ascend Mont Blanc, and had got near the top when the husband said to the wife: "You had better tarry here with one of the guides. It will be too cold up there on that top cliff. I will hasten up and touch the top of the cliff, and hasten back again, and you stay here until I return," and he started. She, ambitious to follow him, started also, and putting her foot on what she supposed to be solid ice, it broke, and she fell through, hundreds and perhaps thousands of feet down, her body to be found forty years from now, when by the law of the glacier it will come out at the foot of the cliff. On the following days we stood and looked through our telescopes, and we saw the men digging in the snow and hewing amid the glaciers; but there was no hope—no hope. Oh! are there not souls here traveling on slippery places? You think that all is fair and well. You are going on, you are going up in life, but after a while you will put your foot down and it will break through into the grave, and you will be gone from your house, and gone from the church, and gone from the store, and gone from all the places which know you now, but will know you no more. Fly to the cross! Drop everything for that. You cannot afford to ruin your soul. Lose heaven and you lose all. Talmage.

7718. DANGER, Symbol of. A merchant was one evening celebrating the marriage of his daughter. While the guests were enjoying themselves above, he chanced to go into the basement where he met a servant carrying a candle without a candlestick. She passed on to the cellar for wood, and returning quickly without the candle, the merchant suddenly remembered that during the day several barrels of gunpowder had been placed in the cellar, one of which had been opened. Inquiring what she had done with the candle, to his amazement and horror her reply was, that not being able to carry it with the wood, she had set it in a small barrel of "black sand," in the cellar. He flew to the spot. A long, red snuff was ready to fall from the wick into the mass of powder, when, with great presence of mind, placing one hand on each side of the candle, and making his hands meet at the top over the wick, he safely removed it from the barrel. At first he smiled at his previous terror; but the reaction was so great that it was weeks before he overcame the shock which his nerves had sustained in that terrible moment. Beneath the surface of our social enjoyments are burning passions and terrible temptations which may bring terrible destruction at any moment. Anon.

7719. DANGER, Unlikely. You have read the reason why the Ephesians expelled the best of their citizens,—"Nemo de nobis unus excellat, sed si quis extiterit, alio in loco et apud alios sit;" "If any are determined to excel their neighbors, let them find another place to do it." You have read that he who conquered Hannibal saw it necessary to retire from Rome, that the merits of others might be more noticed. My authors tell me that "at all times nothing has been more dangerous among men than too illustrious a degree of merit." But, my readers, the terror of this envy must not intimidate you. I must press you to do good; and be so far from affrighted at it, you shall rather be generously delighted with the most envious deplumations. Cotton Mather.

7720. DANGER, Unseen. The preacher may be addressing one whose end is near and whose preparation for eternity must be crowded into a few hours or days. Could he lift the curtain and show the neglecter his true position, on the verge of the abyss of woe, while death stands by with uplifted hand to push him over the brink, he would cry out in the greatest alarm, "Save Lord, or I perish." Such a vision would extort the cry from every beholder, "Sinner, have mercy on thine own soul. O God, have mercy upon him and haste to save him."

7721. DANGER, Vows in. How much would the gods be enriched by danger, if we remembered the vows which it makes us offer! But, the danger once past, we no longer remember our promise. Fontaine.

7722. DANGER, Warning of. It was a custom in Pompeii to place a slave with a trusty dog to keep guard in the vestibule of the houses. Conspicuously posted were the words, "Cave canem." Beware of the dog. There is many a dangerous place where no guard appears and no warning is given.

7723. DANGERS, Extremes of. Look upon any duty or grace, and you will find it lie between Scylla and Charybdis, two extremes alike dangerous. Faith, the great work of God, cuts its way between the mountain of presumption and the gulf of despair. Patience (a grace so necessary that we cannot be without it a day, except we would be all that while beside ourselves) keeps us that we fall neither into the sleepy apoplexy of a blockish stupidity, nor into a raging fit of discontent. Gurnall.

7724. DANGERS, Hidden. There is a mountain pass in Switzerland over which the traveler is conducted blindfold. He might lose his footing if he caught but one bewildering glimpse of the chasm below. In like manner a wise love conceals from us those circumstances that might distract our attention from the immediate line of duty, and withholds the knowledge that might occasion bewilderment and a fall. Charles Stanford.

7725. DANGERS, Influence of. When evil passions stir within, and evil men oppress without—when conscience accuses, and death overshadows—I am like a dove tossed with the tempest: I see an opening into the bosom of my Father—thither I fly away to be at rest. Blessed is even the storm which drives the dove to its window. Blessed, in the end, will be the miscellaneous dangers and trials of life; for they shut the pilgrim up to the refuge of his soul, and keep him cowering deep all his days, in God's loving kindness, which is better than life. Arnot.

7726. DANIEL, Tradition of. The marvelous gift of Daniel, by which he was able to discover the dream of Nebuchadnezzar, and to give the true interpretation thereof, won for him the name Belteshazzar. Josephus says that the king was so astonished at Daniel's revelation that he fell down on his face before him and worshiped him as a god, conferred the name of his own god, Belteshazzar, upon him, and gave command that men should sacrifice to him as a god. Because of this Daniel may have been exempted from the command to worship the image in the plain of Dura, for disobedience to which the other Hebrews were cast into the furnace. The reputation that he was a god extended among the pagans, increased by his sanctity and the marvels he wrought. He was a favorite with kings and people, appearing at the court of Nebuchadnezzar, rendering his dream of the great image; then in the palace of Belshazzar, reading the handwriting on the wall; then he is prime minister to Darius, and endures the ordeal of the lions. Afterward he wrote his own life, the Book of Daniel.

7727. DARK AGES, Ignorance in the. In less than a century after the barbarous nations settled in their new conquests, almost all the effects of knowledge and civility, which the Romans had spread through Europe, disappeared. Not only the arts of elegance, which minister to luxury, and are supported by it, but many of the useful arts, without which life can scarcely be considered as comfortable, were neglected or lost. Literature, science, and taste, were words little in use during the ages which we are contemplating; or, if they occur at any time, eminence in them is ascribed to persons and productions so contemptible, that it appears their true import was little understood. Persons of the highest rank, and in the most eminent stations, could not read or write. Many of the clergy did not understand the breviary which they were obliged daily to recite; some of them could scarcely read it. The memory of past transactions was in a great degree lost, or preserved in annals filled with trifling events or legendary tales.

Dr. Robertson.

7728. DARKNESS, Biblical. DARKNESS is one of the many abstract terms used to express the evil and effects of sin. Sin is not only dark, but darkness; not an enemy, but enmity. The expression, too, is intensified by the strongest epithets: "gross darkness"—"thick darkness"—"blackness of darkness." So we read of the actings of sin as "ways of darkness"—"works of darkness"—"deeds of darkness," &c. DARKNESS lies in the sinner's heart, Rom. 1: 21; and understanding, Eph. 4: 18. It is the element in which they live. So we read that they "walk" in darkness; they "sit;" they "abide;" they "grope;" they "stumble on the dark mountains." No wonder, when we read that they "prefer darkness to light;" they "hate;" "they rebel against the light;" "there is no light in them;" and "their punishment shall be analogous to their life"—"driven into darkness;" "cast into outer darkness" (three times referred to by St. Matthew, chap. 8: 12; 22: 13; 25: 20), where "the light of the wicked shall be put out, and the spark of his fire shall not shine," Job 18: 5, 6, 18. SATAN'S CONNECTION with darkness. Christ's kingdom is a kingdom of light. Satan's kingdom is that of darkness, Eph. 6: 12; Rev. 16: 10; Jude 6.

Bowes.

7729. DARKNESS, Influence of. A little girl sat, at twilight, in her sick mother's room, busily thinking. All day she had been full of fun and noise, and had many times worried her poor tired mother. "Ma," said the little girl, "what do you suppose makes me get over my mischief, and begin to act good, just about this time every night?" "I do not know, dear. Can you not tell?" "Well, I guess it's because this is when the dark comes. You know I am a little afraid of that. And then, ma, I begin to think of all the naughty things I've done to grieve you, and that perhaps you might die before morning; and so I begin to act good." "O!" thought I, "how many of us wait till 'the dark comes,' in the form of sickness or sorrow, or trouble of some kind, before we 'begin to act good!' How much better to be good while we are enjoying life's bright sunshine! and then 'when the dark comes,' as it will in a measure to all, we shall be ready to meet it without fear." Wellspring.

7730. DARKNESS, Need of. Speaking of a Norwegian summer, the Rev. H. Macmillan says: "The long daylight is very favorable to the growth of vegetation, plants growing in the night as well as in the day in the short but ardent summer. But the stimulus of perpetual solar light is peculiarly trying to the nervous system of those who are not accustomed to it. It prevents proper repose and banishes sleep. I never felt before how needful darkness is for the welfare of our bodies and minds. I longed for night, but the farther north we went, the farther we were fleeing from it, until at last, when we reached the most northern point of our tour, the sun set for one hour and a half. Consequently, the heat of the day never cooled down, and accumulated until it became almost unendurable at last. Truly for a most wise and beneficent purpose did God make light and create darkness. 'Light is sweet, and it is a pleasant thing to the eyes to behold the sun.' But darkness is also sweet, it is the nurse of nature's kind restorer, balmy sleep, and without the tender drawing round us of its curtains the weary eyelid will not close, and the jaded nerves will not be soothed to refreshing rest. Not till the everlasting day break, and the shadows flee away, and the Lord himself shall be our light, and our God our glory, can we do without the cloud in the sunshine, the shade of sorrow in the bright light of joy, and the curtain of night for the deepening of the sleep which God gives his beloved."

7731. DARKNESS, Spiritual. We often see men whose blindness is such that they cannot behold the bright orb of day in the heavens. But because they are blind, do we doubt the existence of a sun, or do we quarrel with his beams? The fault, indeed, is not in the sun, but in the eyes of such persons, which will not permit them to admire his radiance. Thus blinded are the eyes of the soul, and our sins are those shadows which hide from us the glorious light of heaven and of celestial beauty. Oh, man, how art thou fallen by nature! How miserably abject thy condition! But if thou wilt, thou canst be healed. Go to the true physician of the soul; to him belongs a light which can dissipate the darkest shadows. Beseech him to open thine eyes, that thou mayest see.

Theophilus of Antioch.
7732. DAUGHTER, The Conduct of a. When a young woman behaves to her parents in a manner particularly tender and respectful, I mean from principle as well as nature, there is nothing good and gentle that may not be expected from her in whatever condition she is placed. Of this I am so thoroughly persuaded, that, were I to advise any friend of mine as to his choice of a wife, I know not whether my very first counsel would not be—"Look out for one distinguished by her attention and sweetness to her parents." The fund of worth and affection, indicated by such a behavior, joined to the habits of duty and consideration thereby contracted, being transferred to the married state, will not fail to render her a mild and obliging companion. Fordyce.

7733. DAVID, Error Concerning. David is called "a man after God's own heart,"—not in his personal and private character, but in the policy of his public administration as the lieutenant and deputy of Jehovah. He most scrupulously observed the civil and ecclesiastical laws which Moses had promulgated, and carefully adjusted his own military government to the inspired maxims of the prophets and priests of the Most High. He staunchly maintained the knowledge and service of the living and true God against all forms of idolatry and will-worship, and assiduously labored to improve and perpetuate the ritual homage which was rendered to him. He therefore planned the building of a splendid temple for Jehovah, and consecrated the spoils of his many victories to its adornment; whilst he called into exercise his splendid gifts in poetry and music, that he might perfect "the service of song in the house of the Lord." "Those persons, therefore, who gather up the great faults and sins of David's private life—his craft and falsehood, his anger and revenge, his adultery and murder—in order to ask with derision and contempt, 'Is this man after God's own heart?' are quite beside the mark, missing altogether the spirit and intention of the passage they are so ready to pervert. When the prophet Samuel uttered that much-abused sentence (1 Sam 13: 14), it was in immediate connection with one that condemned the disobedience of Saul, and it therefore predicted a successor whose policy and administration should be in direct opposition to those of this king. It had, therefore, little to do with the private character of David, and only commended that course of public policy which maintained inviolate all the great maxims of the theocratic government."

John Blackburn.

7734. DAVID, Excellence of. Never, among the mere sons of men, has there appeared on so prominent a stage, a character with so rich and varied gifts. Like the single heir of a number of wealthy families, he seemed to unite in himself the moral wealth of nearly all that had gone before him—the heavenly conversation of Enoch, the triumphant faith of Abraham, the meditative thoughtfulness of Isaac, the wrestling boldness of Jacob, the patient and holy endurance of Joseph—no less than his talent for administering a kingdom, the lofty patriotism of Moses—as well as his brilliant fancy, the war-like skill and energy of Joshua, the daring courage of Gideon, the holy fervor of Samuel—all met in a measure in the character of David. A great King—a great warrior—and a great religious reformer—he held at once the great sceptres that ruled the hearts of men. But there was still higher work in reserve for him. He was the great hymn-writer of the church, the framer of that grand liturgy in which the godly of all nations, and of all generations, were to pour out the feelings of their hearts to God. Yet higher still, he was a type of Christ. Blakie.

7735. DAY, Accounting for a. Vespasian, the Roman emperor, throughout the whole course of his life used to call himself to account every night for the actions of the past day, and as often as he found he had passed any one day without doing some good, he entered in his diary this memorandum, Diem perdidit: "I have lost a day."

7736. DAY, Rules for Each. In the week days, when thou risest in the morning, consider, 1. Thou must die. 2. Thou mayst die that minute. 3. What will become of thy soul? Pray often. At night consider, 1. What sins thou hast committed. 2. How often thou hast prayed. 3. What hath thy mind been bent upon? 4. What hath been thy dealing? 5. What thy conversation? 6. If thou callest to mind the errors of the day, sleep not without a confession to God, and a hope of pardon. Thus, every morning and evening make up thy accounts with Almighty God, and thy reckoning will be the less at last. Bunyan.

7737. DAY OF GRACE, Neglecting the. When I think of opportunities, I think I may liken us here to-night to a number of men in the Arctic regions. They have been frozen up for a long time, and the ship is high and dry on great masses of ice. The thaw comes on; but the thaw, however, will last but for a very short time. They set their saws to work; they see a split in the ice; there is a long and very narrow lane of water. If they can get the ship along there before the water freezes it up again, they may yet reach the shores of dear old England, and be safe; but if not, they are frozen in for another winter, and very likely will be frozen in forever. Well, now, to-night it seems just so with us. It seems as if the Spirit of God had purposely brought some of you here; and I do trust he is opening, as it were, the lane of mercy for you—causing your sins for a little time to loose their frosty hold, and opening your heart a little to the genial influences of the Gospel. But, oh! if it should be frozen up again. Spurgeon.

7738. DAYS, Computation of. Every day is a little life; and our whole life is but a day repeated: whence it is that old Jacob numbers his life by days; and Moses desires to be taught this point of holy arithmetic, to number not his years, but his days. Those, therefore, that dare lose a day, are dangerously prodigal; those that dare misspend it, desperate.

Bishop Hall.

7739. DEAD, Blessed. A Roman Catholic lady I was the means of bringing out of that church, told me that the words repeated by me, "Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord," kindled in her heart convictions which she could not allay, and which, on application to the priest, he could not hush. She told me that she was once supposed to be on the point of death. "I was given up as dying," she said, "and a priest was sent for, a venerable man, to administer extreme unction. He did so; I had full possession of my mind, and I asked him, 'Now, tell me, my father, am I saved? And he answered, 'I can pledge my own salvation that you will be ultimately safe.' 'Ultimately! what does it mean?' 'My child, you must pass through purgatory.' I said, 'I have had extreme unction administered. What is the nature of that purgatory through which I have to pass?' 'My child, purgatory is a place where you must endure the torments of the damned, only of shorter duration.'" Such was the comfort with which she was left to die; but this text seemed to her to annihilate purgatory. Dr. Cumming.

7740. DEAD, Burning the. Mr. Underhill, writing from India, says: "We went aboard at daylight on the 18th, and before night had entered the channel which leads to the Sunderbunds. From a slight accident to the paddle-box at starting, we were detained two or three hours at the dock opposite to Nimtollah Ghat. It is at this place the Hindoos burn their dead. Three fires were burning during our detention. We could easily see the whole process; both men and women were engaged in performing this last rite. Around the ghat were thousands of birds, waiting with solemn mien the departure of the attendants, to pick over and devour the charred remains. The walls and houses around were covered with vultures, and dogs prowled about to share in the horrid feast."

7741. DEAD, Fear of the. It is said of the late Dr. Arnold, that "finding one of his children had been greatly shocked and overcome by the first sight of death, he tenderly endeavored to remove the feeling which had been awakened, and, opening a Bible, pointed to the words, 'Then cometh Simon Peter following him, and went into the sepulchre, and seeth the linen clothes lie, and the napkin, that was about his head, not lying with the linen clothes, but wrapped together in a place by itself.'—'Nothing,' he said, 'to his mind afforded us such comfort, when shrinking from the outward accompaniments of death—the grave, the grave-clothes, the loneliness—as the thought that all these had been around our Lord himself—round him who died, and is now alive for evermore.'" Stanley.

7742. DEAD, Honors to the. Our respect for the dead, when they are just dead, is something wonderful, and the way we show it more wonderful still. We show it with black feathers and black horses; we show it with black dresses and black heraldries; we show it with costly obelisks and sculptures of sorrow, which spoil half of our beautiful cathedrals. We show it with frightful gratings and vaults, and lids of dismal stone, in the midst of the quiet grass; and last, and not least, we show it by permitting ourselves to tell any number of falsehoods we think amiable or credible in the epitaph. Ruskin.

7743. DEAD, Raising the. There was a dead man being carried out of the City of Nain, and there was a great company of the friends accompanying that widow to lay away her only child, her only son. He was an only son, it says, and his mother was a widow. The father, the head of the house, had died perhaps long before, and long before that mother had watched over that husband, and at last she closed his eyes in death. It was a terrible blow, and now death had come again. You who are mothers can see how through all that sickness that mother was not willing to let the neighbors come in and watch over that boy. For weeks you can see a light burning in that little cottage in Nain. That mother has imprinted the last kiss upon that lovely cheek. Now they lay him in the coffin or upon the bier, and perhaps four men take him up just as they did the man with the palsy, and they bear him away to his resting place and there is a great multitude coming out of Nain. All Nain is moved. The widow was loved very much and there was a great multitude attending her. And now we see them as they are coming out of the gate of the city. The disciples look, and they see a great crowd coming out of Nain, and the two crowds, the two great multitudes come together, and the Son of God looks upon that scene. We read often where he looked toward heaven and sighed. He had followers on his right hand, followers on his left hand, followers behind him, and followers before him. He saw the woe and suffering in this wretched world, but he looked upon that weeping mother. Death has got its captive. And shall not the Son of God look upon that widow? He saw those tears trickling down her cheeks, and the great heart of the Son of God was moved. He would not suffer that son to pass. He commanded the young men to rest the bier. "Young man, I say unto thee, arise!" and the dead heard the voice of the Son of God and he arose. I can imagine him saying, "Blessed be God, I am alive."

Moody.

7744. DEAD, Reviving the. Thomas Fuller tells of a knight, one Gervase Scroop, who received twenty-six wounds in the battle of Edgehill, and was left for dead amid heaps of slain. The next day his son Adrian sought his corpse to give it a decent burial. When found, the body was not quite cold, and the son began to use the means for restoration, which met with entire success, and the knight lived more than ten years, a monument of his son's affection. There are many souls left as dead, among the slain, along the highways of sin, whom diligent personal effort would rescue. Surprising success often attends this work.

7745. DEAD, Unchangeable. A minister dreamed that he was walking with a companion of his boyhood, when suddenly the Day of Judgment, with all its appalling scenes, burst upon them. He turned to look for his companion, and saw him lying pale and motionless, with his tongue swollen, and hanging from his mouth, as if he had been trying to pray, but was struck into stone. He heard a voice say, "His character is adamant; he that is filthy, let him be filthy still; and he that is righteous, let him be righteous still." In much trepidation he awoke, and at the earliest possible time sought his friend, and told him the dream. It was the means of reforming the man.

7746. DEAD, Unconsciousness of the. A young man, applying to St. Macarius for spiritual advice, directed him to go to a burying-place and upbraid the dead, and after that to go and flatter them. "Well," said Macarius, when the young man returned, "how did the dead receive thy abuse of them?" "They answered not a word," he replied. "And how did they behave when flattered?" "They took no notice of that either." "Then," replied Macarius, "Go, and learn neither to be moved with injuries nor flatteries. If you die to the world and to yourself, you will begin to live to Christ."

7747. DEAD, Yet Speaking. The sun sets behind the western hills, but the trail of light he leaves behind him guides the pilgrim to his distant home. The tree falls in the forest; but in the lapse of ages it is turned into coal, and our fires burn now the brighter because it grew and fell. The coral insect died, but the reef it raised breaks the surge on the shores of great continents, or has formed an isle in the bosom of the ocean to wave now with harvests for the good of man, and to be a gem hereafter for the diadem of the great Redeemer. We live, and we die; but the good or evil that we do lives after us, and "is not buried with our bones."

Dr. Cumming.

7748. DEATH, Admonition of. Henry, Emperor of Germany in the tenth century, caused a paper to be placed upon the plate of one of his pets at a feast with the inscription, "Meinwerk! Meinwerk! set thy house in order, for in five days thou shalt die." The bishop was startled, left the table abruptly, hastened home, made his will, renounced his earthly goods and bade farewell to his clergy. Then wrapping himself in his shroud he laid down in his coffin to die. But death tarried and the bishop grew hungry. He arose from his coffin, and walked about in his grave clothes, searching for food. Just then King Henry with some of his nobles burst in, and, amid great laughter, congratulated the bishop on his resurrection. He discovered the joke and his wrath waxed hot. Next Sunday he excommunicated the king, and would not remove the ban till he had done penance standing with bare feet, clothed in a white sheet.

7750. DEATH, Alfred Cookman's. Rev. Alfred Cookman seemed to have premonitions of his approaching decease. About four weeks previously he preached his last sermon from, "We do all fade as a leaf," holding up at the same time a withered leaf. Passing out from the congregation he handed this to a brother, remarking, "I feel that the text and the preacher are much alike. It may be my last testimony." His final words to his mother were, "I am more indebted for all I am to your prayers and counsel and example than to aught beside." To his sister he said, "If I could have life on earth for the lifting up of my hand I would not. If Jesus should come and ask me would I live or die, I would say, 'Do as thou pleasest, Lord.'" Lifting up his paralyzed hand with the other, he said, "This is a paralyzed hand, but it belongs to Jesus." And now the chariot seemed to have come, and his last words were, "I am sweeping through the gates, washed in the blood of the Lamb."

7751. DEATH, Avarice in. Mr. Watson, uncle to the late Marquis of Rockingham, a man of immense fortune, finding himself at the point of death, desired a friend who was present to open him a drawer, in which was an old shirt, that he might put it on. Being asked why he would wish to change his linen when he was so ill, he said, "Because I'm told that the shirt that I die in must be the nurse's perquisite, and that is good enough for her!" This was as bad as the woman, who, with her last breath, blew out an inch of candle—"Because," said she, "I can see to die in the dark." Hood.

7752. DEATH, Beautiful. To me, few things appear so beautiful as a very young child in its shroud. The little innocent face looks so sublimely simple and confiding among the terrors of death. Crimeless and fearless, that little mortal passed under the shadow and explored the mystery of dissolution. There is death in its sublimest and purest image; no hatred, no hypocrisy, no suspicion, no care for the morrow, ever darkened that little one's face; death has come lovingly upon it; there is nothing cruel or harsh in its victory. The yearnings of love, indeed, cannot be stifled; for the prattle and smiles, and all the little world of thoughts that were so delightful, are gone forever. Awe, too, will overcast us in its presence; for we are looking on death. But we do not fear for the little lovely voyager; for the child has gone, simple and trusting, into the presence of its all-wise Father, and of such, we know, is the kingdom of heaven. Leigh Hunt.

7753. DEATH, Bells Ringing at. The legend of St. Hymelin is, that as he was dying all the church chimes of the town began ringing sweet music, though no man touched the bells.

7754. DEATH, Biblical Figures of. The king of terrors, Job 18: 14. Sleep, Acts 7: 60. Putting off the tabernacle of the body, 2 Cor. 5: 1. Cut down like the grass or flower, Ps. 90: 5, 6. Cut off like the weaver's thread, Is. 38: 12; or the ears of corn, Job 24: 24. Fleeing as a shadow, Job 14: 1. Carried away as a flood, Ps. 90: 5. The consuming of snow-water, Job 24: 9; water spilt upon the ground, 2 Sam. 14: 14. In some Eastern lands in ancient times they poured water into the grave in token of man's frailty. Departing like a vessel from the harbor, Phil. 1: 23. The river Jordan, the entrance to the land of rest. Sowing like seed, 1 Cor. 15: 42-45. Resting as in a tranquil bed, Is. 57: 2. Returning to dust, Gen. 3: 19; Eccl. 12: 7. Going the way whence there is no return, Job 16: 22. A war from which there is no discharge, Eccl. 8: 8.

Bowes.

7755. DEATH, Bishop Butler's. As this great Christian apologist lay on his death-bed, he said to his chaplain: "I know that Jesus Christ is a Saviour, but how am I to know that he is a Saviour to me?" The chaplain replied, "It is written, 'Him that cometh unto me I will in no wise cast out.'" After musing awhile the dying bishop said, "I have often read and thought of that scripture, but never till this moment did I feel its full power, and now I die happy."

7756. DEATH, Calling for. An old man that had traveled a long way with a huge bundle of sticks, found himself so weary that he cast it down, and called upon Death to deliver him from his most miserable existence. Death came straightway at his call, and asked him what he wanted. "Pray, good sir," says he, "do me but the favor to help me up with my burden again." Æsop.

7757. DEATH, Certainty of. There is nothing more certain than death, nothing more uncertain than the time of dying. I will, therefore, be prepared for that at all times, which may come at any time, must come at one time or another. I shall not hasten my death by being still ready, but sweeten it. It makes me not die the sooner, but the better. Warwick.

7758. DEATH, Change in. There lies my friend. He hastens to depart. Death is upon him. The change has well-nigh come. How little intervenes between his present humiliations and his awaiting glories! I tremble to think what in an instant he must be! How unlike all he was! I bend over thee, and mark thy wasted, pallid frame; I look up, and there is ascending above me an angel's form. I stoop to thee, and just can catch thy feeble, gasping whisper: I listen, and there floats around me a seraph's song. I take thy hand, tremulous and cold: it is waving to me from yonder skies. I wipe thy brow, damp and furrowed: it is enwreathed with the garland of victory. I slake thy lip, bloodless and parched; it is drinking the living fountains, the overflowing springs of heaven! R. W. Hamilton.

7759. DEATH, a Change of Place only. Rev. Thomas Sheppard, of Charlestown, Mass., on the day before his death, said to Dr. Cotton Mather, "My hopes are built on the free mercy of God, and the rich merit of Christ; and I do believe that if I am taken out of the world, I shall only change my place: I shall neither change my company nor my communion."

7760. DEATH, Cheerfulness at. One of the martyrs was asked why he was so light-hearted when doomed to a terrible death. "Oh," said he, "my heart is so light at my death, because Christ's was so heavy at his."

7761. DEATH of Children. The good husband-man may pluck his roses and gather in his lilies at midsummer, and for aught I daresay in the beginning of the first summer month; and he may transplant young trees out of the lower ground to the higher, where they have more of the sun, and a more free air at any season of the year. What is that to you or me? The goods are his own.

Rutherford.

7762. DEATH, Child's Ideas of. "She died," said Mary, "and was buried in the ground where the trees grow." "The cold ground?" said Kate, shuddering. "No, the warm ground," returned Mary, "where the ugly little seeds are turned into beautiful flowers, and where good people turn into angels and fly away to heaven."

7763. DEATH with Christ. "During seven weeks of his severe suffering, a fretful or murmuring expression never escaped Romaine's lips; but often would he say, 'How good is God to me! What entertainments and comforts does he give me! Oh, what a prospect of glory and immortality is before me! He is my God, through life, through death, and to eternity.' When inquiries were made how he felt, his general reply was, 'As well as I expect to be this side heaven.' To a brother minister he said: 'I do not repent of one word that I have printed or preached about Jesus, for I now feel the blessed comforts of that precious doctrine.' 'I have lived,' said he to another, 'to experience all I have spoken, and all I have written, and I bless God for it.' Afterwards he observed, 'I knew the doctrines I preached to be truths, but now I experience them to be blessings.' As he lay waiting for his dismissal, the friend in whose house he was, said to him, 'I hope, sir, you now find the salvation of Jesus inestimably precious to you.' 'Yes,' he replied with a feeble voice, 'he is precious to my soul.' 'More precious than rubies,' said his friend. He caught the word and completed the Scriptural idea, 'and all that can be desired is not comparable to him.'"

7764. DEATH without Christ. A young lady who had been very near the gate of death and had bidden final farewell to her friends, as she supposed, recovered. She afterward said that she was then very happy, expected to go to heaven, and had no doubts, fears or suspicions but she should. Being asked, "On what was your hope founded?" "Founded?" she replied: "why, I had never injured any person, and I had endeavored to do all the good in my power. Was not this sufficient?" "It is a delightful reflection," said the questioner, "that you have never injured any person, and it is still more delightful to think that you have done all the good in your power; but this is a poor foundation for a sinner to rest upon. Was this the foundation of your hope?" She seemed quite astonished at the question, and eagerly inquired, "Was not this sufficient?" He did not give a direct answer; but observed, "I am very thankful that you did not die." "What! do you think that I should not have gone to heaven?" "I am sure you could not in the way you mentioned. Do you perceive that, according to your plan, you were going to heaven without Christ?—a thing which no sinner has done since Adam fell, and which no sinner will be able to do while the world stands." The conversation led to her conversion. Multitudes die having only the same groundless expectation, "as the fool dieth."

7765. DEATH, Chrysostom's. This famous preacher was exiled because of his purity of life and severity with the sins of priests and people, high or low. At Antioch his influence became so great that his enemies resolved to change the place of his exile. His guards were ordered to conduct him to a place on the Black Sea, and to make the journey as exhausting as possible. For three months, over hard roads and in severe storms, their journey lasted. He was broken down and needed rest. Stopping at the church of St. Basiliscus near Comana, he had a premonition of speedy relief. That night Basiliscus, the martyr, appeared to him and said, "Courage, my brother John, to-morrow we shall be together." In the morning he begged not to be moved, but was forced to go on by the guard. After going four miles he was so evidently dying that they took him back to the church. There he put on white robes, received the holy communion, offered his last prayer and thanksgiving which were his last words, "Glory to God for all things, amen," stretched out his feet and expired, September 14, 407.

7766. DEATH, Comfortless. Mr. Job Throgmorton, a Puritan divine, who was described by his contemporaries as being "as holy and as choice a preacher as any in England," is said to have lived thirty-seven years without any comfortable assurance as to his spiritual condition. When dying, he addressed the venerable Mr. Dod in the following words: "What will you say of him who is going out of the world, and can find no comfort?" "What will you say of him," replied Mr. Dod, "who, when he was going out of the world, found no comfort, but cried, 'My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?'" This prompt reply administered consolation to the troubled spirit of the dying friend, who departed an hour after, rejoicing in the Lord.

Anon.

7767. DEATH, Condition of an Easy. The Princess Charlotte, of England, collected various opinions on the question, "What can make a death-bed easy?" Had she seen the martyrs triumphing in torture, and the trusting shouting victory through the blood of the Lamb in the midst of great pain, she would have sought no further answer than the Bible gives. Christians die well. He dies easily who feels that Christ died for him.

7768. DEATH, Confidence in. "I have no hope in what I have been or done," said Dr. Doddridge, on his dying-bed, "yet I am full of confidence; and this is my confidence, there is a hope set before me. I have fled—I still fly for refuge to that hope. In him I trust, in him I have strong consolation; and shall assuredly be accepted in this beloved of my soul."

7769. DEATH, Contrast in. When Joseph Sutcliff was near his last hour, he said, "I have been thinking of the difference between the death of Paul and of Byron. Paul said, 'The time of my departure is at hand; but there is laid up for me a crown.' Byron said,

"My days are in the yellow leaf,
The flower, the fruit of life are gone;
The worm, the canker, and the grief
Are mine alone."

7770. DEATH, A Converted Heathen's. Rev. Mr. Armond gives the following account of the death of Vara, a blood-thirsty chief of Aimeo, who offered his own brother in sacrifice to his heathen gods before his conversion. "On seeing that the end of the venerable chief was fast approaching, I said to him, 'Are you sorry that you cast away your lying gods by which you used to gain so much property?' He was roused from his lethargy, and, with tears of pleasure sparkling in his eyes, he exclaimed, 'Oh, no no, no. What! can I be sorry for casting away death for life? Jesus is my rock, the fortification in which my soul takes shelter.' I said, 'Tell me on what you found your hopes of future blessedness.' He replied, 'I have been very wicked, but a great King from the other side of the skies sent his ambassadors with terms of peace. We could not tell for many years what these ambassadors wanted. At length Pomare obtained a victory, and invited all his subjects to come and take refuge under the wing of Jesus, and I was one of the first to do so. The blood of Jesus is my foundation. I grieve that all my children do not love him. Had they known the misery we endured under the reign of the devil, they would gladly take the gospel in exchange for their follies. Jesus is the best King; he gives a pillow without thorns!' A little time after, I asked him if he was afraid to die, when, with almost youthful energy, he replied, 'No, no. The canoe is in the sea, the sails are spread, she is ready for the gale. I have a good Pilot to guide me. My outside man and my inside man differ. Let the one rot till the trumpet shall sound, but let my soul wing her way to the throne of Jesus.' Soon afterwards Vara passed away to be forever with the Lord."

7771. DEATH, Conviction from. My first convictions on the subject of religion were confirmed by observing that really religious persons had some solid happiness among them, which I felt the vanities of the world could not give. I shall never forget standing by the bedside of my sick mother. "Are not you afraid to die?" I asked. "No." "No! Why does the uncertainty of another state give you no concern?" "Because God has said, 'Fear not; when thou passest through the waters, I will be with thee; and through the rivers, they shall not overflow thee.' Let me die the death of the righteous." Cecil.

7772. DEATH, Cordial in. The Rev. James Hervey died on Christmas-day, December 25, 1758. When dying he thanked the physicians for their visits, and with great solemnity and sweetness in his countenance exclaimed, "Lord, now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace according to thy most holy and comfortable word, for mine eyes have seen thy precious salvation. Here, doctor, is my cordial! What are all the cordials given to support the dying, in comparison of that which arises from the promises of salvation by Christ? This, this now supports me." About three o'clock he said, "The great conflict is over—now all is done," after which he scarcely spoke except twice or thrice, "Precious salvation!" and then, leaning his head against the side of his chair, he closed his eyes to earth to open them in heaven.

7773. DEATH, Courage at. Leonard Vecchel, one of the Catholic martyrs of Gorkum, sighed at the thought of the effect his tragic death would have upon his mother. Another of those, Godfrey Dumas said to him as he mounted the scaffold, "Courage, master Leonard, this day we shall assist at the marriage supper of the Lamb."

7774. DEATH, Cowards or Fools at. Some old doctor or other said quaintly that patients were very apt to be fools and cowards. But a great many of the clergyman's patients are not only fools and cowards, but also liars. If you think I have used rather strong language, I shall have to read something to you out of the book of this keen and witty scholar—the great Erasmus—who "laid the egg of the Reformation which Luther hatched." Oh, you never read his Naufragium, or "Shipwreck," did you? Of course not; for if you had, I don't think you would have given me credit—or discredit—for entire originality in that speech of mine. That men are cowards in the contemplation of futurity he illustrates by the extraordinary antics of many on board the sinking vessel; that they are fools, by their praying to the sea, and making promises to bits of wood from the true cross, and all manner of similar nonsense; that they are fools, cowards, and liars all at once, by this story: I will put it into rough English for you: "I couldn't help laughing to hear one fellow brawling out, so that he might be sure to be heard, a promise to Saint Christopher of Paris—the monstrous statue in the great church there—that he would give him a wax-taper as big as himself. 'Mind what you promise,' said an acquaintance that stood near him, poking him with his elbow, 'you couldn't pay for it, if you sold all your things at auction.' 'Hold your tongue, you donkey!' said the fellow—but softly, so that Saint Christopher should not hear him—'do you think I'm in earnest? If once I get my foot on dry ground, catch me giving him so much as a tallow candle!'" Holmes.

7775. DEATH Disarmed. Death is a dragon, the grave its den; a place of dread and terror; but Christ goes into its den, there grapples with it, and forever overcomes it, disarms it of all its terror; and not only makes it cease to be inimical, but to become the greatest blessing to the saints; a bed of rest, and a perfumed bed; they do but go into Christ's bed, where he lay before them, 1 Cor. 15: 15.

John Flavel

7776. DEATH, Diversities in. You have been in a ship when it entered the harbor, and you have noticed the different looks of the passengers as they turned their eyes ashore. There was one who, that he might not lose a moment's time, had got everything ready for landing long ago; and now he smiles and beckons to yonder party on the pier, who in their turn, are so eager to meet him, that they almost press over the margin of the quay; and no sooner is the gangway thrown across, than he has hold of the arm of one, and another is triumphant on his shoulder, and all the rest are leaping before and after him on their homeward way. But there is another, who showed no alacrity. He gazed with pensive eye on the nearer coast and seemed to grudge that the trip was over. He was a stranger going amongst strangers, and though sometimes during the voyage he had a momentary hope that something unexpected might occur, and that some friendly face might recognize him in regions where he was going an alien and an adventurer, no such welcoming face is there, and with reluctant steps he quits the vessel, and commits himself to the unknown country. And now that every one else has disembarked, who is this unhappy man whom they have brought on deck, and whom, groaning in his heavy chains, they are conducting to the dreaded shore? Alas! he is a felon and a runaway, whom they are bringing back to take his trial there; and no wonder he is loath to land. Now, dear brethren, our ship is sailing fast. We shall soon hear the raspings of the shal-lows, and the commotion overhead, which bespeak the port in view. When it comes to that, how shall you feel? Are you a stranger, or a convict, or are you going home? Can you say, "I know whom I have believed?" Have you a Friend within the veil? And however much you may enjoy the voyage, and however much you may like your fellow passengers, does your heart sometimes leap up at the prospect of seeing Jesus as he is, and so being ever with the Lord?

Dr. J. Hamilton.

7777. DEATH, Diversities of. On May 5th, 1821, Napoleon Bonaparte, in the delirium of his last sickness, cried, "Tête d'armée"—head of the army. They were the last words of a great but defeated and exiled general at St. Helena, whose ruling passion was strong in death. In the cabin of a ship at anchor in the port of the same island, twenty-four years later, lay the devoted Mrs. Judson turning homeward from her finished work. About to pass the same ordeal, she declared, "I ever love the Lord Jesus Christ," kissed her husband in token of her affection for him, and fell into a quiet slumber of an hour, when she awoke amid the angels. The Emperor was honored by a grand funeral and magnificent tomb. The missionary burial was unhonored and unsung. A simple slab marked her grave, bearing her name and age and the date of her death, and the verse,

"She sleeps sweetly here on this rock of the ocean,
Away from the home of her youth,
And far from the land where with heartfelt devotion,
She scattered the bright beams of truth."

7778. DEATH, Dread of. A Jewish record says, When Rabbi Jochanan, the son of Sachai, was ill and on his death-bed his disciples came to visit him. When he saw them he began to weep. "Light of Israel," said they to him "main pillar of the right, thou strong hammer, why dost thou weep?" He answered, "Were I led forth to judgment before a mortal king, who is here to-day and in his grave to-morrow; whose anger, were it excited against me, would not be lasting; whose fetters, were he to chain me, could not confine the body; whose infliction of death, were he to kill me, would not be eternal; whom I could mollify with words or bribe with gifts—even then I would weep. How much greater is my cause for tears, now that I am to be led before the King of kings, the Holy One! Blessed be he who liveth and reigneth for ever! whose wrath, were it excited against me, is everlasting; whose fetters, were he to chain me, know no end; whose infliction of death, were he to kill me, would be eternal; whom I can neither mollify with words, nor bribe with gifts. Moreover, there are two paths open before me—the one leading to bliss, the other to torments; and I know not which of them it will be my doom to take. Then how can I abstain from weeping?" His disciples then said, "Our rabbi, give us thy blessing." He answered, "May the fear of the Deity be as strong on you as the fear of man!" One of them said, "What! no stronger?" He answered, "Oh that it were as strong! for you know that he that is about committing a sin says within himself, 'I must take care that no man seeth me.'"

7779. DEATH, Early. Youth is as fickle as old age. The young man may find graves enough of his length in burial places. As green wood and old logs meet in one fire, so young sinners and old sinners meet in one hell and burn together. When the young man is in his spring and prime, then he is cut off and dies: "One dying in his full strength (or in the strength of his perfection, as the Hebrews have it) being wholly at ease and quiet, his breasts are full of milk, and his bones are moistened with marrow," Job 21: 23, 24. David's children died when young, so did Job's and Jeroboam's, etc. Every day's experience tells us, that the young man's life is as much a vapor as the old man's is. I have read of an Italian poet, who brings in a proper young man, rich and potent, discoursing with Death in the habit of a mower, with his scythe in his hand, cutting down the life of man, "For all flesh is grass," Isa. 40: 6. "And wilt thou not spare any man's person," saith the young man? "I spare none," saith Death. Man's life is but a day, a short day, a winter's day. Ofttimes the sun goes down upon a man before it be well up. Your day is short, your work is great, your journey long, and, therefore, you should rise early, and set forward towards heaven betimes, as that man doth that hath a long journey to go in a winter's day.

7780. DEATH, Empty Hands in. I remember an Eastern legend which I have always thought furnished a remarkable though unconscious tommentary on the words of the Psalmist. Alexander the Great, we are there told, being upon his death-bed, commanded that when he was carried forth to the grave his hands should not be wrapped as was usual in the cere-cloths, but should be left outside the bier, so that all might see them, and might see that they were empty, that there was nothing in them; that he, born to one empire, and the conqueror of another, the possessor while he lived of two worlds—of the East and of the West—and of the treasures of both, yet now when he was dead could retain no smallest portion of these treasures; that in this matter the poorest beggar and he were at length upon equal terms.

Trench.

7781. DEATH, The Entrance to Happiness. The City of Rhegium was taken by Dionysius, the elder, after a long siege. The obstinate defense of Phytion, a most worthy man, aroused the captor's wrath, and he resolved to avenge himself. He ordered Phytion to execution and told him that he had on the previous day drowned his son and all his kindred. He answered, "They are by one day happier than I!"

7782. DEATH Everywhere. Death meets us everywhere, and is procured by every instrument and in all chances, and enters in at many doors—by violence and secret influence, by the aspect of a star and the stink of a mist, by the emissions of a cloud and the meeting of a vapor, by the fall of a chariot and the stumbling at a stone, by a full meal or an empty stomach, by watching at the wine or by watching at prayers, by the sun or the moon, by a heat or a cold, by sleepless nights or sleeping days, by water frozen into the hardness and sharpness of a dagger, or water thawed into the floods of a river, by a hair or a razor, by violent motion or sitting still, by severity or dissolution, by God's mercy or God's anger, by everything in Providence and everything in manners, by everything in nature and everything in chance: we take pains to heap up things useful to our life, and get our death in the purchase; and the person is snatched away and the goods remain. And all this is the law and constitution of nature; it is a punishment to our sins, the unalterable event of Providence, and the decree of heaven; the chains that confine us to this condition are as strong as destiny, and immutable as the eternal laws of God.

Jeremy Taylor.

7783. DEATH, Evidences in. Rev. Leigh Richmond, in dying said, "Brother, brother, strong evidences, nothing but strong evidences will do in such an hour as this. I have looked here and looked there for them, and all have failed me; and so I cast myself on the sovereign, free, and full grace of God in the covenant by Jesus Christ; and there, brother, there, I have found peace." Even so; the free grace of the promise is our only hope.

7784. DEATH, Expectation of. Persons in health have died from the expectation of dying. It was once common for those who perished by violence to summon their destroyers to appear, within a stated time, before the tribunal of their God: and we have many perfectly attested instances in which, through fear and remorse, the perpetrators withered under the curse, and died. Pestilence does not kill with the rapidity of terror. The profligate abbess of a convent, the Princess Gonzaga, of Cleves, and Guize, the profligate Archbishop of Rheims, took it into their heads, for a jest, to visit one of the nuns by night, and exhort her as a person who was visibly dying. While in the performance of their heartless scheme they whispered to each other, "She is just departing," she departed in earnest. Her vigor, instead of detecting the trick, sank beneath the alarm; and the profane pair discovered, in the midst of their sport, that they were making merry with a corpse.

Wakley.

7785. DEATH, Exposure to. Tasso and his friend Manso, with Scipio Belprato, were one day in a summer-house which commanded a full prospect of the sea, agitated at the time by a furious storm. Belprato observed "that he was astonished at the rashness and folly of men who would expose themselves to the rage of so merciless an element, where such numbers had suffered shipwreck." "And yet," said Tasso, "we every night go without fear to bed, where so many die every hour. Believe me, death will find us in all parts: and those places that appear the least exposed are not always the most secure from his attacks."

7786. DEATH, Faithful till. It was on January 4, 1869, that the Triumph was on the Bay of Biscay, on a voyage from Liverpool to Spain. The storm raged, the sea ran mountains high, and the ship dashed to and fro, when the captain gave orders to stow the maintop-gallant sail; but no one would venture. Then Jack called out, "I will venture my life to save the ship and crew, and if I die I will die at my duty." With a smile on his face, he quickly climbed the mast. He was a true missionary, with a single object in view, and that object was to save the lives of others even if he lost his own. He clung hard to the ropes, stowed the maintop-gallant sail, when suddenly to the horror of the crew, a sea came and washed the mainmast overboard, with poor Jack upon it! They heard him cry, "O my God!" and then they saw him no more. He had sacrificed himself for them.

Missionary News.

7787. DEATH, Farewell in. An Indiana soldier lay dying in the hospital at Chattanooga. He was happy in Christ. He had his rings taken from his fingers to be sent to his sister, with the message that they were taken off when his hands were growing cold. He had three pictures which were held up before him by the chaplain. He took that of his mother first in his hand, kissed it fondly, and said, "Dear mother, good bye; I wish I could see you, but I am going to die in Georgia." With many sobs he repeated, "Good bye, good bye." Then he kissed his sister's picture, saying, "Dear sister; don't fret for me; I'll see you again; only be faithful; good bye, dear sister, good bye." Next he took and gazed upon the picture of a nameless friend and kissed it in silence. The patients of the ward,—such as could move, gathered around; others lifted themselves on elbow, to witness the scene. An opening life was cheerfully laid down. He said, "I was glad when I enlisted, and I am glad now. I am willing to die for my country."

7788. DEATH, Fearless of. Sir William Forbes, the biographer of Beatti, uttered this: "Tell those," said he, "that are drawing down to the bed of death, from my experience that it has no terrors; that in the hour when it is most wanted, there is mercy with the most high; and that some change takes place which fits the soul to meet its God." When the Earl of Derby came to his execution, although he had said in previous times, that he could die in fight, but knew not how it might be on the scaffold, he now said he could lay his head on the block as cheerfully as on his pillow. "Let my people know," said the pious Archdeacon Aylmer, "that their pastor died undaunted, and not afraid of death. I bless my God that I have no fear, no reluctance, but an assured confidence in the sin-overcoming merits of Jesus Christ."

7789. DEATH, Fear of. A little girl of eight years was on her dying bed, and weeping friends were gathered about her to watch the outgoing of her young life. She had reached the margin of the river of death. She became much agitated at what seemed to her a broad and impassable flood. After a little she grew calm, a smile of confidence lit up her face and saying, "O it is only a little brook," she passed joyously to the shining shore.

7790. DEATH, Feelings at. When Rev. Dr. James W. Alexander, for many years pastor of the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian church (a man of precious memory in the church of God), lay dying, he was approached by a friend who asked him how he felt, and said to him, "Suppose you were now to go to the judgment seat, what would be your feelings?" He was then within twenty hours of his decease, and he knew he was dying. "What would be my feelings," said he in reply, "if the curtain should drop now, and I at this moment were ushered into the presence of God? They would be these: first, I would prostrate myself in an unutterable sense of my nothingness and guilt; but, secondly, I would look upon my Redeemer with an inexpressible assurance of faith and love. A passage of Scripture which explains my present feeling is this: 'I know whom (with great emphasis) I have believed, and am persuaded that he is able to keep that which I have committed unto him against that day.' Some persons read it 'In whom I have believed,' but there is no preposition. Christ himself was the direct object of the Apostle's faith. 'I know whom I have believed,' that is, I am acquainted with him; I know him;" and relying on that only, he died, as millions of others have done, and as God grant we may, in the holy triumphs of the Gospel. C. D. Foss.

7791. DEATH a Ferry-Boat. Death to God's people is but a ferry-boat. Every day and every hour the boat pushes off with some of the saints, and returns for more.

S. S. Treasury.

7791. DEATH, The First. Those who are in Christ shall never taste of the second death; but, as to the first death, how art thou freed? I answer, thou art freed from the curse and from the sting of death; so thou mayest step on the back of death and go into endless glory. Therefore this first death is no death to thee who art in Christ, but rather an entry, or passage, or port to eternal life. But if thou wouldst be sure to be freed from death, then thou must first be freed from sin, by the law of the Spirit of life: and thou must know who it is that brings this freedom to thee, to wit, the Lord Jesus only. John Welsh.

7792. DEATH, Fletcher's. Rev. John Fletcher, of Madeley, returned home from his parish duties on a midsummer day, exhausted and feverish with cold. On the ensuing Sunday, resting, after two days' confinement, the admonitions of his friends, he went to his church; it was the last day of his ministrations there. Before he had read far in the service, his countenance changed, he was seized with faintness, and could scarcely proceed. The congregation was alarmed and in tears; his wife pressed through the crowd, and entreated the dying man to desist; but he seemed to know it "was the last time," and persisted. The windows were opened, and afforded him relief; his sermon surprised his hearers by its more than usual pathos and power, and "an awful concern was awakened through the whole assembly." Descending from the pulpit, he walked up to the communion table, saying as he went, "I am going to throw myself under the wings of the cherubim, before the mercy-seat." Several times did he sink exhausted on the sacramental table, while the congregation wept and sobbed aloud at the sight. Having struggled through a service of four hours' duration, he was supported, while uttering benedictions on his people, to his chamber, where he fell in a swoon, and never again went out, but wher borne to the grave. For several days he suffered much, but with continual praise upon his lips. "God is love! shout aloud! I want a gust of praise to go to the ends of the earth!" cried the sinking man. A visitor asked him if he thought God would not raise him up. "Raise me up in the resur—," he gasped. On the next Sunday a supplicatory hymn was sung for him in the church. A brother clergyman, who officiated on the occasion, says that there can be no description of the scene: the burst of sorrow that attended the supplication; the sadness, and even consternation, that prevailed through the village which had been consecrated so long by his holy life; the running to and fro of messengers with reports of his condition. "The members of every family sat together in silence that day, awaiting with trembling expectation the issue of every hour." The poor who came from a distance to attend the service, and who were usually entertained at his house, begged to see him once more. They were allowed to pass along the gallery, and to take, through the opened door of his chamber, their final look at his beloved face. He died that night. "I know thy soul," said his wife as she bent over him, when he could no longer speak; "I know thy soul; but for the sake of others, if Jesus be present with thee, lift up thy right hand." Immediately it was raised. "If the prospects of glory sweetly open before thee, repeat the sign." He instantly raised it again, and in half a minute a second time. He then threw it up, as if he would reach the top of the bed. After this his hands moved no more. Breathing like a person in common sleep, he died August 14, 1785, in the fifty-sixth year of his age. "Many exemplary men," said Wesley, "have I known, holy in heart and life, within four-score years; but one equal to him I have not known; one so inwardly and outwardly devoted to God, so unblamable a character in every respect, I have not found either in Europe or America, nor do I expect to find another such on this side of eternity." Weeping and lamenting thousands bore the remains of Fletcher to the grave, singing on the way:

"With heavenly weapons he has fought
The battles of his Lord,
Finished his course, and kept the faith,
And gained the great reward."

Stevens.

7793. DEATH, Forewarned of. It is noteworthy that in the three cases where the exact length of life was revealed, no practical good seems to have followed. H Ezekiah was promised fifteen years of longer life, Isa. 38: 5. Yet the very next chapter (written probably soon after) contains the record of his pride. Hananiah was forewarned that he should die the same year, Jer. 28: 16. But no record is added of his repenting and preparing for death. The rich fool was allowed only a few hours, Luke 12: 20. Yet there is no reason to think there was any softening result produced. Bowes.

7794. DEATH, Friends in. Severus, bishop of Ravenna, prepared a tomb for himself in his church. In it he placed the bodies of his wife, Vincentia, and of his daughter, Innocentia. After some years he was premonished that his time to die had come. He held service with the people, dismissed them, and closed the cathedral doors. Then, clothed in his episcopal robes, with one attendant, he went to the sepulchre of his family. They raised the stone from the tomb, and Severus, looking in, said: "My dear one, with whom I lived in love so long, make room for me, for this is my grave, and in death we shall not be divided." Immediately he descended into the tomb, laid himself down between his wife and daughter, crossed his hands upon his breast, looked up to heaven in prayer, gave one sigh and fell asleep, A. D. 390.

7795. DEATH, Gain of. "I am no longer disposed," says a Jew in writing to another, "to laugh at religion, or to plead that Christianity has no comforts in death. I witnessed the last moments of my worthy gardener, and wish I may die his death: and, if there is happiness in another life, this disciple of Jesus is assuredly happy. When the physician told him he was in extreme danger: 'How,' said he, 'can that be, when God is my Father, Jesus my Redeemer, heaven my country, and death the messenger of peace? The greatest risk I run is to die, but to die is to enter into complete and endless bliss.' His last words were, 'I die, but what needs that trouble me? My Jesus is the true God, and eternal life.'"

7796. DEATH, General Interest in. There is nothing in history which is so improving to the reader as those accounts which we meet with of the deaths of eminent persons, and of their behavior in that dreadful season. I may also add, that there are no parts in history which affect and please the reader in so sensible a manner. The reason I take to be this, because there is no other single circumstance in the story of any person which can possibly be the case of every one who reads it. A battle or a triumph are conjunctures in which not one man in a million is likely to be engaged; but when we see a person at the point of death, we cannot forbear being attentive to everything he says or does, because we are sure that, some time or other, we shall ourselves be in the same melancholy circumstances. The general, the statesman, or the philosopher, are, perhaps, characters which we may never act in; but the dying man is one whom, sooner or later, we shall certainly resemble. Addison.

7797. DEATH, Gentle. A Scotch minister upon his deathbed said, "I see Christ standing over Death's head, saying, 'Deal warily with my servant; loose thou this pin and that pin; for this tabernacle must be set up again.'"

7798. DEATH, Glorious. I have stood beside the dying soldier, when it has seemed as if a bridge of golden sheen was let down from heaven, a highway for the ransomed of the Lord. And that way cast up of God, has glowed with the steps of the angels, come to bear the soldier, who had made his last charge and fought his last battle, home. And up that shining path with angel convoy, the spirit has gone,—away from the clang of arms and the din of strife and the groans of the wounded,—away, away to the very gates of pearl, to the peace like a river and the rest of God.

Herrick Johnson.

7799. DEATH, Habit in. After John Wesley's death a small tract was published, giving an account of it. One was put into the hands of a learned and philosophical man, who seemed to have a real respect for religion. After reading the tract, he said to the person who gave it to him, "Well, this is the most astonishing instance of the power of habit! Here is a man who had been threescore years praying, preaching, and singing psalms, and, behold, he thinks of nothing else when he is dying!"

7800. DEATH, Happiness after. She is gone! No longer shrinking from the winter wind, or lifting her calm pure forehead to the summer's kiss; no longer gazing with her blue and glorious eyes into a far-off sky; no longer yearning ing with a holy heart for heaven; no longer toiling painfully along the path, upward and upward, to the everlasting rock on which are based the walls of the city of the Most High; no longer here; she is there; gazing, seeing, knowing, loving, as the blessed only see, and know, and love. Earth has one angel less, and heaven one more, since yesterday. Already, kneeling at the throne, she has received her welcome, and is resting on the bosom of her Saviour. If human love hath power to penetrate the veil (and hath it not?), then there are yet living here a few who have the blessedness of knowing that an angel loves them.

Hawthorn.

7801. DEATH, Happy. Rev. John Janeway, when on his death-bed, was employed chiefly in praise. "Oh," said he to his friends, "help me to praise God; I have now nothing else to do. I have done with prayer and all other ordinances. Before a few hours are over I shall be in eternity, singing the song of Moses and the Lamb. I shall presently stand upon Mount Zion, with an innumerable company of angels, and spirits of just men made perfect, and with Jesus, the Mediator of the new covenant. I shall hear the voice of much people, and with them shall cry, hallelujah, glory, salvation, honor and power, unto the Lord our God! And again we shall say, hallelujah!" In this triumphant manner he expired, in the twenty-second year of his age.

7802. DEATH, Heathen View of. Sophocles, the most renowned of the Grecian poets, almost equally distinguished as dramatist, statesman, and philosopher, closed a career of eighty years, which the world has called brilliant, five centuries before the birth of our Saviour. But unenlightened by Christianity, there was no happy paradise of God opening before him. As he sank into the rayless grave he left behind him the following pathetic testimony:

Man's happiest lot is not to be;

And when we tread life's thorny steep,

Most blest are they who, earliest free,

Descend to death's eternal sleep.

J. S. C. Abbott.

7803. DEATH, Honorable. When Pelopidas, as the result of his valor in marching against the enemy of his city, was slain, those who were engaged in the contest with him would not put off their armor, unbridle their horses, or bind up their wounds until they had piled round his body the spoils of their enemy, and in token of the genuineness of their grief cut off the manes of their horses and the hair of their own heads. Throughout the camp there prevailed a melancholy silence, as though they had been defeated instead of being victorious. This was indeed to die with honor. So dies the Christian warrior, who has gathered around him a band of valiant men and inspired them with his own holy courage. None weep so sincerely over his grave as those who have been associated with him in conflict and in triumph.

7804. DEATH, Hopeless. "I have nothing to expect, sir, but condemnation; nothing to expect but condemnation." The speaker articulated with difficulty. He was a large man, massive of feature and muscular of limb. The awful pallor of the face was increased by the masses of thick black hair, that lay in confusion about the pillow, brushed off from the dead whiteness of his forehead. Struck down suddenly from full, hearty life to the bed of death, he made there and then an agonizing confession, such as racks the ear of the listener at unhappy death-beds. A meek woman sat near the nurse, who was striving quietly to alleviate the suffering he endured. "Oh, don't talk to me of pain!" he cried bitterly. "It is the mind, woman—the mind;" and agony overclouded his face. He continued slowly and deliberately: "There is a demon whispering in my ear for ever, 'You knew it at the time, and at every time; you knew it.' Knew what? Why, that a penalty must follow a broken law. Mark me—I have not opened a Bible for years—I have not entered a church; yet the very recollection that my mother taught me to pray (and she died when I was only six), has passed judgment upon all my sins. I have done wrong, knowing it was wrong, first with a few qualms, then brushing aside conscience, and at last with the coolness of a fiend. Sir, in one minute of all my life I have not lived for heaven; no, not one minute." "But Christ died for sinners, even the worst." "Oh, yes; Christ died for sinners; but my intellect is clear, sir; clearer than ever before. I tell you"—his voice sharpened, almost whistled, it was so shrill and concentrated—"I can see almost into eternity. I can feel that unless Christ is desired, sought after, longed for—that unless guilt is repented of, his death can do no good. Do I not repent? I am only savage at myself to think—to think, sir!" he lifted his right hand impressively, "that I have so cursed myself. Is that repentance? Do not try to console me; save your sympathy for those who will bear it, for I cannot. Thank you, nurse;" this as she wiped his brow, and moistened his parched lips. "I am not dead to kindness, if I am to hope. I thank you, sir, for your Christian offices, though they do me no good. If we sow thorns, you know, we cannot reap flowers; and corn will not grow from the seed of thistles. Heaven was made for the holy; 'without, are dogs, whoremongers, and adulterers.' There's a distinction; it's all right." After that, till eleven o'clock, his mind wandered: then he slept a few moments. Presently, roused by the striking of the clock, he looked around dreamily, and caught the eye of the nurse, and of his friend. "It's awful dark here," he whispered: "My feet stand on the slippery edge of a great gulf. Oh, for some foundation!" He stretched his hand out as if feeling for the way. "Christ is the only help—I am the way, the truth, and the life," whispered the man of God. "Not for me!" and pen cannot describe the immeasurable woe in that answer. "I shall fall—I am falling!" he half shrieked in an instant after; he shuddered and all was over.

Am. Messenger.

7805. DEATH, Horrible. "I once attended on his dying bed," says the author of "Damascus," "a man whose early history had given promise of better things, but whose goodness was as the morning cloud and the early dew. As I entered the room, he fixed his eyes upon me with a fearful expression of countenance, and in the spirit, almost in the very language, of the Gadarene demoniac, exclaimed, 'Why are you come to torment me?' I replied, 'I am not come to torment you: I am come to tell you that there is mercy, mercy yet, and mercy even for you.' He raised his arm with vehemence, and said, 'No mercy for me! no mercy for me! no mercy for me! I have sinned through all: I have despised all. I am dying, and I am damned!' His arm fell, and he apparently ceased to breathe. I thought him dead, but was mistaken: there still was life, there was even consciousness. Fetching a long-drawn breath, as if for some desperate effort, and covering his face with the evident intention of concealing the agony which was written there, he uttered the most awful groan I ever heard, and then expired."

7806. DEATH, Humility in. Vincent de Paul died in Paris 1660, aged eighty-five. He was lowly born, a cowherd's son, but attained to great honor and usefulness as a preacher, and as an organizer of charitable institutions. The sisters of charity were first organized by him to care for the sick and the orphaned in his hospitals. His good works were numerous and his praise was on the lips of all. Near the close of his long and truly noble life, he was compelled to ride about in a carriage, which was then regarded as the privilege of the noble and wealthy only. He mourned the necessity and exclaimed, "I, a poor cowherd's son, to ride like a prince!" When near death he said, "One of these days the body of this old sinner will be laid in the dust, and be trodden under foot. Alas! my Lord! my sins multiply on me, and I never seem to amend." At last the stupor of the last sleep came upon him, but if the name of Jesus was whispered in his ear he gave signs of consciousness and pleasure.

7807. DEATH, Ignorance of the Time of. From the notion which some held of St. Columba, that he was able to foretell future events, a man asked him one day how long he had to live. "If your curiosity on that head could be satisfied," said the saint, "it could be of no use to you. But it is only God, who appoints the days of man, that knows when they are to terminate. Our business is to do our duty, not to pry into our destiny. God in mercy hath concealed from man the knowledge of his end. If he knew it was near, he would be disqualified for the duties of life; and if he knew it were distant, he would delay his preparation. You should, therefore, be satisfied with knowing that it is certain; and the safest way is to believe that it may be also near, and to make no delay in getting ready, lest it overtake you unprepared."

7808. DEATH, Individual. One may live as a conqueror, or a king, or a magistrate, but he must die a man. The bed of death brings every human being to his pure individuality, to the intense contemplation of that deepest and most solemn of all relations, the relation between the creature and his Creator.

Webster.

7809. DEATH, Inevitable. A California stage-driver, after having been engaged in that business for many years, was dying in San Francisco, and in his last moment he put his foot out of the bed and swung it back and forth. Some one said to him: "Why do you make that motion with your foot?" He replied: "I am on the down grade, and I cannot get my foot on the brake." When our last moment comes, we cannot stop. Our going will be inevitable, and we shall not be able to get our foot on the brake.

7810. DEATH, Influence of. A devoted Christian mother had a reckless son. She spared no effort to reclaim him from the habits of drunkenness and debauch into which he had fallen, but all was vain. Her prayers to God to rescue her imperiled boy were incessant. At last she sank, heart-broken, into an untimely grave. The son came to look upon the face of his dead mother. His heart was rent as he thought of the ruin he had wrought. He charged himself with his mother's death, and cried out in agony, "Mother, what your life could not accomplish your death shall." That son is now a minister of the gospel.

7811. DEATH, Instantaneous. Jerome Cardan relates that eight reapers, who were eating their dinner under an oak-tree, were all struck by the same flash of lightning, the explosion of which was heard far away. When some people passing by approached to see what had happened, they found the reapers to all appearance continuing their repast; one still held his glass in his hand, another was in the act of putting a piece of bread in his mouth, a third had his hand in the dish. Death had come upon them suddenly whilst in these positions, when the thunderbolt fell. Azrael had seized upon them with so much violence that he had impressed upon the entire surface of their bodies the mournful tint of his black wings. One might have taken them for statues sculptured out of black marble! The catastrophe was so rapid that the faces of the victims had not had time to take any expression of pain; life was suppressed so instantaneously that the muscles remained unmoved. The eyes and the mouths were open, as in life; and had not the color of the skin been so much changed the illusion would have been complete.

7812. DEATH, Joy at. Mrs. Rowe, when her acquaintance expressed to her the joy they felt at seeing her look so well, and possessed so much health as promised many years to come, was wont to reply, "that it was the same as telling a slave his fetters were like to be lasting, or complimenting him on the strength of the walls of his dungeon." Dr. Maclaine was fifty years minister of the English church at the Hague; but by the revolution in Holland in 1796, he took refuge in this country, where he died in peace and comfort. When informed that his disorder must be fatal, he replied, "You remember Socrates, the wisest and best of heathens, in this state could only express a hope mingled with anxiety and doubt; but, blessed be God, though a grievous sinner, in retiring to that bed from which I shall rise no more, I know in whom I have believed. Death cannot separate me from the love of Christ, and in him to die is gain." If a heathen philosopher rejoiced that he should die because he believed he should see Homer, Hesiod, and other eminent persons, how much more do I rejoice, said a pious old minister, who am sure to see Christ my Saviour, besides so many wise, holy, and renowned patriarchs, prophets and apostles. Buck.

7813. DEATH, Joy in. A dying Hottentot girl, who had been instructed by the missionaries, emphasized her experience by repetition after the fashion of her tribe, "Jesus receiveth sinners, sinners, sinners! joy, joy, joy!"

7814. DEATH, Joyous. A soldier dying on a battlefield, while the blood was spurring from his wounds, thus addressed his Christian comrade: "Ah! comrade, the joys of my soul are greater than all the pains of my body; yes, indeed, Christ is precious, and I now prove that, having loved his own, he loveth them to the very end. Adieu, comrade, I am now going to be with Jesus;" and then waving his hand, and gazing around him, he cried out with a peculiar tone of voice, "Farewell, marches and trenches; farewell, fatigue-parties, and midnight revelings of drunken comrades; farewell, fields of battle, and blood, and slaughter; and farewell sun, and moon, and stars, and—" He paused, almost exhausted with his feelings, but soon said, "Farewell, beloved comrade in Christ Jesus; meet me in glory, for oh, in a few minutes more, my soul must depart, and then, yes,

"Then I'll march up the heavenly street,
And ground my arms at Jesus' feet!"

He sank in death, and his soul sped on its expected march up the heavenly street.

7815. DEATH, Kneeling in. Alexander Cruden, well known as the author of that invaluable help to Bible study, the Concordance, was very poor. What little profit came from his book he gave away. When about seventy years of age he was found at his humble lodgings, kneeling by his chair, his Bible open before him, his face calm and peaceful, but his spirit gone to God. David Livingstone, the great explorer, when very ill of his last sickness, was left for a little time alone in his tent. Upon the return of his men he was found upon his knees. They paused a moment, but he moved not; then they entered, and touched him, but he was dead. A medical student in New York was recently missing at the breakfast table. He was sought in his room, and was found, the bed undisturbed, but he kneeling at its side, cold in death. Ch. Press.

7816. DEATH, Knell of. I don't believe there is a man or woman that ever lived who is not afraid of death unless they knew that Jesus Christ would overcome death. Before I knew the son of God as my Saviour death was a terrible enemy to me. Now up in that little New England village where I came from, in that little village it was the custom to toll out the bell whenever any one died, and to toll one stroke for every year. Sometimes they would toll out seventy strokes for a man of 70, or forty strokes for a man of 40. I used to think when they died at 70, and sometimes 80, well, that is a good ways off. But sometimes it would be a child at my age, and then it used to be very solemn. Sometimes I could not bear to sleep in a room alone. Death used to trouble me, but, thanks to God, it don't trouble me now. If he should send his messenger and the messenger should come up here on this platform and say to me, "Mr. Moody, your hour is come, I have got to take you away," it would be joyful news for me; for though I should be absent from the body, I should be present with the Lord. Through the world I can shout, "O death, where is thy sting?" Moody.

7817. DEATH of Knox. Step into this room, where the greatest Scotchman lies a-dying, and see an example more striking, warning, alarming still. From the iron grasp of kings and princes, John Knox has wrung the rights of Scotland. Ready to contend even unto the death, he had bearded proud nobles, and yet prouder churchmen; he had stood under the fire of battle; he had been chained to the galley's oar; he had held the pulpit with a papist's carbine leveled at his fearless head; to plant God's truth, and that tree of civil and religious liberty which has struck its roots deep into our soil, and under whose broad shadow we are this day sitting, he had fought many a hard-won battle; but his hardest of all was fought in the darkness of the night and amid the solitude of a dying chamber. One morning his friends enter his apartment. They find him faint, pallid, wearing the look of one who has passed a troubled night. So he had. He had been fighting, not sleeping; wrestling, not resting; and it required all God's grace to bring him off a conqueror. Till daybreak, Jacob wrestled with the Angel of the Covenant; but Knox had passed that long night wrestling with the Prince of Darkness. Like Bunyan's pilgrim, he had encountered Apollyon in the valley, and their swords struck fire within the shadow of death. Into that room the enemy had come. He stands by the dying man's side. He reminds him that he had been a standard bearer of the truth, a reformer, the most thorough of all the reformers; a bold confessor; a distinguished sufferer; the very foremost man of his time and country; and so attempts to persuade him, that surely such rare merits deserve the crown. The Christian conquered; but hard put to it, only conquered through him that loved him. His shield was the truth of my text. He had been lost, wrecked at the mouth of the very harbor, had he lost sight of this beacon, "I do not this for your sake, but for mine holy name's sake." Dr. Guthrie.

7818. DEATH, Lamenting. A gigantic Spartan soldier was wounded in battle by an arrow. He was ambitious to do much execution against the enemy, and chagrined that he was compelled to die before he had drawn his sword. The young Christian soldier has no need of regrets when called to lay down his armor, however bright. He is called to be a member of the staff of Christ in heaven.

7819. DEATH, Land of. Owen, on his dying bed, dictated a short letter to a friend. The amanuensis had written, "I am yet in the land of the living," when Owen at once arrested him. "Stop, alter that; write 'I am yet in the land of the dying, but I hope soon to be in the land of the living.'"

7820. DEATH, Legend of. The following is from the sacred books of the Buddhists: Among the immediate followers of Buddha was a young girl named Koshagautami. She was a simple, artless, creature, married to an Indian youth like herself; and the pair dwelt together in a woodland country near the city of the famous Oriental teacher. They had a little child, of which Koshagautami was passionately fond, as is the wont of Eastern mothers. But it happened that the little one sickened and died, much to the astonishment of the young and ignorant parents, who had been brought up in a life so solitary that they knew nothing whatever about death. The mother was especially grieved to find that her child looked so still and pale, and felt so cold, although she pressed it constantly to her bosom, and tempted it with delicate food. She rocked and shook it to make it speak once more—she would have been glad to hear it cry, although in pain; for the silence and deadly heaviness of the little body filled her with a vague misery. She went about the woods with the baby upon her hip, as Indian women always carry their children, asking everybody whom she met to tell her what would be good for the baby, and why it was so quiet and so chill. The people whom she met looked very strangely at the tiny corpse, and shook their heads, saying that no medicine would do it good any more. This disappointed the mother so much, that she determined to seek out Buddha and to ask him, who was never at a loss, for something that would bring back the warmth and laughter to the small cheeks. The Master was seated under a banyan tree with his disciples, and, when the young mother came near with the child, beseeching him to say if he knew what would make it well again, he looked at her weeping countenance with great pity, and answered that he did. "Go," he said, "and bring me hither a handful of mustard-seed from a house where nobody has ever died, and then I will heal your son." Koshagautami repaired to the town with the child; and asked at the first house for a little mustard-seed; which was readily given, because of her gentle and sorrowful look. "Friend," said she to the Goodman, "did ever any die in this household?—for then the seed would not do." The housekeeper shook his head mournfully, and replied that his eldest son had died there during the last moon. She went to the next residence, and to the next, and so on right through the town; but, to her surprise, she found that into every house had entered the same disease of which her little one was sick—even DEATH. Ashamed to have been so passionate and importunate, when all the rest of the world suffered and submitted, she dared not take the child back to Buddha, but buried it tenderly in the forest, under the shade of an asoka-tree, and then returned to the spot where the Master was still teaching. "There was no one," she moaned, "who had mustard-seed to give me, of the kind you bade me bring." "No, Koshagautami; it does not grow in this world of pain and illusion! The living are very few; the dead are very many, my daughter!"

7821. DEATH, Liberty by. Rev. Wm. Jenkyn, one of the ejected Ministers in England, being imprisoned in Newgate, presented a petition to King Charles II. for a release, which was backed by an assurance from his physician, that his life was in danger from his close imprisonment. The answer returned was, "Jenkyn shall be a prisoner as long as he lives." A nobleman having sometime after heard of his death, said to the King, "May it please your Majesty, Jenkyn has got his liberty." Upon which he asked, with eagerness, "Ay! who gave it him?" The nobleman replied, "A greater than your Majesty—the King of kings."

7822. DEATH, Light at. A lady, while she was full of life, shrank from the thought of the night with dismay, because she could not see beyond it the dawn of the morning. When the end was near, her brother told me, she was the sunniest spirit in the house. She would talk of her going as of a dim passage into another room, of those who were waiting to see her, and of those she should wait to see, and so she passed away. Now what makes this difference between the living and the dying? Just this, as I look at it: that we have all been interpreting Paul's great word, "Death is swallowed up in victory," as if it read, Life is swallowed up in victory. We have wanted in this, as in so many other ways, to push the hands forward and bring in the revelation before it is ripe; to bear the image of the earthly and the heavenly together, and put on immortality while we are cabled about and almost lost in the mortal. "When will the Minot light strike out?" I inquired this summer when we were down at the sea; "The moment the sun goes down," my friend said, "now let us watch." We were standing on high land watching the long shadows steal over the waters, and so it was that the moment the sun went down the light flashed out, and came out clearer as the shadows deepened, until it seemed to brood over the bay like a benediction. But here is our trouble. We want to see the light on the forelands of heaven, in the glare of high noon, and are dismayed because it is not there. Then we stand beside our dying when their sun goes down, and lo! as we watch them they tell us of the light we can not see, making the dark waters radiant, and filling them with a great peace and sense of the impending morning and the home.

Robert Collyer

7823. DEATH of Little Nell. She was dead. There, upon her little bed, she lay at rest. The solemn stillness was no marvel now. She was dead. No sleep so beautiful and calm, so free from trace of pain, so fair to look upon. She seemed a creature fresh from the hand of God, and waiting for the breath of life; not one who had lived and suffered death. Her couch was dressed with here and there some winter berries and green leaves, gathered in a spot she had been used to favor. "When I die, put near me something that has loved the light, and had the sky above it always." She was dead. Dear, gentle, patient, noble Nell, was dead. Her little bird—a poor slight thing the pressure of a finger would have crushed—was stirring nimbly in its cage; and the strong heart of its child-mistress was mute and motionless for ever. Where were the traces of her early cares, her sufferings, and fatigues? All gone. Sorrow was dead indeed in her, but peace and perfect happiness were born; imaged in her tranquil beauty and profound repose. And still her former self lay there, unaltered in this change. Yes. The old fireside had smiled upon that same sweet face: it had passed, like a dream, through haunts of misery and care; at the door of the poor school-master on the summer evening, before the furnace-fire upon the cold wet night, at the still bedside of the dying boy, there had been the same mild, lovely look. So shall we know the angels in their majesty, after death. Dickens.

7824. DEATH of Little Paul. "Now lay me down," he said; "and Floy, come close to me, and let me see you!" Sister and brother wound their arms around each other, and the golden light came streaming in, and fell upon them, locked together. "How fast the river runs between its green banks and the rushes, Floy! But it's very near the sea. I hear the waves! They always said so!" Presently he told her that the motion of the boat upon the stream was lulling him to rest. How green the banks were now, how bright the flowers growing on them, and how tall the rushes! Now the boat was out at sea, but gliding smoothly on. And now there was a shore before him. Who stood on the bank? He put his hands together, as he had been used to do, at his prayers. He did not remove his arms to do it; but they saw him fold them so, behind her neck. "Mamma is like you, Floy. I know her by the face! But tell them that the print upon the stairs at school is not divine enough. The light about the head is shining on me as I go!" The golden ripple on the wall came back again, and nothing else stirred in the room. The old, old fashion! The fashion that came in with our first garments, and will last unchanged until our race has run its course, and the wide firmament is rolled up like a scroll. The old, old fashion—Death! Oh thank God, all who see it, for that older fashion yet, of immortality! And look upon us, angels of young children, with regards not quite estranged, when the swift river bears us to the ocean! Dickens.

7825. DEATH, Longing for. Why may not I as passionately wish to see an end of life, as a slave in a hot day gasps for the refreshment of the shade; or as the laborer longs for the evening, when he may rest, and be paid for his pains.

Bishop Patrick.

7826. DEATH, Looking to Christ in. "I am going to him," said Dr. Owen, "whom my soul loved, or rather who has loved me with an everlasting love, which is the sole ground of all my consolation." When Mr. Payne said to him, "I have just been putting your book, on 'The Glory of Christ,' to the press," he answered, "I am glad to hear it; but, oh! brother Payne, the long looked-for day is come at last, in which I shall see that glory in another manner than I have ever done yet, or was capable of doing in this world." What a death was that, which was only a going forth to meet one whom the soul loved! "I desire to depart and to be with Christ, which is far better," said the Rev. John Brown, of Haddington; "and though I have lived sixty years very comfortably in the world, yet I would turn my back upon you all to be with Christ. Oh, commend Jesus! there is none like Christ, none like Christ! I have been looking at him these many years, and never yet could find a fault in him, but was of my own making, though he has seen ten thousand faults in me. Many a comely person have I seen, but none so comely as Christ. I am weak, but it is delightful to feel one's self in the everlasting arms. Oh! what must he be in himself, when it is he that sweetens heaven, sweetens scriptures, sweetens ordinances, sweetens earth, sweetens trial?" And when Rowland Hill was dying, all his thoughts were centered on beholding the person of his Lord, and being where he was. "I do believe," said the dying man, "that for the first ten thousand years after we enter the kingdom of glory it will be all surprise." "But will this surprise never end?" "Never, while we behold the person of our Lord." "You are going to be with Jesus, and to see him as he is," said a friend. "Yes!" replied Mr. Hill with emphasis, "and I shall be like him: that is the crowning point."

Power.

7827. DEATH, The Lot of All. Death is a mighty leveler. He spares none, he waits for none, and stands on no ceremony. He will not tarry till you are ready. He will not be kept out by moats, and doors, and bars, and bolts. The Englishman boasts that his home is his castle; but with all his boasting, he cannot exclude death. An Austrian nobleman forbade death and the small-pox to be named in his presence. But, named or not named, it matters little, in God's appointed hour death will come. One man rolls easily along the road in the easiest and handsomest carriage that money can procure. Another toils wearily along the path on foot. Yet both are sure to meet at last in the same home. One man like Absalom, has fifty servants to wait upon him and to do his bidding. Another has none to lift a finger to do him a service. But both are traveling to a place where they must lie down alone. One man is the owner of hundreds of thousands.

Another has scarce a shilling that he can call his own property. Yet neither one nor the other can carry one farthing with him into the unseen world. One man is the possessor of half a country. Another has not so much as a garden of herbs. And yet two paces of the vilest earth will be amply sufficient for either of them at the last. One man pampers his body with every possible delicacy, and clothes it in the richest and softest apparel. Another has scarcely enough to eat, and seldom enough to put on. Yet both alike are hurrying on to a day when "ashes to ashes, dust to dust," shall be proclaimed over them, and fifty years hence none shall be able to say, "This was the rich man's bone and this was the bone of the poor."

Ryle.

7828. DEATH, Marks of. The change of countenance which sometimes precedes death was observed in Mr. George Moir, and was reported to him by his wife. He called for a mirror and could but notice his own changed appearance. He exclaimed, "Death has set his mark on my body, but Christ has set his mark upon my soul."

7829. DEATH, Meditating on. Robert Boyle returning from Rotterdam to Gravesend by ship was chased by a vessel supposed to be a pirate. He took a glass and looked at it. From it he drew the following lesson: "This glass does, indeed, cause the distrustful vessel to approach; but it causes her to approach only to our eyes, not to our ship. If she be not making up to us, this harmless instrument will prove no load-stone to draw her towards us: and if she be, it will put us in better readiness to receive her. Such an instrument, in relation to death, is the meditation of it, by mortals so much and so causelessly abhorred. For though most men studiously shun all thoughts of death, as if, like a nice acquaintance, he would forbear to visit where he knows he is never thought of; or as if we would exempt ourselves from being mortal, by forgetting that we are so; yet meditation on this subject brings the awful reality nearer to our view, without at all lessening the real distance betwixt us and death. If our last enemy be not approaching us, this innocent meditation will no more quicken his pace than direct his steps; and if he be, it will, without hastening his arrival, prepare us for his reception."

7830. DEATH, Melancthon's. Melancthon's mind was clear to the last, and the passion of expounding Scripture was strong upon him. He was very tender, and spoke to each—even to the little children. His consolation was "Christ is made unto us wisdom, righteousness, sanctification, and redemption." Having done all possible for his comfort, his son-in-law asked if he would have anything else. "Alind nihil, nisi cælum."—Nothing else but heaven, he answered. He fell into quiet and rested forever from his labors.

7831. DEATH, Mental Enlargement in. The ancients noticed increased powers of mind in dying people. Plutarch says, "It is not probable that in death the soul gains new powers which it was not before possessed of, when the mind was confined in the chains of the body; but it is much more probable that these powers were always in being, though dimmed and clogged by the body; and the soul is only then able to practice them when the corporeal bonds are loosened, and the drooping limbs and stagnant juices no longer oppress it."

7832. DEATH, Mindful of. When Bernard Gilpin was privately informed that his enemies had caused thirty-two articles to be drawn up against him in the strongest manner, and presented to Bonner, bishop of London, he said to his favorite domestic, "At length they have prevailed against me. I am accused to the bishop of London, from whom there will be no escaping. God forgive their malice, and grant me strength to undergo the trial." He then ordered his servant to provide a long garment for him, in which he might go decently to the stake, and desired it might be got ready with all expedition. "For I know not," says he, "how soon I may have occasion for it." As soon as this garment was provided, it is said, he used to put it on every day, till the bishop's messengers apprehended him. It were well if we all thus realized to ourselves the hour of our departure. We ought by anticipation to sleep in our shrouds, and go to bed in our sepulchres. To put on our cerements now is wisdom.

Spurgeon.

7833. DEATH, Mountains of. A mother thought her little sick boy was safe in the arms of Jesus. She thought he was trusting sweetly in Christ; but one day, as he drew towards the chambers of death, she came into his room, and he said, as she was looking out of the window, "Mother, what are those mountains that I see yonder?" The mother said, "Eddie, there is no mountain in sight of the house." "Don't you see them, mother?" said he; "they're so high and so dark. Eddie has got to cross those mountains. Won't you take him in your arms and carry him over those mountains?" The mother said, "Eddie, I would if I could, but I cannot." The mother then said, "Eddie, you must take your eyes off your mother. You must have your eyes upon Jesus. He will help you." The mother again prayed with him, and tried to get his little mind off from the dark mountain. All at once he said, "Mother, hark! don't you hear them call?" "Hear who, Eddie?" "Don't you see the angels just on the other side of the mountain? They are calling for me. Take me, mother, and carry me over the mountain." The mother said again, "Why, my boy, I cannot go with you; but Christ will be with you. He will take you safe over the mountains, if you trust him." Again the mother prayed for her little boy, for she could not bear to have him die in that state of mind, so troubled about the mountain. At length he closed his eyes, and he prayed, "Lord Jesus, be with me, and take me over the mountains." Then he opened his little eyes, and said, "Good-bye, mamma; Jesus is coming to carry me over the mountains;" and the little sufferer was gone. Sinner, Christ has come to-night to carry you over the mountains.

7834. DEATH, No Delaying. A physician was called to attend a woman who had been stabbed in a drunken brawl. When he came she exclaimed, "Doctor, can I live?" He examined the wound, and pronounced it mortal. "O doctor," she said, "do save my life for a month, that I may pray to God to pardon my sins!" "I never deceive my patients," he replied, "and I would not for the world deceive you. My opinion is, that you cannot live an hour." "O, for half an hour then, doctor! half an hour! half an hour!" She breathed her last uttering this cry.

7835. DEATH, No Escape from. In reading the epitaphs, and surveying the monuments of others, we should reflect on our own mortality. And not only reflect, but also prepare for the last scene, so that when it arrives we may meet it without dismay. The ancient Egyptians are said to have placed a skull upon the table at their most splendid banquets, in order to remind the guests of their mortality. Socrates disregarded the intercession of his friends, and when it was in his power to make his escape out of prison, he refused, and asked with his usual pleasantry, where he could escape death. "Where," says he to Crito, who had bribed the gaoler, and made his escape certain, "Where shall I fly to avoid this irrevocable doom passed on all mankind?" Reader, remember this, whatever you escape, where will you go to avoid death? How necessary, then, to seek the favor of him who alone can support in that moment, and grace alone can prepare for the awful event.

7836. DEATH Not Desired. Burekhardt relates, that when the plague visited Medina the Mohammedans, strict predestinarians, fled to the desert, excusing their conduct by saying that although the disease was a messenger sent to call them to heaven, yet they felt their own unworthiness to be so great that they thought it advisable to decline this special favor at present and leave the town. Men call for death, but when it comes it is usually unwelcome.

7837. DEATH, Not Ready for. A minister said to an emaciated soldier in hospital, "How are you to-day, my soldier friend?" "Poorly, sir; very poorly; a few days more, only a few." "You are all ready, I trust?" "I am going—there is no help for it; if you call that ready, I am ready." "I mean are you prepared to die? Is this exchange of worlds going to be pleasant to you?" "Pleasant! It is awful, sir; horrible beyond all account! But I have got to come to it!" The minister spoke to him of the offer of mercy through Christ. He replied, "I know it all, have heard it a thousand times, but it is not for me now." The minister urged him to come to Christ at once, and said it was a pity he had not done so before. "Pity! It's my ruin, sir. I cannot come. I will not. You come a little too late! It's getting dark now." Unconsciousness was fast settling upon him. In this attitude of despair he passed into eternity. "No, no—a boy again, a boy again," were his last words. His boyhood, innocent and full of good opportunities, was lost, and would not return at his call. The thought filled his soul with agony.

7838. DEATH, Occupation and. When the sensibility to outward impressions is lost or considered, and the mind is delirious, the dying dream of their habitual occupations, and construct an imaginary present from the past. Dr. Armstrong departed delivering medical precepts. Napoleon fought some battles o'er again, and the last words he muttered were tête d'armée. Lord Tenderden, who passed straight from the judgment-seat to his death-bed, fancied himself still presiding at a trial, and expired with, "Gentlemen of the jury, you will now consider of your verdict." Dr. Adam, the author of the "Roman Antiquities," imagined himself in school, distributing praise and censure among his pupils: "But it grows dark," he said; "the boys may dismiss;" and instantly died. The physician, soldier, judge, schoolmaster, each had their thoughts on their several professions, and believed themselves engaged in the business of life when life itself was issuing out through their lips. Fontenelle.

7839. DEATH, Paine's. Before his death, Thomas Paine seems to have feared that some influence would be brought to bear upon him by which he should be lead to renounce the atheistic views advanced in his "Age of Reason." He then called upon Mr. Jarvis, a man of the same opinions, to witness, saying, "Now I am in health, and in perfect soundness of mind, is the time to express my opinion." He then solemnly affirmed his belief in the truth of his books. The reports of his friends put him in the most hostile attitude towards Christianity. Rev. Mr. Milledollar, a Presbyterian, and Rev. Mr. Cunningham called upon him as neighbors, and the latter warned him, "You have now a full view of death; you cannot live long, and whosoever does not believe in Christ will certainly be damned." Mr. Paine replied, "Let me have none of your popish stuff! Get away with you! Good morning!" He would hear nothing from Mr. Milledollar. When they had gone, he ordered his housekeeper, "Don't let 'em come here again; they trouble me." A Methodist minister gained admission to his sick-room, and warned him of the necessity of repentance. Mr. Paine was very angry, and sick as he was, rose up in his bed and declared if he was able, he would put him out of his room. An old disciple of Mr. Paine's called upon him, and narrated his conversion to Christianity. He was abruptly and angrily dismissed. His associates clustered about him constantly, asking him if he had any doubts on the subject of his teachings, and he as constantly affirming that he had none. His last words were, in answer to the question of Dr. Manly, his physician, "Do you wish to believe that Jesus is the Son of God?" He answered, "I have no wish to believe on that subject." Thus passed from earth Thomas Paine, an irascible, penurious, and unhappy old man. See vol. i., 1374.

7840. DEATH, Parting at. A minister called upon another, then upon his dying bed. As they shook hands at parting, the latter said, "Brother, we part at the footstool, we shall meet at the throne."

7841. DEATH, Patriotic. Rev. J. H. Knowles was called to see a wounded soldier. He had been brought in on a stretcher, and placed under the shade of a green tree. He was shot through the mouth; his tongue was cut, and he could not speak. As the chaplain approached him he made signs for pencil and paper, and wrote, "I am a Christian, prepared to die;" then looking around upon the soldiers near, he added another line, "Rally round the flag, boys, rally round the flag." Mr. Knowles took the paper, and read it aloud to his comrades. As he read, the dying man, speaking only with his animated face, raised his bloody hand over his head, and waved it as Marmion shook his sword, with all the enthusiasm of the charge; and then quietly, while every eye brimmed with tears, went away out of the midst of the company into the City of Peace.

7842. DEATH, Pause Before. A commander of Charles V. of Spain, requested a discharge from public service. The king required a reason. The officer replied, "There ought to be a pause between the tumult of life and the day of death."

7843. DEATH, Peaceful. Remember the happy, peaceful death of the righteous man can only be obtained or hoped for by those who have lived the life of the righteous. Remember that every guilty compliance with the humors of the world, every sinful indulgence of our own passions, is laying up cares and fears for the hour of darkness, and that the remembrance of ill-spent time will strew our sick bed with thorns and rack our sinking spirits with despair.

Heber.

7844. DEATH, Peace in. Pastor Emille Cook, in returning to France from the Evangelical Alliance of 1873, suffered shipwreck. He was picked up and carried to the Loch Earn in a fainting state, almost naked, and suffering with cold. The Loch Earn was slowly sinking, but while others were taken off, he remained for six days to care for a wounded friend and encourage the crew. All were rescued from the sinking vessel, but excitement brought on a violent fever and nervous prostration. His hope was to live, to work for his native land, but God ordered otherwise. His physical struggles were great, and the last day of his life was one of intense agony. The last hour came. He made sign to have the Bible read. A friend read the sixth psalm. "Admirable! admirable!" said he. His wife told him "God will help you, my dear; he will give you his peace." He replied in almost a reproachful tone, "But I have it—peace; I have it." Then he fell into a half sleep. He uttered three sighs, and all was over.

7845. DEATH, Personification of. The personification of death in the act of executing the Divine commands is variously represented by different nations. The meanest is the common monkish one of a skeleton with dart and hour glass; while one of the most terrible is that of the Scandinavian poets, who represent him as mounted on horse-back, riding with inconceivable rapidity in pursuit of his prey, meagre and wan, and the horse possessing the same character as his rider. Yet this passage from the Apocalypse is in sublimity and terror superior to the most energetic specimens of Runic poetry: "And I looked, and behold a pale horse: and his name that sat on him was Death, and hell followed with him. And power was given unto them over the fourth part of the earth, to kill with sword, and with hunger, and with death, and with the beasts of the earth." The word translated "pale" is peculiarly expressive in the original; it might be more adequately rendered "ghastly," meaning that wan and exanimate hue exhibited in certain diseases.

7846. DEATH, Physical. Death does not strike all the organs of the body at the same time. Some may be said to survive others, and the lungs are among the last to give up the performance of their function and die. As death approaches, they become gradually more and more oppressed, the air-cells are loaded with an increased quantity of the fluid which naturally lubricates their surfaces; the atmosphere can now no longer come in contact with the minute blood-vessels spread over the air-cells, without first permeating this viscid fluid; hence the rattle. Nor is the contact sufficiently perfect to change the black venous into the red arterial blood. An unprepared fluid consequently issues from the lungs into the heart, and is thence transmitted to every other organ of the body. The brain receives it, and its energies appear to be lulled thereby into sleep—generally tranquil sleep, filled with dreams which impel the dying lip to murmur out the names of friends and the occupations and recollections of a past life; the peasant "babbles o' green fields;" and Napoleon expires amid visions of battle.

Sir H. Halford

7847. DEATH, Picture of. The hour of death may be fitly likened to that celebrated picture in the National Gallery, of Perseus holding up the head of Medusa. That head turned all persons into stone who looked upon it. There is a warrior represented with a dart in his hand; he stands stiffened, turned into stone, with the javelin even in his fist. There is another with a poignard beneath his robe, about to stab; he is now the statue of an assassin, motionless and cold. Another is creeping along stealthily, like a man in ambuscade, and there he stands a consolidated rock; he has looked only upon that head, and he is frozen into stone. Such is death. What I am when death is held before me, that I must be forever. When my spirit departs, if God finds me hymning his praise, I shall hymn it in heaven; if he finds me breathing out oaths, I shall follow up those oaths in hell.

Spurgeon.

7848. DEATH, Power of Habit in. An hour before Malherbe's death, says Bayle, after he had been two hours in an agony, he awakened on a sudden to reprove his landlady, who waited upon him, for using a word that was not good French; and when his confessor reprimanded him for it he told him he could not help it, and that he would defend the purity of the French language until death. When his confessor painted the joys of paradise with extraordinary eloquence, and asked him if he did not feel a vehement desire to enjoy such bliss, Malherbe, who had been more attentive to the holy man's manner than to his matter, captiously replied, "Speak no more of it; your bad style disgusts me." He was critical to the last gasp. Poor Sheridan, like Rabelais, in the midst of all his miseries preserved his pleasantry, and his perception of the ridiculous almost as long as life lasted. When lying on his death-bed, the solicitor, a gentleman who had been much favored in wills, waited on him; after the general legatee had left the room another friend came in, to whom the author of the "School for Scandal" said, "My friends have been very kind in calling upon me and offering their services in their respective ways; Dick W. has been here with his will-making face." Physic and Physicians.

7849. DEATH, Premonition of. The first symptom of approaching death with some is the strong presentiment that they are about to die. Ozanam, the mathematician, while in apparent health, rejected pupils, from the feeling that he was on the eve of resting from his labors; and he expired soon after, of an apoplectic stroke. Foote, prior to his departure for the continent, stood contemplating the picture of a brother author, and exclaimed, his eyes full of tears, "Poor Weston!" In the same dejected tone he added, after a pause: "Soon others shall say, 'Poor Foote!'" and, to the surprise of his friends, a few days proved the justice of his prognostication. The expectation of the event had a share in producing it; for a slight shock completes the destruction of prostrate energies. The case of Wolsey was singular. The morning before he died he asked Cavendish the hour, and was answered "Past eight." "Eight of the clock!" replied Wolsey, "that cannot be; eight of the clock, nay, nay, it cannot be eight of the clock, for by eight of the clock shall you lose your master." The day he miscalculated, the hour came true. On the following morning, as the clock struck eight, his troubled spirit passed from life. Cavendish and the bystanders thought he must have had a revelation of the time of his death; and from the way in which the fact had taken possession of his mind, we suspect that he had relied on astrological prediction, which had the credit of a revelation in his own esteem. T. Wakley.

7850. DEATH, Preparation for. Religion, indeed, is like the stone Chrysolapis, which will shine brightest in the dark of death. The truly religious may launch into the ocean of eternity, and sail to their everlasting harbor, as the Alexandrian ship came into the Roman haven, with top and top-gallant, with true comfort and undaunted courage: let death come when it will, he can bid it welcome. Death is never sudden to a saint; no guest comes unawares to him who keepeth a constant table; but as when the day dawns to us in Europe, the shadows of the evening are stretched on Asia, so the day of their redemption will be a long night of destruction to thee. That jailer who knocketh off their fetters, and setteth them at that perfect liberty, will bind thee in chains of darkness, and haul thee to the dungeon of horror, whence thou shalt never come forth.

Swinnock.

7851. DEATH, Preparing for. The Observer relates that, in a recent prayer-meeting in Fulton street, New York, a gentleman from London stated that on his passage homeward they encountered a terrible storm. The shaft of the steamship was broken, one wheel was disabled, and they expected every moment to go down. On board they had in one cabin several Catholic priests, and as many nuns, or Sisters of Charity. They had also a very pious Methodist man. In the midst of the storm the priests were about to administer extreme unction, the last rite of the church, by which all sin is supposed to be washed away. This Methodist had been with them, and to him one of the priests said,—"I feel it my duty to tell you that we are about to administer extreme unction for the cleansing away of all sin. I must tell you that you are out of the true church, and that if you die as you are, you will be lost forever—you will be damned. Will you allow me to administer to you extreme unction, and thus save your soul?" "Sir," said the Methodist, "I have been down to my state-room for some time alone, with the High Priest of my profession. I have made a full and unreserved confession of all my sins. He has pronounced absolution from all my guilt. He has administered to me extreme unction. He has assured me that he is ready to receive me. He is mighty to save, and he tells me he can save, to the uttermost, all who come unto God through him. He has prepared me for death. I know that my Redeemer liveth. I am ready to have this vessel go down. I ask you if you really believe I need any preparation at your hands?" The priest said no more.

W. Jones.

7852. DEATH, The Purifier. Under the ceremonial law, if earthen vessels were polluted, there was no way but to break them; so there is no way of purifying our sinful bodies but by breaking them by death.

Bp. Hopkins.

7853. DEATH, Putting off the Thought of. Is it not then, think you, a great folly that men are so unwilling to think of death? Questionless it is. We see the mariner with joy thinks of the haven: the laborer is glad to see the evening: the soldier is not sorry when his warfare is accomplished: and shall we be grieved when the days of sin are ended? It seemeth by this which you have said that this life of ours is very troublesome; for we are mariners, our haven is happiness: travelers, our journey is to Paradise: laborers, our hire is heaven: and soldiers, our conquest is at death. Is, then, our life both miserable and changeable? Yea.

verily, for it is compared to a pilgrimage, in which is uncertainty: a flower, in which is mutability: a smoke, in which is vanity: a house of clay, in which is misery: a weaver's shuttle, in which is volubility: a shepherd's tent, in which is variety: a ship on the sea, in which is celerity: a mariner, who sitting, standing, sleeping, or waking, ever saileth on: a shadow, which is nothing to the body: to a thought, whereof we have thousands in one day: to a dream, whereof we have millions in one night: to vanity, which is nothing in itself; and to nothing, which hath no being in the world (Psalm 39: 5). If all this be true, as it must needs be, because God hath said it, the hour of death is far better than the day of our birth.

Hill.

7854. DEATH, Question of. Rev. Dr. Kidd, was an eccentric Scotch minister of some prominence. One of his parishioners says: "I was busy in my shop, when, in the midst of my work, in stepped the doctor. 'Did you expect me?' was his abrupt inquiry, without even waiting for a salutation. 'No,' was my reply. 'What if I had been Death?' he asked, when at once he stepped out as abruptly as he came, and was gone almost before I knew it."

7855. DEATH, Questions of. Rev. John Newton one day mentioned in company the death of a lady. A young woman who sat opposite immediately said, "O sir, how did she die?" The clergyman replied, "There is a more important question than that, my dear, which you should have asked first." "Sir," said she, "what question can be more important than 'How did she die?'" "How did she live?" was Mr. Newton's answer.

7856. DEATH, Quiet in. Sometimes the quiet death of a very bad man proceeds from stupidity, and want of a just sense of the danger of his condition, and this from a want of discipline and instruction in the nature and principles of religion. This temper looks like courage, because it is fearless of danger; but this fearlessness is founded in great ignorance and want of apprehension; whereas a true courage discerns the danger, and yet thinks it fit and reasonable to venture upon it. Now this stupidity of dying men, who have lived very ill, is commonly the case of such as have been brought up in ignorance, and have lived in great sensuality, by which means their spirits are immersed, and even stifled in carnality and sense; and no wonder, if they who live like beasts die in the same manner.

Tillotson.

7857. DEATH, Regret in. Salmasius, one of the most profound scholars of his time, saw cause to exclaim bitterly against himself. "Oh!" said he, shortly before his death, "I have lost a world of time—time, the most precious thing in the world! Had I but one year more, it should be spent in perusing David's Psalms and Paul's Epistles. Oh! sirs," said he, addressing those about him, "mind the world less and God more."

7858. DEATH, Rejoice at. Rejoice that it is the gracious pleasure of thy God, thou shalt not always inhabit a dungeon, nor lie amidst so impure and disconsolate darkness; that he will shortly exchange thy filthy garments for those of salvation and praise. The end approaches. As you turn over these leaves, so are your days turned over. And as you are now arrived at the end of this book, God will shortly write "finis" to the book of your life on earth, and show you your names written in heaven, in the book of that life which shall never end.

Howe.

7859. DEATH, Release by. God's house is a hospital at one end and a palace at the other. In the hospital end are Christ's members upon earth suffering with various diseases, and confined to a strict regimen of his appointing. What sort of a patient must he be who would be sorry to know that the hour is come for his dismissal from the hospital, and to see the doors thrown wide open for his admission into the King's presence.

Adams.

7860. DEATH, Review at. When Pambo, the hermit, was dying, he said, "I thank God that not a day of my life has been spent in idleness. Never have I eaten bread that I have not earned with the sweat of my brow. I do not recall any bitter speech I have made, for which I ought to repent now." This is the man who learned to "offend not with his tongue." No. 5739.

7861. DEATH a Reward. Biton and Cleobis, two young men of Argos, their mother being the priestess of Juno, and the time being come that she was to go up to the temple to perform the rites of the goddess, and those whose office it was to draw her chariot tarrying longer than usual, these two young men harnessed themselves and took it up, and so carried their mother to the temple. She, being extremely taken with the piety of her sons, petitioned the goddess that she would bestow upon them the best present that could be given to men; accordingly she cast them into that deep sleep out of which they never awoke, taking this way to recompense their filial zeal with death. Pindar writes of Agamedes and Trophonius, that after they had built a temple at Delphi, they requested of Apollo a reward for their work. It was answered them that they should have it within seven days, but in the meanwhile they were commanded to live freely and indulge their genius; accordingly they obeyed the dictate, and the seventh night they died in their beds.

Plutarch.

7862. DEATH, Royalty at. Prince Albert when upon his dying bed said, "I have had wealth, rank and power. But if this were all I had, how wretched I should be now."

"Rock of ages, cleft for me,
Let me hide myself in Thee."

7863. DEATH, Ruling Passion in. An old farmer, up to all methods for making a bargain, was very ill, and friends were expecting an early demise. His nephew and a man hired for the occasion butchered a steer that had been fattened, and when the job was completed the nephew entered the sick-room, where a few friends were assembled, when, to the astonishment of all, the old man opened his eyes and, turning his head slightly, said, in a full voice, drawing out the words: "What have you been doing?" "Killing the steer," was the reply. "What did you do with the hide?" "Left it in the barn; going to sell it by and by." "Let the boys drag it around the barn a couple of times; it will make it weigh heavier." And the good old man was gathered unto his fathers. Anon.

7864. DEATH, Sayings in. Rev. Matthew Henry said to his old and intimate friend Mr. Illidge, on his death-bed, "You have been used to take notice of the sayings of dying men. This is mine. That a life spent in the service of God, and communion with him, is the most comfortable and pleasant life that any one can live in this world."

7865. DEATH, Sermon on. A man may read a sermon, the best and most passionate that ever man preached, if he shall but enter into the sepulchres of kings. In the same Escorial where the Spanish princes live in greatness and power, and decree war or peace, they have wisely placed a cemetery, where their ashes and their glory shall sleep till time shall be no more; and where our kings have been crowned their ancestors lie interred, and they must walk over their grandsire's head to take his crown. There is an acre sown with royal seed, the copy of the greatest change, from rich to naked, from ceiled roofs to arched coffins, from living like gods to dying like men. There is enough to cool the flames of lust, to abate the heights of pride, to appease the itch of covetous desires, to sully and dash out the dissembling colors of a lustful, artificial, and imaginary beauty. There the warlike and the peaceful, the fortunate and the miserable, the beloved and the despised princes, mingle their dust, and lay down their symbol of mortality, and tell all the world that, when we die, our ashes shall be equal to kings', and our accounts easier, and our pains for our crowns shall be less.

Jeremy Taylor.

7866. DEATH, Shrinkage by. Pope Leo IX. approached death with great calmness. He ordered his coffin to be placed in St. Peter's, and had his couch placed beside it. Rising up he looked into his coffin and said, "Behold, my brethren, the mutability of human things! The cell which was my dwelling when a monk expanded into yonder spacious palace; it shrinks again into this narrow coffin." He died before the altar of St. Peter's at Rome, A. D. 1054.

7867. DEATH, Simplicity in. Dr. Guthrie asked his friends to sing. They asked him, "What shall we sing for you?" He said, "Give me a bairn's hymn." They sang "Jesus, tender Shepherd, hear me," and "There is a happy land, far, far away." His faith was the faith of a little child. When asked, "Have you that Saviour now?" he answered, "Yes; I have none else." Then he was heard to murmur to himself, "Over on the other side," and kept ejaculating the words, "Happy, happy, happy!" And so he fell asleep in Jesus.

7868. DEATH, Solemnity of. Death is too serious a subject for trifling or vaunting. A minister says, "I once knew an 'old disciple' who had no patience with Christians that were afraid to die: it was bringing, he said, such a reproach upon religion! For his own part, as he expressed it, he was always looking out for the holidays, and wondering why his father was so long in sending to take him home. But when the message came, he was filled with consternation. During the illness which brought him to the grave, he clung to earthly existence, with a tenacity which was perfectly distressing. On the announcement of his decease, a neighbor remarked concerning him, 'Poor old man! in life he would have given the world to die; and in death he would have given the world to live.'"

7869. DEATH, Spiritual. When at sea, it is the practice to attach heavy weights to a corpse, and it is then lowered into the deep waters. But the corpse, though carried downwards into the deep unfathomable gulf, is utterly unconscious of its sinking state, though it continues to descend till it meets the bottom. So the soul which is spiritually dead is continually thrust down and overwhelmed with the burden of its sins. Unconscious of its destination, it is irresistibly carried onwards. Its path is the downward path of destruction. It has a weight and a burden which it can no more cast off, than the corpse can disengage itself from its iron weights. Unconscious of ruin, it continues to fall until it is swallowed up in the depths of perdition. Nothing but the mighty hand of God can arrest it while plunging downwards in the gulfs of ruin. Salter.

7870. DEATH, Sudden. Death does not always give warning beforehand; sometimes he gives the mortal blow suddenly; he comes behind with his dart, and strikes a man at the heart, before he saith, 'Have I found thee, O mine enemy?' (Kings 21: 30). Eutychus fell down dead suddenly (Acts 20: 9); death suddenly arrested David's sons and Job's sons; Augustus died in a compliment, Galba with a sentence, Vespasian with a jest; Zeuxis died laughing at the picture of an old woman which he drew with his own hand; Sophocles was choked with the stone in a grape; Diodorus the logician died for shame that he could not answer a jocular question propounded at the table by Stilpo; Johannes Measius, preaching upon the raising of the woman of Nain's son from the dead, within three hours after died himself.

Brooks.

7871. DEATH, Sunset. I sympathize with the sentiment of Rev. Dr. Few, of Georgia, when he lay a-dying. A brother sang for him that hymn which has this refrain, "I hope to die shouting, The Lord will provide." Said he, "I don't ask to die that way—but peacefully, like the sun goes down." So died Dr. A. L. P. Green. We had the privilege of more than one prayerful interview with him. He believed he was nearing the end when others had hope. "Doctor, you have done a great deal of preaching; how does it appear now, as you look back on it?" There was no remark of self-depreciation, as that he might have done it better, or more of it: but this was the deliberate reply, "I am impressed with its truth. What I have been preaching is true."

Bp. M Tyere.

7872. DEATH, Temptations in. Rev. Joseph Alleine, in a sore conflict with Satan just before his death, said, "Away, thou foul fiend, thou enemy of mankind, thou subtle sophister! Art thou come now to molest me, now I am just going—now I am so weak, and death upon me! Trouble me not, for I am none of thine; I am the Lord's; Christ is mine, and I am his; his by covenant. I have sworn myself to be the Lord's, and his I will be;—therefore begone!" These last words he often repeated, "which," says Mrs. Alleine, "I took much notice of, that his covenanting with God was the means he used to expel the devil and all his temptations."

7873. DEATH, Terrors in. Bunyan shows his sagacity in representing his hero as beset with terrors and demoniacal mockeries before his final triumph; for the characters of neither good nor bad men can be inferred from their dying words. It pleases God usually to comfort exceedingly his children in the solemn crisis of death; and even the phantasies of the struggling and disordered mind generally then take their character from the habitually pious or godless course of the preceding life: but it is sometimes otherwise; disease and drugs have much effect on the shattered sensibilities; and Christian biography teaches that surviving friends should attach but little significance, whether saddening or consoling, to the last expressions of the dead; life, not death, reveals the probable fate of the soul. Thomas Walsh once heard Fletcher, of Madeley, preach in Wesley's chapel, in London, on the dying trials of good men. Fletcher supposed that some comparatively weak believers might die most cheerfully; and that some strong ones, for the further purification of their faith, or for inscrutable reasons, might have severe conflicts. At the subsequent meeting of the bands, Walsh opposed this opinion, and said he thought it bore hard against God's justice, faithfulness, and covenant love to his servants. Fletcher modestly observed that God's wisdom was sovereign and unsearchable; and though he was sorry he had given offence, yet he could not with a good conscience retract what he had said. With some degree of warmth Walsh replied, "Be it done unto you according to your faith, and be it done unto me according to mine!" and here the matter rested. Two years afterward Walsh needed in death the consolatory opinion of Fletcher. During some months he struggled with what were doubtless the agonies of a disordered nervous system. He was brought almost to the extremity of mental anguish, if not despair of his salvation. To his Christian brethren it was a mysterious spectacle, and public prayers were offered up for him in Dublin, London, and other places. "His great soul," says his biographer, "lay thus, as it were, in ruins for some considerable time, and poured out many a heavy groan and speechless tear from an oppressed heart and dying body. He sadly bewailed the absence of him whose wonted presence had so often given him the victory over the manifold contradictions and troubles which he endured for his name's sake." But as sometimes the clouds, thick on the whole heavens, are rent at the horizon the moment the sun seems to pause there before setting, and his last rays stream in and flood with effulgence and joy the whole sky, so was the darkness lifted from the last hour of this good man. After prayers had been offered in his chamber by a group of sympathizing friends, he requested to be left alone a few minutes that he might "meditate a little." They withdrew, and he remained in profound prayer and self-recollection for some time. At length he broke out with the rapturous exclamation, "He is come! he is come! my Beloved is mine, and I am his; his forever!" and died. Stevens.

7874. DEATH, Time of. An eminent author suggests a motive which we may, with humble reverence, conceive as inducing the Father of mercies to choose the precise moment which he does for calling each of his children out of this world. He read an account of an accidental fire by which a house in the neighborhood of London was consumed. The father and mother escaped from the flames, bearing, as they first supposed, all their treasures with them. But on reckoning them up, the father discovered that the youngest child, then an infant, had in the confusion of the moment been left behind in an upper chamber. He instantly rushed back in the midst of the conflagration, ascended the stairs, and was seen by the assembled crowd of anxious spectators to enter the apartment, now illuminated by the flames. He flew to the bed—seized the child—enfolded him in his arms—and, just as he was on the point of bearing him off in triumph the floor gave way, and both were precipitated into the devouring element. Upon reading this, he could scarcely describe his feelings. In much weakness he was disposed to wonder why a merciful Providence should thus require an act of such heroic tenderness. But after a moment's pause, the following reflection came to his relief. If the saying of the wise may be applicable here, "where the tree falleth there it shall lie;" if precisely as our state is at the instant of death, so will our character be fixed for ever—how could this person have been summoned at a more auspicious moment? To mortal eyes, indeed, no sight could have been more agonizing, than that of a man perishing in so generous a struggle for the deliverance of his child. Such is the dark side of the picture which we see. But how glorious the reverse, presented to the assembly of invisible spectators! Amidst what joyful acclamations might these two have ascended from the flames into the regions of the blessed! How might the angels have rejoiced—with what transport might the spirits of the just be filled when this parent entered the gates of heaven with his infant in his arms;

the one to live for ever amongst the band of innocents, the other to take his station with those who "lost their life in this world, that they might keep it unto life eternal!"

Woodward.

7875. DEATH, Timidity at. Mrs. Sarah Wesley, the wife of Charles, was very timid at the approach of death. She asked all to pray fervently for her deliverance. She repeated "By thy precious death and passion, good Lord, deliver us;" and in struggle of soul pleaded "Open the gates! Open the gates!" Peace came to her before death. She passed through the gates to her rest without a groan.

7876. DEATH by Torture. In the persecution of Valerian in 258, Laurence, a deacon at Rome, was condemned to be tortured to death. A huge gridiron was made ready, the fire was kindled, and Laurence was stripped and laid upon it. The day was beautiful. The sun shone upon the face of the martyr and his countenance was radiant as the face of an angel. Not a murmur escaped him. He said, with a smile, to his tormentors, "Turn me, I am roasted on one side." He died without a cry or moan of pain, as calmly as if lying on a bed of down. Jesus can make even tortures pleasures, and pains joys.

7877. DEATH, Trifling in. A fatal malady seized on Cardinal Mazarin, whilst engaged in conferences about a treaty, and worn by mental fatigue, he consulted Guenau, the physician, who told him he had but two months to live. Some days afterwards, Brienne perceived the cardinal in his night-cap and dressing-gown tottering along his gallery, pointing to his pictures, and exclaiming, "Must I quit all these?" He saw Brienne, and seized him. "Look at that Correggio! this Venus of Titian! that incomparable Deluge of Caracci! Ah! my friend, I must quit all these. Farewell, dear pictures, that I love so dearly, and that cost me so much!" A few days before his death he caused himself to be dressed, shaved, rouged and painted. In this state he was carried in his chair to the promenade, where the envious courtiers paid him ironical compliments on his appearance. Cards were the amusement of his deathbed, his hands being held by others; and they were only interrupted by the Papal Nuncio, who came to give the cardinal plenary indulgence.

Percy.

7878. DEATH, Two Pictures of. In a scantily-furnished chamber lies an old Scotch minister with thin, gray hair, and wrinkled skin. But his brow is high and broad; his deep-set eyes are bright and piercing; a smile plays round his lips; and though feeble and dying, he looks calm and happy. Let us speak to him and say: "Do you think yourself dying, dear sir?" He fixes his eye calmly upon you, and slowly he replies: "Really, friend, I am not anxious whether I am or not; for if I die, I shall be with God; if I live, he will be with me." Now let us step into yonder mansion. Entering a richly-furnished chamber, we find a dignified personage enfolded in warm robes, and seated in a large easy chair. He, too, is feeble and dying; but the light in his eyes is unsteady, and he looks like a man ill at ease with himself. Let us also ask him a question: "Mr Gibbon, how does the world appear to you now?" The eloquent historian of the Roman empire (for he it is) closes his eyes a moment, then opens them again, and with a deep sigh he replies: "All things are fleeting. When I look back, I see they have been fleeting; when I look forward, all is dark and doubtful."

Protestant Churchman.

7879. DEATH, Type of. Jordan is the type of death, dividing the wilderness, this world, from the land of promise, heaven. Israel passes through Jordan without feeling its waters, and comes with Joshua into the promised land. When he passes Jordan all Israel passes. And thus it was in Christ. The Church is dead with him, buried with him, risen with him.

A. Jukes.

7880. DEATH, Unexpected. At a banquet of Roman nobles, the discourse was upon what was the best sort of death. Caesar said, "That which is unexpected." He had his wish gratified, dying in the fullness of his manhood and at the height of renown.

7881. DEATH, Unlooked for. "It has always appeared to me," says Dr. Johnson, "as one of the most striking passages in the visions of Quevedo, that which stigmatizes those as fools who complain that they failed of happiness by sudden death. Quevedo asks, 'How can death be sudden to a being who always knew that he must die, and that the time of his death was uncertain?'"

7882. DEATH, Unpleasing. Fuller, having pondered on all the modes of destruction, arrived at the short and decisive conclusion, "None please me." "But away," the good man adds, "with these thoughts; the mark must not choose what arrow shall be shot against it." The choice is not ours to make, and if it were the privilege would be an embarrassment. But there is consolation in the teaching of physiology. Of the innumerable weapons with which death is armed, the worst is less intolerable than imagination presents it; his visage is more terrible than his dart.

Fontanelle.

7883. DEATH, Unselfishness in. A private of the 11th Maine was mortally wounded in a charge. As his companions started to carry him to the rear, he looked up to his regimental commander, and said, in generous thoughtfulness of others, "Don't trouble the boys to carry me back, Colonel; it will only tire them. I can live but a few minutes, and can just as well die here."

7884. DEATH Vanquished. Through the Redeemer's sacrifice, death becomes to the Christian as one in a various catalogue of things which must work together for his good. So complete, indeed, is the atonement which has been made for human guilt, that the Father might cause our spirits to be enlightened and sanctified at once, and our bodies to pass at once into heaven, without tasting of death, were such his pleasure. But the wisdom which has determined that our victory over spiritual death should be by means of a various and protracted warfare, has arranged that victory over natural death should be through the passage of the grave. Thus a new character attaches to this event, when viewed in connection with the second Adam, instead of being regarded merely in its relation to the first. From the one, this enemy derives all that power which has rendered him the king of terrors; by the other, the foe has been deprived of his main strength, and rendered comparatively and ultimately harmless. Vaughan.

7885. DEATH, Vicarious. A sailing ship started from England loaded with passengers, who were seeking a home in America. Among them were two brothers: one was married; his wife and two children were already in America, and expecting his arrival; the other was single. The ship sprung a leak near the Banks, and had to be abandoned; the ship's boats were sufficient to take two-thirds of the passengers, and no more. It was determined by lot who should go into the boats, and who should stay on the sinking ship. In casting the lot, the single brother was chosen to go, and the married one elected to stay on the ship. They looked at each other, but did not speak; after a few breathless moments the single man stepped out of line and beckoned the brother to take his place. Said he, "You have a wife and two children depending upon you; I have none to care for but mother, and I never expect to see her." The married brother hesitated, and the other as much insisted on his going, until the time had arrived for one or the other to go. The married man jumped into the boat, and in a few minutes all was over with those that remained. He met his wife and children: their hearts were made glad together. The joy of that meeting, with new scenes, banished for a while the lost brother from the husband's memory, until his wife asked where James was (meaning the single brother). Then the scene on shipboard flashed before his mind, and, overwhelmed with grief, he wept, but did not speak. When he did speak, does any one suppose he said, I remember James as I do a bird I once had, or as the flowers that grew in our garden, or as I do a summer's day? No, hardly. He spoke, and it was this: "James gave his life for my life and yours;" then the whole story was told. The wife wept; they both wept and prayed together; and ever after, the mention of that brother's name brought tears to the eyes of those parents. W. Gray.

7886. DEATH, Victory over. A man having always been greatly troubled with the fear of death, told a friend that if he was aware of its approach, it would take three or four men to hold him. His friend encouraged him to believe that "as his day so should his strength be." After a long illness, the dying hour came. Satan whispered that he had been a deceiver and should die a hypocrite. Prayer was offered that these unreasonable fears might be dispelled, when he cried out, "The Lord has come! Praise God! praise God!" Raising his hands, with holy exultation, he several times repeated, "Victory, Victory, Victory through the blood of the Lamb," and died with the words of triumph on his lips.

7887. DEATH, Views at. Rev. J. Hervey while on his death bed, dictated the following letter to a friend: "Now I apprehend myself near the close of life, and stand, as it were, on the brink of the grave, with eternity full in my view, perhaps my dear friend would be willing to know my sentiments in this awful situation. At such a juncture the mind is most unprejudiced, and the judgment not so liable to be dazzled by the glitter of worldly objects. I have been too fond of reading everything valuable and elegant that has been penned in our own language, and been peculiarly charmed with the historians, orators and poets of antiquity; but were I to renew my studies, I would take leave of these accomplished trifles; I would resign the delights of modern wits, amusements, and eloquence, and devote my attention to the Scriptures of truth. I would sit with much greater assiduity at my Divine Master's feet, and desire to know nothing but Jesus Christ and him crucified."

7888. DEATH, Voice from. Death, says Seneca, falls heavy upon him who is too much known to others, and too little to himself; and Pontanus, a man celebrated among the early restorers of literature, thought the study of our own hearts of so much importance, that he has recommended it from his tomb. "I am Pontanus, beloved by the powers of literature, admired by men of worth, and dignified by the monarchs of the world. Thou knowest now who I am, or more properly, who I was. For thee, stranger, I who am in darkness cannot know thee, but I entreat thee to know thyself." Johnson.

7889. DEATH, Vow at. Louis IX. of France was an honest man, a devout Christian, and a good king. In the eighteenth year of his reign A. D. 1244, he had a severe sickness, during which he made a vow that if spared he would head a crusade for the redemption of the Holy Land from the infidels. He had arranged all his affairs for his death, and fell into unconsciousness. Presently he gasped and revived. He said, "The day-spring from on high hath visited me by the grace of God, and hath called me back from death." He sent for the Bishop of Paris and directed him: "My Lord Bishop, put, I pray thee, on my shoulder the cross of voyage beyond the sea," which he reluctantly did. His mother and the entire court opposed his scheme, but in vain. He tenaciously held to his purpose and sailed with a large army in 1249, landing at Damietta. He met with disaster from the start. Sickness, death, and his own incompetency reduced his army to a wreck. A few only returned to France. Louis, though much humiliated, never forgot his vow, and in 1270 led another expedition toward Jerusalem, which fared as ill as the first. The remnant gladly returned to France bearing the body of King Louis. In his sickness he murmured, "We will go to Jerusalem," but it was the heavenly Jerusalem.

7890. DEATH, Warning of. St. Cyprian, bishop of Carthage, was warned in a vision of his approaching death. The manner of his condemnation, and method of his execution were shown him. He was first arrested and sent into exile with many other Christians. They lived in constant expectation of the arrival of the executioner at Curubis to send them to their crowns. It was a glorious company of the faithful, encouraging each other to hold out to the end that they might sooner enter the society of the blessed. An order came requiring Cyprian's return to Carthage. He answered to his name to the proconsul, and confessed his hostility to the heathen religion. The proconsul recited his orders from the Emperor Valerian. "Obey your orders," said Cyprian. The proconsul wrote, "I will that Thascius Cyprian be beheaded." "Blessed be God for it," said the saint. He was executed A. D. 258.

7891. DEATH, Willingness for. Of the great number to whom it has been my painful professional duty to have administered in the last hour of their lives, I have sometimes felt surprised that so few have appeared reluctant to go to the undiscovered country "from whose bourne no traveler returns." Many, we may easily suppose, have manifested this willingness to die from an impatience of suffering, or from that passive indifference which is sometimes the result of debility and bodily exhaustion. But I have seen those who have arrived at a fearless contemplation of the future from faith in the doctrine which our religion teaches. Such men were not only calm and supported, but cheerful in the hour of death; and I never quitted such a sick chamber without a hope that my last end might be like theirs.

Sir Henry Halford.

7892. DEATH, Worldling's View of. A dying worldling said: "My physician tells me I must die, and I feel that he tells me the truth. In my best hours, and in my worst, death has been perpetually upon my mind: it has covered me like a dread presence, weighed me down like an ocean, blinded me like a horrid vision, imprisoned my faculties as with bars and gates of iron. Often and often, when in saloons alive with mirth and splendor I have seemed the gayest of the inmates, this thought and fear of death have shot through my mind, and I have turned away sick and shuddering. What is it then to approach the reality? to feel it very near—very close at hand? stealing on, and on, and on, like the tide upon the shore, not to be driven back till it has engulfed its prey? What is it to apprehend the approach of the time when you must be a naked, guilty, trembling spirit, all memory, and all consciousness, never again for a single moment to sleep, or know oblivion from the crushing burden of the deeds done in the body! The dying may indeed be in a place of torment—in hell—before the time; and the remembrance of past life, stripped of all its deceptions, shriveled into insignificance, may appear, in connexion with eternity, but as a tiny shell tossed on the broad black surface of an ocean; then, again, the intense importance of that very insignificant fragment of time, and the intense remembrance of all that occupied it—its schemes, and dreams, and sins, and vanities, sweeping across the mind, in solemn order, like a procession of grim shadows, with death waiting to embosom all. O, well may I smite upon my breast, and cry, with all but despair, Woe is me for the past! woe, for the past! Every dream is dissolved—every refuge of lies is plucked from me—every human consolation totters beneath me, like a bowing wall; and all the kingdoms of the world, and all the glory of them, could not bribe from my soul the remembrance of a single sin. Ambition, pleasure, fame, friendship, lie around like wrecks, and my soul is helpless in the midst of them, like the mariner on his wave-worn rock."

7893. DEATH-BED, Revelations of the. It is a fearful thing to wait and watch for the approach of death; to know that hope is gone, and recovery impossible; and to sit and count the dreary hours through long, long nights—such nights as only watchers by the bed of sickness know. It chills the blood to hear the dearest secrets of the heart—the pent-up, hidden secrets of many years—poured forth by the unconscious, helpless being before you; and to think how little the reserve and cunning of a whole life will avail when fever and delirium tear off the mask at last. Strange tales have been told in the wanderings of dying men; tales so full of guilt and crime, that those who stood by the sick person's couch have fled in horror and affright, lest they should be scared to madness by what they heard and saw; and many a wretch has died alone, raving of deeds the very name of which has driven the boldest man away.

Dickens.

7894. DEATH OF CHRIST, Biblical Types and Figures of. Abel's sacrifice, Gen. 4: 4; Heb. 11: 4. Abraham's ram, Gen. 22: 13. The Jewish sacrifices and offerings, varying in costliness and number, but all typical of the one great sacrifice and offering. The paschal lamb, Exod. 12: 3-7; John 19: 36; 1 Cor. 5: 7. The smitten rock, Exod. 17: 6; 1 Cor. 10: 4. The scapegoat, Lev. 16: 20-22. The brazen serpent, Num. 21: 9; John 3: 14, 15. The leper's offering—the bird killed, Lev. 14: 45. The red heifer, Num. 19: 2-6; Heb. 9: 13, 14. Jonah in the whale's belly, Jonah 1: 17; Matt. 12: 40. The roasting, slaying, drying, etc., of the different sacrifices and offerings; animals slain, consumed in whole or in part upon the altar; corn ground and baked; olives bruised, etc., all spoke of the sufferings of the one great Victim.

7895. DEATH OF CHRIST, Demand of the. A minister in one of our large cities prepared and preached, as he supposed, a most convincing sermon for the benefit of an influential member of his congregation, who was known to be of an infidel turn of mind. The sinner listened unmoved to the well-turned sentences and the earnest appeals; his heart was unaffected. On his return from church, he saw a tear trembling in the eye of his daughter, whom he tenderly loved; and he inquired the cause. The child informed him that she was thinking of what her Sunday-school teacher had told her of Jesus Christ. "And what did she tell you of Jesus Christ, my child?" he asked. "Why, she said he came down from heaven and died for poor me!" and in a moment the tears gushed from the eyes which had looked upon the beauties of only seven summers, as in the simplicity of childhood, she added, "Father, should I not love one who has loved me?" The proud heart of the infidel was touched. What the eloquent plea of his minister could not accomplish, the tender sentence of his child had done, and he retired to give vent to his own feelings in a silent but penitent prayer. That evening found him at the praying circle, where, with brokenness of spirit, he asked the prayers of God's people. In giving an account of his Christian experience, he remarked, "Under God I owe my conversion to a little child, who first convinced me by her artless simplicity that I ought to love one who has so loved me." W. F. Crafts.

7896. DEBT, Exemption from. The goddess Diana, in the city of Ephesus, gives to such debtors as can fly into her temple freedom and protection against their creditors; but the sanctuary of economy and moderation in expenses, into which no usurer can enter to pluck thence, and carry away any debtor prisoner, is always open for the prudent, and affords them a long and large space of joyful and honorable repose.

Plutarch.

7897. DEBT, Payment of the. There was a man converted in Europe several years ago, and he liked the Gospel so well, he thought he would like to go and publish it. Great crowds came to hear him out of curiosity. The man was not much of a speaker, so the next night there wasn't many there, and the third night the man didn't get a hearer. But he was anxious to publish the Gospel, and so he got some great placards and posted them all over the town, that if there was any man in that town that was in debt, to come to his office between certain hours on a certain day with the proof of their indebtedness, and he would pay the debt. Well, of course, it went all over the town, but the people didn't believe him. One man said to his neighbor, "John, do you believe this man will pay our debts?" "Oh, of course not; that is a great sell; that is a hoax." The day came, and instead of there being a great rush, there didn't anybody come. Now, it is a great wonder that there isn't a great rush of men into the kingdom of God to have their debts paid when a man can be saved for nothing. About 10 o'clock there was a man walking in front of the office; he looked this way and that to see if there was anybody looking, and by and by he was satisfied there wasn't anybody looking, and he slipped in, and he said, "I saw a notice around town if any one would call here at a certain hour you would pay their debt. Is there any truth in it?" "Yes," says the man, "it is quite true. Did you bring around the necessary papers?" "Yes." And after the man had paid the debt he said, "Sit down, I want to talk to you," and he kept him there until 12 o'clock. And before 12 o'clock had passed there were two more came and had their debts paid. At 12 o'clock he let them all out, when they found some other men standing around the door, and they said, "Well, you found he was willing to pay your debts, didn't you?" Yes, they said, it was quite true that he had paid their debts. "O, if this is so, we are going in to get our debts paid." And they went in, but it was too late. The man said if they had called within a certain hour he would have paid their debts. To every one of you that is a bankrupt sinner—and you never saw a sinner in the world but that he was a bankrupt sinner—Christ comes and he says, "I will pay the debt." And that is just what he wants to do to-night. Bear in mind that the Son of God came into the world to save sinners, and he has got the power to forgive sin. And he has not only got the power, but he is willing to save, and he is anxious to save; and so, my friends, if you will accept Christ's offer you can get out of this hall to-night cleansed of all sin. Moody.

7898. DEBT, Providential Relief From. A poor widow supported herself, in a seaport town, by the sale of small articles. She was much pressed for the payment of a bill, but had no money to meet it. She prayed God to send her relief. Just before the time when her goods would have been seized, she heard what she supposed to be the footsteps of her creditor. Instead, a company of sailors came, and bought articles to the exact value of the demanded debt.

7899. DEBT, The Unpaid. A gentleman, an essential part of whose religion was to pay his debts, dreamed that he paid them all. He mentioned the fact with considerable satisfaction, when a personage replied as if he held some unsatisfied demand, "There is one debt you have not paid." "What is it?" said the man, with some anxiety. "You have not paid the debt of nature." It is true of all living, and payment may be demanded at any moment.

7900. DEBTOR, Lamentation of a. Well did an English author represent a poor debtor in the Fleet Prison answering a person who spoke to him of friends: "Friends!" exclaimed the man; "if I lay dead at the bottom of the deepest mine in the world, I could not be more forgotten or unheeded than I am here. I am a dead man;—dead to society, without the pity they bestow on those whose souls have passed away! Friends to see me! My God! I have shrunk from the prime of life into old age in this place; and there is not one to raise his hand above my bed, when I lay dead upon it, and say, 'It is a blessing he is gone!'"

G. W. Montgomery.

7901. DEBTS, Payment of. Paying of debts is, next to the grace of God, the best means in the world to deliver you from a thousand temptations to sin and vanity. Pay your debts, and you will not have wherewithal to buy a costly toy or a pernicious pleasure. Pay your debts, and you will not have what to lose to a gamester. In short, pay your debts, and you will of necessity abstain from many indulgences that war against the spirit, and bring you into captivity to sin, and cannot fail to end in your utter destruction, both of soul and body.

Delany.

7902. DECAY, Example of. Empires, states, and kingdoms have, by the doom of the Supreme Providence, their fatal periods; great cities lie sadly buried in their dust; arts and sciences have not only their eclipses, but their wanings and deaths. The ghastly wonders of the world, raised by the ambition of ages, are overthrown and trampled. Some lights above, not idly entitled stars, are lost, and never more seen of us. The excellent fabric of this universe itself shall one day suffer ruin, or a change like a ruin; and should poor earthlings thus to be handled complain? W. Drummond.

7903. DECAY, Law of. No organized substance, no part of any plant or animal, after the extinction of the vital principle, is capable of resisting the chemical action of air and moisture; for all that power of resistance which they temporarily possessed as the bearers of life, the media of the vital manifestations, completely ceases with the death of the organism; their elements fall again under the unlimited dominion of the chemical forces.

Liebig.

7904. DECEIT, Detection of. An ass having put on a lion's skin, roamed about frightening all the silly animals he met with, and seeing a fox, he tried to frighten him also. But Reynard, having heard his voice, said, "Well, to be sure! and I should have been frightened too, if I had not heard you bray." They who assume a character that does not belong to them, generally betray themselves by overacting it.

Æsop.

7905. DECEIT, Emblems of. The dank mossy sward is deceitful: its fresh and glossy carpet invites the traveler to leave the rough moorland tract; and, at the first step, horse and rider are buried in the morass. The sea in deceitful; what rage, what stormy passions sleep in that placid bosom! and how often, as vice serves her used-up victims, does she cast the bark that she received into her arms with sunny smiles a wreck upon the shore. The morning is oft deceitful; with bright promise of a brilliant day, it lures us from home; the sky ere noon begins to thicken; the sun looks sickly; the sluggish, heavily-laden clouds gather upon the hill-tops; the landscape closes in all around; the lark drops songless into her nest; the wind rises, moaning and chill; and at length, like adversities gathering round the gray head of age, tempest, storm, and rain, thicken on the dying day. The desert is deceitful; it mocks the traveler with its mirage. How life kindles in his drooping eye, as he sees the playful waves chase each other to the shore, and the plumes of the palm waving in the watery mirror! Faint, weary, parched, perishing with thirst, he turns to bathe and drink; and exhausting what little strength remains in pursuit of a phantom, unhappy man! he has turned to die. Deceitful above sward or sea, sky or enchanting desert, is the heart of man; nor do I know a more marked or melancholy proof of this than that afforded by our light treatment of such weighty matters as sin and judgment. There is no exaggeration in the prophet's language, "The heart is deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked."

Dr. Guthrie.

7906. DECEIT, Fable of. The cat having a long time preyed upon the mice, the poor creatures at last, for their safety, contained themselves within their holes; but the cat finding his prey to cease, as being known to the mice that he was indeed their enemy and a cat, deviseth this course, following, namely, changeth his hue, getting on a religious habit, shaveth his crown, walks gravely by their holes; and yet perceiving that the mice kept their holes and looking out, suspected the worst, he formally and father-like, said unto them, "Quod fueram non sum, frater, caput aspice tonsum." ("O brother, I am not as you take me for; I am no more a cat; see my habit and shaven crown.") Hereupon some of the more credulous and bold among them were again, by this deceit, snatched up; and therefore when afterwards he came, as before, to entice them forth, they would come out no more, but answered, "Talk what you can, we will never believe you; you bear still a cat's heart within you." And so here the Jesuits; yea, and priests too, for they are all joined in the tails like Samson's foxes: Ephraim against Manasseh, and Manasseh against Ephraim, and both against Judah.

E. Coke.

7907. DECEPTION, Fatal. Many years ago, when the Egyptian troops first conquered Nubia, a regiment was crossing a desert. The heat was oppressive, almost beyond endurance; the supply of water nearly exhausted. Far in the horizon they seemed to see a beautiful lake bordered with palm-trees. The Arab guide, who well understood the desert wastes, told the soldiers there was no lake there, that what they saw was only a mirage, a floating delusion on the sky. But the thirsty soldiers saw something which they believed to be water, and were determined to trust their sight rather than his words. They insisted upon their guide leading them to the water. He protested, and resisted even to death. When they had killed him, the whole regiment, wild with excitement and eager for the cooling waters, leave the course indicated by their guide and start for the lake. On and on they press over the burning sands; hour after hour they endure the heat, hoping to gain the refreshing waters of the lake, but that object flees before them like a phantom. Self-deceived, exhausted by the heat, and overcome with fatigue, they begin to fall upon the burning sands and die. They all perished. Long after, the Arabs in search found the body of the guide, a martyr to his faithfulness, while the bodies of the soldiers were found far out upon the wild wastes, where they fell in their vain search to find water where there was none. Their sincerity did not save them from death. Sir S. W. Baker.

7908. DECEPTION, Pleasure of Self. Many a man has a kind of a kaleidoscope, where the bits of broken glass are his own merits and fortunes, and they fall into harmonious arrangements, and delight him, often most mischievously and to his ultimate detriment; but they are a present pleasure. Helps.

7909. DECISION, Christian. That rich and blessed virgin in Basil, who was, for Christianity, condemned to the fire, and was offered if she would worship idols, to have her life and estate safe restored unto her, was obstinate in her resolution: "Valeat vita, pereat pecunia;" "I shall have more life in Christ, than in myself; all the emperors, all the physicians in the world, cannot make my life, which I have in myself, so long to-morrow as it is to-day; but in Christ, my life is not only an abiding, but an abounding life: I shall have more of that by losing mine own; my life in him is a hidden life; free from all injuries and persecutions of men: I shall have more riches in him than in myself, even unsearchable riches, which can never be stolen away, because they can never be exhausted. It is as possible for thieves to draw out the mines of India, or to steal away the sun out of his orb, as for any human violence to take away Christ from a man." Alike honorable was the answer of Frederic, the elector of Saxony, who, being prisoner to Charles V., was promised enlargement and restitution of dignity, if he would come to mass. "Summum in terris dominum agnosco Cæsarem, in coelis Deum,"—"In all civil accommodations I am ready to yield unto Cæsar, but for heavenly things, I have but one master, and therefore I dare not serve two; Christ is more welcome to me in bonds, than the honors of Cæsar without Christ." Such acceptance hath the Gospel found amongst the renowned worthies heretofore: and the like entertainment should we all give unto it, even prefer it above our greatest glory: and as the Thessalonians did receive it with joy in the midst of afflictions, abide with Christ in his temptations; esteem his Gospel glorious, as the stars are in the darkness of the night, or as a torch, which blazeth most when it is most shaken.

Bp. Reynolds.

7910. DECISION, Circle for. Pompilius was sent to Antiochus with a letter from the senate, commanding him to withdraw his army out of Egypt, and to renounce the protection of that kingdom during the minority of Ptolemy's children. When he came towards him in his camp, Antiochus kindly saluted him at a distance, but without returning his salutation he delivered his letter; which being read, the king answered that he would consider and give his answer. Whereupon with his wand he made a circle around him, saying, "Consider and answer before you go out of this place." Then Antiochus answered he would give the Romans satisfaction. Man is called upon to decide the question whether he will accept and serve Christ or not. The circle is drawn about each, and the time fixed within which he must answer.

7911. DECISION, Confiding. A little girl was awakened at a meeting where the story of the leper was told. The leper came to Jesus and worshiped him, saying, "Lord, if thou wilt, thou canst make me clean. And Jesus put forth his hand and touched him, saying, I will; be thou clean; and immediately his leprosy was cleansed." This little girl said, "I noticed that there was an 'if' in what the man said, but there was no 'if' in what Jesus said; so I went home and took out the 'if,' and I knelt down, and I said, 'Lord Jesus, thou canst, thou wilt make me clean; I give myself to thee.'" She was saved.

7912. DECISION, Examples of. Julius Palmer in Queen Mary's days, had life and preferment offered him if he would recant his faith in Christ. His answer was, that he had resigned his living in two places for the sake of the Gospel, and was now ready to yield his life on account of Christ. William Hunter, when urged by Bonner to recant, replied, he could only be moved by the Scriptures, for he reckoned the things of earth but dross for Christ; and, when the sheriff offered him a pardon at the stake if he would renounce his faith, he firmly rejected it. Antonius Riceto, a Venetian, was offered his life and considerable wealth if he would concede but a little, and when his son, with weeping, entreated him to do so, he answered that he was resolved to lose both children and estate for Christ. Bibl. Treas.

7913. DECISION, Importance of. Some years ago, while spending a pleasant holiday at Thun in Switzerland, four ministers of the gospel, of whom I was one, went into a boat for a row on the broad and rapid Aar, which flows past that city. When we had got to the middle of the stream, a most unseemly and ill-timed discussion arose among us, as to the point for which we should make. In our eager debate we lay upon our oars, and had much to say for and against different proposals; but meanwhile the swiftly flowing current was settling the question for us, and was hurrying us down to a very dangerous rapid, which we only escaped by long and arduous exertion. Thus it is often in the graver and more momentous interests of life. We imagine that no harm comes of our indecision, while in fact the undertow of fashion, or interest, or inclination, is bearing us away with it; and when we awake to our danger, it may be too late to ensure our safety. Hence, no matter how apparently trifling the thing may be that is put before us, if it involve a principle in it, we ought to settle at once what our duty in the case is, and do that promptly and with all our might.

W. M. Taylor.

7914. DECISION, Missionary. "Brothers, in a few days we shall be scattered, never perhaps to meet on earth again. We may soon lose sight of each other in widely-separated fields of ministerial labor. Though my field may be unknown to you, while I live you may always know Carlos R. Martin is somewhere tremendously determined to do good." These words were uttered at a farewell meeting of students of the Concord Biblical Institute. Bishop Baker on the day following asked Mr. Martin if he was willing to go as a missionary to China. He consented, on condition that the lady who was soon to be his bride approved. Speedily the mail brought the message from her, "Carlos, go where your duty calls you, and I will go with you, even to the ends of the earth." Years after, this devoted man, dying of cholera in the midst of life and usefulness, sent back to America this message: "I find it pays to be a Christian."

Charles E. Little.

7915. DECISION, Noble. Five boys, pupils in the boarding-school, were in the room. Four of them, contrary to the express rules, engaged in a game of cards. The fifth was not standing and looking on to see how the game would go, but engaged in some work of his own. One of the players was called out. "Come," said the others to their companion, "it is too bad to have the game stop in the middle. Come and take his place." "I do not know one card from another." "That makes no difference. We will teach you. Come, do not let our sport be spoiled." The boy perceived that this was the decisive moment. Ah, just such are the critical points—sometimes the turning-points of life. His resolution was instantly taken. He made no excuse, but at once planted himself squarely upon principle. "My father does not wish me to play cards, and I shall not act contrary to his wishes." This ended the matter. It did more. It established his position among his companions. It compelled their respect and preserved him from temptation in the future. Such a boy inspires confidence. The incident may seem small in itself, but it gives promise of the future better than thousands of gold. Three sterling qualities are manifested: A conscientious regard for the wishes of parents, superiority to the fear of the ridicule of his companions, and decision. These qualities form a shield and buckler to all temptation. Years have passed. That boy has become a man. Various and trying have been the scenes through which he has been called. Severe have been the temptations to which he has been exposed. But he has come forth as gold. No parent weeps, no friend blushes for him.

Am. Messenger.

7916. DECISION Overcome. While Mr. Wilson was teaching the people of Raiatea, South Sea Islands, an old man stood up, and exclaimed, "My forefathers worshiped Oro, the god of war, and so have I; nor shall anything you can say persuade me to forsake this way. And," said he, addressing the missionary, "what do you want more than you have already? Have you not won over such a chief, and such a chief?—ay, and you have Pomare herself! What want you more?" "All—all the people of Raiatea, and you yourself I want!" replied Mr. Wilson. "No, no," cried the old man: "me!—you shall never have me. I will do as my fathers have done: I will worship Oro. You shall never have me, I assure you." Yet, within six months from that time, this staunch adherent of the bloody superstition of Oro, the Moloch of the Pacific, became a worshiper of the true God. Such is the power of the Holy Spirit.

7917. DECISION, Promptitude in. Captain Oldrey, commanding the Hyacinth sloop of war, was working up for Barbadoes August 10, 1831, when the hurricane came on. He had been upon the deck during the finest weather ever witnessed in that climate, and had just been admiring the beauty of the evening. The atmosphere of the horizon was perfectly clear, not a cloud obscuring the sky; nor was there the least probability of a change, as far as could be judged from any appearance observable in the heavens or on the ocean. Going below to his cabin, the captain flung himself upon a sofa, and a minute or two afterwards, chancing to cast his eyes upon a barometer suspended near, he observed that the mercury was falling. It was a moment when he would not have thought of consulting the instrument for any purpose, and so strange did he think the circumstance that he rubbed his eyes, imagining he was deceived. Still the mercury fell; he got off the sofa, and, approaching the instrument, discovered that the quicksilver was falling with a perceptible motion. He went on deck, but the weather was as lovely as before; he descended again, shook the instrument, and still the descent was certain and continued. A fall so rapid and remarkable, of which he had never seen nor heard of a parallel instance, convinced him that something was about to happen. He called the first lieutenant and master, and stated what he had seen. These officers alleged that there could be no storm likely, the sea and sky were then so clear and beautiful. The captain was not of their opinion; and as the ordinary falling of the barometer indicated a storm, he resolved to prepare for one with a speed and energy proportioned to the singular rapidity of the indication. He ordered everything to be instantly made snug, the topmasts to be struck, and all to be got down and secured upon deck. The officers and ship's company were surprised and still incredulous. One man said to another, "The captain is determined to sweat us." By an activity urged on by the union of command and entreaty, all was lowered and secured. The officers of the ship, except the captain, were still of their previous opinion, and well they might be: so far, none of the appearances then existed that usually precede storms and hurricanes in that latitude. The evening had closed in by the time operations on board the ship were nearly completed. Captain Oldrey relaxed nothing in the way of preparation to the last, and saw it finished to his satisfaction. An hour or two had gone by afterwards, during which his mind had become composed with the reflection that he had prepared for the worst, when he had proof of the value of the instrumental warning: a storm did come on, and reached its fury almost at once, so that a rag of sail could not be kept up; the wind blew with a fury so great that the sea could not rise into waves, but became one vast plain of foam, on which the ship lay driving furiously along. Fortunately, there was ample sea-room. There is a delicacy of perception in a truly wise man which gives him warnings as decisive, respecting the coming storm of Divine vengeance, but which are as unappreciable by others as the indications of Captain Oldrey's barometer.

7918. DECISION, Reward of. When William Lloyd Garrison commenced the publication of the "Liberator" he began with these memorable words: "I am in earnest—I will not equivocate—I will not excuse—I will not retreat a single inch—and I will be heard." He was heard—and the chains have fallen from the three millions of bondmen to whose service he consecrated his life.

7919. DECISION, Success of. When Mohammed began to proclaim himself God's prophet, some of his relations laughed at him, others became hostile to him, and so unpromising was his cause that his uncle, Abu Taleb, in whom he confided most, advised him to desist. He replied, resolutely, "Though they set the sun against me on my right hand, and the moon on my left, yet will I not give up this enterprise." His unfailing resolution carried him through persecution, opposition and flight, to the most signal success any impostor ever attained.

7920. DECISION, Symbol of. On a recent most instructive visit to the Assay Office in Wall street, I was shown a balance concerning which the courteous superintendent said: "The distinctive feature of this balance is its combination of sensitiveness with decision. It will be turned by the smallest fraction of a grain, and, whenever it is turned, it moves right on; we had one formerly which was extremely sensitive, but it lacked decision, so that it went quivering from one side to another for a long time before it settled; and, frequently, we wasted fifteen minutes in getting a result, which we can obtain from this one in a moment." As I listened to this admirable explanation, I could not help saying within myself: "How like that wavering balance many men are! They are abundantly sensitive, but they lack decisiveness; they take so long to settle what is to be done, that the opportunity of doing anything is sometimes gone before they are ready to begin!"

7921. DECREES, Disputing about the. A professor of religion, of dubious character, much given to disputation, came down to death with his ruling passion still predominant. A good Christian, at his bedside, said, "This is the decree you have now to do with. 'He that believeth shall be saved; he that believeth not shall be damned.'"

7922. DECREES, Mystery of the. Hillel, the holy, wished to explore and to explain the mystery of the divine decrees, and in order to prepare himself for such deep meditation he spent two days in fasting and prayer. On the third he ascended to the top of Carmel, and sat down beneath the shade of a juniper tree. Here his mind collected its force, to cast its thoughts toward heaven and hell, eternity and infinity. But these thoughts recoiled on his own breast, like stones from the top of Gerizim. Hillel, at length tired of his fruitless contemplation, by chance turned his eyes toward a spot of earth not far distant, where something seemed to be moving. It was a mole, which in his darksome abode had perceived there was such a thing as light, and forgetting the weakness of his organs, desired to contemplate the sun at mid-day. But no sooner had he left his home than, blinded by the splendor of meridian beams, he wished himself again in his subterranean lodging. But ere he could accomplish his retreat, an eagle snatched him away, and flew off with him towards the valley of the son of Hinnom. "Blessed be God," said Hillel, "who hath conveyed instruction to the mind of his servant, and warned him of the danger of prying into that knowledge, the difficulty of which seems to imply that it is forbidden."

7923. DEDICATION, Biblical. The word "Enoch" means dedicated; and it is singular to observe how early the name was given, both in Cain's line, and in the line of Seth, Gen. 4: 17; 5: 24. Lemuel, Prov. 31: 1, means also devoted to God. The word saints has properly the same signification—sanctified, set apart for sacred purposes. To consecrate. The marginal translation of the Hebrew word is generally to "fill the hand." See Exod. 28: 41; 32: 29; 1 Chron. 29: 5. To "yield to God"—in the Hebrew is to give the hand. UNDER THE LAW. There were very numerous examples and illustrations of dedication and consecration of persons and things. The several sacrifices and offerings, especially the burnt-offering, which was to be wholly consumed, and which represents the entire dedication of the offerer to God. The first-born of men, Exod. 13: 2-12 (after 12, Israel's redemption); 22: 29. The firstling of cattle, Exod. 13: 12; 22: 30. The first ripe fruits and corn,—the first produce of oil, and wine, and fleece, Exod. 22: 29; Num. 18: 12. The fruit of trees in the fourth year, Lev. 19: 24. A sheaf was presented at harvest time as a wave offering, Lev. 23: 10-14; two wave loaves at Pentecost, Lev. 23: 17; dough, as a heave offering, Num. 15: 20. These were to be brought to God's house, Exod. 22: 29; 23: 19; with confession and thanksgiving, Deut. 26: 3-10. Nazarites, dedication of, Num. 6: 1-8. THE HOUSE OF THE LORD. It is striking how largely the house of the Lord was enriched by dedicated things. The tabernacle was richly adorned from the spoils of Egypt; the gold and silver, and fine linen, and various things required. The Lord so ordered it, not only as intimating favor to the Gentiles, but as representing the use which God often makes of the abilities and substance of strangers, in supporting and promoting true religion.—Scott, on Exod. 25: 1-7. The laver of brass was made of the looking-glasses of the women, Exod. 38: 8. The temple of Solomon was raised largely by the dedicated things David gathered, 2 Sam. 8: 7, 8, 11; 1 Kings 7: 51; 1 Chron. 18: 7-11. Large offerings were often voluntarily made, which were devoted to holy purposes. See the offerings of the officers and captains, after the victory over Midian, Num. 31: 48-54, amounting to about £37,856; and the treasures of dedicated things, set apart to maintain the house of the Lord, from the days of Samuel, by Samuel, Saul, Abner, Joab, &c., 1 Chron. 26: 26-28; and the superabundant treasures of dedicated gifts in Hezekiah's time, 2 Chron. 31: 5-12. THE WALL OF JERUSALEM,—the rebuilding of, was a noble example of difficult work done in a pious spirit,—first "sanctified," Neh. 3: 1; then "dedicated," 12: 17. GIVEN TO THE LORD. What large views St. Paul had of the entire consecration of the believer to God! See 1 Cor. 6: 19, 20; Rom. 12: 1; see also Phil. 2: 17, where he speaks of himself as willing to be "offered," "poured forth" (marg.), like the libations or drink offerings of ancient sacrifices, with cheerful surrender and sanctified joy. Note the beautiful expression in the post-communion service of the Church of England—"And here we offer and present unto thee, O Lord, ourselves, our souls and bodies, to be a reasonable, holy, and lively sacrifice unto thee." THE RIGHTFUL ORDER.—First the person, then the gift; the heart, and then the offering; see 2 Cor. 8: 5; Luke 11: 41; Heb. 11: 4. Bowes.

7924. DEFEAT, Providential. History says that Sapore, the King of Persia, besieged the city of Nisibis, with every prospect of success. St. James, the holy bishop of the city, prayed God, most earnestly, to confound the enemy. In answer there came an infinite number of gnats, who so preyed upon the horses and their riders as to throw the army into great confusion. This insignificant insect caused Sapore to raise the siege, and, under God, saved the city. The weakest things with God for their ally, are stronger than the mightiest armies contending against the right. "If God be for us who shall be against us?" Rom. 8: 31.

7925. DEFECTS, Boasting of. Said a young mole to her mother, "Mother, I can see." So, in order to try her, her mother put a lump of frankincense before her, and asked her what it was. "A stone," said the young one. "O, my child!" said the mother, "not only do you not see, but you cannot even smell."

Æsop.
7926. DEFENCE, Hedge of. Roberts tells us that in India it is said of a man who cannot be injured, "Why attempt to hurt him? is there not a hedge about him?" "You cannot get at the fellow; he has a strong hedge about him."

7927. DEFENCE, Instinct of. Brasidas, the Lacedæmonian captain, by chance caught a mouse among some dry figs; and, being bit by her, let her go with this exclamation, "By Hercules! there is no creature so little or so weak that it cannot preserve its life if it dares but defend it."

7928. DEFENCE, The Lord Our. In the early part of the reign of Alexander I., Bible reading and habits of piety and devotion were held in contempt among the upper classes in Russia; and when Prince Galitzin, in utter ignorance of religion, became a magnate of the church by imperial appointment, he was obliged to purchase a Bible secretly, that he might acquaint himself with the first principles of Christianity. His stolen study of the Holy Book soon influenced the character and manners of the once haughty noble, so that all who dared to do so sneered at him. In course of time Napoleon invaded Russia, and all St. Petersburg prepared either to fight or flee. Galitzin alone remained unmoved. His palace was undergoing extensive repairs, and he continued to superintend them as composedly as if his country was in the midst of the profoundest peace. The Czar was astonished at the apparent unconcern of his favorite prince, and before putting himself at the head of his armies he called on him, half fearing for the soundness of Galitzin's patriotism. "What does it mean," said he, "that you go on building when every one else prepares to flee?" "The Lord is my defence, sire," answered Galitzin: "I am as safe here as anywhere." Alexander demanded to know where he had found this new confidence, and the prince showed him his Bible. Strange as it may seem, it was the first Bible the Czar had ever seen. The first place which he opened was at the ninety-first Psalm: "He that dwelleth in the secret place of the Most High shall abide under the shadow of the Almighty," etc., and Galitzin read to him the whole of that sweet, grand Scripture. Profoundly impressed, the Czar repaired to the cathedral for public worship preparatory to departing on his campaign. The priest who conducted the service chose, by a singular coincidence, the ninety-first Psalm, to read: "He that dwelleth in the secret place of the Most High shall abide under the shadow of the Almighty." "Did Galitzin tell you to select that?" asked Alexander. "I have not seen Galitzin," said the priest. "I only prayed the Lord to be guided in my choice." The Czar went a day's march with his army, and in the evening, feeling anxious and serious, he ordered his chaplain to read to him in his tent. The chaplain began to read, "He that dwelleth in the secret place of the Most High shall abide under the shadow of the Almighty." "Hold," cried Alexander; "did Galitzin tell you to read that to me?" "Assuredly not, sire," said the chaplain; "I asked God to direct me to a passage, and then I felt constrained to select this Psalm." From that time Alexander secretly got access to a Bible every day, and read it with wonder and delight. And when Divine Providence scattered the great army of Napoleon, and drove it out of Russia with a loss of 450,000 men the Czar returned to his capital, borrowed Galitzin's Bible, and applied himself eagerly to the study of its precious pages until the Holy Spirit taught him to make it the rule of his life. Some years afterward two missionaries, who were preaching and teaching the Scriptures in St. Petersburg, learned this story from the mouth of Prince Galitzin, and heard the Czar himself confirm it during an impressive and memorable interview which he granted them at the palace. One of those missionaries was Stephen Grellet, a Quaker, who recorded the facts in his journal.

Youth's Companion.

7929. DEFENCE, Useless. The Chinese have been for at least two or three thousand years a wall-making people. It would bankrupt New York or Paris to build the walls of the city of Peking. The great wall of China is the wall of the world. It is forty feet high. The lower thirty feet is of hewn limestone or granite. Two modern carriages may pass each other upon the summit. It has a parapet throughout its whole length, with convenient staircases, buttress and garrison houses at every quarter of a mile, and it runs, not by cutting down hills and raising valleys, but over the uneven crests of the mountains and down through their gorges, a distance of a thousand miles. Admiral Rodgers and I calculated that it would cost more now to build the great wall of China, through its extent of one thousand miles, than it has cost to build the fifty-five thousand miles of railroad in the United States. What a commentary it is upon the splendid range of the human intellect to see this great utilitarian enterprise, so necessary and effective two thousand years ago, now not merely useless, but an incumbrance and an obstruction.

Wm. H. Seward.

7930. DEFENCE, Wall of. On a certain occasion an ambassador from Epirus, on a diplomatic mission, was shown by the king over his capital. The ambassador knew of the monarch's fame—knew that though only nominally king of Sparta, he was ruler of Greece—and he had looked to see massive walls rearing aloft their embattled towers for the defense of the town; but he found nothing of the kind. He marvelled much at this, and spoke of it to the king. "Sir," he said, "I have visited most of the principal towns, and I find no walls reared for defense. Why is this?" "Indeed, Sir Ambassador," said Agesilaus, "thou canst not have looked carefully. Come with me to-morrow morning, and I will show you the walls of Sparta." Accordingly, on the following morning, the king led his great guest out upon the plains where his army was drawn up in full battle array, and, pointing proudly to the serried hosts, he said: "Thou beholdest the walls of Sparta—ten thousand men, and every man a brick!"

7931. DEFILEMENT, Biblical. Figures of logs, generally wild in the East, prowling about the street, and feeding on garbage, Ps. 59: 6; Matt. 7: 6. Swine, delighting in filthiness, 2 Pet. 2: 22. A cage of unclean birds,

Jer. 5: 27; Rev. 18: 2. Defiled garments, Is. 64: 6; Rev. 3: 14. Sepulchres full of dead men's bones, and all uncleanness, Matt. 23: 27. The leprosy, the special type of sin, Lev. 13th and 14th chapters. The melancholy picture of corruption, loathsomeness, and decay; affecting persons, garments, houses; beginning insidiously, and spreading with a relentless progress, until complete destruction left nothing more to do; and besides incurable. The rites enjoined in the case of the leper all denoted, in the most humbling manner, the mournful effects of sin; see Lev. 13: 45, 46; the rent clothes, bare head, covered lip, and the leper's pitiable cry, if any one came near, "Unclean, unclean," and the separation from society, without the camp. Some of these signs are the same as those appointed in mourning for the dead. Regulations about social life—Child-bearing, Lev. 12: 2-8; food, Lev. 11; disease, Lev. 15; contact with uncleanness, Lev. 5: 2, 3; 11: 24, 25; 22: 5, 6. Regulations about death—Touching a dead body, or carcase of a beast, or a grave, Num. 19: 11-22; Lev. 17: 15, 16; 5: 2-13; even entering the tent where the dead lay, Num. 19: 14; the priests mourning for the dead, Lev. 21: 1-3. Regulations about sacred duties—Even taking part in these, in some cases, made men liable to ceremonial uncleanness. Burning the sin offering, e.g., on the day of atonement, Lev. 16: 28; leading the scape-goat into the wilderness, Lev. 16: 26, etc. THE RED HEIFER was a striking illustration of the imputation of defilement, Num. 19: 1-10. (1) The heifer itself, as bearing the uncleanness of the people, was to be carried without the camp. (2) Eleazar was to offer it, not Aaron, that the high priest might not be defiled. (3) Eleazar, the priest, the man who burnt the heifer, and even the clean man that gathered the ashes, were all rendered ceremonially unclean by the performance of these duties. THE MORAL LEPROSY—It would be difficult to describe to the full the awful extent of the spreading taint of sin. Trace in Conc. under the head of defiled, and see how "sin" is inscribed on men's mind and conscience—body—hands—feet—flesh—garments—house—land, etc.; under filthy—"filthiness of the flesh and spirit"—"filthy communications"—"filthy lucre" (five times)—"all filthiness and superfluity of naughtiness"—"even our righteousnesses are as filthy rags," and man is "abominable and filthy"—"altogether filthy." Zech. 3—The high priest Zechariah represented Israel appearing before the Lord—first, clothed with filthy garments; then clothed with change of raiment, adorned and crowned with personal and official dignity. Haggai 2: 11-13. How much more easily is uncleanness communicated than purity! One drop of ink will stain a glass of water, but one drop of water cannot purify a glassful of ink. Isa. 52: 11—"Touch no unclean thing." One of the great lessons God would teach his Church. It was the charge given to Israel on their entering Canaan—"Defile not yourselves," see Conc.; on their leaving Babylon

Isa. 52: 11; applied to the Church of Christ in her separation from the world, 2 Cor. 6: 14.

7932. DEGENERATION, Human. I have read of a painter, who being warmly reprehended by a cardinal for putting too much red in the faces of St. Paul and St. Peter, answered, "It is to show how much they blush at the conduct of many who style themselves their successors." Were Abraham, the father of the faithful, now on earth, how would he disclaim all relation to many who call themselves his offspring! Though there was less grace discovered to the saints of old, yet there was more grace discovered by them. They knew little and did much; we know much and do little.

7933. DEGRADATION, Pagan. Rev. Mr. Kicherer, a German missionary, who labored for many years as a missionary in Southern Africa, gives the following account of the lowest and most degraded tribe of the Hottentot race called Bushmen: "Their manner of life is extremely wretched and disgusting. They delight to besmear their bodies with the fat of animals, mingled with ochre, and sometimes with grime. They are utter strangers to cleanliness, as they never wash their bodies, but suffer the dirt to accumulate, so that it will hang a considerable length from the elbows. Their huts are formed by digging a hole in the earth, about three feet deep, and then making a roof of reeds, which is, however, insufficient to keep off the rains. Here they lie close together like pigs in a sty. They are extremely lazy, so that nothing will rouse them to action but excessive hunger. They will continue several days together without food, rather than be at the pains of procuring it. When compelled to sally forth for prey, they are dexterous at destroying the various beasts which abound in the country; and they can run almost as well as a horse. They are total strangers to domestic happiness. The men have several wives; but conjugal affection is little known. They take no great care of their children, and never correct them except in a fit of rage, when they almost kill them by severe usage. In a quarrel between father and mother, or the several wives of the husband, the defeated party wreaks his or her vengeance on the child of the conqueror, which in general loses its life. Tame Hottentots seldom destroy their children, except in a fit of passion; but the Bushmen will kill their children without remorse, on various occasions; as when they are ill-shaped, when they are in want of food, when the father of the child has forsaken its mother, or when obliged to flee from the farmers or others; in which case they will strangle them, smother them, cast them away in the desert, or bury them alive. There are instances of parents throwing their offspring to the hungry lion, who stands roaring before their cavern, refusing to depart till some peace-offering be made to him. In general their children cease to be objects of a mother's care as soon as they are able to crawl about in the field. In some few instances, however, we have met with a spark of natural affection which places them on a level with the brute creation."

7934. DEGRADED, Renovation of the. The paper manufacturer is not nice in the choice of his materials. He does not reject a torn or a filthy piece as unfit for his purpose. All come alike to him. The clean and glancing cloth from the table of the rich and the filthy rags from a beggar's back are equally welcome. The clean cannot be serviceable without passing through the manufacturer's process, and the unclean can be made serviceable with it. He throws both into the same machine, puts both through the same process, and brings out both new creatures. The Pharisees were scandalized on observing that publicans and sinners came in streams to Christ, and were all accepted. "This man receiveth sinners," they complained. Yea, receiveth them; sinners are taken in between the wheels, at the commencement of this process; but at the end of it, saints in white clothing are thrown out, fit for the kingdom of heaven. Christ does not find any pure on earth; he makes them. Those that stand round the throne in white clothing were gathered from the mire. They were once darkness, though they be now light in the Lord.

7935. DEGRADED, Transformation of the. In the manufacture of coal gas a large quantity of coal tar is left in the retorts. It is a black substance constantly giving off foul odors, and was for a time regarded as worthless. From this vile stuff more than forty different articles have been produced which promote health, gratify the most refined taste, and add to our comfort. Such is the transformation wrought by the gospel upon polluted, vicious and degraded men, and they become bright jewels in the Saviour's crown.

7936. DEGREES, History of. Irnerius, the celebrated jurist, is said to have introduced the degree of Doctor into the universities. The first ceremony of this kind was performed at Bologna, on the person of Bulgarus, in the year 1130, who began to profess the Roman law, and on that occasion was promoted to the doctorate. The custom was soon transferred from the faculty of law to that of theology; and Peter Lombard is the first doctor in sacred theology upon record in the university of Paris. Ancient English writers hold the venerable Bede to have been the first doctor of Cambridge, and John de Beverley at Oxford; the latter died in 712. But Spelman thinks there was no title or degree in England till about the year 1207. John Hambois is supposed to be the first musician who was honored with the title of doctor in England. Holinshed, in his "Chronicles," tells us—"John Hambois was an excellent musician, and for his notable cunning therein he was made a doctor of music."

Loaring.

7937. DEGREES, Mercenary. Luther relates, that Carolstad was promoted Doctor of Divinity eight years before he had read any of the Bible. Afterwards Luther conferred the degree of Doctor on one at Wittemberg, and made this speech: "Here I stand and do promote this man; and I know I do not rightly therein, and that thereby I do commit a mortal sin; but I do it for the gain of two gilders, which I get by him."

7938. DEITY, Footsteps of. There is no creature in the world, wherein we may not see enough to wonder at; for there is no worm of the earth, no spire of grass, no leaf, no twig, wherein we see not the footsteps of a Deity. The best visible creature is man. Now, what man is he that can make but an hair, or a straw, much less any sensitive creature, so as no less than an infinite power is seen in every object that presents itself to our eyes: if, therefore, we look only on the outside of these bodily substances, and we do not see God in every thing, we are no better than brutish; make use merely of our sense, without the least improvement of our faith or our reason. Contrary, then, to the opinion of those men who hold that a wise man should admire nothing, I say that a truly wise and good man should admire everything, or rather that infiniteness of wisdom and omnipotence which shows itself in every visible object.

Bishop Hall.

7939. DEITY, Omnipresence of. The unfathomable ether, that emblem of Omnipresent Deity, which, everywhere enfolding and supporting man, yet baffles his senses and is unperceived, except when he looks upwards and contemplates it above him.

Hare.

7940. DEITY, World without a. What would the world be without a Deity, without love, justice, freedom, retribution? A gigantic corpse, from which the soul has fled; an unconscious play of things, in which there is no place for the highest and best—for virtue, love, perfection, but only for their names. A miserable, unmeaning, unsolvable, never-ending riddle; and the most wretched of beings in it—man, with the claims of his reason and the sentiments of his heart!

7941. DELAY, Beware of. When the Shunammite went to the prophet on behalf of her dead child, she made great haste to get to him, and said to her servant, "Drive and go forward, slack not thy pace;" but thou hast a business of greater concernment to go to Christ about than this woman had to go to the prophet. She had a dead son, and thou hast a soul dead in trespasses and sins; therefore make haste, go forward, slack not thy pace till thou hast gotten to Christ, and Christ hath given thee life.

7942. DELAY, Fatal. During a violent storm, a trading vessel was wrecked on the west coast of England. Many of the crew perished, but the captain and his wife were providentially enabled to reach a rock, and, climbing up, escaped from the waves. But the danger was not over. The tide was rising, the cold intense; and it soon became evident that unless assistance was quickly rendered, they must perish. Happily, they were seen from the neighboring shore, and a boat was sent to attempt their rescue. As the boat could not possibly come close to the rock, the only alternative was to project a rope from the shore by a rocket, and then to haul them through the surf within reach of the boat. After many fruitless attempts this succeeded, and then the only way of deliverance was by springing into the wave at the moment of its highest swell, and being borne over the danger and pulled into the boat. The wife was the first to make the attempt, and was told what to do. All was ready. The big wave swelled full at her feet. "Now, now," shouted the crew, "spring into the wave!" Alas! she trembled, hesitated, delayed only a moment—but that moment was fatal. She leaped towards the receding wave, fell upon the rugged rocks beneath, and the next moment was dragged on board, a mangled, lifeless corpse. The captain, ignorant of her hapless fate, followed, and, taking the wave in the swell, was saved.

7943. DELAY, Folly of. More wise was the poor peasant in the fable, who is represented as coming and sitting by the side of a swiftly-flowing river, and who, because it flowed so swiftly, fancied that it must soon run dry, and therefore sat upon the brink and watched and waited; but still it flowed on. So it is with the man who waits for a more convenient season; the river of corruption, of obstacle, of impediment, runs on, and broadens, and deepens as it goes.

Hugh Stowell.

7944. DELAY, A Little. During the closing services one Sabbath, my eyes rested on a lovely youth. I approached him, and exhorted him to repentance and faith on the Lord Jesus Christ. He replied, "I am not ready now, but in two weeks I am resolved to seek the salvation of my soul." A few days after, this minister was summoned to visit him upon a bed of sickness. He said to the minister, "I was invited to the Saviour at the meeting on the Sabbath, but replied that I was not ready then, and now I am not ready to die." On a subsequent visit, the dying youth exclaimed, "I was not ready to seek God at the meeting; I was not ready to die when the message came; and now I am not ready to lie down in hell! My two weeks have not yet elapsed when I hoped to have made my peace with God, and sickness, death, and hell have overtaken me, and I am forever lost."

E. P. Hill.

7945. DELAY, Propensity to. Why will men put off this repentance until to-morrow, and day after day, in the way they do? Is it because they love sin so much? Is it because they want to have their own way? Why, it is very much like Pharaoh when he had the plague of the frogs. He could not take a step but that he put his foot down on a frog. There were frogs in his bed-room, in his sitting-room. They got into his kneading-troughs. Out a loaf of bread and a frog would be found in it. It was frog, frog, frog. At last it annoyed him so he was compelled to send for Moses. And Moses said to him, When shall I ask the Lord to take them away? I remember well the first time I read that. I, of course, thought that Pharaoh, in answer to that question, would have said, "Now, now," with all his might, and with all the earnestness of which he was capable. Did he say that? Why, no; he said "To-morrow." He wanted the frogs all night. You laugh at that. Yet you want to hold on to your sins just as long as you are able. Well, are these sins so sweet, that you like them so? Like them, then, if you want to, but you hear what God says. He commands you to repent and leave them.

Moody.

7946. DELAY, Risking. A young lady at church, in North Carolina, gave heed to a powerful and awakening sermon, the preacher urging an immediate acceptance of Christ, and warning of the dangers of delay and putting off for a more convenient season. A few days after the young lady was dangerously ill, and sent for the preacher to come and see her. He went and found her at death's door, and yet she told him she neither wished him to pray with or talk to her; that she had heard his sermon the Sunday before, and at the time had written with her pencil a certain sentence in her hymn-book, and ever since then all had been darkness and her heart as hard as stone. The preacher took the hymn-book, and read on the fly-leaf in the back of the book the following fatal sentence: "I'll run the risk." A few hours more, and the young woman died in the darkness of despair. She had run the risk.

Darnall.

7947. DELAY, Too Long. A minister stroked the head of a young soldier as he lay upon his cot in the hospital, and said, "You are almost through with this world." "Am I?" "Yes, and I hope you are ready for the next." "No, I am not—not ready, not ready!" "Well, Jesus is all ready, and waiting right here. Shall I pray?" "Oh, no, no; it is too late! I ought to have been a Christian long ago." There was a time when he was deeply convicted. In memory of it he now cried, "That was the time; I might have come to Christ then, why didn't I? why didn't I?" He drew the blanket over his head, saying, "Don't talk to me any more; it's too late, I can't hear it." The next morning on the delegate's return death had done its work and his cot was empty.

7948. DELAY, Youthful. A young man who had been putting off the subject of religion, was one day thrown from his horse and carried into the nearest house, and being told that he could not live an hour he cried out, "Must I go into eternity in an hour? Must I stand before my Judge in one short hour? God knows I have made no preparation for this event! I have heard of impenitent young men thus suddenly cut off, but it never occurred to me that I should be one! O tell me, tell me what I must do to be saved!" He was told that he must repent of his sins, and look to Jesus Christ for pardon. "But I do not know how to repent. The whole work of my life time is crowded into this hour of agony. O! what shall I do to be saved?" he continued to cry, with an eye glaring with desperation. But death would not wait, and, crying out for aid and instruction, he sank back upon his pillow, and in a moment was in eternity.

7949. DELIBERATION, Rule for. Athenodorus, the philosopher, gave Augustus, the Roman Emperor, the following advice, viz.: "Before he did or said anything of unusual importance to repeat to himself the twenty-four letters of the Greek alphabet." The old philosopher hoped thereby to prevent hasty resolutions and precipitate action, which are soon followed by vain repentance.

7950. DELIVERANCE, Improvement of. A fashionable lady was driving along the road between Margate and Ramsgate. The road is situated upon the chalk cliffs which overhang the sea, and sometimes very near its edge. One day her horse took fright and backed the carriage so that she was thrown over the precipice. Some men who had seen the accident thought she must certainly be dashed in pieces on the rocks below. They were surprised to find that she was caught part way down by a projecting rock. They lowered themselves to where she lay and found her insensible, but they restored her to consciousness. She was not seriously injured, and soon pursued her course of life as thoughtless as usual. Some years after she heard a sermon, "Who redeemeth thy life from destruction," Ps. 103: 4, and saw and felt how ungrateful and thoughtless she had been, not to give her heart to that God who had so signally preserved her life. Then she made a consecration of herself to her Preserver and Redeemer.

7951. DELIVERANCE, Memento of. To commemorate the deliverance of England from the formidable Spanish Armada, Queen Elizabeth commanded a medal to be struck, representing the Armada scattered and sinking in the background, and in the front the British fleet riding triumphant, with the following passage as a motto round the medal: "Thou didst blow with thy wind, and the sea covered them."

7952. DELIVERANCE, Signal of. The original suggestion of the famous revival song, "Hold the Fort," was an incident of the late war. After the fall of Atlanta, when Gen. Hood started on his march north, the fort and base of supplies which Sherman had established at Altoona, were threatened, and Sherman started in hot haste to reinforce the garrison. Hood was attacking the fort with overwhelming forces, and the defenders were about to succumb when they saw Sherman's signal flag waving from a mountain top in the distance. The words of the signal were, "Hold the fort, for I am coming." They were encouraged, and held the fortress till deliverance came.

7953. DELIVERANCE, Strange. A sailor named Campbell felt one evening, when near the African shore, a disposition to bathe. His companions would have dissuaded him from it, as they had recently seen several sharks; but being partly intoxicated, he would not listen to their persuasions. Nearly as soon as he was in the water, his companions saw an alligator directing its course towards him, and considered his escape from death impossible.

They fired at the alligator, but in vain. Campbell became aware of his danger, and immediately made for the shore. On approaching within a very short distance of some canes and shrubs that covered the bank, and while closely pursued by the alligator, a ferocious tiger sprang towards him at the very instant he was about being devoured by his first enemy. At this moment he was preserved. The eager tiger overleaped him, fell into the grasp of the alligator, and, after a long struggle, was killed by him. Campbell was conveyed to his vessel, returned thanks to Providence which had preserved him, and from that period was a changed man. Anon.

7954. DELIVERANCE, Transport of. Open the iron-bound door of the condemned cell, and by the dim light that struggles through its bars read the sovereign's free pardon to the felon, stretched, pale and emaciated, upon his pallet of straw; and the radiance you have kindled in that gloomy dungeon, and the transport you have created in that felon's heart, is a present realization. You have given him back a present life; you have touched a thousand chords in his bosom which awake a present harmony; and where, just previous, reigned sullen, grim despair, now reigns the sunlight joyousness of a present hope. Dr. O. Winslow.

7955. DELUGE, Description of the. The waters rise till rivers swell into lakes, and lakes become seas, and the sea stretches out her arms along fertile plains to seize their flying population. Still the waters rise; and now mingled with beasts that terror has tamed, men climb to the mountain tops, with the flood roaring at their heels. Still the waters rise; and now each summit stands above them like a separate and sea-girt isle. Still the waters rise; and, crowding closer on the narrow spaces of lessening hill-tops, men and beasts fight for standing-room. Still the thunders roar, and the lightnings flash, and the rains descend, and the waters rise till the last survivor of the shrieking crowd is washed off, and the head of the highest Alp goes down beneath the wave. Now the waters rise no more. God's servant has done his work. He rests from his labors, and, all land drowned, all life destroyed, an awful silence reigning and a shoreless ocean rolling, Death for once has nothing to do but ride in triumph on the top of some giant billow, which, meeting no coast, no continent, no Alp, no Andes against which to break, sweeps round and round the world. Dr. Guthrie.

7956. DELUSIONS, Destructive. There are many false lights in the world, there is but one true light. 'Tis our nature to be drawn forth and dazzled by those false lights, by worldly ambition, carnal pleasures, uncertain riches. We seek the sparkling but fatal deceit, we encircle it, hover nearer and nearer. Warnings there are to stop us in our deluded course. A kind hand would often stop us, often it is thrust between us and the scorching glare, too often with too many in vain. They reach the object of their desire, but it becomes their destruction. The true light, the source of life, and cheerfulness, and peace, has shined in vain for them; has been shunned as if it were some horrible and pestilential meteor. Would you see the parable of this in nature's volume? See the moth drawn forth by the glare of a mean and rank-smelling candle. Its red and glowing flame proves only too attractive; the insect hovers nearer and nearer, and the hand of the observer is often thrust before the treacherous light; how very often is the warning offered in vain,—the flame is reached, but with it death! For the same insect, the bright and glorious sun, the source of life and health, has shined in vain; the moth hath shunned it; we seldom see it on the wing till the bright and beautiful sun has come to its setting. Salter.

7957. DELUSION, The Sinner's. Be not like the foolish drunkard, who, staggering home one night, saw his candle lit for him. "Two candles!" said he, for his drunkenness made him see double, "I will blow out one," and as he blew it out, in a moment he was in the dark. Many a man sees double through the drunkenness of sin; he has one life to sow his wild oats in, and then he half expects another in which to turn to God; so, like a fool, he blows out the only candle that he has, and in the dark he will have to lie down forever. Spurgeon.

7958. DEMAND, Supply and. Had there been no monsters to subdue there had been no Hercules. T. Parker.

7959. DEMONIAC, Healing a. If I were an artist, I would like to draw a picture, and hang it up on yonder wall, that you might see it; that is of the father that came to Christ with his beloved boy. He had been up on the mountain with Peter, James and John, and there he met Elias, the prophet, and Moses, the law-giver. Heaven and earth had come together, and there he had met his Father, and he had spoken to him that memorable night on the mountain. In the morning, when he came down, a crowd of people gathered round him, and some were laughing and talking; they had been trying to cast the evil spirit out of this boy, and told his pitiful story. No one knows but a father how much that man loved that boy; his heart was wrapped up in that child; but the boy was not only deaf and dumb, but he was possessed with a devil, and sometimes this devil would throw him into the fire and sometimes into the water; and when the father came to Jesus, he said to him, "Bring him unto me." And when he was coming, the devil cast him down to the ground. So every man on his way to Christ must first be cast down. There he lay foaming, wallowing, and Jesus only said, "How long has this been?" "From his birth," was the answer; "oh, you do not know how much I have suffered with this boy! When a child he was grievously tormented; he has broken my heart." Some of you here perhaps have children who are suffering from some terrible disease, and who are breaking your hearts—you can sympathize with that father. How that father wept when he brought that poor boy! And when Jesus saw that pitiful scene his heart was moved with compassion.

and with a word he cast out the devil. I can see the boy coming home with his father, leaping, and singing, and praying. Let us learn a lesson. Mother, father, have you got a son that the devil has taken possession of? Bring him to Jesus. He delights to save; he delights to bless. All we have to do is to take him in the arms of our faith, and bring him to Jesus. I want to call your attention to a difference between the father we read of in the 9th chapter of Mark and the poor leper in the 1st chapter. The leper says: "If thou wilt, thou canst make me whole." There was the "if" in the right place. The other said, "If thou canst, have compassion." He put the "if" in the wrong place. The Lord said, "If thou canst believe, all things are possible." Let us believe that the Son of God can save our sons and our daughters. Oh, have you got a poor drunken son? Have you a poor brother who is a slave to strong drink? Come; bring him to the meeting here to-morrow night and let your cry be, "Lord, have compassion on my darling boy and save him." Moody.

7960. DEMONS, Habitation of. It is said that St. Parthenius was casting a devil out of a man who had been a long time possessed, when the evil spirit asked for a habitation. Being promised one he said, "Thou wilt cast me out and bid me enter into a swine." "Nay, verily," said the saint, "I will offer thee a man to dwell in." Then the devil came out of the man and the saint said, "Come now, thou foul spirit, I am the man. Enter into me if thou canst." Then the devil cried out that he could not abide in so holy a tabernacle and so fled away. This is a legend of the fourth century.

7961. DENIALS, God's. Israel besought Moses to pray for the removal of the fiery serpents. The Lord did not remove the serpents, but gave them an effectual remedy for their bite, Num. 21: 7-9. Moses.—His earnest request to enter the promised land was rejected, but God favored him with a miraculous view of Canaan before he died, and called him gently to himself in peace and honor, Dent. 3: 23-27; 34: 1-7. David very naturally prayed that his child might live. The Lord refused the request, but gave him another child, honorably born and rarely endowed, and "the Lord loved him," 2 Sam. 12: 16-25. His desire to build the house of the Lord was also denied, but he was allowed to gather the materials for the work, 1 Chron. 28, 29. The healed demoniac wished to be with Christ. The Lord was pleased rather to send him forth as a missionary to his own home and country; and not improbably, the kinder reception our Lord met with when he came into those parts again, was greatly the result of this man's testimony, Mark 5: 19, 20; 7: 31-37; Matt. 15: 29-31. St. Paul.—What a singular link in the chain of God's providence is the narrative in Acts 16: 6-34. The apostle's desire to go into Bithynia was thwarted without any reason apparently being given; but the result proved the opening of the gospel to Philippi, and the founding of the first Christian church in Europe! So, similarly, the apostle's thrice repeated prayer for the removal of the "thorn in the flesh," was answered by the assurance of strength to endure the trial, 2 Cor. 12: 9. How many have cause to bless God for thwarted wishes! The Lord Jesus himself prayed that his bitter cup of suffering might be taken away, and "he was heard," Heb. 5: 7, but in being strengthened to bear the conflict. Luke 22: 42, 43. Bowles.

7962. DENOMINATIONS, Abolition of. I wish all names among the saints of God were swallowed up in that one of Christian. I long for professors to leave off placing religion in any saying, "I am a Churchman," "I am a Dissenter." My language to such is, "Are you of Christ? If so, I love you with all my heart." Whitefield.

7963. DENOMINATIONS, Traits of. Bishop Chase, an Episcopalian bishop of Ohio, met an old school-mate of whom he had been long ignorant, and finding him a judge of good standing, congratulated him upon their success in life, and the honorable position in which they found each other, concluding, "And, better than all, judge, I find you are a member of our church." "Well," said the judge, "that's more a matter of chance than anything else. You see, when I was getting established in my profession, wife and I thought we ought to join some church; 'twas more respectable. So, after mature deliberation, we settled down with the Baptists, and got on very well for a time; but they kept harping on 'faith,' 'faith,' till we pretty soon discovered that they required more 'faith' than we had; so it became necessary to make a change. We turned the matter over considerably, and at last, from various reasons, made up our minds to join the Methodists. Here we found the demand was, 'work,' 'work,' incessantly; and it was presently apparent that they demanded more 'work,' than we were able to perform. It was with great reluctance that we concluded that we must change again, and cast about with much caution, that this move might be final. At last we decided to connect ourselves with your church, bishop, and have got along famously ever since, without either faith or works."

7964. DENOMINATIONS Unknown in Heaven. A pious person once affirmed to me that on the previous night he had the following dream: He thought that he had died, and arrived at the gates of heaven. When he applied to the holy watchmen to admit him within the sacred walls, they inquired, "Whom do you want?" He replied that he belonged to the Independents, and wished to join them in that place. "There are no such people here!" was the answer that he got. "Well," said he, "I have had some connection with the Baptists; may I join them?" "We don't know any of that name," replied the heavenly watchman. It was in vain that he asked for Churchmen—they had never heard of such a term; there were not even any Wesleyans there. He was just going away in despair, when, as a last resource, he said, "But I am a Christian." At this word the gate of bliss flew open, and he was received as a welcome guest. H. Townley.

7965. DENOMINATIONS, War among. Melancthon mourned the divisions among Protestants, and sought to bring them together by the parable of the war between the wolves and the dogs. The wolves were somewhat afraid, for the dogs were many and strong, and they sent out a spy to observe them. On his return, the scout said, "It is true the dogs are many, but there are not many mastiffs among them. There are dogs of so many sorts one can hardly count them; and as for the worst of them," said he, "they are little dogs, which bark loudly, but cannot bite. However, this did not cheer me so much," said the wolf, "as this, that as they came marching on, I observed they were all snapping right and left at one another, and I could see clearly that though they all hate the wolf, yet each dog hates every other dog with all his heart." Spurgeon.

7966. DEPENDENCE, Benefit of. The joint dependence of human beings has led to the most beneficial results, inasmuch as long experience, has shown the inadequacy of unaided exertion. By so much as the highly cultivated individual is superior to the houseless savage, by so much is man in society, and assisted by his fellows raised above those who dwell in isolation and estrangement. Thus, human wants promote the cultivation of human energies, and evils at first sight irremediable, become the source of intelligence and refinement. The solitary wanderer may have few vices, but he can have no virtues; for the qualities that ennoble the heart of man, and send his intellect careering through the boundless fields of science and art, are to be ascribed to the influence of association with his fellows, on his mental, moral, and physical capabilities. The errors of society must be rectified by society itself; the breaking up of intercourse might diminish, but could not increase human excellence.

M' Cormac.

7967. DEPENDENCE, Support in. In an arch, each single stone, which, if severed from the rest, would be perhaps defenceless, is sufficiently secured by the solidity and entireness of the whole fabric of which it is a part.

Robert Boyle.

7968. DEPENDENCE, Universal. There is none made so great, but he may both need the help and service, and stand in fear of the power and unkindness, even of the meanest of mortals.

Seneca.

7969. DEPORTMENT, Rule for. Be reserved, but not sour; grave, but not formal; bold, but not rash; humble, but not servile; patient, but not insensible; constant, but not obstinate; cheerful, but not light. Rather be sweet-tempered than familiar; familiar, rather than intimate; and intimate with very few, and with those few upon good grounds. Penn.

7970. DEPRAVITY, Admission of. Rev. Dr. Waugh, of the Methodist Episcopal Mission in India, states that the Hindus and Mohammedans almost universally concede the depravity of the race. Among illustrative examples he give this from one of the chief men in Lucknow: "The sinfulness of man," said he, "is easy enough understood when we remember that in disposing of a good thing—for instance, milk—we have to carry it to men's doors; and when we wish to furnish that which is evil—that is, sell rum—we have but to open a shop, and they come to us. 'That is,' continued the man, "we will make sacrifices to destroy ourselves, but none to help ourselves."

7971. DEPRAVITY, Corruption of. I have read of an English painter, who, after only meeting any stranger in the streets, could go home and paint that person's picture to the life. Let us suppose that one whose likeness is taken in this manner should happen to see unexpectedly his own picture. It would startle him. The exact similitude of air, shape, features and complexion, would convince him that the representation was designed for himself, though his own name be not affixed to it, and he is conscious that he never sat for the piece. In the scriptures of truth we have a striking delineation of human depravity through original sin. Though we have not sat to the inspired writers, the likeness suits us all. When the Spirit of God holds up the mirror and shows us to ourselves, we see, we feel, we deplore, our apostasy from, and our inability to recover the image of his rectitude. Experience proves the horrid likeness true; and we need no arguments to convince us, that in and of ourselves we are spiritually "wretched, and miserable, and poor, and blind, and naked." Salter.

7972. DEPRAVITY, Course of. We fall not from virtue, like Vulcan from heaven, in a day. Bad dispositions require some time to grow into bad habits; bad habits must undermine good, and oft-repeated acts make us habitually evil; so that by gradual depravations, and while we are but staggeringly evil, we are not left without parentheses of consideration, thoughtful rebukes, and merciful interventions, to recall us to ourselves. Brown.

7973. DEPRAVITY, Evidences of. As it is said of Crete, we may by great chance discover one single region of the world that never afforded any dens and coverts for wild beasts. But through the long succession of ages, even to this time, there scarce ever was a state or kingdom that hath not suffered under envy, hatred, emulation, the love of strife, fierce and unruly passions, of all others the most productive of enmity and ill-will among men. Nay, if nothing else will bring it to pass, familiarity will at last breed contempt, and the very friendship of men doth frequently draw them into quarrels, that prove sharp and sometimes implacable. Plutarch.

7974. DEPRAVITY, Heathen Testimony to. The fox in Æsop, disputing with the panther for the superiority in beautiful variety, when the latter had shown his body, and his superfluities curiously stained and spotted, whereas the fox's tawny skin was ill-favored and unpleasant to the sight, said thus: "But if you, sir judge, will look within me, you will find me much fuller of variety than this leopard;" manifesting the nimble subtlety of his natural disposition, frequently changing as occasions require

Let us then say also to ourselves: "Thy body, O man, naturally of itself breeds many diseases and passions, and many it receives befalling it from without; but if thou shalt open thy interior, thou wilt find a certain various and abundantly furnished storehouse and (as Democritus says) treasury of evils, not flowing into it from abroad, but having as it were their inbred and original springs, which vice, exceedingly affluent and rich in passions, causes to break forth.

Plutarch.

7975. DEPRAVITY, Infantile. A child of three years became enraged at her mother. She screamed and raved in her uncontrolled rage, and fell suddenly dead in the midst of her violent passion.

7976. DEPRAVITY, Parable of. Adam Sibbald, in a book called Orfie Sibbald and his Difficulties, thus illustrates depravity: "He opened the clock-case which stood in the corner, and cautiously extracted the pendulum. Instantly, and with loud whirr, the wheels of the clock flew round with prodigious speed, and the hands coursed rapidly over the dial-plate. After a few seconds of this, Adam inserted the pendulum, readjusted the hands, and returned to his seat. "Now, Orfie," he said, "let that parable speak. The wheels of the clock were every one of them there, and every one of them in working order. And yet, from the single want of the pendulum, the whole machine was perfectly useless for its only purpose of correctly measuring time; nay, it was in actual danger of breaking itself to pieces by its unregulated speed. But the moment that the pendulum was replaced, the same wheels in the same condition began to move with regularity, answering the chief end of the machine, and that with safety to themselves. And my parable applies to the case in hand, if you do not press it too far. The same man who, when left to himself, runs only to ruin, and is quite useless so far as glorifying God by his life is concerned, becomes now, when the fear and love of God are inserted into his heart as its regulating principle, a new man. The sinful disorder is checked; the ruinous waste is corrected; and, as in the case of the clock, the whole is effected by the mere insertion of the pendulum."

7977. DEPRAVITY, Question of. A cavalier once asked Dr. Nettleton, "How came I by my wicked heart?" "That," he replied, "is a question which does not concern you so much as another, namely, How you shall get rid of it. You have a wicked heart, which renders you entirely unfit for the kingdom of God; and you must have a new heart, or you cannot be saved; and the question which now most deeply concerns you is, How shall you obtain it?" "But," says the man, "I wish you to tell me how I came by my wicked heart." "I shall not," replied Dr. Nettleton, "do that at present; for if I could do it to your entire satisfaction, it would not in the least help you toward obtaining a new heart. The great thing for which I am solicitous is, that you should become a new creature, and be prepared for heaven." As the man manifested no disposition to hear anything on that subject, but still pressed the question how he came by his wicked heart, Dr. Nettleton told him that his condition resembled that of a man who is drowning, while his friends are attempting to save his life. As he rises to the surface of the water, he exclaims, "How came I here?" "That question," says one of his friends, "does not concern you now. Take hold of this rope." "But how came I here?" he asks again. "I shall not stop to answer that question now," replies his friend. "Then I'll drown," says the infatuated man; and spurning all proffered aid, sinks to the bottom.

7978. DESERTION, Spiritual. Vessels at sea, that are richly fraught with jewels and spices, may be in the dark and tossed in the storm; so a soul enriched with the treasures of grace, may yet be in the dark of desertion, and so tossed as to think it shall be cast away in the storm.

T. Watson.

7979. DESIGNER, Omnipotent. In the mechanics' hall of the Centennial Exhibition was gathered the largest and most wonderful collection of machinery of all kinds that the world has ever seen. Here automatic machines were producing articles of various kinds. Every machine gave evidence of adaptation for its peculiar work. The looms produced sheetings or ribbons or cloths after their kind. No one saw such a prodigy as a thresher producing boots and shoes, or a printing press threshing grain. All this vast quantity of machinery, which did any work, was connected with a great centre of power, the Corliss engine. Upon this all depended. How small is this wonderful display compared with the wonders of creation! We serve the God who is the author both of the wisdom and the power here displayed.

7980. DESIRES, Government of the. Since, of desires, some are natural and necessary; others natural, but not necessary; and others neither natural nor necessary, but the offspring of a wrong judgment: it must be the office of temperance to gratify the first class, as far as nature requires; to restrain the second within the bounds of moderation; and as to the third resolutely to oppose, and if possible, entirely to repress them.

History of Philosophy.

7981. DESIRES, Gratification of. It is a most miserable state for a man to have everything according to his desire, and quietly to enjoy the pleasures of life. There needs no more to expose him to eternal misery.

Bishop Wilson.

7982. DESIRES, Selfish: A Fable. An active young seal, after an excursion to the sunny South, returned and gave a glowing account of what he had seen to the icebergs of the Arctic. A silly young iceberg who thought himself adapted to shine in other society, became more dissatisfied than ever with his chilly surroundings, and resolved to make the same trip on his own account. He would not listen to the advice of his seniors, but broke recklessly away, and sailed, with all his ribs beating with joy, towards the glorious South

"Now I shall be of use in the world," he thought. But alas, for his good intentions! His first act was to smash and run down a boat in the dark, and he heard plenty of abuse from the sailors in the ship to which it was fastened by a rope. "Ah," he sighed, "I am clumsy, I am in the way;" and when knocked about by waves and winds, "Would I were back in the North! Ah," said he, "I did not know what a peaceful home I had till I lost it, and by my own wilfulness too;" and the poor iceberg sighed and melted in tears of distress and anxiety. He tried to return, but in vain. Alas! it is usually so with those who take a downward path. And the sun looked down on him and lighted up his crests and pinnacles, and the refraction of the light illuminated his crevices, and the soft waves curled round him and laved his base; but the poor iceberg wept the more. The treacherous sun, while beautifying him, only shone on him to melt his peaks one by one, until at last with a gurgling groan he disappeared in the lonely sea, an example to all who leave the station in which they are placed by a loving Father, for a pathway chosen by themselves, and which is certain to end in waste and ruin.

Sunday at Home.

7983. DESPAIR. Arrested. Some hares, driven desperate by the enemies that compassed them about on every side, came to the sad resolution that there was nothing left for them but to make away with themselves, one and all. Off they scudded to a lake hard by, determined to drown themselves as the most miserable of creatures. A shoal of frogs seated upon the bank, frightened at the approach of the hares, leaped in the greatest alarm and confusion into the water. "Nay, then, my friends," said a hare that was foremost, "our case is not so desperate yet; for here are other poor creatures more faint-hearted than ourselves."

Æsop.

7984. DESPAIR, Crime of. There is a possibility of salvation to any yet living. While there is life there is hope. Out of the hell of despair there is redemption; though out of the despair of hell there is no redemption. I have read of one in despair whom Satan persuaded it was in vain to pray or serve God, for he must certainly go to hell, who yet went to prayer, and begged of God that if he must go to hell when he died, yet he would please to give him leave to serve him while he lived, upon which his terrors vanished; being clearly convinced none could pray that prayer that had sinned the sin against the Holy Ghost. Still again let me say to thee, as Tamar to Ammon in another case. This later evil in turning mercy out of doors is worse than the former abusing it, and forcing it to serve thy lusts. Both are naught (i. e., wicked), this worse. The sin of Cain despairing was worse than the killing of his brother. There he wronged justice, here mercy; thereby he violated the law, hereby he disparaged the Gospel; thereby he set light by the blood of his brother, hereby of the blood of a Saviour, which crieth louder for better things than the blood of Abel for vengeance. We say the like of Judas's despair; it was a greater sin than the betraying of his master. Sheffield.

7985. DESPAIR, Cure for. It is impossible for that man to despair who remembers that his helper is Omnipotent. Jeremy Taylor.

7986. DESPAIR Dishonors God. He that despairs degrades the Deity, and seems to intimate that he is insufficient, or unfaithful to his word, and in vain hath read the Scriptures, the world and man. Feltham.

7987. DESPAIR, Evils of. Despair makes a despicable figure, and is descended from a mean original. It is the offspring of fear, laziness, and impatience. It argues a defect of spirit and resolution, and oftentimes of honesty too. After all the exercise of this passion is so troublesome, that nothing but dint of evidence and demonstration should force it upon us. I would not despair unless I knew the irrevocable decree was passed; saw my misfortune recorded in the book of fate, and signed and sealed by necessity. Jeremy Collier.

7988. DESPAIR, Never. The New Hampshire troops went forth to engage in the siege of Louisburg, a French stronghold deemed impregnable, called "The Gibraltar of America," in the spirit of Crusaders, with the motto, "Nil desperandum Christo subduce," inscribed upon their banners—Never despair with Christ for leader. Whitfield gave them this sentiment on leaving their native State. To them it was a constant inspiration, and a prophecy of victory from one of God's servants in whom they confided. The surrender of the fortress to the English was regarded as little less than miraculous. This event occurred in what is known as "King George's War," in 1745. The motto is appropriate to every Christian worker.

7989. DESPAIR Overcome. Once when Pelopidas was retreating with the Theban army, they came suddenly upon a much larger force of the Lacedemonians. A soldier ran and told him, "We are fallen into the hands of the enemy." Pelopidas answered, "And why not they into ours?" His skill as a general and the courage of his soldiers made it so. Faith, courage and fidelity will conquer.

7990. DESPONDENCY, Deliverance from. Rev. Robert Johnson gives a case of extreme despondency, resulting from physical debility. The lady overcame by looking to Jesus, and triumphed most gloriously during sickness and in death.

7992. DESPONDENCY, Lesson for. Rev. Thos. Collins, in visiting one of his parishioners, found ber in a very depressed condition. She had her infant in her arms. Mr. Collins said, "Drop that little one upon the floor." With an air of wonder at such a request, she refused. "Well," said he, "for what price would you do it?" "Not for as many sovereigns as there are stars." "You would not?" "No, I would not." "And do you really think that you love your feeble children more than the Lord does his?" Her face brightened, and, aided by that lesson from her own maternal love, faith grew strong.

7993. DESTRUCTION Easy. The work of destruction is always easier than the work of reparation. It is an easy matter to swallow a bit of poisoned food; it is not so easy to undo the dire effects of it. It is easy to kindle a great conflagration; it is a work of toil and trouble to subdue the flames. It is an easy thing to sin, but its effects are dreadful.

T. Alexander.

7994. DETECTION Certain. A man committed a foul murder in a Scotch castle upon a young bridegroom, at whose marriage festivities he had hypocritically assisted. The assassin took a horse in the dead of night, and fled for his life through wood and winding path. When the sun dawned, he slackened his pace, and behold! he was emerging from a thicket in front of the very castle whence he had fled, and to which, by tortuous paths, he had returned. Horror seized him; he was discovered, and condemned to death. However far and swift we may fly, we shall find ourselves, when light returns, ever in the presence of our sin and of our Judge.

Anon.

7995. DETECTION, Example of. Dr. Donne, afterwards the celebrated Dean of St. Paul's, when he took possession of the first living to which he was inducted, walked into the yard of the church where he was to officiate. It happened that as he sauntered along the sexton was digging a grave, and the doctor stood for a moment to observe his operations. As the man was at work he threw up a skull which in some way or other engaged the doctor's attention. While he examined it he perceived a headless nail which perforated the temple, and which convinced him that some dreadful deed must have been perpetrated. Taking up the skull, he demanded of the grave-digger to whom it had belonged. The man instantly said that he knew very well, that it had belonged to a man who was accustomed to excess in the use of liquor, and who, one night having been guilty of his usual intemperance, had been found dead in his bed in the morning. Dr. Donne then asked, "Had he a wife?" The answer was in the affirmative, "What character does she bear?" The sexton said a very good one, only she was reflected upon for marrying immediately after the death of her husband. This was enough for the doctor, who, upon pretence of visiting all his parishioners, soon called upon the woman in question; and in course of conversation he inquired of what sickness her husband had died. She gave him precisely the same account as the sexton had given before her. But the doctor produced the skull, and pointing to the place said, "Woman, do you know this nail?" The unhappy criminal was struck with horror at the demand and the sight, and instantly owned that she had been the perpetrator of the deed which had hurried her husband, in a state of intoxication, into the eternal world.

Providence of God Illustrated.

7996. DETECTION Sure. A gentleman owned a flute with one broken note, and the tunes played on it always missed that note. The flute was stolen, and no traces of it could be found for sometime. One day, in another part of the country, he heard a piping bullfinch whistling some tunes, but always dropping a note. This aroused his curiosity, and he found that the man that had taught the bird to sing was the one that had stolen the flute.

7997. DETERMINATION, Example of. There is one man known to history, and long illustrious among his fellow-men, who in his own meditations had reached the conviction that there was a new world far across the sea, and no disappointment or vexing delay could expel that conviction from his earnest mind. Neither the frowns nor the neglect of monarchs, neither hope deferred, nor the terrors of the deep, nor mutiny, nor tempest, nor death, could turn Columbus from his resolute purpose. On he pressed in spite of them all—serene amid the tempest—full of hope when all around seemed to tell only of despair; and he stood at last on the shores of a lovely island in the ocean—the discoverer of lands whose discovery has changed the history of the world. Tweedie.

7998. DETRACTION, Effect of. A piece of plate may become battered and scratched, so that its beauty is hopelessly gone, but it loses not its real worth; put it into the scale, and its weight and not its fashion shall be the estimate of its preciousness; throw it into the melting-pot and its purity will show its actual value. So there are many outward circumstances which may spoil the public repute in which a Christian is held, but his essential preciousness remains unchanged. God values him at as high a rate as ever. His unerring balance and crucible are not guided by appearances. How content may we be to be vile in the sight of men if we are accepted of the Lord. Spurgeon.

7999. DETRACTION, Harvest of. The detractor, though he sows but words, oftentimes reaps fewer requitals, or at least a plentiful harvest of his own grain. For he shall be sure to hear as much evil as he speaks, and howsoever he puts his faults behind himself, yet they hang before on the shoulder of another. Anon.

8000. DETRACTION, Honor of. Pope wrote to Addison, "I congratulate you upon having your share in that which all the great men and all the good men that ever lived have had their share of—envy and calumny. 'To be uncensured and to be obscure is the same thing.'"

8001. DEVELOPMENT, Animal. Empedocles thought that the first of all animals were trees, and they sprang from the earth before the sun in its glory enriched the world, and before day and night were distinguished.

8002. DEVELOPMENT, Law of. What could be more trivial than the heaving of the lid of a tea-kettle? Yet, in that motion lay the germ of ocean steamers, railways, and mills. Development dilates the small into the great. By that law sparks flame into conflagrations, fountains flow into streams, and the minute swell into the magnificent. The seeds of many a world-famed change were dropped in silence—night dews watered them when no eyes looked on; but at length they bore fruit in the hearts of millions; and the harvest of them waved over all the breadth of a continent.

S. Coley.

8003. DEVIL, Complaints of the. When people came to Poemen complaining of being tormented by the devil with discouraging thoughts, he used to say, "Ah! Isidore of Seete used to say under these circumstances, 'Well, devil, suppose I am lost? you will always be below me.'" At other times he said "Devils! devils! it is always devils that are complained of. I say self-will, self-will."

8004. DEVIL, Image of the. The devil has had his worshipers in Calcutta. A temple was erected, in the midst of it a throne, and a brazen statue placed upon it. A diadem was about his head, like the pontifical mitre amongst the Romans, from underneath which projected four prominent horns. He was represented with a very large mouth, a crooked nose, threatening eyes, cruel countenance and deformed hands and feet, altogether forming a very horrible image.

8005. DEVIL, Kiss of the. There was an Arab once who had the devil for his servant. When his term of service had expired, the devil begged as his reward to kiss the shoulders of his master. This request was granted, but out of the spots where the devil's lips had touched sprang serpents, which ever darted their fangs into the breast of the unhappy man. He strove to tear them away, but could not for the agony.

Philips Brooks.

8006. DEVIL, Overcome. A monk came to Luther's house, and with great violence, knocked for admittance. On presenting himself to Luther, he told him that there were some Papistical errors about which he desired a conference, and he desired to propound some syllogisms. Luther solved some with ease, and others not so easily. Luther becoming wearied, angrily told the monk he gave him a great deal of trouble. Perceiving that the monk's hands were like birds' claws, he exclaimed, "Art thou he, then? listen to the sentence pronounced against thee, 'The seed of the woman shall bruise the serpent's head,'" and then added, "Nor shalt thou devour them all." The devil, overcome with this saying, angry and murmuring to himself, departed.

8007. DEVIL, Resist the. The race that shortens its weapons lengthens its boundaries. Corollary.—It was the Polish lance that left Poland at last with nothing of her own to bound. What business had Sarmatia to be fighting for liberty with a fifteen-foot pole between her and the breasts of her enemies? If she had but clutched the old Roman and young American weapon, and come to close quarters, there might have been a chance for her; but it would have spoiled the best passage in "The Pleasures of Hope."

Holmes.

8008. DEVIL, Silencing the. Datus, archbishop of Milan, arriving at Corinth with his companions, sought a house in which to lodge. He saw a mansion unoccupied. He was told that the place was haunted, and that no man could spend a night there. Datus replied, "Ghost and devil will not scare a servant of God." So himself and company lodged there. At midnight all were aroused by a hideous noise, described as "the braying of asses, the grunting of swine, the squeaking of rats, and the hissing of serpents." Datus, rising in his bed, shouted, "Oh, Satan! thou who saidst in thine heart, 'I will ascend into heaven; I will exalt my throne above the stars of God; I will be like the Most High' (Isa. 14: 13, 14.) Well done, I say, Satan! Thou, who wouldst be like God, art reduced to bray like a jackass and grunt like a hog." Instantly there was silence, and the noises were heard no more.

8009. DEVIL Transformed. To a saint who was praying the evil spirit showed himself radiant with royal robes, and crowned with a jeweled diadem, and said, "I am Christ—I am descended on the earth—and I desired first to manifest myself to thee." The saint kept silent, and looked, and then said, "I will not believe that Christ has come, save in that state and form in which he suffered, save with the marks of the wounds of the cross." And the false apparition vanished. The application is this: Christ comes not in pride of intellect, or reputation for ability. These are the glittering robes in which Satan is now arrayed. Many spirits are abroad, more are issuing from the pit; the credentials which they display are the precious gifts of mind, beauty, richness, depth, originality. Christian, look hard at them with the saint in silence, and ask them for the print of the nails.

Dr. Howson.

8010. DEVIL, Works of the. The devil is the author of evil, the fountain of wickedness, the adversary of the truth, the corrupter of the world, man's perpetual enemy; he planteth snares, diggeth ditches, spurrerh bodies; he goadeth souls, he suggesteth thoughts, belceth anger, exposeth virtues to hatred, maketh vices beloved, soweth error, nourisheth contention, disturbeth peace, and scattereth affliction.

Quarles.

8011. DEVIL, Worship of the. All the worship or homage paid to anything by the natives of Western Africa is that of fear and dread, and not of love and respect. Hence, with this feeling they worship the devil, and offer sacrifices to him to cultivate his friendship and turn aside his anger, that he may do them no harm. About seventy miles from the mouth of the Gambia there is a sharp elbow-turn from left to right: the left bank is rather hilly, and is covered with trees. This is called the "Devil's Point." The river is here about two miles wide; and, in passing this place, the natives are in the habit of consigning to the deep some small portions of the ship's cargo, or eatables, in honor of his Satanic Majesty, and to ensure a safe passage up and down the river. The first time I sailed up this splendid stream, I was requested to give something to the devil at this place, which, of course, I declined; but it is still practiced by the superstitious natives and sailors, for the Prince of Darkness is said to have his residence under that point of land, and to stretch out his long arms beneath the water, in order to receive the offerings presented by his worshipers.

For.
8012. DEVILS, Guard of. A man dreamt he was traveling, and came to a little church, and on the cupola of that church there was a devil fast asleep. He went along further, and came to a log cabin, and it was surrounded by devils all wide awake. He asked one of them what it meant; said the devil, "I will tell you. The fact is, that whole church is asleep and one devil can take care of all the people; but here are a man and woman who pray, and they have more power than the whole church."

8013. DEVOTION, Advantage of. Alexander the Great, when a child, was checked by his governor, Leonidas, for being over-profuse in spending perfumes; because on a day, being to sacrifice to the gods, he took both his hands full of frankincense and cast it into the fire; but afterwards, being a man, he conquered the country of Judea, (the fountain whence such spices did flow,) and sent Leonidas a present of five hundred talents' weight of frankincense, to show him how his former prodigality made him thrive the better in success, and to advise him to be no more niggardly in divine service. Thus they that sow plentifully shall reap plentifully. I see there is no such way to have a large harvest as to have a large heart. The free giving of the branches of our present estate to God is the readiest means to have the root increased for the future.

Spencer.
8014. DEVOTION, Benefit of. The man who lives under an habitual sense of the divine presence keeps up a perpetual cheerfulness of temper, and enjoys every moment the satisfaction of thinking himself in company with his dearest and best of friends. The time never lies heavy upon him: it is impossible for him to be alone. His thoughts and passions are the most busied at such hours when those of other men are the most inactive. He no sooner steps out of the world but his heart burns with devotion, swells with hope, and triumphs in the consciousness of that presence which everywhere surrounds him; or, on the contrary, pours out its fears, its sorrows, its apprehensions, to the great Supporter of its existence.

Addison.
8015. DEVOTION, Enemies to. St. Macrius once saw in a vision devils distracting monks in their devotions, closing the eyes of some in drowsiness, and filling the minds of others with wandering thoughts. Some repelled their approach by secret supernatural power; others dallied with their suggestions. The saint burst into tears, and at the end of the prayers admonished every one of his distraction, warned them of the snares of the enemy, and exhorted them to be watchful against his unseen attacks.

8016. DEVOTION, Examples of. Rev. William Bramwell was the honored instrument of many conversions among the Wesleyans of England. "Perhaps," observes Rev. William Dawson, in his funeral sermon, "it will not be asserting too much, if it be said, that, upon an average, he employed six hours out of the twenty-four in prayer and other exercises of the closet." "This is nothing like an exaggeration," add the members of his family, in their memoir, recently published. "On the contrary, it is probably much within the real truth, though it still embraces only a part of his devotional duties. There were, in addition, the supplications of the pulpit, in the prayer-meetings, in his pastoral visits;"—"and besides this," continues Mr. Dawson, "through the whole of the day he was darting the feelings of his heart to God by perpetual ejaculations; and when in company with his friends, he was continually leading them into the holiest by the blood of Jesus, and offering the sacrifices of prayer and praise." "Here, then," add his biographers, "was an amount of devotion which recalls the feats of some of the Puritan or Covenanting divines. Take the case of Mr. Welsh, of Ayr, the son-in-law of John Knox. Out of every twenty-four hours, eight were consumed in private prayer. Like his Wesleyan brother, he would wake in the middle of the night, throw a plaid around him, and renew his supplications without regard to the lapse of time."

8017. DEVOTION, Fire of. When night fell on Jerusalem, and the tide and hum of business had ceased, and one after another the lights were extinguished, and all fires quenched in the sleeping city, one was kept alive—the fire that burned on God's holy altar. "It shall not be put out," said the Lord; "the fire shall ever be burning on the altar; it shall never go out." Fed by such logs as blazed on the hearths and roared in the chimneys of olden times, yet this had not been kindled by man's hands, or blown into flame by his breath. Like God's love on a lost world, or his wrath on the head of his dying Son, it had descended from the skies. "There came," it is said, when Aaron and his sons were offering their first sacrifice, "fire out from before the Lord, and consumed the burnt-offering and the fat, which, when the people saw, they shouted and fell on their faces." Whether slumbering in its ashes or flaming with the fat of sacrifices, this fire burned by night and day on the altar; nor was it till after the lapse of nearly a thousand years that it went out—quenched hissing in the blood of priests who fell in defense of the temple at the first captivity. Now in that old altar on which the sacred fire was always burning, but where sacrifices were not always offering, we see the heart of a devout believer. He is not always praying; but within his bosom there is a heaven-kindled love, fires of desire, fervent longings, which make him always ready to pray and often engage him in prayer. And thus he who engages in devout meditations, and holds communion with God through his word and also through his works, may, in respect of his habitual, prevailing frame of mind, as well as of his frequent prayers, be said to "pray without ceasing," "always to pray;" he is like an Æolian harp, on whose strings, by night or day, the wind has but to breathe to wake up sweet and plaintive music.

Anon.

8018. DEVOTION, Glory of. The great antique heart: how like a child's in its simplicity, like a man's in its earnest solemnity and depth! Heaven lies over him wheresoever he goes or stands on the earth; making all the earth a mystic temple to him, the earth's business all a kind of worship. Glimpses of bright creatures flash in the common sunlight; angels yet hover, doing God's messages among men: that rainbow was set in the clouds by the hand of God! Wonder, miracle, encompass the man; he lives in an element of miracle; heaven's splendor over his head, hell's darkness under his feet; a great law of duty, high as these two infinitudes, dwarfing all else, annihilating all else—it was a reality, and it is one: the garment only of it is dead; the essence of it lives through all times and all eternity! Carlyle.

8019. DEVOTION, Impaired. A boy who had been remarkable for the perfection of his lessons, and the teacher's weekly reports of whom showed the highest grade, was gradually reported to have deteriorated fifty per cent. His father expostulated with him. The boy could give no excuse. The father had a bushel of apples placed in the room and a bushel basket half filled with shavings. He directed the son to put all the apples into the basket on top of the shavings. The boy filled the basket, but the apples were only half gathered up when he called his father's attention to the fact that he could not get the apples all into the basket. "This," said the father, "will teach you why you have not mastered your lessons of late. You have occupied your time and half filled your mind with novels and play so that there was no room for other lessons." This pertinently teaches its religious lesson. How can there be entire or partial devotion when the heart is preoccupied with the world?

8020. DEVOTION, Interruption of. St. Frances, of Rome, was a faithful wife, as well as a devout Christian. One day she was reciting her prayers, when her husband called for her. Instantly she obeyed the call, did the desired service, and then returned to her prayers. Four times in succession was she thus interrupted, cheerfully answered the calls, and returned to her devotions without a shadow of annoyance. On resuming her missal, after her last interruption, she was greatly surprised to find the antiphon which she had four times begun and four times called to leave unfinished, written in letters of gold. The legend says that others saw the gilded letters, and that they remained in the book till the day of her death.

8021. DEVOTION, Model of. Bishop Janes, who grew to such majestic stature, gave undivided attention to his work. Having a little place out in the country, he visited it half a day each year for a settlement with his tenant, and that was all of the Church's time he gave to it. This scrupulous devotion exalted him into great usefulness—doubtless, the greatest usefulness of any man of this or the last generation—and, consequently, into the most substantial greatness. This we take to be a model life.

Dr. Fowler.

8022. DEVOTION, Neglect of. Eugippius relates that a poor man in Vienna left his prayers and spent the day in trying to keep the locusts off from his little patch of corn when he should have been at church. To his great surprise he found, when the next morning dawned, that his field had been stripped bare, while his neighbor's crops were untouched.

8023. DEVOTION, Personal. I have just put my soul as a blank into the hands of Jesus, my Redeemer, and desired him to write on it what he pleases: I know it will be his image.

Whitefield.

8024. DEVOTION, Prayer of. Grant, O Lord, that the sweet violence of thy most ardent love may disengage and separate me from every thing that is under heaven, and entirely consume me, that I may die for the love of thy infinite love. This I beg by thyself, O Son of God, who diedst for love of me. My God and my all! who art thou, O sweetest Lord? and who am I thy servant and a base worm? I desire to love thee, most holy Lord. I have consecrated to thee my soul and body, with all that I am. Did I know what to do more perfectly to glorify thee, that would I most ardently do.

St. Francis of Assisi.

8025. DEVOTION, Private. A man may pray with others from a variety of motives; but he will never love praying by himself until he feels his constant need of the Divine care, and views God as the chief good. Some professors are very deficient in this duty, in which they ought to abound. They are known by a sickly languor in other duties, and are proofs that none relish public ordinances so well as those who keep up a constant correspondence with heaven in private. Remissness in duty is always attended by a deficiency of comfort. We can only climb the mount of communion on the knee of prayers.

Herrick.

8026. DEVOTION, Propensity to. It has been observed by some writers, that man is more distinguished from the animal world by devotion than by reason, as several brute creatures discover in their actions something like a faint glimmering of reason, though they betray in no single circumstance of their behavior anything that bears the least affinity to devotion. It is certain, the propensity of the mind to religious worship, the natural tendency of the soul to fly to some superior being for succor in dangers and distresses, the gratitude to an invisible superintendent which arises in us upon receiving any extraordinary and unexpected good fortune, the acts of love and admiration with which the thoughts of men are so wonderfully transported in meditating upon the divine perfections, and the universal concurrence of all the nations under heaven in the great article of adoration, plainly show that devotion or religious worship must be the effect of tradition from some first founder of mankind, or that it is conformable to the natural light of reason, or that it proceeds from an instinct implanted in the soul itself. For my own part, I look upon all these to be the concurrent causes; but whichever of them shall be assigned as the principle of divine worship, it manifestly points to a Supreme Being as the first author of it. Addison.

8027. DEVOTION, Result of. One asked Scipio the Elder in Sicily, on what confidence he presumed to pass with his navy against Carthage. He showed him three hundred disciplined men in armor, and pointed to a high tower on shore. "There is not one of these," said he, "that would not at my command go to the top of that tower and cast himself down headlong." Over he went, landed, and burnt the enemy's camp, and the Carthaginians sent to him, and covenanted to surrender their ships, elephants, and a sum of money.

8028. DEVOTION, Reward of. During the cholera season of 1832, Father Matthew administered the last rites of religion to a young man in whom he had a special interest, when he was called to go to another ward. He remained away but a short time, but when he returned he found the bed was unoccupied; the young man had been carried to the dead-house. Father Matthew could not believe that he was dead, and started to find him. An awful spectacle met his sight—piles of miserable coffins, bodies on tables, and on the floor, many wrapped like mummies in the sheets in which they had been snatched from the bed in which they died, these liberally coated with pitch or tar to prevent contagion. Amid this scene of horrors Father Matthew sought the young man. There lay the body, while near by stood two men preparing the tarred sheet in which they were to wrap it. "Stop," said Father Matthew, "that young man can't be dead. I was speaking to him a few moments ago. No, no, I can't believe it; he is not dead." There was a suspension of the loathsome work for a time, while Father Matthew knelt down beside the body and pressed his hand lightly on the region of the heart. A moment of suspense followed, while the devoted priest listened for the heart to tell its throbs. Suddenly he exclaimed, "Thank God! he is alive; I feel his heart beat; thank God, thank God!" He was removed back to the hospital, restoratives were applied, and in a few days he was able to pour forth his gratitude to his preserver, for had another minute passed he would have been lost to the world forever.

8029. DEVOTION, Secret. Secret devotions resemble the rivers which run under the earth; they steal from the eyes of the world to seek the eyes of God; and it often happens that those of whom we speak least on earth, are best known in heaven. Caussin.

8030. DIAMOND, Peculiarity of the. The distinguishing peculiarity and most valuable characteristic of the diamond is the power it possesses of refracting and reflecting the prismatic colors: this property it is that gives fire, life, and brilliancy to it. Other stones reflect the light as they receive it—bright in proportion to their own transparency, but always colorless; and the ray comes out as it went in.

Colton.

8031. DIAMOND, Value of the. The diamond, the most costly of all substances, has intrinsic beauties of its own. It has a limpidity, a brilliancy, a fire appertaining to itself, but, above all, an absolute indestructibility far surpassing that of any known product, which gives the additional reason for its enhanced value. The first diamond taken from the bed of the Indian torrent, cut centuries ago, has not lost an atom of its weight, nor has a spark of its brilliant fire been dimmed. Though it has passed through millions of hands, it shows no trace of wear; it has been subjected to all temperatures and climates, and its shining lustre has never paled. This indestructibility has, then, made it inestimable as a standard of value. A thousand years ago it had its price, and a thousand years to come it must remain unchanged in form and lustre, and ever have intrinsic value.

Anon.

8032. DIE, Why will you? It is alleged by travelers that the ostrich, when hard pressed by the hunters, will thrust its head into a bush, and, without further attempt either at flight or resistance, quietly submit to the stroke of death. Men say that, having thus succeeded in shutting the pursuers out of its own sight, the bird is stupid enough to fancy that it has shut itself out of theirs, and that the danger which it has ceased to see, has ceased to exist. We doubt that. God makes no mistakes; and, guided as the lower animals are in all their instincts by infinite Wisdom, I fancy that a more correct knowledge of that creature would show that whatever stupidity there may be in the matter, lies not in the poor bird, but in man's rash conclusion regarding it. Man trusts to hopes which fail him, the spider never; she commits her weight to no thread which she has spun, till she has pulled on it with her arms, and proved its strength. Misfortune overtakes man unprovided and unprepared for it; not winter the active bee. Amid the blaze of Gospel light, man misses his road to heaven: but in the starless night, the swallows cleave their way through the pathless air, returning to the window nook where they were nestled; and through the darkest depths of ocean the fish steer their course back to the river where they were spawned. Would ye find folly, Solomon tells us where to seek it:—"Folly," says the wise man, "is bound in the heart of a child;" and what is folded up there like leaves in their bud, blows out in the deeds and habits of men. This poor bird, who has thrust its head into the bush, and stands quietly to receive the shot, has been hunted to death. For hours the cry of staunch pursuers has rung in its startled ear; for hours their feet have been on its weary track; it has exhausted strength, and breath, and craft, and cunning, to escape; and even yet, give it time to breathe, grant it but another chance, and it is away with the wind; with wings outspread and rapid feet it spurns the burning sand. It is because escape is hopeless and death is certain, that it has buried its head in that bush, and closed its eyes to a fate which it cannot avert. To man belongs the folly of closing his eyes to a fate which he can avert. He thrusts his head into the bush while escape is possible; and, because he can put death, and judgment, and eternity, out of mind, lives as if time had no bed of death, and eternity no bar of judgment.

8033. DIFFICULTIES, Biblical. Great mountains, Zech. 4: 7; Matt. 17: 20; 1 Cor. 13: 2. A lion in the way, Prov. 22: 13; 26: 13. A thorn hedge, Prov. 15: 19. Thorns and briars, Ezek. 2: 6. Gates of brass, Ps. 107: 16; Isa. 45: 2. Rough roads, Ps. 18: 33; Eph. 6: 15. Eccles. 11: 4.—“He that observeth the wind shall not sow,” etc. THE HISTORY OF ISRAEL at different times may furnish a good illustration of the difficulties that attend the Christian warfare. On leaving Egypt, what could apparently seem more embarrassing than their position? and before entering the promised land, when the difficulty of conquest was enhanced by their unbelieving fears, and the report of the spies? See Num. 13: 26–33. So in later times, as in the days of Hezekiah, Isa. 36: 37; of Asa, 2 Chron. 14: 9–15; of Jehoshaphat, 2 Chron. 20: 1–30, and others. THE HISTORY of many eminent saints similarly shows that it is “no strange thing” to be dismayed by real or imagined difficulty. How many have shrunk back at first when called to undertake some important mission, like Moses, Gideon, Elijah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel? AFRAID OF SHADOWS. Our greatest fears often arise from imagined difficulties; which, when we go forward in the strength of the Lord, prove to be only shadows! It is to be noted, that the Anakims—the great giants—at the thought of whom Israel trembled, gave them really little opposition when they entered Canaan! HOW TO MEET DIFFICULTIES. Take two examples—Num. 13: 26–33; 14: 1–10. Copy the noble spirit of Caleb and Joshua, when the other spies would have disheartened the people. See especially 13: 30; 14: 8, 9. Nehemiah 3: 4; 12: 27.—The building of the wall of Jerusalem amidst the greatest opposition. FEAR NOT. See in Conc. the precious “Fear nots” of Scripture. They are generally found as the preparation and antidote for apprehended difficulty, or felt discouragement. 1 Cor. 16: 8, 9.—“And there are many adversaries.” Difficulties dishearten the weak and timid. They bring out the spirit of the brave. Difficulties make the man. QUESTIONS. Zech. 4: 7.—“Who art thou, O great mountain?” Gen. 18: 14; Jer. 32: 17.—“Is anything too hard for the Lord?” Num. 11: 23.—“Is the Lord’s hand waxed short?” Isa. 50: 2. Luke

1: 34.—How shall this be? ANSWER. Luke 1: 37.—“With God, nothing shall be impossible.” Isa. 59: 1.—“Behold, the Lord’s hand is not shortened that it cannot save.” Bowes.

8034. DIFFICULTIES, Surmounting. It is weak to be scared at difficulties, seeing that they generally diminish as they are approached, and oftentimes even entirely vanish. No man can tell what he can do till he tries. It is impossible to calculate the extent of human powers; it can only be ascertained by experiment. What has been accomplished by parties and by solitary individuals in the torrid and frozen regions, under circumstances the most difficult and appalling, should teach us that, when we ought to attempt, we should never despair. The reason why men oftener succeed in overcoming uncommon difficulties than ordinary ones, is, that in the first case they call into action the whole of their resources, and that in the last they act upon calculation, and generally undercalculate. Where there is no retreat, and the whole energy is forward, the chances are in favor of success: but a backward look is full of danger. Confidence of success is almost success; and obstacles often fall of themselves before a determination to overcome them. There is something in resolution which has an influence beyond itself, and it marches on like a mighty lord among its slaves; all is prostration where it appears. When bent on good, it is almost the noblest attribute of man; when on evil, the most dangerous. It is by habitual resolution that men succeed to any great extent; impulses are not sufficient. What is done at one moment is undone the next; and a step forward is nothing gained unless it is followed up. Resolution depends mainly on the state of the digestion, which St. Paul remarkably illustrates when he says, “Every man that striveth for the mastery is temperate in all things.” Moir.

8035. DIFFICULTY, Benefit of. Difficulty is a severe instructor, set over us by the supreme ordinance of a parental guardian and legislator, who knows us better than we know ourselves; and he loves us better too. He that wrestles with us strengthens our nerves, and sharpens our skill. Our antagonist is our helper. This amicable conflict with difficulty obliges us to an intimate acquaintance with our object, and compels us to consider it in all its relations. It will not suffer us to be superficial. Burke.

8036. DIFFICULTY, Miracles of. It is difficulties which give birth to miracles. It is not every calamity that is a curse; and early adversity is often a blessing. Perhaps Madame de Maintenon would never have mounted a throne had not her cradle been rocked in a prison. Surmounted obstacles not only teach, but hearten us in our future struggles; for virtue must be learnt, though, unfortunately, some of the vices come as it were by inspiration. The austerities of our northern climate are thought to be the cause of our abundant comforts, as our wintry nights and our stormy seas have given us a race of seamen perhaps unequaled, and certainly not surpassed, by any in the world. Sharpe.

8037. DILIGENCE, Blessing upon. A divine benediction is always invisibly breathed on painful and lawful diligence. Thus, the servant employed in making and blowing of the fire, though sent away thence as soon as it burneth clear, ofttimes getteth by his pains a more kindly and continuing heat than the master himself, who sitteth down by the same; and thus persons industriously occupying themselves thrive better on a little of their own honest getting than lazy heirs on the large revenues left unto them. Fuller.

8039. DILIGENCE, Lesson of. Select a large box and place in it as many cannon-balls as it will hold; it is after a fashion full, but it will hold more if smaller matters be found. Bring a quantity of marbles, very many of these may be packed in the spaces between the larger globes; the box is full now, but only in a sense; it will contain more yet. There are interstices in abundance, into which you may shake a considerable quantity of small shot; and now the chest is filled beyond all question, but yet there is room. You cannot put in another shot or marble, much less another cannon-ball, but you will find that several pounds of sand will slide down between the larger materials, and even then between the granules of sand, if you empty yonder jug, there will be space for all the water, and for the same quantity several times repeated. When there is no space for the great, there may be room for the little; where the little cannot enter, the less can make its way; and where the less is shut out, the least of all may find ample room and verge enough. Now, the diligent preacher may not be able to preach more sermons; his engagement book is crowded. He may not be able to offer more public prayers, or to search the word of God more constantly; there is as much time occupied with these things as could well be given to them. Still there must be stray moments, occasional intervals and snatches, which might hold a vast amount of little usefulness in the course of months and years. What a wealth of minor good, as we may think it to be, might be shaken down into the interstices of ten years' work, which might prove to be as precious in result, by the grace of God, as the greater works of the same period. Spurgeon.

8040. DILIGENCE, Missionary. Elliot, the apostle to the Indians, was easily moved to undertake their conversion by the seal of the Massachusetts colony, which had on it an Indian, with a label from his mouth, on which was the inscription, "Come over and help us." In the prosecution of his efforts to evangelize the Indians, he endured many hardships. In a letter to a friend, he says, "I have not been dry night nor day, from the third day of the week to the sixth, but so traveled; and at night pulled off my boots, wrung my stockings, and on with them again, and so continue. But God steps in and helps." After having formed, with the greatest difficulty, a grammar of the Indian language, he wrote, in a letter to a friend, "Prayers and pains, through faith in Christ Jesus, will do anything." Such was the diligence of Elliot in his great work that on the day of his death, in his eightieth year, the "Apostle of the Indians" was found teaching the alphabet to an Indian child at his bedside. "Why not rest from your labors now?" asked a friend. "Because," said the venerable man, "I have prayed to God to render me useful in my sphere; and now that I can no longer preach, he leaves me strength enough to teach this poor child his alphabet."

8041. DILIGENCE, Strength for. Perhaps thou findest the duty of thy calling too heavy for thy weak shoulders. Make bold by faith to lay the heaviest end of thy burden on God's shoulder, which is thine, if a believer, as sure as God can make it by promise. When at any time thou art sick of thy work, and ready to think with Jonas to run from it, encourage thyself with that of God to Gideon, whom he called from the flail to thresh the mountains. Go in this thy might. Hath not God called thee? Fall to the work God sets thee about, and thou engagest his strength for thee. "The way of the Lord is strength." Run from thy work, and thou engagest God's strength against thee; he will send some storm or other after thee to bring home his runaway servant. How oft hath the coward been killed in a ditch, or under some hedge, when the valiant soldier that stood his ground and kept his place got off with safety and honor! Gurnall.

8042. DISAGREEMENTS, Advantage of. There was one Melancthus, who (whether in jest or earnest he said it, it matters not much) affirmed that the city of Athens owed its preservation to the dissensions and factions that were among the orators, giving withal this reason for his assertion, that thereby they were kept from inclining all of them to one side, so that by means of the differences among those statesmen there were always some that drew the saw the right way for the defeating of destructive counsels. Plutarch.

8043. DISAGREEMENTS, Cause of. Many contentions arise out of sheer misunderstanding. Disputants often become metaphysical according to the explanation given by the Scotchman, who said: "Why, ye see, metaphysics is when twa men are talking thegither, and the ane of them dinna ken what he is talking aboot, and the ither canna understand him." Drs. Chalmers and Stuart must have been a "wee bit" metaphysical that day they got into a controversy about the nature of faith. Chalmers, compelled at length to leave his friend, said: "I nave time to say no more; but you will find my views fully and well put in a recent tract, called Difficulties in the way of Believing." "Why," exclaimed the astonished Dr. Stuart, "that is my own tract! I published it myself!" That man was surely wise who prefaced every debate with, "Gentlemen, define your terms." During the Peninsular war an officer of artillery had just served a gun with admirable precision against a body of men posted in a wood to his left. When the duke rode up, after turning his glass for a moment in that direction of the shot, he said, in his cool way, "Well aimed, Captain; but no more; they are our own 39th!" This sad blunder has been repeated too often in the armies of Jesus. With what fatal frequency have great guns of the church, which might have battered down citadels of Satan, been misdirected against Christian brethren! There are surely devils enough in the world to shoot at, without firing into each other.

S. Coley.

8044. DISBELIEF, Ignorance and. Absolute disbelief implies knowledge: it is the knowledge that such or such a thing is not true. If the mind admit a proposition without any desire for knowledge concerning it, this is credulity. If it is open to receive the proposition, but feels ignorance concerning it, this is doubt. In proportion as knowledge increases, doubt diminishes, and belief or disbelief strengthens. No one ought to profess to disbelieve any proposition, unless he is sure that he perfectly understands the subject to which it relates. To do so is the most absurd presumption. Those who profess to doubt the truth of important propositions thereby acknowledge their ignorance; they ought, therefore, not to rest till they have sought information by every possible means.

Anon.

8045. DISAPPOINTMENT, Fable of. A fox, just at the time of the vintage, stole into a vineyard where the ripe sunny grapes were trellised up on high in most tempting show. He made many a spring and jump after the luscious prize; but failing in all his attempts, he muttered as he retreated, "Well, what does it matter? the grapes are sour!"

Æsop.

8046. DISAPPOINTMENT, Providential. Two literary societies were formed by the students of a village academy during the absence of the principal, which held their meetings in a vacant house. The principal, on being informed of this, issued an order positively forbidding the meetings. There was great excitement among the students over this despotic order, but it was obeyed. They knew the kindness of the master, and judged that he had some reason for his action of which they were ignorant. On his return they asked for an explanation. He said: "A few days before I left you, three men, having been secretly lodged in the house where your meetings were held, died of the small-pox. Are you satisfied?" This was reason enough. Our kind Father often deals with his children in the same way. Our idols are broken, and our own purposes defeated, because he designs some better things for us.

8047. DISAPPOINTMENT, Sad. That which has died within us is often the saddest portion of what death has taken away—and to all, and above measure, to those in whom no higher life has been awakened. The heavy thought is the thought of what we were, of what we hoped and proposed to have been, of what we ought to have been, of what but for ourselves we might have been—set by the side of what we are, as though we are haunted by the side of our own youth. This is a thought the crushing weight of which nothing but a strength above our own can lighten.

8048. DISCIPLINE, Analogy of. When in the city of Amsterdam, in Holland, I was very much interested in a visit we made to a place there famous for polishing diamonds. We saw the men as they were engaged in this work. When a diamond is first found, it has a rough, dark outside, and looks just like a common pebble. The outside must be ground off and the diamond be polished before it is fit for use. It takes a long time to do this, and it is very hard work. The diamond has to be fixed very firmly in the end of a piece of hard wood or metal. Then it is held close to the surface of a large metal wheel which is kept going round. Fine diamond dust is put on this wheel, because nothing else is hard enough to polish the diamond. And this work is kept on for days, and weeks, and months, and sometimes for several years, before it is finished. And if a diamond is intended to be used in the crown of a king, then longer time and greater pains are spent upon it, so as to make it look as brilliant and beautiful as can be. Now, Jesus calls his people his jewels. He intends them to shine like jewels in the crown he will wear in heaven. To fit them for this they must be polished like the diamond. And God makes use of the troubles he sends on his people in this world to polish his jewels. And when we get to heaven and see how beautiful they look, we shall see that it was indeed good for them that they were troubled. It has fitted them for greater happiness there.

Dr. R. Newton.

8049. DISCIPLINE, Example of. A once earnest and devoted Christian lost his spirituality through the usual influence of great worldly prosperity. The Lord would not give him up to apostasy and ruin. He took his wife from him by death, then a loved son; still no amendment. Then misfortune blighted his plans, but did not cure his worldliness. A loathsome and incurable disease fastened upon him, and while imprisoned by it, his house took fire. As he was carried from the burning building he exclaimed, "Blessed be God; I am cured at last," and shortly after died in the assurance of faith.

8050. DISCIPLINE, Intention of. "As an eagle stirreth up her nest," This illustration is one of the most beautiful and appropriate that could be conceived. It is taken from the habits of the eagle, which, when her young ones are well-fledged and would prefer to linger in downy ease, disturbs their nest, that they may be taught how to fly. Look at that parent bird picking at the nest which she hath built for her tender offspring: see how she breaks off one twig after another, exciting her brood to leave their nest and soar on high amid the sunshine of heaven. And if they will not leave it, she will break it further and further, until it is utterly broken up, and they are forced to fly or fall. Thus God deals with us. He knows our tendency to make this earth our rest, and he disturbs our nest to teach us to rise on the wings of faith towards the enduring realities of heaven. How often does God take away our earthly comforts when he sees that we cling too fondly to them! How often, in this world of vicissitude and change, do riches make themselves wings and fly away! By some unfortunate speculation, or in some way we know not how, lands and possessions are swept away at a stroke, and stranger feet now tread that abode which was once the home of competence and ease. The hopes of a rising family are blighted, and those who were fostered in the downy softness of luxury are turned out into a cold and pitiless world to work for their daily bread. Perhaps something upon which we placed the utmost reliance, upon which seemed to rest our only stay, is suddenly and mysteriously taken from us, and when we attempt to grasp it we find it gone. A gale at sea may destroy the hopes of the merchant; depression in trade may bring want to your door; the bankruptcy of some large mercantile firm, or the failure of a bank, may involve numbers in ruin, and plunge many families in misery hitherto unknown. How many have had occasion, from these and similar causes, and how many more will yet have occasion, to mourn over altered circumstances! Marvel not if it be thus with you; it is God stirring up your nest to teach you to wing your flight to heaven. All these things have a voice if ye will but hear, and seem to say, "Arise ye, and depart; for this is not your rest," Micah 2: 10. Brock.

8051. DISCIPLINE, Military. The leading idea of military discipline is to reduce the common men, in many respects, to the nature of machines; that they may have no volition of their own, but be actuated solely by that of their officers; that they may have such a superlative dread of those officers as annihilates all fear of the enemies; that they may move forwards when ordered without deeper reasoning or more concern than the firelocks they carry along with them. Sir J. Moore.

8052. DISCIPLINE, Personal. It would seem, indeed, to be God's usual method to prepare men for extensive usefulness by the personal discipline of trial. Hence, when we see Bunyan encompassed by terrible temptations, and immured in bondage; Luther, in the fortress on the Wartburg, pining in sore sickness, and battling, in fancy, with embodied evil; Wesley wandering to Georgia and back, led through doubt and darkness to the long-deferred moment which ended his "legal years," and then welcomed on his evangelistic journeys with ovations of misrepresentation and mud;—we remember that this protracted suffering is but the curriculum of heavenly discipline by which, learning of him who is lowly, they are shriven of self and pride, and which superadds to the fortitude which bears all, and to the courage which dares all, the meekness and gentleness of Christ. Punshon.

8053. DISCIPLINE, Reason for. We sometimes wonder, with regard to some of God's dealings with the elect, that he should cast them again and again into the crucible of trial. It seems to us as though they were already refined gold. But he sees that in them which we do not see, a further fineness which is possible; and he will not give over till that be obtained. It is just as in a portrait by some cunning artist, which is now drawing near to its completion. Men look at it, and count it perfect, and are well-nigh impatient that the artist does not now withhold his hand and declare it is finished, while he, knowing better, touches and retouches, returns again and again to his work. And why? Because there floats before him an ideal of possible excellence at which he has not yet arrived, but which he will not rest nor be contented till he has embodied in his work. It is thus with God and some of his elect servants. Trench.

8054. DISCIPLINE, Results of. The law of habit when enlisted on the side of righteousness, not only strengthens and makes sure our resistance to vice, but facilitates the most arduous performances of virtue. The man whose thoughts, with the purposes and doings to which they lead, are at the bidding of conscience, will, by frequent repetition, at length describe the same track almost spontaneously—even as in physical education, things, laboriously learnt at the first, come to be done at last without the feeling of an effort. And so, in moral education, every new achievement of principle smooths the way to future achievements of the same kind; and the precious fruit or purchase of each moral virtue is to set us on higher and firmer vantage-ground for the conquests of principle in all time coming. He who resolutely bids away the suggestions of avarice, when they come in conflict with the incumbent generosity; or the suggestions of voluptuousness, when they come into conflict with the incumbent self-denial; or the suggestions of anger, when they come into conflict with the incumbent act of magnanimity and forbearance—will at length obtain, not a respite only, but a final deliverance from their intrusion. Conscience, the longer it has made way over the obstacles of selfishness and passion, the less will it give way to these adverse forces, themselves weakened by the repeated defeats which they have sustained in the warfare of moral discipline; or, in other words, the oftener that conscience makes good the supremacy which she claims, the greater would be the work of violence, and less the strength for its accomplishment, to cast her down from that station of practical guidance and command, which of right belongs to her. It is just, because, in virtue of the law of suggestion, those trains of thought and feeling, which connect her first biddings with their final execution, are the less exposed at every new instance to be disturbed, and the more likely to be repeated over again, that every good principle is more strengthened by its exercise, and every good affection is more strengthened by its indulgence, than before. The acts of virtue ripen into habits; and the goodly and permanent result is, the formation or establishment of a virtuous character.

Chalmers.

8055. DISCIPLINE a Test. When Scoresby was selecting his men to accompany him in his Arctic explorations, he needed sailors that could stand the severest exposures, and who had nerve to bear the worst trials. So every man who applied to accompany the expedition was made to stand barefooted on a great block of ice while the surgeon examined his body, and Scoresby inquired into his past history. Scores were rejected at once, as they had not nerve to endure the test. The men who stood the trial made up a band of the most glorious heroes. So sometimes God tries us when he has in store for us some great undertaking. Many faint and excuse themselves from the start. Some endure, and make the heroes and leaders of the church.

A. D. Vail.

8056. DISCIPLINE, Work of. A mother endured a prolonged and painful illness with great patience. The evidence of her suffering often caused her attendants to weep with sympathy. The heroic sufferer replied to her attentive daughter, whose tears fell upon her mother's face, "Patience, darling; it is only the chiseling." She had learned the secret of philosophy and true Christian faith.

8057. DISCONTENT, Absurd. Anaxarchus told Alexander that there was an infinite number of worlds. At this he wept, and when asked if any accident had befallen him, he replied, "Do you not think it a matter of lamentation, that, when there is such a vast multitude of worlds, we have not conquered one?"

8058. DISCONTENT, Constant. A child about three years old was crying because his mother had shut the parlor door. "Poor thing," said a neighbor, "you have shut the child out." "It's all the same to him," said the mother; "he would cry if I called him in and then shut the door. It is a peculiarity of that boy, that if he is left rather suddenly on either side of a door, he considers himself shut out, and rebels accordingly." Many older people bear a remarkable resemblance to this child.

8059. DISCONTENT, Cure for. Beg of God a meek and quiet spirit, which is of so great price in the sight of God; and watch after your prayers, not only how the Lord answers, but how you endeavor. He that prays against discontent, binds himself to watch and strive against it, or else his prayers are sin. Beg an humble heart of God; the humble man is seldom discontented; he thinks that the least of mercies is good enough for the chief of sinners. Here is a poor house, coarse fare, hard lodgings, unkind usage; but it is good enough for me: any thing short of hell is mercy; if I have but bread to eat, and raiment to put on, it is good fare for such an one as I. And then beg a mortified heart to all that is in the world. When the heart is dead to the world, worldly troubles do not trouble. He that is dead to the world will save his bones whole: when crosses, straits, and troubles come upon him, it may be said of such an one, "Yonder man is dead already to the world, his heart is crucified to it; he feels nothing so as to be distressed by it."

When we strip dead men they struggle not; we may take all, they are not troubled at it. Oh, beg such a heart, that God may do what he will with thee, that his will may be done; and this prayer will procure patience and help against discontent.

Steele.

8060. DISCONTENT, Delusion of. The happiest of mankind, overlooking those solid blessings which they already have, set their hearts upon somewhat which they want; some untried pleasure, which if they could but taste, they should then be completely blest.

Atterbury.

8061. DISCONTENT, Emblem of. It is like ink poured into water, which fills the whole fountain full of blackness. It casts a cloud over the mind, and renders it more occupied about the evil which disquiets it, than about the means of removing it.

Feltham.

8062. DISCONTENT, Error of. The great error of our nature is, not to know where to stop, not to be satisfied with any reasonable acquirement; not to compound with our condition; but to lose all we have gained by an insatiable pursuit after more.

Burke.

8063. DISCONTENT, Incurable. An ass, belonging to a gardener, having little to eat and much to do, besought Jupiter to release him from the gardener's service, and give him another master. Jupiter, angry at his discontent, made him over to a potter. He had now heavier burdens to carry than before, and again appealed to Jupiter to relieve him, who accordingly contrived that he should be sold to a tanner. The ass having now fallen into worse hands than ever, and daily observing how his master was employed, exclaimed with a groan, "Alas, wretch that I am! it had been better for me to have remained content with my former masters, for now I see that my present owner not only works me harder while living, but will not even spare my hide when I am dead!"

Æsop.

8064. DISCONTENT, Misery of. The discontented is ever restless and uneasy, dissatisfied with his station in life, his connexions, and almost every circumstance that happens to him. He is continually peevish and fretful, impatient of every injury he receives, and unduly impressed with every disappointment he suffers. He considers most other persons as happier than himself, and enjoys hardly any of the blessings of Providence with a calm and grateful mind. He forms to himself a thousand distressing fears concerning futurity, and makes his present condition unhappy, by anticipating the misery he may endure in years to come.

Stennett.

8065. DISCONTENT, Reproof of. To reprove discontent, the ancients feigned that in hell stood a man twisting a rope of hay; and stilhe twisted on, suffering an ass to eat up all that was finished.

Jeremy Taylor.

8066. DISCORD, Effect of. If one note in the organ be out of key, or harsh of tone, it mars the whole tune. All the other reeds may be in harmony; but the one defective reed destroys the sweetness of all the rest. In every tune it makes discord somewhere. Its noise jars out into every other note. And so one sin destroys the harmony of a whole life. A boy or girl may be obedient, filial, industrious, and honest; but ill-temper is a jarring reed that touches every grace with chill and discord. Let every affection, and every thought, and every word, and every action, be right: then there is music in the life.

Anon.

8067. DISCORD, Forgetting. The Athenians struck from their calendar the second day of their month Boedromion, because they had a story, that on that day their gods Neptune and Minerva quarreled. It is well to cancel from memory those disagreeable things that only afflict the soul and cast a black shadow over life.

8068. DISCORD, Rebuke of. Demaratus coming from Corinth into Macedonia when Philip and his queen and son were at odds, after a gracious reception was asked by the king, "What good understanding there was among the Grecians?" He replied, "Aye, by all means, sir, it highly becomes your majesty to enquire about the concord betwixt the Athenians and Peloponnesians, when you suffer your own family to be the scene of so much discord and contention."

8069. DISCOVERIES, Accidental. Newton was wont to speak of himself as "a child gathering pebbles on the seashore," and if there was any mental endowment in which he excelled the generality of men it was that of patience in the examination of the facts and phenomena of his subjects. A fall of an apple was but an insignificant affair, and had been witnessed by thousands, without any recognition of the principle that governed its fall. But Newton in his twenty-third year, decided that the attraction of gravitation caused it to fall. It was during the plague in London, and he had retreated into the country. He was lying under an apple tree, and an apple fell; he reflected if the attraction of gravitation did that it must be the same principle that keeps the sun in the centre of the solar system, the planets in their orbits, as they revolve around him, and their satellites in their order around them. Galileo standing one day in the church at Pisa noticed the movements of a suspended lamp, which some accidental disturbance had caused to vibrate. The invention of the pendulum was the result, the principle of the most perfect measure of time extant. This occurred when Galileo was not yet twenty years of age. In later years he heard a report while residing in Venice that an instrument had been presented to Count Maurice of Nassau that would make distant objects appear near. This was enough for Galileo; he set himself to work, and soon found that by a certain arrangement of spherical glasses he could produce the same effect. To him, therefore, are we indebted for the discovery of the telescope. Prince Rupert noticed one morning a soldier rubbing the rust off his gun-barrel, occasioned by the dew of the night before, and that it left on the surface of the steel minute holes resembling a dark engraving. The mezzotinto was thus suggested to him, and its invention the result of his experiments. The waving of a linen shirt before the fire suggested to Stephen Mongolfier the invention of the air-balloon.

8070. DISCOVERY, Joy of. Such was the joy of Pythagoras at the completion of a certain geometric diagram that he sacrificed an ox in gratitude to the gods. Hiero, king of Syracuse, ordered a massive crown of gold to be prepared to be offered to the gods, as a tribute for success in war. It was suspected that the goldsmith had used silver in its construction. Archimedes was called in, and required to test it without marring the crown. While studying the problem he went to his bath. As he immersed his body the water ran over, and suggested to him the solution of the king's question. Forgetting himself, he ran home naked as he was, crying, as he went, "Eureka! Eureka!" He fixed the relative weight of water, gold and silver, and therefrom determined the proportion of gold and silver in the crown.

8071. DISCRETION, Advantage of. There is no talent so useful towards rising in the world, or which puts men more out of the power of fortune, than that quality generally possessed by the duller sort of men, and in common speech called "discretion,"—a species of lower prudence, by the assistance of which people of the meanest intellectuals pass through the world in great tranquillity, neither giving nor taking offence. For want of a reasonable infusion of this everything fails. Had Windham possessed discretion in debate, or Sheridan in conduct, they might have ruled their age. Swift.

8072. DISCUSSION, Advantage of. Unless a variety of opinions are laid before us, we have no opportunity of selection, but are bound of necessity to adopt the particular view which may have been brought forward. The purity of gold cannot be ascertained by a single specimen, but when we have carefully compared it with others, we are able to fix upon the finest ore.

Herodotus.

8073. DISCUSSION, Rule for. It is an excellent rule to be observed in all disputes, that men should give soft words and hard arguments; that they should not so much strive to vex, as to convince an opponent. Bp. Wilkins.

8074. DISEASE, The Cause of. I tell you honestly what I think is the cause of the complicated maladies of the human race:—it is their gormandizing and stuffing, and stimulating their digestive organs to an excess, thereby producing nervous disorders and irritations. The state of their minds is another grand cause:—the fidgeting and discontenting themselves about what cannot be helped; passions of all kinds—malignant passions pressing upon the mind, disturb the cerebral action, and do much harm.

Dr. Abernethy.

8075. DISHEARTENERS, Guilt of. It is cheap and easy to destroy. There is not a joyful boy or innocent girl, buoyant with fine purposes of duty, in all the street full of eager and rosy faces, but a cynic can chill and dishearten with a single word. Despondency comes readily enough to the most sanguine people. The cynic has only to follow the hint with his bitter confirmation, and they go home with heavier step and premature age. They will themselves quickly enough give the hint he wants to the cold wretch. Which of them has not failed to please where they most wished to please? or blundered where they were most ambitious of success? found themselves awkward, or tedious, or incapable of study, thought, or heroism, and only hoped by good sense and fidelity to do what they could, and pass unblamed? And this wicked malefactor makes their little hope less with satire and scepticism, and slackens the springs of endeavor. Yes, this is easy; but to help the young soul, add energy, inspire hopes, and blow the coals into a useful flame; to redeem defeat by new thought, by firm action, that is not easy—that is the work of divine men.

Emerson.

8076. DISHONESTY, Greed of. So grasping is dishonesty that it is no respecter of persons; it will cheat friends as well as foes; and were it possible even God himself.

Bancroft.

8077. DISHONESTY, Penalty of. John Eyre, whose name is recorded in the annals of crime as possessing £30,000, and yet being sentenced to transportation for stealing eleven quires of writing-paper, had an uncle, a gentleman of considerable property, who made his will in favor of a clergyman, his intimate friend, and committed it, unknown to the rest of the family, to the custody of the divine. However, not long before his death, having altered his mind with regard to the disposal of his wealth, he made another will, in which he left the clergyman only £500, bequeathing the bulk of his large property to his nephew and heir-at-law, Mr. Eyre. Soon after the old gentleman's death, Mr. Eyre, rummaging over his drawers, found this last will, and perceiving the legacy of £500 in it for the clergyman, without any hesitation or scruple of conscience, he put it into the fire, and took possession of the whole effects, in consequence of his uncle being supposed to die intestate. The clergyman coming to town soon after, and inquiring into the circumstances of his old friend's death, asked if he had made a will before he died. On being answered by Mr. Eyre in the negative, the clergyman very coolly put his hand in his pocket and pulled out the former will, which had been committed to his care, in which Mr. Eyre, sen., had bequeathed him the whole of his fortune, amounting to several thousand pounds, excepting a legacy of £200 to his nephew. Percy.

8078. DISHONESTY, Revelation of. There is a Mohammedan tradition, that every man who has cheated or defrauded another, will appear at the day of judgment with whatever he has fraudulently obtained attached to his neck. What a spectacle will that be!

8079. DISHONESTY, Reward of. A wolf had seized a sheep from a fold, and was carrying it home to his own den, when he met a lion, who straightway laid hold of the sheep and bore it away. The wolf standing at a distance, cried out, that it was a great shame, and that the lion had robbed him of his own. The lion laughed, and said, "I suppose, then, that it was your good friend, the shepherd, who gave it to you."

Æsop.

8080. DISINTERESTEDNESS, Heathen. Coleridge somewhere relates a story to this effect:—Alexander, during his march into Africa, came to a people dwelling in peaceful huts, who neither knew war nor conquest, and gold being offered to him, he refused it, saying, that his sole object was to learn the manners and customs of the inhabitants. "Stay with us," said the chief, "as long as it please thee." During the interview with the African chief, two of his subjects brought a case before him for judgment. The dispute was this: the one had bought of the other a piece of ground, which after the purchase was found to contain a treasure, for which he felt bound to pay. The other refused to receive anything, stating that when he sold the ground he sold it with all the advantages apparent or concealed which it might be found to afford. Said the chief, looking at the one, "You have a son;" and to the other, "you have a daughter—let them be married, and the treasure be given to them as a dowry." Alexander was astonished. "And what," said the chief, "would have been the decision in your country?" "We should have dismissed the parties," said Alexander, "and seized the treasure for the king's use." "And does the sun shine on your country?" said the chief, "does the rain fall there? are there any cattle there which feed upon the herbs and grass?" "Certainly," said Alexander. "Ah," said the chief, "it is for these innocent cattle that the Great Being permits the sun to shine, the rain to fall, and the grass to grow in your country." F. F. Trench.

8081. DISINTERESTEDNESS, Luther's. Luther's poverty did not arise from wanting the means of acquiring riches, for few men have had it in their power more easily to obtain them. The Elector of Saxony offered him the produce of a mine at Sneberg; but he nobly refused it, "lest," said he, "I should tempt the devil, who is lord of these subterraneous treasures, to tempt me." The enemies of Luther were no strangers to his contempt for gold. A poor student once telling him of his poverty, he desired his wife to give him a sum of money; and when she informed him they had none left, he immediately seized a cup of some value, which accidentally stood within his reach, and, giving it to the poor man, bade him go and sell it, and keep the money to supply his wants. In one of his epistles Luther says: "I have received one hundred guilders from Taurerheim, and Scharfts has given me fifty; so that I begin to fear lest God should reward me in this life. But I will not be satisfied with it. What have I to do with so much money? I gave half of it to P. Priorious and made the man glad."

8082. DISOBEDIENCE, Correction of. Dean Swift, though a good master, was very rigid with his servants. The task of hiring them was always entrusted to his housekeeper, but the only two positive commands he had for them he generally delivered himself. These were, to shut the door whenever they came into, or went out of, a room. One of his maid-servants one day asked permission to go to her sister's wedding, at a place about ten miles distant. Swift not only consented, but lent her one of his own horses, and ordered his servant to ride before her. The girl, in the ardor of her joy for this favor, forgot to shut the door after her when she left the room. In about a quarter of an hour afterwards the Dean sent a servant after her, to order her immediate return. The poor girl complied, and entering his presence, begged to know in what she offended or what her master wished. "Only shut the door," said the Dean, "and then resume your journey."

8083. DISOBEDIENCE, Filial. Dr. Adam Clarke, when a little boy, one day disobeyed his mother, and the disobedience was accompanied with some look or gesture that indicated an undervaluing of her authority. This was a high affront; she immediately took up the Bible, and opened on these words, Prov. 30: 17, which she read and commented on in a most solemn manner: "The eye that mocketh at his father, and despiseth to obey his mother, the ravens of the valley shall pick it out, and the young eagles shall eat it." The poor culprit was cut to the heart, believing the words had been sent immediately from heaven; he went out into the fields with a troubled spirit, and was musing on this terrible denunciation of Divine displeasure, when the hoarse croak of a raven sounded to his conscience an alarm more dreadful than the cry of fire at midnight. He looked up, and soon perceived this most ominous bird, and actually supposing it to be the raven of which the text spoke, coming to pick out his eyes, he clapped his hands on them, and with the utmost speed and trepidation ran towards the house, as fast as his alarm and perturbation would admit, that he might escape the impending vengeance.

8084. DISOBEDIENCE, Overcome. I have a little nephew who took a Bible he saw lying on the table and threw it on the floor. His mother said to him, "Go and pick up uncle's Bible." He said he didn't want to. His mother said, "I didn't ask you whether you wanted to or not; go and pick it up." Then the little fellow said, "I won't." His mother said, "Why, Charlie, who taught you that naughty word?" when she found out that he not only knew what it meant, but he meant every word he said. The mother says, "Charlie, I never heard you talk so before. If you don't go and pick up uncle's Bible, I shall punish you." And the little fellow says, "I won't do it." She told him again if he didn't pick up the Bible she would punish him, and he would have to pick it up too. Then he said he couldn't. I suppose he thought he couldn't; he didn't want to. That is the trouble with men, they don't want to come. Christ says, "Ye will not come unto me that ye might have life." It is not because men can't come to God; it is because they won't. The little fellow looked at it as though he would like to do it, but he couldn't. At last he just got down on the floor and got both his arms around the book, and tried and said he couldn't. Now the mother says, "Charlie, do you pick up that book or I shall punish you, and you will have to pick it up too." I felt very much interested for I knew if she didn't break his will he would break her heart eventually. At last she broke that little fellow's will, and the minute his will was broken, he picked up that book just as easy as that.

8085. DISOBLIGING, Punishment of the. A man who kept a horse and an ass was wont in his journeys to spare the horse, and put all the burden upon the ass's back. The ass, who had been some while ailing, besought the horse one day to relieve him of part of his load; "For, if," said he, "you would take a fair portion, I shall soon get well again; but if you refuse to help me, this weight will kill me." The horse, however, bade the ass get on, and not trouble him with his complaints. The ass jogged on in silence, but presently, overcome with the weight of his burden, dropped down dead, as he had foretold. Upon this, the master coming up, unloosed the load from the dead ass, and putting it upon the horse's back made him carry the ass's carcass in addition. "Alas, for my ill-nature!" said the horse; "by refusing to bear my just portion of the load, I have now to carry the whole of it, with a dead weight into the bargain."

8086. DISPATCH, Kinds of. False dispatch is one of the most dangerous things to business that can be. It is like that which the physicians call pre-digestion, or hasty digestion, which is sure to fill the body full of crudities, and secret seeds of diseases. I knew a wise man had it for a by-word, "Stay a little, that we may make an end the sooner." On the other side, true dispatch is a rich thing; for time is the measure of business, as money is of wares; and business is bought at a dear hand when there is small dispatch.

8087. DISPOSITION, Amiable. A tender-hearted and compassionate disposition, which inclines men to pity and feel the misfortunes of others, and which is, even for its own sake, incapable of involving any man in ruin and misery, is of all tempers of mind the most amiable; and though it seldom receives much honor, is worthy of the highest.

8088. DISPOSITION, Good. A good disposition is more valuable than gold; for the latter is the gift of fortune, but the former is the dower of nature.

8089. DISPOSITION, Unhappy. Philagrus, a Silician, a sophist, and a scholar of Sollianus, was of a very passionate temper, so much so that he gave one of his scholars a blow upon the face when he was asleep. When asked why he did not marry, he replied, "Because I am never pleased; no, not with myself."

8090. DISPOSITION, Varieties of. It is observed, that gold is both the fairest and the most solid of all metals, yet it is the soonest melted with the fire; others, as they are coarser, so more churlish, and hard to be wrought on by a dissolution. Thus a sound and good heart is easily melted into fear and sorrow for sin, by the sense of God's judgments, whereas the carnal mind is stubborn and remorseless. All metals are but earth, yet some are of a finer quality than others; all hearts are but flesh, yet some are, through the power of grace, more capable of spiritual apprehensions than others.

Bp. Hall.

8091. DISPUTATION, Patience in. My spirit felt composed after the dispute with a mocking moonshoe, by simply looking to God, as one who had engaged to support his own cause; and I saw it to be my part to pursue my way through the wilderness of this world, looking only to that redemption which daily draweth nigh. The same thoughts continued through the evening. I reflected, while looking at the stream gliding by, the smooth current of which showed its motion only by the moon shining upon it, that all are alike carried down the stream of time, that in a few years there will be another race of Hindoos, Mussulmans, and English in this country, and we are now but just speaking to each other as we are passing along. How should this consideration quell the tumult of anger and impatience when I cannot convince men? Oh how feeble an instrument must a creature so short-sighted be! How necessary is it that God should be continually raising up instruments; and how easily can he do it; "the government is upon his shoulder," Jesus is able to bear the weight of it; we need not be oppressed with care and fear.

Henry Martyn.

8092. DISPUTATION, Self-control in. Great care must be taken lest your debates break in upon your passions and awaken them to take part in the controversy. When the opponent pushes hard, and gives just and mortal wounds to our own opinion, our passions are very apt to feel the strokes, and to rise in resentment and defence. Self is so mingled with the sentiments which we have chosen, and has such a tender feeling of all the opposition which is made to them, that personal brawls are very ready to come in as seconds to succeed and finish the dispute of opinions. Then noise, and clamor, and folly appear in all their shapes, and chase reason and truth out of sight.

Dr. Watts.

8093. DISPUTATIOUSNESS, Youthful. I never object to a certain degree of disputatiousness in a young man, from the age of seventeen to that of four or five and twenty, providing I find him always arguing on one side of the question.

Coleridge.

8094. DISPUTES, Ecclesiastical. A gentleman, in company with Mr. John Newton, of London, lamented the violent disputes that often take place among Christians respecting the non-essentials of Christianity, and particularly church government. "Many," he said, "seem to give their chief attention to such topics, and take more pleasure in talking on these disputable points than on spiritual religion, the love of Christ, and the privileges of his people." "Sir," said the venerable old man, "did you ever see a whale-ship? I am told that when the fish is struck with the harpoon, and feels the smart of the wound, it sometimes makes for the boat, and would probably dash it to pieces. To prevent this, they throw a cask overboard; and when it is staved to pieces, they throw over another. Now, sir," added Mr. Newton, "church government is the tub which Satan has thrown over to the people of whom you speak."

8095. DISPUTES, Settlement of. In the Canton of Schwyz, a man named Frantz went one evening to Gaspard, who was working in his field, and said to him, "Friend, it is now mowing time; we have a difference about a meadow, you know, and I have got the judges to meet at Schwyz to determine the cause, since we cannot do it for ourselves; so you must come with me before them to-morrow." "You see, Frantz," replied Gaspard, "that I have mown all this field; I must get in this hay to-morrow; I cannot possibly leave it." "And," rejoined Frantz, "I cannot send away the judges now; they have fixed the day, and, besides, one ought to know whom the field belongs to before it is mown." They disputed the matter some time; at length Gaspard said to Frantz, "I will tell you how it shall be: go to-morrow to Schwyz, tell the judges both your reasons and mine, and then there will be no need for me to go." "Well," said the other, "if you choose to trust your cause to me, I will manage it as if it were my own." Matters thus settled, Frantz went to Schwyz, and pleaded before the judges his own and Gaspard's cause as well as he could. When the decision was given, Frantz reported it. "Gaspard," said he, "the field is yours. I congratulate you, neighbor. The judges have decided in your favor, and I am glad the affair is finished." They were firm friends ever after.

Percy.

8096. DISSATISFACTION, Cause of. A little girl was one day working at her worsted. A stranger came into the parlor, and as he looked at her, said, with an apparent sneer: "My dear, what is that you are doing? I see nothing but tangled webs and confused knots." She looked up archly into his face, and replied, "You are looking on the wrong side;" and she turned it over, and there it was, a beautiful figure. Oh! my friends, how confused we are, just looking on the wrong side!

H. B. Ridgeway.

8097. DISSATISFACTION, Confession of. Of all the multiplied men who lived in me, to a certain degree—the man of sentiment, the man of poetry, the man of oratory—nothing remains in me but the literary man. The literary man himself is far from being happy. Years do not yet bear me down. I bear more heavily the weight of my heart than the weight of my years. These years, like Macbeth's phantoms, pass their hands over my shoulder, and point out to me, not crowns, but a sepulchre: would to God I was now asleep in it! I have nothing in me wherewith to smile to the future of the past. I am growing old, without children, in my desolate house, surrounded by the tombs of all those I loved. All that remains to me of life is concentrated in a few hearts and in a modest inheritance. And even these hearts suffer because of me, and I am not sure that I shall not be dispossessed of that inheritance to-morrow, and go and die upon some stranger's road, as Dante says. The hearth on which my father placed his feet, and where I now place mine, is a borrowed hearth, which may be torn up at any hour; it may be sold and resold at any caprice of the auctioneer; and so may my mother's bed; so may the dog which licks my hand in pity when he sees my brow in agony as I look at him. The children of the Samians insulted Homer, because, they said, Homer obstructed the highways of the islands by singing poetry before the houses. I am not Homer; but my critics are more severe than the Samians. Upon these pages where they reproach me for heaping piles of vanity, it is not ink you read; no, believe me, it is not; but the sweat of my brow. It is not my name I seek to magnify, but the pledge of those who have no estate and no existence save that name. My name!—oh, I know as well as you do what that name is worth, and what will be its fate! I would with all my heart (God is my witness) that name had never been uttered. I would give all that may yet remain to me of life, if it were entirely buried, with him who bears it, in the silence of the tomb—noiselessly borne to the graveyard there, forgotten here. Life to me now is nothing worth. What have I now, I pray, to regret in life? Have not I seen all my thoughts perish before me? Do I design again to sing in life, with an extinguished voice, strophes which would end in sobs? Have I taste for returning into those political struggles which, were they even opened again, would no longer recognize my posthumous accents? Have I any firm hope in those forms of government which the people abandon with as much fickleness as they adopted them? Am I so insane as to believe that I shall cast, or that I shall sculpture—I alone—in bronze or marble, a colossal statue of the human race, when God has given wherewith to do so but sand and clay to the greatest of sculptors? Of what use is life when one can contemplate nothing but the ruins of those things which are recorded in his mind! Happy the men who die at their work, struck down by the revolutions in which they were engaged. Death is their punishment—aye, but it is their refuge!

M. de Lamartine.

8098. DISSATISFACTION, Cured. A poor lame boy was converted, whose home surroundings were very unfriendly. He said, when relating his experience, "Once everything went wrong at our house; father was wrong, and mother was wrong, and sister was wrong; but now that Jesus is mine, it is all right, and I know why everything went wrong before; I was all wrong myself."

8099. DISSATISFACTION, Example of. "All these things are against me." Mrs. Wear always said that Jacob had taken the word out of her mouth. Why the affliction came to her house she never could fully understand; and why the minister should have preached from "Curse ye Meroz," when he knew that she was in a weak, nervous state, and would have preferred "Jesus wept," was a mystery greatly to the disadvantage of Providence; and why the postman should always begin to give out letters at the other end of the row was just a bit of spite on his part, and nothing better could be expected of such vermin. When the doctor told Mrs. Wear that he could do nothing more for her, she said she had always wondered what doctors were for. Her end was peace—to her family.

Dr. Joseph Parker.

8100. DISSATISFACTION, Influence of. The traveler who comes to a country whose inhabitants are inhospitable, where the food is bad and difficult to be obtained, where the climate is unhealthy, where he encounters dangers from wild beasts, obnoxious serpents and irritating insects, will not delay his journey, but hasten on to a better country. Men in this world are travelers in such a country. They should hasten towards the land of "milk and honey," counting themselves "strangers and pilgrims" till they shall gain Heaven.

8101. DISSATISFACTION, Rebuke of. If you entered the workshop of a blacksmith, you would not dare to find fault with his bellows, anvils, and hammers. If you had not the skill of a workman, but the consideration of a man, what would you say? "It is not without cause the bellows are placed here; the artificer knew, though I do not know, the reason." You would not dare to find fault with the blacksmith in his shop, and do you dare to find fault with God in the world?

St. Bernard.

8102. DISSATISFACTION, Wail of. Theodore Parker, the self-appointed reformer of Protestantism, did not attain the success which he expected, and relieves himself by writing in his journal, "Boston is the metropolis of snobs." "To me it seems as if my life was a failure. 1. Domestically. 'Tis mainly so: for I have no children. 2. Socially. It is completely a failure. Here I am as much an outcast from society as if I were a convicted pirate. I mean from all that calls itself 'decent society,' respectable society, in Boston. 3. Professionally. I stand all alone, not a minister with me. I see no young men rising up to take ground with me or in advance of me. I think that with a solitary exception, my professional influence has not been felt in a single young minister's soul." It seems not to have occurred to him that there was any other cause for his failure than the soil and the climate. He had forgotten the motto on Luther's monument.

8103. DISSIPATION, Study and. It is the commonly received notion that hard study is the unhealthy element of a college life; but from the tables of Harvard University, collected by Prof. Pierce from the last triennial catalogue, it is clearly demonstrated that the excess of death for the first ten years after graduation is found in that portion of each class of inferior scholarship. Every one who has seen the curriculum knows that where Æschylus and political economy injure one, late hours and rum-punkes use up a dozen, and that their two little fingers are heavier than the loins of Euclid. Dissipation is a sure destroyer, and every young man who follows it is as the early flower exposed to untimely frost. Those who have been inveigled in the path of vice are named Legion. A few hours' sleep each night, high living, and plenty of "smashes," make war upon every function of the body—the brain, the heart, the lungs, the liver, the spine, the limbs, the bones, the flesh, every part and faculty overtasked and weakened by the terrific energy of passion loosened from restraint, until, like a dilapidated mansion, the "earthly house of this tabernacle" falls into ruinous decay.

Scientific American.

8104. DISSIPATION, Tyranny of. I expect absolutely nothing of the man upon whom I see marks of dissipation. Five years ago I remember to have made the acquaintance of a young man who had a pew in my church, and after I had known him a little while I used to wish I could say something, but I hardly knew how. He was distant. His breath was not the most repelling thing to me. You know how it comes; you have seen it; a little fullness—getting a little full around the face, and a little full in the eyes; then a reddish appearance; then a florid aspect; then he passes from the reddish appearance into the florid, and from the florid into the purple—we have seen men who are purple. This young man is there now; he is in the purple stage. The next stage is—death! The enemy has got the mastery of him. I never knew the man to whip. A great many have attacked this enemy in the firm conviction that "I have seen him slay others, but I will be his master." Oh, how many are conquered! I know them and mark them. I see such young men almost every week, and converse with them about this matter of liquor-drinking, and nine times out of ten they think they are safe. I point out men, who twenty, fifteen or ten years ago, were moderate drinkers; but now liquor drinking has become their master. And you say, "I should think men would have more respect for themselves." So should I. But I simply prophesy, that if the habit is continued it will beat you; it always has. That is its business. You are doing a thousand other things; but liquor has just one purpose; it is always on the guard; it slumbers not, and sleeps not. It is like the coming of the snow-flake, or the pointing of the sculptor's chisel; it grows and multiplies, and multiplies and grows. It is like sleep coming upon a man; a man never knows just the moment when he goes to sleep; and a man never knows just the day when liquor is his master. After a while he comes to acknowledge, like the miser, "I am a slave."

Robert Laird Cockier.

8105. DISTANCE, Effects of. As some travelers were making their way along the seashore, they came to a high cliff, and, looking out upon the sea, saw a faggot floating at a distance, which they thought at first must be a large ship; so they waited, expecting to see it come into harbor. As the faggot drifted nearer to the shore, they thought it no longer to be a ship, but a boat. But when it was at length thrown on the beach, they saw that it was nothing but a faggot after all. Dangers seem greatest at a distance; and coming events are magnified according to the interest or inclination of the beholder.

Æsop.

8106. DISTINCTION, Danger of. The mice and the weasels had long been at war with each other, and the mice being always worsted in battle, at length agreed at a meeting, solemnly called for the occasion, that their defeat was attributable to nothing but their want of discipline, and they determined accordingly to elect regular commanders for the time to come. So they chose those whose valor and prowess most recommended them to the important post. The new commanders, proud of their position, and desirous of being as conspicuous as possible, bound horns upon their foreheads as a sort of crest and mark of distinction. Not long after a battle ensued. The mice, as before, were soon put to flight; the common herd escaped into their holes; but the commanders, not being able to get in from the length of their horns, were every one caught and devoured.

Æsop.

8107. DISTRUST, Rebuke of. A correspondent of the New York Evangelist says: "Last year, coming from Pittsburgh east in a sleeping-car, my apartment was next to that occupied by a gentleman, his wife, and their little daughter, perhaps four years old. The lady was excessively timid—terribly nervous. The Horseshoe Curve seemed to be her especial terror, and my sleep, and I presume that of others, was disturbed by her talking to her husband of the peril. The engineer might be asleep, or the switch tender might be asleep, and then the train would certainly be plunged down the abyss. But it was worth while to be awake, when I heard the sweet rebuke, not intended, but real, of the little one: 'Ma, God takes care of us, and does God sleep?' Was not this the ordaining strength out of the mouth of babes? Happy for the mother if it proved strength to her faith!"

8108. DIVINE LOVE, Permanence of. There is nothing in the world so real and substantial as the love of God. One act of divine love is a more finished thing than a statue of Phidias or Praxiteles. It is more firm than the foundations of the Alps. It is more enduring than the round world which God hath made so strong. All things are bubbles to it. They have nothing in them. They mean little. They soon pass away. An act of love is a complete work, and has greater power and greater consequences than any other act. The mere act of dying is not equal to it. And yet this act of love can be made by a mental glance, quick as lightning, and piercing heaven. Such acts can be multiplied at will beyond our power of reckoning, and in the midst of apparently the most distracting occupations. So far from being weakened by repetition, they only grow more intense and more powerful. Yet they require no effort. To elicit them is even a pleasure to us. But when we put these facts alongside of our practice, it looks as if there must be a fallacy somewhere. All this can hardly be true, and yet we remain as we are. How incredible is the hardness of our own hearts! It is a fair match for the excess of God's love. Oh welcome then that beautiful spirit of reparation to the majesty of God, which so many of the saints have had! It is like making sweet honey out of bitter flowers. The little love we have for God thus, by this dear right of reparation, furnishes us with another means of loving him still more. Who will say that all things are not contrived for love?

F. W. Faber.

8109. DIVINE UNION, Blessedness of. Each moment of time is one of the successive and separate letters of the alphabet, which go to make up the great book of eternity. And eternity being the sum of all moments, and therefore the residence or locality of God in the higher sense, we are thus learning the letters of that book in which will be written out all truths and destinies for ourselves. To lose a moment by being out of harmony with the facts and requisitions of the moment is to lose a letter out of the great book, and thus to lose something of its infinite and eternal meanings. It was thus that God taught me while I was in the spiritual wilderness. I was thus enabled to see, and perhaps more clearly than others will be likely to do who have not passed through the same inward history, why he shut the old gateways and vistas of spiritual knowledge, which were suited to the beginnings of inward experience, and required me to meet with him and to dwell with him in the Eternal Now. It was one of the lessons of the desert; but the desert, I mean the spiritual desert, is one of the school-houses of the soul. And as soon as I had learned the lesson, which it seems to have been the object of the school of the desert to teach, the cloud was gradually lifted; the sunshine came down upon the rocks, the sands and pebbles grew up into flowers. I found the shepherd sitting beside the still waters, and I came up out of the entanglements of the wilderness into a firmer position and a clearer light than I had ever known before.

Dr. Thos. C. Upham.

8110. DIVINITY OF CHRIST, Argument for the. The following words of Napoleon were addressed to one of his generals, who appeared to consider Christ merely in the light of a great genius: "The triumph of love is, without dispute, the greatest of the miracles of Christ. He, and he only, has succeeded in raising the heart of man above visible things, even to the sacrifice of time; he alone, by establishing such an immolation, has established a link between heaven and earth. All those who sincerely believe in him experience this admirable, supernatural, all-powerful love, which is an inexplicable phenomenon, and cannot be attained by the reason and strength of man; it is a sacred fire which has been given to earth by this new Prometheus, and of which time, that great destroyer of all things, can neither waste the strength nor limit the duration. I, Napoleon, admire this fact more than any other, because I have often reflected upon it, and it affords me complete proof of the divinity of Christ! I have fascinated multitudes who would have died for me. God forbid that I should form any comparison between the enthusiasm of my soldiers and Christian charity, which are as different from one another as their causes! But, in fine, it was by my presence, by the electricity of my glance, by one single word, that I lighted the sacred fire in all hearts. Certainly I possess the secret of that magic power which carries the mind of man along with it: but I could not communicate it to any one; not one of my generals has received or imbibed it from me; neither have I the secret of causing my name and my love forever to remain enshrined in the heart of man, and of working wonders therein, unassisted by matter. Now that I am at St. Helena, now that I am fastened down alone upon this rock, who fights my battles and conquers empires for me? Where are the courtiers of my misfortunes? Do men think of me? Who exerts himself for me in Europe? Who has remained faithful to my cause? Where are my friends? Yes, two or three, immortalized by their fidelity, partake and console my exile! Such is the fate of great men! such is the fate of Cæsar and Alexander; and then we are forgotten! and the name of a conqueror, as well as that of an emperor, is nothing more than the subject of a college theme! Our exploits are at the mercy of any pedant who chooses to praise or insult us! How many and various judgments are passed on the great Louis XIV.! Scarcely was he dead when the great king himself was left alone in the solitude of his bed room at Versailles, neglected by his courtiers, and perhaps their laughing-stock! He was no longer their master, but a corpse, the tenant of a coffin and a grave, and an object of horror from the fear of that decomposition which had already begun! Such is the approaching fate of the great Napoleon! What an abyss is there between the depths of my misery and the eternal reign of Christ, who is preached, praised, loved, adored, and living throughout the universe! Can that be called death? Is it not rather life? Behold the death of Christ! behold the death of a God!"

8111. DIVINITY OF CHRIST, Proof of the. When Ulysses returned with fond anticipations to his home in Ithaca, his family did not recognize him. Even the wife of his bosom denied her husband, so changed was he by an absence of twenty years, and the hardships of a long protracted war. It was thus true of the vexed and astonished Greek, as of a nobler king, that he came unto his own, and his own received him not. In this painful position of affairs he called for a bow which he had left at home, when, embarking for the siege of Troy, he bade farewell to the orange groves and vine-clad hills of Ithaca. With characteristic sagacity, he saw how a bow so stout and tough that none but himself could draw it might be made to bear witness on his behalf. He seized it. To their surprise and joy, like a green wand lopped from a willow tree, it yields to his arms; it bends, till the bow-string touches his ear. The wife, now sure that he is her long lost and long lamented husband, throws herself into his fond embraces, and his household confess him the true Ulysses. If I may compare small things with great, our Lord gave such proof of his divinity when he, too, stood a stranger in his own home, despised and rejected of men, a man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief. He bent the stubborn laws of nature to his will, and proved himself Creator by his mastery over creation. Dr. Guthrie.

8112. DIVISIONS, Danger of. Three bulls fed in a field together in the greatest peace and amity. A lion had long watched them in the hope of making prize of them, but found that there was little chance for him so long as they kept all together. He therefore began secretly to spread evil and slanderous reports of one against the other, till he had fomented a jealousy and distrust amongst them. No sooner did the lion see that they avoided one another, and fed each by himself apart, than he fell upon them singly, and so made an easy prey of them all. Æsop.

8113. DIVISIONS, Unity and. The narrow-minded and cold-hearted bigot, not content to find in the church substantial agreement amidst circumstantial variety, would reduce all to one single point of his own vision; and thus the faith of the Gospel vanishes under this rude and violent process. In matters connected with religion there may be difference without opposition, variety without discord, shades of difference without real diversity of sentiment. It could never be intended that the people of God should all hold the same opinions; if so, how could the apostle Paul say in reference to minor points of belief, "Let every man be fully persuaded in his own mind." Godkin.

8114. DIVORCE, Prevention of. Milton had not lived long with his first wife before a difference arose, which ended in a separation; the lady returned to the house of her father, and Milton published his work on the doctrine and discipline of divorces, with the intention, it is said, of marrying another wife. At the house of a friend his wife appeared suddenly before him, threw herself upon her knees and begged his pardon. Reconciliation followed, and the happiness of their after married life was uninterrupted. Their reconciliation, it is said, suggested Eve's address to Adam in "Paradise Lost."

"He from her turn'd: but Eve,
Not so repuls'd, with tears that ceas'd not flowing.
And tresses all disorder'd, at his feet
Fell humble; and embracing them besought
His peace, and thus proceeded in her plaint:
'Forsake me not thus, Adam! witness heav'n
What love sincere, and reverence in my heart,
I bear thee, and unweeting have offended
Unhappily deceiv'd! Thy suppliant
I beg, and clasp thy knees: bethink me not (Whereon I live!) thy gentle looks, thy aid,
Thy counsel, in this uttermost distress,
My only strength and stay! Forlorn of thee,
Whither shall I betake me—where subsist?
While yet we live (scarce one short hour perhaps),
Between us two let there be peace.'"

8115. DOCTRINE Doctored. "Babbage's Economy of Manufactures," says that "some years since, a mode of preparing old clover and trefoil seeds, by a process called 'doctoring,' became so prevalent as to attract the attention of the House of Commons. By this process old and worthless seed was rendered in appearance equal to the best. One witness tried some doctored seed, and found that not above one grain in a hundred grew." Crude notions, dogmatically propounded by beardless youths, is the doctored seed of our day. The harvest can only be thistles and tares, material for the flames.

8116. DOCTRINE, False. They which have been patrons of it before, should do like the father and mother of an idolater; that is, lay the first hand upon him to shorten his life.

Henry Smith.
8117. DOCTRINE, Heathen View of. A chief of the Bechuanas, after having listened to the Gospel from Rev. R. Moffat, calling thirty of his men about him, he addressed them, pointing to him, "There is Ra-Mary (Mr. Moffat) who tells me that the heavens were made, the earth also, by a beginner whom he calls Morimo. Have you ever heard anything to be compared with this? He says that the sun rises and sets by the power of Morimo; as also that Morimo causes winter to follow summer, the winds to blow, the rain to fall, the grass to grow, and the trees to bud;" and, casting his arm above and around him, added, "God works in everything you see and hear! Did you ever hear such words?" Seeing them ready to burst into laughter, he said, "Wait, I shall tell you more. Ra-Mary tells me that we have spirits in us which will never die; and that our bodies, though dead and buried, will rise and live again. Open your eyes to-day; did you ever hear fables like these?" This was followed by a burst of deafening laughter; and on its partially subsiding, the chief man begged him to say no more on such trifles, lest the people should think him mad.

8118. DOCTRINE, Importance of. When the peace and purity of our mind, the rectitude and happiness of our lives, and the blessedness of eternity, has so close and necessary a dependence upon the doctrines we imbibe, that we hereby either secure or forfeit them; who sees not, unless he be stupid and infatuated, that greater care and solicitude is necessary here, than in any matter whatever, because there is no other of equal moment? Bad money, or bad wares instead of good; an ill title or conveyance instead of a firm and clear one, may impoverish us: bad drugs instead of good may infect the body, and destroy the health: but what is all this to the dismal consequences of error and heresy, which impoverishes and infects the mind, perverts the life, and damns the man to all eternity? We must admit nothing hastily, assent to nothing without examining the grounds on which it stands. Credulity, precipitation, and confidence are irreconcilable enemies to knowledge and wisdom. Lucas.

8119. DOCTRINE, Mixed. There is need of great caution in the trial and examination of doctrines. The devil sows his tares among the wheat. Errors, and these too, fatal and destructive ones, are frequently obtruded upon the world for the revelations of God; and every party, nay, every single author, lays the stress of salvation on their peculiar and distinguishing opinions. Lucas.

8120. DOCTRINE, Systems of. While the trees and flowers that clothe the fields of nature are thus dispersed over the wide surface of the earth, there are mountain regions lying within the tropics, where, in the course of a single day, the traveler finds every vegetable form peculiar to every line of latitude between the equator and the poles. These all laid out in regular arrangement. Leaving the palms which cover the mountain's feet, he ascends into the region of the olive; from thence he arises to a more temperate climate, where vines festoon the trees, or trail their limbs along the naked rock; still mounting, he reaches a belt of oaks and chestnuts; from that he passes to rugged heights, shaggy with the hardy pine; by and by, the trees are dwarfed into bushes; rising higher, his foot presses a soft carpet of lowly mosses; till, climbing the rocks where only lichens live, he leaves all life below; and now, shivering in the cold, panting in the thin air for breath, he stands on those dreary elevations where eternal winter sits on a throne of snow, and, waving her icy sceptre, says to vegetation, "Hitherto shalt thou come, but no further." Like some such lofty mountain of the tropics, there are portions of the divine word, where, in a space also of limited extent, within the short compass of a chapter, or even part of it, the more prominent doctrines of salvation are brought into juxtaposition, and arranged side by side, almost in systematic order. Dr. Guthrie.

8121. DOCTRINE, Unity of. Granite boulders lie scattered along through Vermont, New Hampshire, and out into the Atlantic ocean in a southeasterly direction. The geologist will look in vain for their native beds in the sections where they are found. Prof. Agassiz tells us that they came down from the north borne by the great ice waves of the glacier period. These stones are as mysterious as the various doctrines scattered through the Bible. We see them as men do the scattered boulders, but they are parts of one grand whole.

8122. DOGMATISM, Despotism of. Scientific knowledge, even in the most modest persons, has mingled with it a something which partakes of insolence. Absolute, peremptory facts are bullies, and those who keep company with them are apt to get a bullying habit of mind; not of manners, perhaps; they may be soft and smooth, but the smile they carry has a quiet assertion in it, such as the champion of the heavy weights, commonly the best natured, but not the most diffident of men, wears upon what he very inelegantly calls his "mug." Take the man for instance, who deals in the mathematical sciences. There is no elasticity in a mathematical fact; if you bring up against it, it never yields a hair's breadth, everything must go to pieces that comes in collision with it. What the mathematician knows, being absolute, unconditional, incapable of suffering question, it should tend, in the nature of things, to breed a despotic way of thinking. So of those who deal with the palpable and often unmistakable facts of external nature; only in a less degree. Every probability (and most of our common working beliefs are probabilities) is provided with buffers at both ends, which break the force of opposite opinions clashing against it; but scientific certainty has no spring in it, no courtesy, no possibility of yielding. All this must react on the minds that handle these forms of truth. Holmes.

8123. DOGMATISM, Spirit of. A dogmatical spirit inclines a man to be censorious of his neighbors. Every one of his opinions appears to him written, as it were, with sunbeams, and he grows angry that his neighbors do not see it in the same light. He is tempted to disdain his correspondents as men of low and dark understandings, because they do not believe what he does. Watts.

8124. DOGMATIST Defined. He who is certain, or presumes to say he knows, is, whether he be mistaken or in the right, a dogmatist.

Fleming.
8125. DOING GOOD, Aim at. An English Lord congratulated Handel on the success of his new oratorio of the "Messiah," and thanked him for the entertainment he had furnished the people. Handel replied, "My lord, I should be sorry if I only entertained them; I wish to make them better." That preacher mistakes who does not in every sermon, prayer, conversation, visit, and all other work of his ministry aim to make people better. This will have a wider application, extending to all Christians.

8126. DOING GOOD, Effect of. I have read of one Pachomius, a soldier under Constantine the Emperor, how that his army being almost starved for want of necessary provision, he came to a city of Christians, and they of their own charity relieved them speedily and freely. He, wondering at their free and noble charity, inquired what kind of people they were whom he saw so bountiful. It was answered that they were Christians, whose profession it is to hurt no man, and do good to every man. Hereupon Pachomius, convinced of the excellence of this religion, threw away his arms and became a Christian, a saint. Brocks.

8127. DOING GOOD, Efforts at. For his way of living, if we are fallen into a generation wherein men will cry (Sotah!) "He is a fool" that practices it, as the rabbins foretell it will be in the generation wherein the Messiah comes; yet there will be a wiser generation, and "wisdom will be justified of her children." Among the Jews there has been an Ezra, whose head they called "the throne of wisdom;" among the Greeks there has been a Democritus, who was called "Sophia" in the abstract; the later ages knew a Gildas, who wore the surname of Sapiens: but it is the man whose temper and interest it is "to do good" that is the wise man after all. And, indeed, had a man the hands of a Briareus, they would all be too few to do good; he might find occasions to call for more than all of them. The English nation had once a sect of men called "Bons hommes," or "Good men." The ambition of this book is to revive and enlarge a sect that may claim that name; yea, to solicit that it may extend beyond the bounds of a sect, by the coming of all men into it. Of all the trees in the garden of God, which is there which envies not the palm-tree, out of which alone, as Plutarch informs us, the Babylonians derived more than three hundred commodities? or the cocoa-tree, so beneficial to man that a vessel may be built, and rigged, and freighted, and victualed, from that alone? To plant such trees of righteousness, and prune them, is the object of the book now before us. The men who devise good will now give me leave to remind them of a few things, by which they may be a little fortified for their grand intention; for, sirs, you are to pass between "Bozeh" (or dirty) and "Senek" (or thorny), and encounter a host of things worse than Philistines, in your undertaking.

Cotton Mather's Essays.

8128. DOING GOOD, Example of. Dr. Cotton Mather, at the age of sixteen, adopted the maxim, "An opportunity to do good implies the positive duty to do it," and made it his rule in every relation of a long and well spent life. After he had attained to man's estate, he imposed on himself a rule never to enter any company where it was proper for him to speak without endeavoring to be useful in it; dropping, as opportunities might offer, some instructive hint or admonition. By way of improving every moment of his time, he avoided paying or receiving unnecessary visits. No day passed without some contrivance on his part "to do good," nor without his being able to say at the close of it, that some part of his income had been distributed for purposes of charity.

8129. DOING GOOD, Heathen Ideas of.

"I plough the spacious Berecynthian fields,
Full six days' journey wide, says one boasting in the poet; the same man, if he were as much a lover of mankind as of husbandry, would much rather bestow his pains on such a farm, the fruits of which would serve a great number, than to be always dressing the olive-yard of some cynical malcontent, which, when all was done, would scarce yield oil enough to dress a salad or to supply his lamp during the long winter evenings. Epicurus himself, who places happiness in the profoundest quiet and sluggish inactivity, as the only secure harbor from the storms of the troublesome world, could not but confess that it is both more noble and delightful to do than to receive a kindness; for there is nothing which produces so humane and genuine a sort of pleasure as that of doing good. He who gave the names to the three graces well understood this, for they all signify delectation and joy, and these surely are far greater and purer in him who does the good turn. This is so evidently true, that we all receive good turns blushing and in some confusion, but we are always gay and well pleased when we are conferring them. Plutarch.

8130. DOING GOOD, Influence of. The Christian commission treated Federal and Confederate soldiers alike. The effect upon the latter was remarkable. A delegate says, "As we have ministered to their wants and addressed words of kindness to them, tears have started from eyes unaccustomed to weeping. They fairly overwhelm us with their thankful expressions. 'This is what I call living Christianity,' one would say. 'This is the religion for me,' another would add. 'I can't stand this,' said a rough, hard-looking fellow, badly wounded in the foot, but able to hobble along on crutches, 'I can't stand this, boys; it overcomes me. I give in,' and as he came towards us his whole frame shook with emotion, and the big tears fell from his sunburnt face, tears which he awkwardly and vainly tried to hide from his comrades and us. 'You know,' he continued, 'I am no coward. I can face the enemy and not wink; but this kindness kills me; it breaks one all to pieces. I tell you, boys, this is no humbug. It's a big thing. It's the Gospel for body and soul—just what we all need.'"

8131. DOING GOOD, Power of. A Baptist lady, with a kind, Christian, motherly heart, talked familiarly with her Catholic servant-girl, telling what religion had done for her, and how happy it made her under life's burdens; and she showed by her sweet temper and kind spirit that she was all that she claimed. Bridget was affected, because she saw that that was just what she needed, but had not. She was sour, irritable, timid, and sometimes ugly; while her mistress was pleasant and patient under all circumstances, and never afraid to die. The good woman told the girl, too, how she obtained this grace, and where, and that every one might have it who would come to Jesus; that many Catholics had sought and found it, etc., which only deepened her impressions. At length she invited her to go to church, which she did, and sat with her in her fine-cushioned pew, like any other lady—not in a free seat in the gallery. This was repeated, and further appropriate conversations were had, until that girl accepted an invitation, went to the altar for prayers, and found the pearl of great price, to her unutterable joy.

The effect on her life was remarkable. The lady's husband, a venerable gentleman of the Unitarian persuasion, speaking to the writer of the case, soon after said he never saw such a change in a human being in his life, and that they had taken her from the kitchen and brought her to their table and fellowship as a daughter.

Dr. James Porter.

8132. DOING GOOD, Prescription of. Lady Holland, a victim of ennui, complained that she did not know how to pass the time. The poet Rogers prescribed for her something new, viz: "To try to do a little good."

8133. DOING GOOD, Requirement of. The Gymnosophists were greatly opposed to idleness, and required of every pupil that he should tell of some good he had done or devised, every day before he was permitted to sit down to dinner.

8134. DOING GOOD, Result of. An accomplished and wealthy Christian lady of Richmond, Va., was out riding one day, when she came upon a well dressed young man who lay in the hot sun by the road side, dead drunk. The lady alighted, dipped her handkerchief in a stream near by, and spread it over his beautiful face, then returned to the city and reported his case to the police. Shortly afterwards a stranger called upon the lady and said "I am ashamed to look you in the face. I am the man you so kindly cared for the other day. The name on the handkerchief with which you covered my face revealed my benefactress. I have come to thank you for your kindness. I have signed the pledge. With my hand on my mother's Bible, I have sworn, God being my helper, that I will never taste another drop of intoxicating liquor." He kept his pledge. His rescuer became his wife. His brilliant talents won for him a high place in the service of his country. This man was William Wirt.

8135. DOING WELL, Benefit of. The enterprising son of a widow sought work that he might help his mother. He could find employment in liquor-shops, but was too high-principled for that. At last he asked a prominent merchant, who sat reading his paper, the oft-repeated question, "Do you want a boy, sir?" The merchant looked at him, and said, "What can you do?" "I can do anything that will give me an honest living." "Well, take these boots down stairs and black them." In this he succeeded. The merchant said, "Why, my boy, you have done those very well." "Mother told me always to do well whatever I did." His engagement with the merchant was consummated. He became an honorable man, successful merchant, and bank president. The key to his success was "doing well," whether blacking boots or managing finance.

8136. DOOMSDAY, Every Day. One of the illusions is that the present hour is not the critical, decisive hour. Write it on your heart that every day is the best day in the year. No man has learned anything rightly until he knows that every day is Doomsday. Emerson.

8137. DOOR, Closed. In a town in the north of Scotland some boys were in the habit of meeting together for prayer. A little girl was passing, and heard them sing. She stopped to listen, and thinking it was just an ordinary prayer-meeting, she felt anxious to get in. Putting up her hand, she pulled the latch, but it would not open; it was fastened inside. She became very uneasy, and the thought arose in her mind, "What, if this were the door of heaven, and me outside?" She went home, but could not sleep. Day after day she became more troubled at the thought of being shut out of heaven. She went from one prayer-meeting to another, still finding no rest. At length, one day reading the tenth chapter of John, she came to the words, "I am the door." She paused, and read the verse again and again. Here was the very door she was seeking. She entered in and found peace.

8138. DOOR, Knock at the. Not many sounds in life (and I include all urban and all rural sounds) exceed in interest a knock at the door. It "gives a very echo to the throne where hope is seated." But its issues seldom answer to this oracle within;—it is so seldom that just the person we want to see comes. Lamb.

8139. DOOR, The Other. Mr. Whitefield was preaching on the text "And the door was shut." Two young men full of hilarity and glee remarked to one another, "What if one door be shut? another will open." Whitefield had not proceeded far in his discourse when he said, "It is possible there may be some careless, trifling persons here to-day who may ward off the force of this impressive subject by lightly thinking, 'What if the door be shut? another will open.' This repetition of their remark by the preacher came upon them like a sudden flash of lightning. It put an effectual stop to their trifling. The young men were sorely troubled under his pointed appeals. Whitefield went on to say with the utmost solemnity, "Yes, another door will open, and I will tell you what door it will be: it will be the door of the bottomless pit! the door of hell! the door that conceals from the eyes of angels the horrors of damnation!"

8140. DOOR, Sermon about the. A little boy is said to have preached the following on the text "I am the door." "The first word is 'I.' That has only one letter in it. This means the Lord Jesus, the good Saviour, who loves little children. The second word is 'am.' That has two letters in it. When Jesus says 'I am the door,' of course he doesn't mean that he is a door like that you shut just now; but this little sermon is to show you how he is like a door. The third word is 'the,' which has three letters. Jesus says the door, because there is only one door into the kingdom of heaven. The fourth word is 'door,' which has four letters in it. A door lets people into the house; and if there was no door they could not get in. So the Lord Jesus lets his people into the kingdom of heaven; and if it was not for him they could not get in at all. A door keeps out the rain, and the dogs, and the thieves; and so Jesus keeps away all evil and hurtful things out of his beautiful heaven. Now when you want to go into a house, you go straight to the door; and so if we want to go into the kingdom of heaven, we must go to Jesus, and ask him to let us in."

8141. DOUBLE-MINDEDNESS, Biblical. IS LIKE a man with a double heart, Ps. 12: 2 ("a heart and a heart," marg.—with truth on the surface and deception underneath); 1 Chron. 12: 33 compared with ver. 38, men "of double heart" contrasted with "perfect" and "one" (united) heart. "Ungodly professors," says Cocceius, "have two hearts, two lords, two ways, two ends." But of the godly man it is said, "his heart is fixed," Ps. 112: 1; yea, David says it twice, "My heart is fixed, O God, my heart is fixed," Ps. 57: 7; see Hosea 10: 2. IS LIKE "a cake not turned"—half baked, half dough, Hosea 7: 8; as Israel mixed idolatry with the worship of God. IS LIKE a speckled bird, Jer. 12: 9. IS LIKE a kingdom, city, or house divided against itself, that cannot stand, Matt. 12: 25. ILLUSTRATIVE TEXTS. Lev. 19: 19. "The original prohibition of mingling divers things may not inaptly be regarded, as implying a command of 'simplicity and godly sincerity' in all things. It may fairly be accommodated to the case of those who endeavor to reconcile the service of God and mammon, or the pleasures of the world with those of religion; to unite works and grace in the matter of justification, and to many other heterogeneous and unnatural commixtures."—Scott.—1 Kings 18: 21.—"How long halt ye between two opinions?" The idea is taken from a bird hopping recklessly about from bough to bough, not knowing on which to settle (Dr. A. Clarke); or, according to others, from the unequal walk of a lame person.—(Scott.) Ps. 119: 113.—"I hate vain thoughts." The word "vain" is not in the original, and the meaning might be expressed, "I hate other thoughts—thoughts which are at variance with the one law I follow." Prov. 23: 18.—"He that is perverse in his ways shall fall at once." The Hebrew word for "ways," is in the dual form, and means, properly, in two ways. "He that endeavors to preserve himself by fraud and deceit, though he can wind and turn, and hath several shifts he thinks to save himself by, yet in one or other of them he shall perish."—Bishop Patrick.—Jer. 3: 10.—"And yet for all this her treacherous sister Judah hath not turned unto me with her whole heart, but feignedly, saith the Lord." Like Jehu, who "took no heed to walk in the law of the Lord his God with all his heart, for (he, too, was treacherous) he departed not from the sins of Jeroboam, who made Israel to sin," 2 Kings 10: 31; or, like Amaziah, "who did that which was right in the sight of the Lord, but not with a perfect heart," 2 Chron. 25: 2. Matt. 6: 24.—"No man can serve two masters." True, a servant may follow two masters while they walk together, and strangers cannot judge which of the two he is engaged to serve; but if their roads part, it is then seen to which of the two he belongs.

Bowes.

8142. DOUBLE-MINDEDNESS, Parable of. A ship's crew rose in mutiny against the captain soon after they had lost sight of home. Then they said, "Who shall steer us safe to some foreign land?" So they appointed as pilot one of the mutineers, who said he knew the way. But the crew were divided among themselves; some thought the captain knew the way, others believed in the new pilot. At one time the captain's side got the upper hand, and then they used to unbind the captain and set him at the helm; then presently the other side would prevail, and they would push away the captain and put the mutineer in the captain's place. The consequence was that the vessel used to sail at one time in one way and at another time in quite the opposite way, so that they made no progress at all. At last, one evening as the sun was setting, one of the oldest and most experienced sailors said, "Look yonder; there is the Black Rock, on which hundreds of fine ships have been wrecked, and we are drifting toward it. Night is coming on, and the current is taking us fast to the rock. This comes of having more than one pilot."

Arnot.

8143. DOUBT, Biblical. Matt. 14: 31.—"Wherefore didst thou doubt?" ἰδιόρατος—"a figurative word, taken either from a person standing where two ways meet, not knowing which to choose; or from the tremulous motion of a balance when the weights on each side are nearly equal."—(Parkhurst.) The same word occurs Matt. 28: 17. Acts 10: 20; Rom. 4: 20; James 1: 6. Three texts, where the same Greek word is rendered by three different English words:—doubting—staggering—wavering. Luke 12: 29.—"Be not of doubtful mind." Or, as in the margin, "Live not in careful suspense." A figure derived from "floating in the air." (Robinson.) Or, as others take it, from a ship tossed in a storm upon the rising and falling waves, in continued unrest and perturbation. Bowes.

8144. DOUBTING, Pains of. David Hume, after witnessing in the family of the venerable La Roche those consolations which the gospel only can impart, confessed with a sigh that "there were moments when, amidst all the pleasures of philosophical discovery, and the pride of literary fame, he wished that he had never doubted."

8145. DOUBTS, Preach Not. Do not preach your doubts. You are sure of enough in the book to preach about for a life-time. When you preach personal experience you come to Christ's formula, "Verily, verily, I say unto you." When you preach doubts or hearsay it is not "I," but somebody else, that preaches, and so is not evidence that is accepted by the court of the judgment. If you have only doubts, quit preaching. Only convictions generate convictions.

Dr. Fowler.

8146. DOUBTS, Ridicule of. A woman of the doubting kind went to her pastor and said, "Oh, I am dead, dead, twice dead, and plucked up by the root." He replied, "Sitting in my study the other day, I heard a sudden scream, 'John's in the well! John's fallen into the well!" Before I could reach the spot I heard the sad cry, 'John's dead—poor little Johnny's dead.' Leaning over the curb, I called out, 'John, are you dead?' 'Yes, grandfather, I'm dead,' replied John." The preacher remarked, "I was glad to hear it from his own mouth." Dead men do not report themselves.

8147. DOVES, Flight of. In the environs of the city, to the westward, near the Zainderood, are many pigeon-houses, erected at a distance from habitations, for the sole purpose of collecting pigeons' dung for manure. They are large round towers, rather broader at the bottom than the top, and crowned by conical spiracles, through which the pigeons descend. Their interior resembles a honey-comb, pierced with a thousand holes, each of which forms a snug retreat for a nest. More care appears to have been bestowed upon their outside than upon that of the generality of the dwelling-houses, for they are painted and ornamented. The extraordinary flights of pigeons which I have seen alight upon one of these buildings afford, perhaps, a good illustration for the passage in Isaiah, "Who are these that fly as a cloud, and as the doves to their windows?" Their great numbers, and the compactness of their mass, literally look like a cloud at a distance, and obscure the sun in their passage.

Morier.

8148. DREAM, Conviction Through a. Rev. Herbert Mendes ascribed his religious impressions to a dream. He thought he was called to the judgment, and heard the Judge say of his father and mother, "Well done." He heard his own name distinctly called, and appeared before the Judge, overwhelmed with conviction and in full expectation of punishment. He fell down at the feet of the Judge, and implored. "Lord, spare me yet a little longer, and when thou shalt call me again, I hope to be ready." The Judge, with a benignant smile, said, "Go then, and improve the time given thee." His after life showed the abiding results of a fitting dream.

8149. DREAM, Fulfillment of a. A lady placed a bouquet of tuberoses upon the table at the Fulton St. Prayer meeting, which Mr. Lanphier carried home with him. He was followed by a foreigner, who could not speak a word of English. By his gestures he called attention to the bouquet, and by means of an interpreter explained that he had a dream on his way to America in which he was directed to speak to a man whom he should see carrying white flowers. When the German saw the missionary with the white flowers in his hand, he thought of his dream, and tried to speak to him who carried it. In his dream the German received a German Bible from the man, and was instructed in the way of salvation. All this was literally fulfilled, and the man who had the dream is now an earnest missionary among his own countrymen.

8150. DREAM, A Warning. A lady related her dream as follows:—"In my sleep, I thought that I was in my dining room, with a large party of friends, when a most frightful figure appeared at the window, and seemed as if he wanted to get in. I asked what it was, and being told it was death, I was exceedingly alarmed, and begged they would keep him out but in spite of all their efforts, he forced his way in, and pointed his dart at me. I prayed earnestly that he would go away and not hurt me; on which he said, 'That he would leave me for the present, but in nine days he would return and take no denial.' After this, I thought I was carried to a beautiful place, where I saw an immense company of people, who appeared to be exceedingly happy. I understood it was heaven, and felt greatly disappointed and astonished that I did not find myself happy. I was not able to join in their employments, nor could I understand the cause of their joy. While I was musing on all this, one came to me, whom I supposed to be an angel. I asked him if this was heaven? He answered, 'Yes.' 'How does it happen then,' said I, 'that I am not happy?' 'Because,' he replied, 'it is not your place.' He then asked how I came there? I told him I did not know. On saying this, he conducted me to a door, which opening, I was instantly precipitated towards a most dreadful place, from which issued such doleful groans and piercing shrieks, as awoke me from my sleep." Having given this account of her dream, her visitor spoke to her very seriously, and advised her to consider it as a warning from God to attend to her best interests, and to prepare for death and eternity. At this the lady was offended and turned the conversation to other subjects. But the dream was verified. She died on the day indicated, and there seems to have been no change in the fashionable and worldly woman to indicate that the whole was not fulfilled.

8151. DREAMS, Conscience in. God strikes terror into the hearts of the wicked by dreams: as a malus genius is said to have appeared to Brutus the night before his death; or as the face of Hector was presented to Andromache—Virgil records the dream; or as that bloody tyrant, Richard the Third, in a dream the night before the battle of Bosworth Field, thought that all the devils in hell were hauling and tugging him in pieces, and all those he had murdered crying and shrieking out vengeance against him—though he thinks this was more than a dream. Id credo non fuisse somnium sed conscientiam scelorum. He judged it not so much a dream as the guilty conscience of his own wickedness. So to Robert Winter, one of the powder traitors, in a dream appeared the ghastly figures and distracted visages of his chief friends and confederates in that treason; not unlike the very same manner wherein they after stood on the pinnacles of the Parliament house.

Adams.

8152. DREAMS, Felicity of. If we can sleep without dreaming, it is well that painful dreams are avoided. If, while we sleep, we can have any pleasing dreams, it is, as the French say, tant gagné, so much added to the pleasure of life.

Franklin.

8153. DREAMS, Peculiarities of. A very remark able circumstance, and an important point of analogy, is to be found in the extreme rapidity with which the mental operations are performed, or rather with which the material changes on which the ideas depend are excited in the hemispherical ganglia. It would appear as if a whole series of acts, that would really occupy a long lapse of time, pass ideally through the mind in one instant. We have in dreams no true perception of the lapse of time—a strange property of mind! for if such be also its property when entered into the eternal disembodied state, time will appear to us eternity. The relations of space, as well as of time, are also annihilated; so that while almost an eternity is compressed into a moment, infinite space is traversed more swiftly than by real thought. Dr. Forbes Winslow.

8154. DREAMS, Supernatural. The records of history, both sacred and profane, abound in instances of dreams which it is impossible to account for on any other hypothesis than that of a supernatural interposition. Brande.

8155. DREAMS, Views of. Luther objected to all reliance upon dreams, because many are deluded by them. He prayed God not to send him any, but to give him a sound understanding of his revealed will. An old author thought the ruling passion or trait of a man's mind would come out in dreams. "What is said of the ancient Persian kings that were seldom seen in the day, but came to view in the night, is true of a man's special or ruling sin. Good men have had clearer sight of their graces in the dreams of the night than in the duties of the day."

8156. DRESS, Beneficence and. What a remarkable woman Mrs. Fletcher was! In many things how Christ-like? What exemplary self-denial! What love of the poor! It is recorded of one year, than in it she spent, upon dress, but nineteen shillings, while she distributed to the necessitous £180. O that women of our time would follow in this track of simplicity and charity. T. Collins.

8157. DRESS, Cost of. A minister writes from Saratoga: "The belle of the season wears a dress valued at the amount of my salary for two years, and a set of diamonds equal in value to the cost of a comfortable mission church, with infant-room attached, gas-fixtures and cabinet organ included."

8158. DRESS, Game of. It is not the cheapest of games. I saw a brooch in a jeweler's in Bond Street, not an inch wide, and without any singular jewel in it, yet worth £3,000. And I wish I could tell you what this "play" costs altogether, in England, France, and Russia annually. But it is a pretty game, and on certain terms I like it; nay, I don't see it played quite as much as I would fain have it. You ladies like to lead the fashion—by all means lead it thoroughly, lead it far enough. Dress yourselves nicely, and dress everybody else nicely. Lead the fashions for the poor first; make them look well, and you yourselves will look, in ways of which you have now no conception, all the better. The fashions you have set for some time among your peasantry are not pretty ones; their doublets are too irregularly slashed, and the wind blows too frankly through them. Ruskin.

8159. DRESS, Idolatry in. Let the Christian dress so that Christian manhood shall not be overlaid, disguised, or misinterpreted. Let Christians so dress as to show that their hearts are not on these things, but heavenly. Whatever goes to indicate that dress is a supreme object in life, and whatever implies this, is just so far both wrong and unchristian. There is no better definition of an idol than that it steals the heart away from God; and when dress does this it is as much an idol as ever Moloch was; and it is fast coming to be seen that it is a worship no less cruel and bloody.

Rev. Dr. Buddington.

8160. DRESS, Importance of. A stranger of tolerable sense, dressed like a gentleman, will be better received by those of quality above him, than one of much better parts whose dress is regulated by the rigid notions of frugality. A man's appearance falls within the censure of every one that sees him; his parts and learning very few are judges of; and even upon these few they cannot at first be well intruded; for policy and good breeding will counsel him to be reserved among strangers, and to support himself only by the common spirit of conversation. Steele.

8161. DRESS an Index of the Mind. As the index tells us the contents of stories, and directs to the particular chapter, even so does the outward habit and superficial order of garments (in man or woman) give us a taste of the spirit, and demonstratively point (as it were a manual note from the margin) all the internal quality of the soul: and there cannot be a more evident, palpable, gross manifestation of poor, degenerate, dunghilly blood and breeding, than a rude, unpolished, disordered, and slovenly outside. Massinger.

8162. DRESS, Preaching against. A young minister, addressing a fashionable audience, attacked their pride and extravagance, as displayed by their dresses, ribands, ruffles, chains and jewels. In the afternoon, an old minister preached powerfully on the corruption of human nature, the enmity of the soul towards God, and necessity for a new heart. In the evening, as they sat together in private, the young minister said, "Sir, why do you not preach against the vanity and pride of the people for dressing so extravagantly?" "Ah, my son," replied the venerable man, "while you are trimming off the top branches of the tree, I am endeavoring to cut it up by the roots, and then the whole top must die!"

8163. DRESS, Pride in. He that is proud of the rustling of his silks, like a madman, laughs at the rattling of his fetters. For, indeed, clothes ought to be our remembrancers of our lost innocency; besides, why should any brag of what is but borrowed? Should the ostrich snatch off the gallant's feather, the beaver his hat, the goat his gloves, the sheep his suit, the silkworm his stockings, the neat his shoes (to strip him no further than modesty will give leave), he would be left in a cold condition. And yet it is more pardonable to be proud, even of cleanly rags, than (as many are) of affected slovenness. The one is proud of a mole-hill, the other of a dunghill. Fuller.

8164. DRESS, Rules for. Let women paint their eyes with tints of chastity, insert into their ears the word of God, tie the yoke of Christ around their necks, and adorn their whole persons with the silk of sanctity and the damask of devotion: let them adopt that chaste and simple, that neat and elegant style of dress, which so advantageously displays the charms of real beauty, instead of those preposterous fashions and fantastical draperies of dress which, while they conceal some few defects of person, expose so many defects of mind, and sacrifice to ostentatious finery all those mild, amiable, and modest virtues, by which the female character is so pleasingly adorned.

Tertullian.

8165. DRESS, Wealth and. The person whose clothes are extremely fine, I am too apt to consider as not being possessed of any superiority of fortune, but resembling those Indians who are found to wear all the gold they have in the world in a bob at the nose. Goldsmith.

8166. DRINKING, Progress of. The social glass leads on to the glass suggestive or the glass inspiring, and the glass restorative leads on to the glass strength-giving, and that again to glasses fast and frequent—glasses care-drowning, conscience-coaxing, grief-dispelling—till, gasping and dying, the hulk is towed ashore and pierced through with many sins; weak, wasted, worthless, the victim gives up the ghost, leaving in the tainted air a disastrous memory. Dr. J. Hamilton.

8167. DRUNKARD, Chain for the. Billy Dawson, the celebrated Wesleyan preacher, once appealed to the drunkard in the following language: "Suppose yourself to be a servant, and your master were to come in the morning and order you to make a strong chain; on the following morning he came again, and urged you to get on with it; and thus, day by day, you were ordered by your master to the same job. Suppose again, that while you were working, a person came in and asked if you knew what it was for; and that you answered in the negative, adding that you did not care so long as you got your wages. But this person tells you, that he knows it to be a fact that it is your master's intention to bind you with it in perpetual bondage; would you, I ask, add another link to it?" The man answered, "No; and all the money in the world would not hire me to it." Mr. Dawson then told him that the habits of drunkenness are the devil's chain, in which he keeps poor sinners in perpetual bondage, and that when they have added the last link, he chains them in hell forever. These words so impressed the mind of the man, that his conscience continued to remind him, "I am making another link for my chain!" until he relinquished his wicked course of life.

8168. DRUNKARD, Conversion of a. A talented young lawyer ran rapidly down the drunkard's road to ruin. Many attempts at reform were made, but uniformly failed. He was taken to a prayer-meeting where he was known, and fervent prayer was offered for him. Deeply moved, he went and knelt at the altar rail while mingled prayers went up for him. A change came over him, which he arose and publicly declared. His reformation was effectual. He soon obtained a large practice, and is now an eminent and successful lawyer.

8169. DRUNKARD, Portion of the. A well-known drunkard appeared at a religious meeting and declared that he was afraid of the drunkard's doom. Said he, "One of the lessons of my childhood was the text 'No drunkard shall inherit the kingdom of God.' It has followed me more than you would suppose. I have heard it in the night-watches and above the revels of a drunken carousal. It seemed to burn on the walls of the rum-shop in letters of fire. I have resolved to escape that doom. Will you give me a helping hand?" The hand of help was given, and the drunkard reformed. A notable "brand plucked from the burning."

8170. DRUNKARD, Salvation for the. In a great meeting in Lancashire, my home, where it was the custom to invite sinners to what we called the "penitent form," for prayer, there was a poor, wretched drunkard. As he was going out, some one asked him to remain. "You don't think I can be a Christian?" said the poor drunkard. "I do," was the answer, "if you are a sinner." "But I'm not going to sign the pledge any more," said he. "I've signed it twenty times, and never will again." "No matter; go and kneel with the others there, and we will pray for you." So he went, and good people knelt beside him and prayed. As he was kneeling there, the chapel door opened, and a poor little girl put her pale face inside. She had on no bonnet; her clothes were in tatters, and the rain dripped from them in little pools at her feet. She was afraid at first to come into the light and warmth out of the storm, but the man at the door drew her in. "What do you want, little girl?" "Please, sir, I heard as my father was coming in here, and I came to see if it was true. Why, that's my father," she said, pointing to the kneeling drunkard. "Tell me, please, sir, what he is doing." Then, permission being given, pater, pater went the little bare feet up the aisle to the penitent form. She knelt down by her father, and put her arms about his neck, and said, "Father, what are ye doing here?" "I'm asking God to forgive me for my badness." "And if he forgives you, shall we be happy then?" "Yes." "Shall we have bread then?" "Yes." "Will you never strike us again?" "No." "And will you stay here till I bring mother?" "Yes." Out she went into the storm, and soon came back with a wretched-looking woman, who had a tattered shawl over her head, and this poor wife went and knelt down by her husband's side, and prayed: "O God! save me, too. O God! save me, too!" And God heard and saved them all. Just as I was leaving England a friend came to me to say good-by. "I have been," said he, "to the home of that drunkard's family to take tea. You would not know them. There is plenty to eat, plenty to wear. Their home is a little heaven."

H. Morehouse.

8171. DRUNKARD, Wail of a. The brilliant Charles Lamb wrote, "The waters have gone over me, but out of the black depths, could I be heard, I would cry out to all those who have set a foot in the perilous flood. Could the youth to whom the flavor of the first wine is delicious as the opening scenes of life, or the entering upon some newly-discovered paradise, look into my desolation, and be made to understand what a dreary thing it is when he shall feel himself going down a precipice with open eyes and passive will—to see all godliness emptied out of him, and yet not be able to forget a time when it was otherwise—to bear about the pitious spectacle of his own ruin; could he see my feverish eye, feverish with last night's drinking, and feverish looking for to-night's repetition of the folly; could he but feel the body of death out of which I cry hourly with feeble outcry to be delivered, it were enough to make him dash the sparkling beverage to the earth, in all the pride of its mantling temptation."

8172. DRUNKARDS, Responsibility of. It is a maxim in legal practice, that those who presume to commit crimes when drunk must submit to punishment when sober. This state of the law is not peculiar to modern times. In ancient Greece, it was decreed by Pittacus, that he who committed a crime when intoxicated should receive a double punishment—viz., one for the crime itself, and the other for the ebriety which prompted him to commit it. The Athenians not only punished offences done in drunkenness with increased severity, but, by an enactment of Solon, inebriation in a magistrate was made capital. In our own country, at the present time, acts of violence committed under its influence are held to be aggravated, rather than otherwise; nor can the person bring it forward as an extenuation of any folly or misdemeanor which he may chance to commit. A bond signed in intoxication holds in law, and is perfectly binding, unless it can be shown that the person who signed it was inebriated by the collusion or contrivance of those to whom the bond was given.

Anatomy of Drunkenness.

8173. DRUNKENNESS, Breaking off. Webb, the celebrated English walker, who was remarkable for vigor both of body and mind, drank nothing but water. He was one day recommending his regimen to a friend who loved wine, and urging him with great earnestness to quit a course of luxury by which his health and intellects would be equally destroyed. The gentleman appeared convinced, and told him that he would conform to his counsel, though he thought he could not change his course of life at once, but would leave off strong liquors by degrees. "By degrees!" exclaimed Webb: "if you should unhappily fall into the fire, would you caution your servants to pull you out only by degrees?"

Anon.

8174. DRUNKENNESS, Brutality of. When this vice has taken fast hold of a man, farewell industry, farewell emulation, farewell attention to things worthy of attention, farewell love of virtuous society, farewell decency of manners, and farewell, too, even an attention to person; everything is sunk by this predominant and brutal appetite. In how many instances do we see men who have begun life with the brightest prospects before them, and who have closed it without one ray of comfort and consolation. Young men, with good fortunes, good talents, good tempers, good hearts, and sound constitutions, only by being drawn into the vortex of the drunkard, have become by degrees the most loathsome and despicable of mankind. In the house of the drunkard there is no happiness for any one. All is uncertainty and anxiety. He is not the same man for any one day at a time. No one knows of his outgoings or his incomings. When he will rise, or when he will lie down to rest, is wholly a matter of chance. That which he swallows for what he calls pleasure brings pain, as surely as the night brings the morning. Poverty and misery are in the train. To avoid these results, we are called upon to make no sacrifice. Abstinence requires no aid to accomplish it. Our own will is all that is requisite; and if we have not the will to avoid contempt, disgrace, and misery, we deserve neither relief nor compassion.

Cobbett.

8175. DRUNKENNESS, Effects of. Now, amongst the rest, drunkenness seems to me to be a gross and brutish vice. The soul has the greatest interest in all the rest, and there are some vices that have something, if a man may so say, of generous in them. There are vices wherein there is a mixture of knowledge, diligence, valor, prudence, dexterity, and cunning; this is totally corporal and earthly, and the thickest-skulled nation this day in Europe is that where it is the most in fashion: other vices discompose the understanding; this totally overthrows it, and renders the body stupid.

Montaigne.

8176. DRUNKENNESS, Fatal. An old sea-captain relates the following fact, of which he was an eye-witness:—"A collier brig was stranded on the Yorkshire coast, and I had occasion to assist in the distressing service of rescuing a part of the crew by drawing them up a vertical cliff, two or three hundred feet in altitude, by means of a very small rope, the only material at hand. The first two men who caught hold of the rope were hauled safely up to the top; but the next, after being drawn to a considerable height, slipped his hold and fell; and with the fourth and last who ventured upon this only chance of life, the rope gave way, and he also was plunged into the foaming breakers beneath. Immediately afterwards the vessel broke up, and the remnant of the ill-fated crew perished before our eyes. What now was the cause of this heart-rending event? Was stress of weather, or a contrary wind, or unavoidable accident? No such thing. It was the entire want of moral conduct in the crew. Every sailor, to a man, was in a state of intoxication! The helm was intrusted to a boy ignorant of the coast. He ran the vessel upon the rock at Whitby, and one-half of the miserable dissipated crew awoke to consciousness in eternity."

8177. DRUNKENNESS, Resolute. Theotymus, on being told by his physician that except he did abstain from drunkenness and excess, he was like to lose his eyes, his heart was so desperately set upon his sin, that he said—"Vale lumen amicum; Farewell sweet light, then, I must have my pleasure in that sin; I must drink, though I drink out my eyes; then farewell eyes, and farewell light and all!"

St. Ambrose.

8178. DRUNKENNESS, Supernatural. It is gravely related of the Irish St. Molua that his father became grossly drunk for seven hours. He assured his wife that he had not taken a drop of anything, but only inhaled the breath of his sleeping babe, the aforesaid saint, as he stooped down to kiss him. It is set down by his biographer as showing the miraculous power of the infant saint. No thought of any other cause seems to have occurred to them. This credulity is certainly a miracle.

8179. DRUNKENNESS, Tempt Not to. Col. John Trumbull, of Connecticut, used to relate the following of himself: An old Mohegan king named Zachary, used to dine annually with his father, then governor of the State. This Indian king had been a great drunkard, but was thoroughly reformed. John, one of the Governor's boys, knowing old Zachary's story, thought he would test him. At the table, he said to the old chief: "Zachary, this beer is excellent: will you taste it?" The old man dropped his knife, his black eye sparkling with indignation, as he said: "John, do you know what you are doing? You are serving the devil. I tell you that I am an Indian; and that if I should but taste the beer, I could not stop until I got to ruin, and became again the drunken, contemptible wretch your father remembers me to have been. John, while you live, never tempt a man to break a good resolution."

8180. DRUNKENNESS, Warning against. A Roman is represented, when he wished to excite the public indignation against the assassins of his friend, as having conveyed the pale, bloody and bleeding body to the public streets, and (lifting up the mantle that was thrown over it, and pointing to the wounds that covered it) as having then and there called for vengeance on the heads of the pitiless assassins. And if anything could make the drunkard hate his crime, or the sober shun it, it might be the dead body that in this church preached better against the crime of drunkenness than a hundred sermons. If there be such a sinner here to-day, I would rather have had him here some days ago. I can now only tell him what drunkenness will do, but I would then have shown him. He has often had the warning of the living; he would then have had the warning of the dead. Guthrie.

8181. DRUNKENNESS, Woes of. It is not so much the money that drunkenness wastes as the misery it produces—the domestic, temporal, and eternal misery—which most of all appals us. As to the expense of this vice, great as it is, that we least deplore; for the loss of money, we hate it least. On the contrary, we should be content were the money and the vice to perish together. We should be content to pay that hundred million as yearly tribute, would this enemy to God and man, this foe to our peace and piety, leave these shores. We wish to keep, and, were it possible, to get back, something far more precious than money. Give that mother back her son, as he was on the day when he returned from his father's grave, and in all the affection of his uncorrupted boyhood, walked to the house of God with a widowed weeping woman leaning on his arm. Give that grieved man back his brother, as innocent and happy as in those days when the boys, twined in each other's arms, returned from school, bent over the same Bible, slept in the same bed, and never thought that the day would come when brother should blush for brother. Give this weeping wife, who sits before us wringing her hands in agony, the tears dripping through her jeweled fingers, and the lines of sorrow prematurely drawn on her beautiful brow, give her back the man she loved, such as he was when her young heart was won, when they stood side by side on the nuptial day, and receiving her from a fond father's hands, he promised his love to one whose heart he has broken, and whose once graceful form now bends with sorrow to the ground. Give me back, as a man, the friends of my youthful days, whose wrecks now lie thick on this wreck-strewn shore. Relieve us of the fears that lie heavy on our hearts for the character and the souls of some who hold parley with the devil by this forbidden tree, and are floating on the outer edge of that great gulf-stream, which sweeps its victims onwards to most woeful ruin. Could this be done, we would not talk of money. The hundred millions which drink costs this land is not to be weighed or ever mentioned with this. Hearts are broken which no money can heal. Rachel is "weeping for her children," refusing to be comforted. Guthrie.

8182. DUELIST, The Remorse of a. For many years, there was in the lunatic asylum at Philadelphia, an intelligent and accomplished man, who, through his own untoward act, had made himself the victim of despair. He had killed his antagonist in a duel; but no sooner did he learn that his shot had taken fatal effect, than he abandoned himself to the horrors of remorse. Most pitiable it was to see him measure off the paces, stand and give the word—"Fire," then wring his hands and shriek—"He is dead! he is dead!" then pace again, and fire, and renew his self-upbraiding. In that fatal moment when his victim fell, conscience took up her iron sceptre, and smote down reason, and hope, and peace. So conscience "doth make cowards of us all."

Dr. Thompson.

8183. DULLNESS, Failures of. The attempts, however, of dullness are constantly repeated, and as constantly fail. For the misfortune is, that the head of dullness, unlike the tail of the torpedo, loses nothing of her benumbing and lethargizing influence by reiterated discharges: horses may ride over her, and mules and asses may trample upon her, but, with an exhaustless and patient perversity, she continues her narcotic operations even to the end.

Colton.

8184. DUPLICITY, Emblem of. A man and a satyr having struck up an acquaintance, sat down together to eat. The day being wintry and cold, the man put his fingers to his mouth and blew upon them. "What's that for, my friend?" asked the satyr. "My hands are so cold," said the man; "I do it to warm them." In a little while some hot food was placed before them, and the man, raising the dish to his mouth, again blew upon it. "And what's the meaning of that, now?" said the satyr. "Oh," replied the man, "my porridge is so hot, I do it to cool it." "Nay, then," said the satyr, "from this moment I renounce your friendship, for I will have nothing to do with one who blows hot and cold with the same mouth."

Æsop.

8185. DURATION, Eternal. There is a great difference between the light of a taper, and that of a flambeau; but expose both to the light of the sun, and their difference will be imperceptible. In like manner eternal duration is so great an object, that it causes everything to disappear that can be compared with it.

Saurin.

8186. DUTIES, Importance of. Never judge by appearances as to the relative importance of duties. What seems the least important may be all important. Had the widow not given her mite the day she did to the treasury, but delayed it a week, how much would she herself, and the whole Christian Church, have lost by the delay!

Macleod.

8187. DUTIES, Practice of. There is a difference, and a wide one, between practicing moral duties and being a Christian. Christianity is a religion of motives. It substitutes an eternal motive for an earthly one: it substitutes the love of God for the love of the world or the love of self. There may be, and are, many persons who practice temperance and other virtues which Christianity inculcates, but who never think of doing so because they are so inculcated. It would be as absurd to ascribe a knowledge of mechanics to savages because they employ the lever, or of the principles of astronomy to brutes because in walking they preserve the centre of gravity, as it is to call such persons Christians. A Christian is one whose motives are Christian faith and Christian hope, and who is, moreover, able to give a reason for the hope that is in him.

Whately.

8188. DUTIES, Presentation of. Boyd says, in his "Art of Putting Things," "What little child would have heart to begin the alphabet, if, before he did so, you put clearly before him all the school and college work of which it is the beginning? The poor little thing would knock up at once, wearied out by your want of skill in putting things. And so it is that Providence, kindly and gradually putting things, wiles us onward, still keeping hope and heart through the trials and cares of life. Ah! if we had had it put to us at the outset, how much we should have to go through to reach even our present stage of life, we should have been ready to think it the best plan to sit down and die at once; but, in compassion for human weakness, the great Director and Shower of events practices the art of putting things."

8189. DUTIES, Religious. The Christian ought to examine what operation, what influence his religious performances have upon him. Prayer, hearing, reading, and such-like duties, do naturally tend to enlighten the mind, purify the heart, increase our love, strengthen our faith, and confirm our hope: and therefore where this is not the effect of them, we may conclude that they are not discharged in that manner, and with that sincerity they ought.

Lucas.

8190. DUTIES, Voluntary. Good duties must not be pressed nor beaten out of us, as the waters came out of the rock when Moses smote it with his rod; but must freely drop from us, as myrrh from the tree, or honey from the comb. If a willing mind be wanting, there wants that flower which should perfume our obedience, and make it a sweet smelling savor to God.

T. Watson.

8191. DUTY, Adaptation of. Latimer was trained by his father to use the cross-bow. At first he was provided with a small bow adapted to his strength, and as he grew larger and stronger bigger bows were given him, till he was able to wield a man's weapon. The scholar is trained by an adjustment of lessons to his capacity, till he reads a thousand lines of Latin more easily than he did one line at the beginning. God has adjusted our duties in the same way. All are not laid upon us at once. First the little, then the great. Having done the little duties of the Christian life faithfully, we shall be prepared for the great ones.

8192. DUTY, Alternative of. On the occasion of a regiment of cavalry being ordered unexpectedly to the Cape of Good Hope, one of the officers, not very remarkable for his zeal in the performance of his duty, applied for leave to remain at home. The Duke's answer was very laconic—"Sail or sell."

Life of Wellington

8193. DUTY, Benefit of. No man has a right to say he can do nothing for the benefit of mankind, who are less benefited by ambitious projects than by the sober fulfillment of each man's proper duties. By doing the proper duty in the proper place, a man may make the world his debtor. The results of "patient continuance in well-doing," are never to be measured by the weakness of the instrument, but by the omnipotence of him who blesseth the sincere efforts of obedient faith alike in the prince and in the cottager. H. Thompson.

8194. DUTY, Biblical. "DUTIES are ours, results are God's," see Exod. 23: 24, 25; 2 Sam. 10: 12; 1 Chron. 19: 13. "The path of duty is the path of safety." "Never expect God's blessing out of God's way." See Gen. 31. 3:—"Return . . . I will be with thee," followed by 32. Oh, how happy are they who go on God's errands. 1 Kings 13—The "man of God" that came to Bethel;—in the way of duty, he had no fear, even to face the king, and the Lord protected him. Out of the path of obedience, how soon was he overtaken by God's judgment! Flying from the place and way of duty brings chastening and sorrow:—Abraham—Hagar—David—Elijah—Jonah. Matt. 10, is Christ's ordination charge to the Twelve. In chap. 11: 1 we read, "He made an end of commanding." Christ's commissions are Christ's commands. Duty goes side by side with privilege. It runs throughout the whole Scripture, see 2 Cor. 6: 16, 17; 7: 1; Prov. 3: 5, 6; Col. 2: 6, 7; 3: 1; Heb. 12: 11, 12. Bowes.

8195. DUTY, Burden of. The Princess Elizabeth carried the crown for her sister in the procession at Mary's coronation, and complained to Noailles of its great weight. "Be patient," was the adroit answer, "it will seem lighter when on your own head." The outward forms of godliness are as burdensome to an unregenerate man as was the crown to the princess; but let him be born again and so made a possessor of the good things of divine grace, and they will sit easily enough upon his head, as his glory and delight. Spurgeon.

8196. DUTY, Conviction of. That we ought to do an action, is of itself a sufficient and ultimate answer to the questions, why we should do it?—how we are obliged to do it? The conviction of duty implies the soundest reason, the strongest obligation, of which our nature is susceptible. Whevell.

8197. DUTY, Fidelity to. During one of the civil wars of England, Dr. John Hacket, of London, was using the liturgy in his church, contrary to the law of Parliament, when armed soldiers rushed in and ordered him to desist. He went on reading the service with steady voice. A soldier aimed a pistol at his head, and threatened him with instant death if he did not stop. The undaunted minister replied, "Soldier, I am doing my duty; do you do yours," and went on reading the service. The soldiers, overmatched in courage, went away, leaving him victor at the post of duty.

8198. DUTY, The First. A young student who subsequently became a missionary, said, "When I was a child I was one day full of bright anticipations as to what I should do, and what I should be, when I became a man. My ideas, both with regard to business and the honors of life, were very glowing. My dear mother listened to my boyish prattle very patiently. When I ceased she paused a few moments, and then, drawing me gently to her side, with an affectionate and solemn tone she said, 'Seek first the kingdom of heaven.' That word 'first' was never forgotten by me. It made an impression on my mind which time never erased, and, by God's mercy, it led me to seek an interest in Jesus; and now I can give up 'all for Christ.'"

8199. DUTY, Happiness in. Without recurring to any effects produced upon the general system, every individual in every stage, and under every circumstance of existence, has a post to maintain, in which he is placed by the Sovereign Disposer of the universe: on a diligent attention to the duties arising from that situation, whatever it be, and not from a desertion of it, must all our happiness depend.

Mrs. Carter.

8200. DUTY, Help in. The area of duty, which is committed to the superintendence of each of us by the sublime code of evangelical morals, is confessedly larger than our scanty powers can occupy. In this state of original helplessness, accordingly, one resource only remains open to us,—to throw ourselves, with all our infirmities, on the Divine help.

Bishop Shuttleworth.

8201. DUTY, Home. God took especial care, that the bird sitting over the eggs in her nest should not be hurt (Deut. 22: 6); but we find nothing to secure her if found abroad. In doing the duty of our place, we have heaven's word for our security; but on our own peril be it if we wander; then are we, like Shimei, out of its precincts, and lay ourselves open to some judgment or another: it is alike dangerous to do what we are not called to, and to neglect and leave undone the duty of our place.

Salter.

8202. DUTY, Ideal of. Suppose the case of a young man entering upon life, with the cause of duty beginning to form in him, or at least working itself clear and firm in his mind, how directly must all his views of the near and the present be affected by his thought of the Supreme and the future? It may not be that he has any distinct consciousness of moulding his views of the one by the other. But not the less surely will the "life that now is" to him be moulded by the character of the life that he believes to be above him and before him. The lower will take its color from the higher—the "near" from the "heavenly horizon." There will be a light or a darkness shed around his present path in proportion as his faith opens a steady or a hesitating—a comprehensive or a partial—gaze into the future and unseen.

Dr. Tulloch.

8203. DUTY, Imperfection and. A sculptor was at work forming a figure out of a faulty block of marble. A neighbor of his told him that it was absolutely impossible to make a perfect figure out of such imperfect materials. "All this is very true," replied the sculptor; "but this block of marble, such as it is, was sent to me to be formed into a statue; and as I cannot make it better, I must content myself in forming the best figure out of it that I can." A nurseryman about to transplant a number of young trees, some straight and others crooked thus reasoned with himself:—"These straight saplings will no doubt grow up to be fine trees without much attention on my part; but I will see if, by proper training, I cannot make something of the crooked ones also. There will be more trouble with them, no doubt, than with others, but for that very reason I shall be the better satisfied should I succeed."

8204. DUTY, Impression of. It is said that Lady Huntingdon was on her way to a brilliant assembly, when suddenly there darted into her soul these words, "Man's chief end is to glorify God and enjoy him forever," which she had long since committed to memory without feeling their mighty import. From that hour her life revolved around a new centre. She soon found peace and rest, and consecrated herself, her wealth, and her influence to God and humanity.

8205. DUTY, Inspiration from. England not long since lost her greatest hero. Full of years and honors, Wellington went down to his grave. A nation mourned him. They mourned him because he had done so much and done it so bravely and well for his country. He had faced perils by sea and by land. He had borne summer heat, and winter cold. He had stood in the "imminent deadly breach," and lifted up an unshrinking front when the air was blackened with fiery shot and bursting shell. He had trodden down his country's foes, and driven her would-be invader into dreary exile. He had maintained her cause against foreign treachery and domestic anarchy. Well, what was it that upheld this man through his wondrous career? What mighty motive lay at the root of his stern, but unimpeachable fidelity? Why that same cold and uninviting thing—as you deem it—a sense of duty. Duty was his watchword; duty to a human master—to a king. He never boasted higher motive—perhaps never thought of it. Merry.

8206. DUTY, Most Important. Archbishop Usher was preaching in the church in Covent Garden, when a messenger from the court announced that the King wished to see him immediately. The Archbishop told the messenger that he was engaged in God's business, and as soon as he had done he would attend upon the King, and then continued his sermon.

8207. DUTY, Neglect of. Thousands of men pass off the stage of life, and are heard of no more. Why? they do not partake of good in the world, and none were blessed by them; none could point to them as the means of their redemption; not a line they wrote, not a word they spake, could be recalled; and so they perished: their light went out in darkness, and they were not remembered more than insects of yesterday. Will you thus live and die, O man immortal? Live for something. Do good, and leave behind you a monument of virtue that the storm of time can never destroy. Write your name in kindness, love, and mercy, on the hearts of thousands you come in contact with year by year: you will never be forgotten. No! your name, your deeds, will be as legible on the hearts you leave behind you as the stars on the brow or evening. Good deeds will shine as the stars of heaven. Chalmers.

8208. DUTY, Path of. A young man went one evening to consult his minister respecting the situation which he filled in a large drapery establishment. His master required him to tell falsehoods about the goods, and to cheat the customers whenever he could do so; and his conscience told him that this was wrong. His minister advised him to refuse to act thus dishonestly. "I shall lose my place," said the young man. "Then lose your place; don't hesitate a moment." "I engaged for a year, and my year is not out." "No matter; you are ready to fulfill your engagement. But what was your engagement? Did you engage to deceive, to cheat and lie?" "Oh no, not at all." "Then certainly you need have no hesitation through fear of forfeiting your place. If he sends you away because you will not do such things for him, you will know him to be a bad man, from whom you may be glad to be separated." "I have no place to go to, and he knows it." "I would go anywhere, do anything, dig potatoes, black boots, sweep the streets for a living, sooner than yield to such temptations." "I don't think I can stay there; but I don't know what to do or where to look." "Look to God first, and trust in him. Do you think he will let you suffer, because, out of regard to his commandments, you have lost your place? Never. Such is not his way. Ask him to guide you." The young man acted upon the advice given. He was dismissed from his situation, but he found another, where he established a character for integrity and promptness, and entered afterwards into business for himself. He prospered, and is now a man of extensive property and high respectability.

Sunday Teacher's Treasury.

8209. DUTY, Refreshment by. A man shall carry a bucket of water on his head and be very tired with the burden; but that same man when he dives into the sea shall have a thousand buckets on his head without perceiving their weight, because he is in the element and it entirely surrounds him. The duties of holiness are very irksome to men who are not in the element of holiness; but when once those men are cast into the element of grace, then they bear ten times more, and feel no weight, but are refreshed thereby with joy unspeakable. Spurgeon.

8210. DUTY, Reward of. No man's spirits were ever hurt by doing his duty: on the contrary, one good action, one temptation resisted and overcome, one sacrifice of desire or interest, purely for conscience sake, will prove a cordial for weak and low spirits, far beyond what either indulgence, or diversion, or company, can do for them. Paley.

8211. DUTY, Routine of. Perhaps an apter simile cannot be formed to illustrate social life than that presented by the planets encircling the sun; while they harmoniously perform their daily revolutions and their annual circuits, and while they act upon the moons which subordinatedly revolve around them, the whole orderly system obeys each impulse of attraction received from the central orb; to him they turn for light and warmth; and the face of each planet, while beholding his brilliant glory, reflects his bright image, and becomes itself a luminary. Had man preserved entire his original likeness to his Creator, he would have displayed the divine likeness, not only in his soul—not only in his bodily glory and endowments—but likewise in his every minutest relation with other beings and things. Another very remarkable, and, I believe, designed coincidence, may be traced between the planetary and the social system: the one and the other are maintained in action and in order by an exactly similar principle, called attraction in the spheres and love in the hearts of mankind; and by this attraction or love, not only are the planets in the sky, and Christians upon earth, drawn mutually towards each other, but also drawn simultaneously towards their central source of life, and light, and happiness.

Lady's Magazine.

8212. DUTY, Sacrifice of. In our late war a little drummer boy, after describing the hardships of the winter campaign, the cold, the biting, the pitiless wind, the hunger and the nakedness which they had to endure, concluded his letter to his mother with the simple and touching words, "But, mother, it is our duty, and for our duty we will die."

8213. DUTY, The Sense of. There is no evil that we cannot either face or fly from, but the consciousness of duty disregarded. A sense of duty pursues us ever. It is omnipresent, like the deity. If we take to ourselves the wings of the morning, and dwell in the uttermost parts of the sea, duty performed or duty violated is still with us, for our happiness or our misery. If we say, the darkness shall cover us—in the darkness, as in the light, our obligations are yet with us. We cannot escape their power, nor fly from their presence. They are with us in this life, will be with us at its close; and in that scene of inconceivable solemnity which yet lies further onward, we shall still find ourselves surrounded by the consciousness of duty, to pain us wherever it has been violated, and to console us so far as God may have given us grace to perform it.

Webster.

8214. DUTY, Self-Sacrifice of. It is an impressive truth that, sometimes in the very lowest forms of duty, less than which would rank a man as a villain, there is, nevertheless, the sublimest ascent of self-sacrifice. To do less would class you as an object of eternal scorn; to do so much presumes the grandeur of heroism.

De Quincey.

8215. DUTY, Triumphs of. There are few things more beautiful than the calm and resolute progress of an earnest spirit. The triumphs of genius may be more dazzling; the chances of good fortune may be more exciting; but neither are at all so interesting or so worthy as the achievements of a steady, faithful, and fervent energy. The moral elements give an infinitely higher value to the latter, while, at the same time, they bring it comparatively within the reach of all. Genius can be the lot of only a few; good fortune may come to any, but it would be the part of a fool to wait for it; whereas all may work with heartiness and might in the work to which they have given themselves. It is their simple duty to do this. It may seem but a small thing to do. No one certainly is entitled to any credit for doing it. Yet just because it is a duty, it will be found bearing a rich reward. The labor of the faithful is never in vain. The fruits will be found gathered into his hand, while the hasty garlands of genius are fading away, and the prizes of the merely fortunate are turned into vanity.

Dr. Tulloch.

8216. DYING, Bliss of. The pain of dying must be distinguished from the pain of the previous disease, for when life ebbs sensibility declines. As death is the final extinction of corporal feeling, so numbness increases as death comes on. The prostration of disease, like healthful fatigue, engenders a growing stupor—a sensation of subsiding softly into a coveted repose. The transition resembles what may be seen in those lofty mountains, whose sides exhibit every climate in regular gradation: vegetation luxuriates at their base, and dwindles in the approach to the regions of snow till its feeblest manifestation is repressed by the cold. The so-called agony can never be more formidable than when the brain is the last to go, and the mind preserves to the end a rational cognizance of the state of the body; yet persons thus situated commonly attest that there are few things in life less painful than the close. "If I had strength enough to hold a pen," said William Hunter, "I would write how easy and delightful it is to die." "If this be dying," said the niece of Newton Olney, "it is a pleasant thing to die;" "the very expression," adds her uncle, "which another friend of mine made use of on her death-bed, a few years ago." The same words have so often been uttered under similar circumstances, that we could fill pages with instances which are only varied by the name of the speaker. "If this be dying," said Lady Glenorchy, "it is the easiest thing imaginable." "I thought that dying had been more difficult," said Louis XIV. "I did not suppose it was so sweet to die," said Francis Suarez, the Spanish theologian. An agreeable surprise was the prevailing sentiment with them all; they expected the stream to terminate in the dash of the torrent, and they found it was losing itself in the gentlest current. The whole of the faculties seem sometimes concentrated on the placid enjoyment. Nor does the calm partake of the sensitiveness of sickness. There was a swell in the sea the day Collingwood breathed his last upon the element which had been the scene of his glory. Capt. Thomas expressed a fear that he was disturbed by the tossing of the ship: "No, Thomas," he replied, "I am now in a state in which nothing in this world can disturb me more. I am dying; and I am sure it must be consolatory to you, and all who love me, to see how comfortably I am coming to my end."

Fontenelle.

8217. DYING, Contrast in. "Fool! fool! fool!" were the last words of one on his dying bed, who, it is to be feared, had procrastinated his repentance too long and too fearfully; while the humble Christian, sensible of a thousand failings and imperfections, still looks with the eye of faith on his Redeemer; and his soul, like the flight of an eagle towards the heavens, soars to the regions of everlasting happiness.

Jesse.

8218. DYING, Experience in. Gert Links, a converted Hottentot of South Africa, noted for his excellence of character, having lived to good old age, said, when about to die, "I have at this moment a particular impression of the immortality of the soul, for my body is already half-dead; I have lost the use of both legs and one arm, and if my soul were not immortal, it would be half-dead also; but instead of that, I am constantly thinking of God and heaven, and I can think with great ease and freedom. I have also a special conviction that the Bible is God's book, and its blessed truths are constantly running through my mind, and afford me great comfort in my affliction. I wish to say further that I now see more clearly than ever that the missionaries are not common men, but servants of God sent to declare to us his Holy Word." He looked round upon the many friends who had assembled to hear his last words, and addressing them he said, "Pay great attention to the word of your teachers, and remember that they speak to you in the name of the Lord." Being faint, he said, "I have done." An hour afterward he was dead.

8219. DYING, Gate Open to tha. A dying woman whom Mother Munroe of Boston led to Christ, said to her, "I will open the gates wide for you." When Mrs. Munroe came to death she repeated, "I shall go sweeping through the gates, washed in the blood of the Lamb." Who shall say her forerunner had not kept her word?

8220. DYING, Glorious. Glorious visions open to the dying saints of God. "The celestial city," says Payson, "is full in my view." "This is heaven begun," said Thomas Scott. "I breathe the air of heaven," said Stephen Gano. "I have been," said Walker of Truro, "upon the wings of the cherubim." "Christ—angels—beautiful—delightful!" were the last words of Dr. Hope. "I see things that are unutterable," said Rev. Mr. Holland. "I see the New Jerusalem," said Norman Smith. "They praise him! They praise him! What glory! the angels are waiting for me!" said Dr. Bateman. "Do you see," said Edmund Auger, "that blessed assembly who await my arrival? Do you hear that sweet music with which holy men invite me, that I may henceforth be a partaker of their happiness! How delightful it is to be in the society of blessed spirits! Let us go! We must go! Let me go!"

8221. DYING, Happy. Rev. A. M. French said, "I am going through the valley of the shadow —who has any anxiety? I shall soon be with Jesus. How sweet to die in the will of the Lord! O my wife, my dear daughter, how sweet to die in the will of the Lord! the sweet will of the Lord!" Four times he repeated, "How sweet to die! How sweet to die!" and added: "Luxurious! luxurious! O that I could tell you how sweet!" At one of his latest rallies, looking smilingly around, and speaking like a guest who had been making a short call in the room, he said, "Well, I guess I must go!"

8222. DYING, Invitation of tha. An unconverted young woman stands by the bedside of a dying Christian. They have loved each other like two sisters. Unable to articulate, the dying one speaks through her eye. Catching the eye of her friend, and looking upward, she silently but significantly says to her, "Meet me up there." A single tear slid out from under the eyelid and paused on her pallid cheek, and remained there after her spirit had fled. To the survivor that crystal sermon was the most effective sermon ever addressed to her. No rest could she find, though she struggled for months, till she opened the door and let Christ in. For twenty-five years that individual has been the companion and helper of a minister of Jesus.

Christian Era.

8223. DYING, Message of tha. I went down the Tennessee river in war time with a boat-load of wounded men, after the battle of Shiloh. Many were mortally wounded; they had taken the worst cases first. I said to those who were with me, "We must not let these men die without telling them of heaven." One young man was unconscious, and they said he could not live. I asked the physician if he could not restore him long enough to get a message for his mother, and he gave me brandy and water, which I fed to him. He was a most beautiful boy. After a while he opened his eyes and looked around a little wild, and I placed my hand upon his brow and said, "My boy, do you know where you are?" At last he said, "I am on my way home to mother." "Yes," I said, "you are, but the doctor tells me you cannot live." I asked him for a message to his mother. He said, "Tell my mother that I die trusting in Christ." He did not know me, whether I was a friend or an enemy. He added, "Tell my mother and sisters to be sure to meet me in heaven," and in a few minutes he was unconscious, and in a few hours he died. They will meet in the morning—it is only a little while—for he died trusting in Christ.

Moody.

8224. DYING, Simplicity in. A dying soldier boy in Stoneman Hospital called the ward master to him, put his arms around his neck and kissed him, and said, "I love everybody." Then he folded his arms upon his breast and slowly repeated his childhood's prayer, "Now I lay me down to sleep, I pray the Lord my soul to keep; if I should die before I wake, I pray the Lord my soul to take." The soldier boy and the great Dr. Nott died with the same prayer on their lips.

8225. DYING, Triumphant. A friend said to Dr. Simpson, of Hoxton Academy, near the last, "You will soon enter upon an eternal Sabbath." He answered, "I shall, it dawns." Just before he breathed his last, he apostrophized Death as if he saw him approaching: "Now have at thee, Death; have at thee, Death! What art thou? I am not afraid of thee! Thou art a vanquished enemy by the blood of the cross! Thou art only a skeleton—a mere phantom!" And repeating "Have at thee, Death," he "grappled in close combat with the king of terrors, and having like a mighty champion defied his utmost rage, Death at last confessed him conqueror, and wreathed around his brow the garland of immortal victory."

8226. DYING, Visions in. Timothy, a reader of the Church in the Thebaid, was requested to deliver up the sacred books of the Christians. He refused; and red-hot irons were applied to his ears, his eyelids were cut off, and he was tortured upon a wheel to induce him to yield. Then the governor sent Maura, the young wife of Timothy, who had been but twenty days married to him, to persuade him to yield. She chose rather to suffer with him. The hair was torn from her head in handfuls. At last both were nailed to a wall, and while stretched in mortal agony, they beheld a glorious vision of angels beckoning them to thrones in heaven by the side of the King of Glory, for whom they died.

8227. DYING TESTIMONIES, Christians'. An educated and converted Kafir said, "Weep not for me, for I am leaning with my whole strength on Jesus Christ." Miss Fannie I. Mann said, "In that house of many mansions there will be one for me." Mrs. Phœbe Palmer said over the weeping friends who surrounded her bed, "The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all. Amen." Bishop Janes, resting on the Rock of Ages, exclaimed, "I am not disappointed."

8228. DYING TESTIMONIES, Ministers'. Henry Furlong said to his children: "Aim at high attainments in religion, and let your characters shine through your lives. Give my love to the brethren, and tell them I die on the Rock." The veteran Henry Slicer said, "My ministry counts for nothing now; my trust is only in the Mediator." In the dreams of a sick-bed the voice of the devoted Eddy rang out with the old missionary fervor, "We must, we can, we will conquer! Forward, is the word; sing and pray, eternity dawns!" Milton Hysore exclaimed, in the midst of a sermon, "Jesus saves me; saves me now!" and fell in the pulpit, never to speak again. J. R. West's last words were, "A band of angels waits to waft my spirit home: hallelujah!" Robert Kemp, "Now I lie down to sleep in Jesus!" William Grace, "O, the glory that shines around me!" J. A. Little, "These are the happiest moments of my life!" Stephen D. Brown, "I have been preparing for this hour for many years!" E. L. Janes, the bishop's twin brother, "It is all bright to me; how could I doubt?" John Trippe, "I have no fear of death; for fifty-four years I have not lost my peace with God." Alonzo Wood's last intelligible words, "Almost to Jesus!" George Jenkins, "Not a cloud overshadows my spiritual skies: all is well." A. A. Farr, "I have tried for a long time to be ready for two things, to preach and to die; I am ready to go home." John Hanlon, "Eternity is near: eternity, eternity! it is sweet to die in Jesus." John S. George, "I never thought I could draw near to death and feel so calm." James M'Millan, "O, the preciousness of Jesus." To his wife he said, "We have been very dear to each other, but Jesus is dearer than all." John Klien, "I am so inexpressibly happy now that I have given all into the hands of God! glorious, all glorious!" Daniel De Motte, "All is well! blessed Jesus!" Joseph White, "Come, Jesus; take me." John Blanpied, "The Lord is letting me down gently; happy in the Lord." J. W. Yokom, "Hark! I hear them! I see them!" Douglas Reagh went repeating the dying words of John Wesley, "The best of all is, God is with us." Micah Purkheiser, "The wires are laid and the poles are all up from 'Stony Point' to headquarters!" Tremillius, a converted Jew, cried the opposite to one of the Jewish rabble "Not Barabbas, but Jesus!"

8229. EAGLES, Flight of. I once saw a very interesting sight above one of the crags of Ben Nevis, as I was going, on the 20th of August, in the pursuit of black game. Two parent eagles were teaching their offspring, two young birds, the maneuvers of flight. They began by rising from the top of a mountain in the eye of the sun. It was about mid-day, and bright for this climate. They at first made small circles, and the young birds imitated them. They paused on their wings, waiting till they had made their first flight, and then took a second and larger gyration, always rising towards the sun, and enlarging their circle of flight, so as to make a gradually extending spiral. The young ones still slowly followed, apparently flying better as they mounted; and they continued this sublime kind of exercise, always rising, till they became mere points in the air, and the young ones were lost, and afterwards their parents, to our aching sight.

Sir Humphrey Davy.

8230. EAR, Mechanism of the. What in ordinary language we call the ear, is only the outer porch or entrance vestibule of a curious series of intricate, winding passages, which, like the lobbies of a great building, lead from the outer air into the inner chambers. Certain of these passages are full of air; others are full of liquid; and thin membranes are stretched like parchment curtains across the corridors at different places, and can be thrown into vibration, or made to tremble, as the head of a drum or the surface of a tambourine does when struck with a stick or the fingers. Between two of those parchment-like curtains, a chain of very small bones extends, which serves to tighten or relax these membranes, and to communicate vibrations to them. In the innermost place of all, rows of fine threads, called nerves, stretch like the strings of a piano from the last points to which the tremblings of thrillings reach, and pass inwards to the brain. If these threads or nerves are destroyed, the power of hearing as infallibly departs, as the power to give out sound is lost by a piano or violin when its strings are broken.

Prof. Wilson.

8231. EARLY DEATH, Parable of. To what is this like? It is like a king who, walking in his garden, saw some roses which were yet buds, breathing an ineffable sweetness. He thought, if these shed such sweetness while yet buds, what will they do when they are fully blown? After a while the king entered the garden anew, thinking to find the roses now blown, and to delight himself with their fragrance, but arriving at the place, he found them pale and withered, and yielding no smell. He exclaimed with regret, "Had I gathered them while yet tender and young, and while they gave forth their sweetness, I might have delighted myself with them, but now I have no pleasure in them." The next year the king walked in his garden, and finding rosebuds scattering fragrance, he commanded his servants, "Gather them, that I may enjoy them, before they wither, as they did last year."

R. C. Trench.

8232. EARLY PIETY, Examples of. Hannah Whitall Smith, of Philadelphia, when one of her daughters was yet but two years old, and was quite ill, says she took the child from her crib and told her plainly and tenderly of the Saviour and of his work for her. The child heard and believed. At once the little one showed trust in Jesus—a trust that thenceforward grew and strengthened with her advancing age until the sweet fruits of the Holy Spirit were manifest richly in her daily life. "That child is naughty sometimes. So are grown Christians." But all the evidence of Christian character which is found in the older disciples is given by the child. A young son of the same mother was a quick-tempered and troublesome boy. "He would say, 'I won't,' and get angry, and throw scissors, and do other naughty things." The other children of the family said they were going to ask Jesus to make Logan a Christian. He was four years old. They took him into a room by themselves, and all kneeled together. One prayed, saying, "Please, Jesus, make Logan a Christian." Another said, "I pray so, too, Jesus." Then they had Logan pray in the same way for himself. Rising from their knees, they said in child-like faith, "Now, Logan, Jesus says that he will give us what we ask of him. Thee must believe that he makes thee a Christian, because he says he will." Logan said, "I do believe it." "And from that time," said the mother, "the change in Logan was absolute and most remarkable. He was so good a boy that I was really afraid he wouldn't live." Again, the little daughter of one of her friends, on being told that Jesus could give her power over all temptation, went to him in trust, and found him as good as his word. So happy was she in his sustaining grace in her daily struggles with sin, that she would say to her mother, cheerily, "Mamma, isn't thee glad Jesus is making me good?" Then she would add, in hope of new attainments in the divine life, "But he's going to make me a great deal gooder than this."

8233. EARLY REST and Early Rising. The studious are noted for their disregard of "the regular hours of rest." The solemn stillness of night, inviting to those pursuits which require a fixed attention, and a connected series of thought and reasoning, leads them first into the habit; which is subsequently strengthened by the circumstance of intense application of the mind uninterrupted by sufficient and appropriate exercise, producing a state of nervous irritability inimical to sleep. Hence the student fears to leave his midnight lamp for a couch, which he can only occupy in a state of restlessness. Let him, however, relinquish his nocturnal studies, and seek, during the natural period, that repose which his mind and body alike demand—appropriating "the hours of early morn" to study, and the residue of the forenoon to exercise, and we are well persuaded that while his progress in the pursuit of knowledge would be in no degree retarded, he will be the gainer, not merely in the enjoyment of more perfect health, but in the increased clearness and vigor of the intellectual faculties. It has been very correctly remarked, that the atmosphere of the night is always more vitiated, and consequently less fit for respiration, than that of the day; and as we respire a greater portion of air when awake than in a sleeping state, it follows that from these, independent of other causes, the system is more liable to injury in the former than in the latter state. Early rising is equally important to the health of the system as early rest. On no account should any one permit himself again to slumber, after the moment of his first awakening in the morning, whether this happen at the early dawn or before the sun has risen; even though from accident or unavoidable causes he may not have enjoyed his six or eight hours of repose. It is much better to make up the deficiency, if necessary, at some other time, than to attempt taking another nap. Whoever shall accustom himself thus to rise, will enjoy more undisturbed sleep during the night, and awake far more refreshed, than those who indolently slumber all the morning. Even this second nap is, however, by no means so injurious to health as the practice of continuing in bed of a morning, long after waking; nothing tends, especially in children, and young persons generally, more effectually to unbrace the solids, exhaust the spirits, and thus to undermine the vigor, activity, and health of the system.

Dr. Hall.

8234. EARLY RISERS, Famous. Napoleon devoted only four hours to sleep; Lord Brougham spent the same time in bed when he was the most celebrated man in England. Dr. Parkhurst, the philologist, rose at five; Gibbon was in his study every morning, winter and summer, at six o'clock.

8235. EARLY RISING, Conclusion from. Apollo-nius being very early at Vespasian's gate, and finding him already up and at work, from thence conjectured that he was worthy to govern an empire, and said to his companion, "This man surely will be emperor, he is so early." The prophecy was fulfilled.

8236. EARLY RISING, Examples of. Sir Thomas More says that he wrote the "Utopia," by stealing time from his sleep and meals. He made it his invariable practice to rise at four. When Bp. Burnet was in college, his father aroused him to his studies every morning at four o'clock, and he continued to rise at that hour during the remainder of his life. Bishop Jewell rose regularly at four; the learned lawyer and pious Christian, Sir Matthew Hale, studied sixteen hours every day, and was an early riser. Dr. Parkhurst, the philologist, rose regularly at five in summer and six in the winter, and, in the latter season, he made his own fire. "I spent," says Dr. Paley, when giving an account of the early part of his life at college, "the first two years of my undergraduate happily, but unprofitably. I was constantly in society, where we were not immoral, but idle and expensive. At the commencement of the third year, after having left the usual party at a late hour, I was awakened at five in the morning by one of my companions, who stood at my bedside and said, 'Paley, I have been thinking what a fool you are. I could do nothing, probably, if I were to try, and I could afford the indolent life you lead. You could do everything, and cannot afford it. I have had no sleep during the whole night on account of these reflections, and am now come solemnly to inform you that if you persist in your indolence I must renounce your society.' I was so struck," says Paley, "with the visit and the visitor, that I lay in bed great part of the day and formed my plan. I ordered my bedmaker to lay my fire every evening, in order that it might be lighted by myself. I arose at five, read during the whole day, took supper at nine, went to bed, and continued the practice up to this hour."

8237. EARLY RISING, Gain by. The difference between rising at five and seven o'clock in the morning, for the space of forty years, supposing a man to go to bed at the same hour at night, is equivalent to the addition of ten years to a man's life.

8238. EARLY TRAINING Coerced. Teach a child there is harm in everything, however innocent, and so soon as it discovers the cheat, it will see no sin in anything. That's the reason deacons' sons seldom turn out well, and preachers' daughters are married through a window. Innocence is the sweetest thing in the world, and there is more of it than folks generally imagine. If you want some to transplant, don't seek it in the inclosures of cant, for it has only counterfeit ones; but go to the gardens of truth and sense. Coerced innocence is like an imprisoned lark—open the door, and it's off forever. The bird that roams through the sky and the groves unrestrained knows how to dodge the hawk and protect itself; but the caged one, the moment it leaves its bars and bolts behind, is pounced upon by the fowler or the vulture. Haliburton.

8239. EARLY TRAINING, Power of. I, too, acknowledge the all but omnipotence of early culture and nurture. Hereby we have either a doddered dwarf bush, or a high-towering, wide-shadowing tree—either a sick, yellow cabbage, or an edible, luxuriant green one. Of a truth, it is the duty of all men, especially of all philosophers, to note down with accuracy the characteristic circumstances of their education—what furthered it, what hindered, what in any way modified it. Carlyle

8240. EARLY TRAINING, Responsibility for. A boy in Æsop's time stole a horn-book, and took it to his mother. She praised him for it. From that time he pursued a course of crime till he was detected, and sentenced to execution. At the last he called his mother to him and bit off her ear. The crowd upbraided him for his unnatural cruelty. He replied, "It is she who is the cause of my ruin; for if, when I stole my school-fellow's horn-book, and brought it to her, she had given me a sound flogging, I should never have so grown in wickedness as to come to this untimely end."

8241. EARNESTNESS, Christian. Matt. 11: 12—"The kingdom of heaven suffereth violence, and the violent take it by force." How startling these words! Do violence to God? Storm the kingdom of heaven? He that forbids us to touch another's goods rejoices to have his own invaded; he that condemns the violence of avarice praises the violence of faith.

8242. EARNESTNESS, Ministerial. Mr. Betterton, the actor, being one day at dinner at the Archbishop of Canterbury's, the latter expressed his astonishment that the representation of fables in their pieces should make more impression upon the mind than that of truth in the sermons of the clergy: upon which Mr. Betterton, explaining the reason of it, said, "May it please your Grace, it is because the clergy, in reading their sermons, pronounce them as if they were reading fables; but we, in acting our parts, and using them in a proper gesture, represent them as matters of fact."

8243. EARNESTNESS, Power of. It is not to be calculated how much a single man may effect who throws his whole powers into a thing. Who, for instance, can estimate the influence of Voltaire? He shed an influence of a peculiar sort over Europe. His powers were those of a gay buffoon, far different from those of Hume, and others of his class; but he threw himself wholly into them. Cecil.

8244. EARNESTNESS, Result of. Have something to say, and burn to say it! It will be logic on fire! Bread may be so solid as to be good for nothing at all; so yeast is not good to live on. Have the real meal, and yeast enough to leaven it up. Put heart, soul and warmth in your sermons. An infidel once made this criticism of the Methodists: "If they were but panoplied in the literary armor of some other sects, in five years they would conquer the world for Jesus Christ." Dr. H. C. Fish.

8245. EARNESTNESS, Stimulated. Let none of my friends cry out to such a sluggish, lukewarm, unprofitable worm, "Spare thyself!" Rather spur me up, I pray you, with an "Awake thou that sleepest," and begin to do something for thy God! Whitefield.

8246. EARNESTNESS, Victorious. I am aware that many object to the severity of my language; but is there not cause for severity? I will be as harsh as truth, as uncompromising as justice. On this subject I do not wish to think, or speak, or write with moderation. No, no! Tell a man whose house is on fire to give a moderate alarm; tell him moderately to rescue his wife from the hands of the ravisher; tell the mother gradually to extricate her babe from the fire into which it has fallen; but urge me not to use moderation in a cause like the present. I am in earnest—I will not equivocate—I will not excuse—I will not retreat a single inch—AND I WILL BE HEARD. The apathy of the people is enough to make every statue leap from its pedestal, and to hasten the resurrection of the dead.

Wm. Lloyd Garrison.

8247. EARTH Adapted to Man. The earth on which we tread, was evidently intended by the Creator to support man and other animals, along with their habitations, and to furnish those vegetable productions which are necessary for their subsistence; and, accordingly, he has given it that exact degree of consistency which is requisite for these purposes. Were it much harder than it now is; were it, for example, as dense as a rock, it would be incapable of cultivation, and vegetables could not be produced from its surface. Were it softer, it would be insufficient to support us, and we should sink at every step, like a person walking in a quagmire. The exact adjustment of the solid parts of our globe, to the nature and necessities of the beings which inhabit it, is an instance of Divine wisdom. Dick.

8248. EARTH, Attachment to the. A boy had the charge of a horse. He tied the end of the halter around his own arm, and lay down on the grass to sleep. The horse ran off, and the boy's arm was torn from his body. If he had held it loosely in his hand, the animal might have escaped, but the boy would have received no harm. It is thus that men foolishly bind, not their arms, but their very souls to some possession of the earth, and having made it fast, lie down to rest. When that possession falls away, as it often does, the man's heart is torn; if he had held it loosely he might have lost his treasure, but he would have retained possession of himself.

8249. EARTH, Destruction of the. What this change is to be, we dare not even conjecture; but we see in the heavens themselves some traces of destructive elements, and some indications of their power. The fragments of broken planets—the descent of meteoric stones upon our globe—the wheeling comets welding their loose materials at the solar furnace—the volcanic eruptions of our own satellite—the appearance of new stars, and the disappearance of others—are all foreshadows of that impending convulsion to which the system of the world is doomed. Thus placed on a planet which is to be burnt up, and under heavens which are to pass away; thus treading, as it were, on the cemeteries, and dwelling in the mausoleums of former worlds—let us learn the lesson of humility and wisdom, if we have not already been taught it in the school of revelation. Timbs.

8250. EARTH, End of the. Is it not probable, it may be asked, that the time will come when the globe itself will come to an end? And if it be so, can science detect the provision that is possibly made for this consummation of all things? We have seen that the atmosphere has for long been undergoing a change; that at a very early period it was charged with carbonic acid, the carbon of which now forms part of animal and vegetable structures. We saw, also, that at first it contained no ammonia; but since vegetation and decomposition began, the nitrogen that existed in the nitrates of the earth and some of the nitrogen of the atmosphere have been gradually entering into new combinations, and forming ammonia; and the quantity of ammonia, a substance at first non-existent, has gradually increased, and as it is volatile, the atmosphere now always contains some of it. The quantity has now become so great in it that it can always be detected by chemical analysis. There is an evident tendency of it to increase in the atmosphere. Now supposing it to go on increasing up to a certain point, it forms with air a mixture that, upon the application of fire, is violently explosive. An atmosphere charged with ammonia is liable to explode whenever a flash of lightning passes through it. And such an explosion would doubtless destroy, perhaps without leaving traces of, the present order of things.

Dr. Lindley Kemp.

8251. EARTH, Glory of the. It was the glory of the earth that Christ trod upon its turf. It was the glory of the ocean that he sailed upon its bosom. It was the glory of the sun that it beamed upon his head. It was the glory of the air that it fanned his brow. It was the glory of the waters that they quenched his thirst. It was the glory of the flowers that they perfumed his path. What planet has been so honored as this? What world so visited, so distinguished, so blest? Winslow.

8252. EARTH, Motion of the. It is said that a farmer, about two hundred miles from New York, told his neighbors that he didn't believe any such foolishness as that about the world turning over every day; and he said that he would prove that he was right. So he placed a pumpkin on a stump, and sat on the fence watching it for twenty-four hours, and his neighbors sat there watching it with him. Sure enough, the pumpkin did not roll off, and the whole party went home convinced that the rotation business was a humbug.

8253. EARTH, Voice of the. The earth, from her deep foundations, unites with the celestial orbs that roll throughout boundless space, to declare the glory and show forth the praise of their common Author and Preserver; and the voice of natural religion accords harmoniously with the testimonies of revelation, in ascribing the origin of the universe to the will of one eternal and dominant intelligence—the Almighty Lord and Supreme First Cause of all things that subsist. Buckland.

8254. EARTHLY GLORY, Brevity of. William of Malmesbury tells the following curious story of the conversion of Ina, king of Wessex, A. D. 726. The king made a great feast in one of his palaces, and invited his nobles and great men. The house was richly adorned, and the table laid with gold and silver service. The next day Ina set forth with his queen Ethelburga, to take up his abode in another house which he had. The house he had occupied was stripped of its fine ornaments, rich curtains, and gold and silver vessels, and by the queen's order was strewn with dung and filled with rubbish, and a sow with her pigs were put into the king's and queen's bed. When the royal train had gone forth some distance, the queen suggested to the king that they should return to the abandoned house, which they did. Then they discovered what a change had been wrought in a few hours. And Ethelburga said to the king, "Seest thou, O king, how the pomp of this world passeth away? Where are all thy goodly things? How foul is now the house which but yesterday was thy royal abode. Are not all the things of this life as a breath, yea, as a smoke, and as a wind that passeth away?" Then the old king resolved to spend the rest of his days in caring for his soul.

8255. EARTHLY GLORY, Uncertainty of. Sesostri, King of Egypt, having subdued many nations, ordered himself a chariot befitting so great a conqueror. A chariot of gold was made, and richly set with precious stones. Four kings were then yoked together, and made to draw the chariot, as often as the monarch required. One day it was drawn to a great festival, and Sesostri observed that one of the kings kept his eye fixed upon the wheel nearest him. He desired to know why he did so, and he told him he was simply "wondering at the unstable motion of the wheel that rolled up and down: first one part, and then another was uppermost, and the highest immediately became the lowest." This caused Sesostri to think of the frailty and uncertainty of human affairs, and he would no more be drawn in that proud manner.

8256. EARTHLY GLORY, Vanity of. Gilimex, King of the Vandals, being led in triumph by Belisarius, cried out, "Vanity of vanities, all is vanity." Charles V., Emperor of Germany, whom of all men the world judged most happy, cried out in reference to whatever is generally considered good and great, "Get you hence; let me hear no more of you."

8257. EARTHQUAKE, Effect of an. One of the most terrible earthquakes on record is that which happened at Lisbon on November 1, 1755. The morning was fine, and there was no apparent indication of the coming destruction. About nine o'clock a low, subterraneous rumbling was heard, which gradually increased, and culminated at last in a violent shock of earthquake, which leveled to the ground many of the principal buildings of the place. Three other shocks followed each other in rapid succession, and continued the work of destruction. Scarcely had the ill-fated inhabitants begun to realize the enormity of the disaster which had come upon them, when they were surprised by another visitation of a different, but not less destructive, character. The sea began to rush with great violence into the Tagus, which rose at once as much as forty feet above high-water mark. The water swept over a great part of the city, and many of the inhabitants fled from its approach to take refuge on a strong marble quay lately erected. They had collected there to the number of three thousand, when the quay was suddenly hurled bottom upwards, and every soul on it perished. There was another shock in the evening, which split the walls of several houses; but when it passed away, the rents closed up again so firmly that no trace of them could be seen. What the earthquake and flood had spared were consumed by fire. The 1st of November being All-Saints' Day, was kept as a high festival, and all the churches were brilliantly illuminated with candles. These falling, with the shock of the earthquake, against the timbers and curtains, set fire to them, and as there was no means of checking it, the conflagration spread rapidly. It is stated that by the combined effect of these disasters no less than sixty thousand persons perished.

Wonders of the World.

8258. EARTHQUAKE, Moral of an. He lay off Lisbon on this fatal first of November, preparing to hoist sail for England. He looked towards the city in the morning, which gave the promise of a fine day, and saw that proud metropolis rise above the waves in wealth and plenty, and founded on a rock that promised a poet's eternity, at least, to its grandeur. He looked an hour after, and saw the city involved in flames, and sinking in thunder. A sight more awful mortal eyes could not behold on this side the day of doom. And yet does not human pride make us miscalculate? A drunker beggar shall work as horrid a desolation with a kick of his foot against an ant-hill, as subterraneous air and fermented minerals to a populous city. And if we take in the universe of things rather with a philosophical than a religious eye, where is the difference in point of real importance between them? A difference there is, and a very sensible one, in the merits of the two societies. The little Troglodytes amass neither superfluous nor imaginary wealth; and, consequently, have neither drones nor rogues among them. Warburton.

8259. EASE, Buried in. Varia Servilius, descended of a Praetorian family, was remarkable for his idleness. As people passed by his house they would say, "Here lies Varia," speaking of him as a person that was not only dead, but buried.

8260. EASE, Seeking. The Sybarites banished from their city all sorts of artificers, and craftsmen that made any noise, that they might not be disturbed in their enjoyment of rest and repose.

8261. EAST, Regard for the. The east, in Scriptural language, was symbolically considered the more immediate residence of the Almighty, and has been emphatically alluded to in every age, although turning to the east savors, in some degree, of Catholicism, and even in the present day is one of the rites of that form of religion. The sun rises in the east, and the prophets of old always turned their faces in that direction when engaged in their devotions. A brilliant star appeared in the east at the birth of the Messiah. Baalam, Cyrus, and the Magi came from the east. It may be considered merely a sort of devotional piety commanded to be observed by the canon law. The Christian churches were anciently built due east and west; and in the early period of Christianity it was usual in Poland, Lithuania, and many other countries, when the creeds were read, for the nobility to rise up and stand facing the east, with their swords drawn, thereby intimating that they were ready, if necessary, to seal the truth of their belief with their blood and life.

Loaring.

8262. EATING, Art of. To eat, in the true idea of the act, requires a far more scientific use of the mouth than is the case with mere feeding. Epicurism is no mere invention of low sensuality: they who practice it do but carry to an unworthy extreme one of the most excellent and characteristic powers of human nature. No man is wise who is not an epicure within the legitimate limits; none are more foolish and unkind to themselves than those who regard only quantity and speed. So with the mental palate. If we be not deliberate epicures in our reading, half our advantages and privileges are thrown away, and we are only like quadrupeds unintelligently munching grass. Not that we ought to pick out Apician morsels.

Grindon.

8263. EATING, Condition of. A certain monk went to the convent at Mount Sinai, and finding all the inmates at work, shook his head, and said to the abbot, "Labor not for the meat which perisheth." "Very well," said the abbot, and ordered the good brother to a cell, and gave him a book to read. The monk retired, and sat hour after hour all day alone, wondering much that nobody called him to dinner or offered him any refreshment. Hungry and wearied out, the night at length arrived. He left his solitary cell, and repaired to the apartment of the abbot. "Father," says he, "do not the brethren eat to-day?" "Oh, yes," replied the abbot, "they have eaten plentifully." "Then how is it, Father," said the monk, "that you did not call me to partake with them?" "Because, brother," replied the abbot, "you are a spiritual man, and have no need of carnal food. For our part, we are obliged to eat, and on that account we work; but you, brother, are above the want of the meat that perisheth." "Pardon me, Father," said the monk, "I perceive my mistake."

8264. EATING Sparingly. By a sparingness in diet, and eating as much as may be what is light and easy of digestion, I shall, doubtless, be able to think more clearly, and shall gain time. First, by lengthening out my life. Secondly, I shall need less time for digestion after meals. Thirdly, I shall be able to study more closely, without injury to my health. Fourthly, I shall need less time for sleep. Fifthly, I shall more seldom be troubled with the headache.

President Edwards.

8265. ECCENTRICITY, Genius and. The great examples of Bacon, of Milton, of Newton, of Locke, and of others, happen to be directly against the popular inference, that a certain wildness of eccentricity and thoughtlessness of conduct are the necessary accompaniments of talent, and the sure indications of genius. Because some have united these extravagancies with great demonstrations of talent, as a Rousseau, a Chatterton, a Savage, a Burns, or a Byron; others, finding it less difficult to be eccentric than to be brilliant, have, therefore, adopted the one, in the hope that the world would give them credit for the other. But the greatest genius is never so great as when it is chastised and subdued by the highest reason: it is from such a combination, like that of Bucephalus, reined in by Alexander, that the most powerful efforts have been produced. And be it remembered, that minds of the very highest order, who have given an unrestrained course to their caprice, or to their passions, would have been so much higher by subduing them.

Colton.

8266. ECONOMY, Advantages of. All to whom want is terrible, upon whatever principle, ought to think themselves obliged to learn the sage maxims of our parsimonious ancestors, and attain the salutary arts of contracting expense; for without economy none can be rich, and with it few can be poor. The mere power of saving what is already in our hands must be of easy acquisition to every mind; and as the example of Lord Bacon may show that the highest intellect cannot safely neglect it, a thousand instances every day prove that the humblest may practice it with success.

Johnson

8267. ECONOMY, Brevities. Beware of little expenses: a small leak will sink a great ship.—Franklin.—He that is taught to live upon little, owes more to his father's wisdom, than he that has a great deal left him, does to his father's care.—Penn.—I had rather see my courtiers laugh at my avarice, than my people weep at my extravagance.—Louis XII.—No man is rich whose expenditure exceeds his means; and no one is poor, whose incomes exceed his outgoings.

Haliburton.

8268. ECONOMY Defined. We have warped the word "economy" in our English language into a meaning which it has no business whatever to bear. In our use of it, it constantly signifies merely sparing or saving; economy of money means saving money—economy of time, sparing time, and so on. But this is a wholly barbarous use of the word—barbarous in a double sense; for it is not English, and it is bad Greek. Economy no more means saving money than it means spending money. It means—the administration of a house; its stewardship; spending or saving, that is, whether money or time, or anything else, to the best possible advantage. In the simplest and clearest definition of it, economy, whether public or private, means the wise management of labor; and it means this mainly in three senses;—namely, first, applying your labor rationally; secondly, preserving its produce carefully; lastly, distributing its produce carefully.

Ruskin.

8269. ECONOMY, Industry and. Let honesty and industry be thy constant companions, and spend one penny daily less than thy gains; then shall thy hide-bound pocket soon begin to thrive, and will never again cry with the empty belly-ache; neither will creditors insult thee, nor want oppress, nor hunger bite, nor nakedness freeze thee. The whole hemisphere will shine brighter, and pleasure spring up in every corner of thy heart. Now, therefore, embrace these rules and be happy. Banish the bleak winds of sorrow from thy mind, and live independent. Then shalt thou be a man, and not hide thy face at the approach of the rich, nor suffer the pain of feeling little when the sons of fortune walk at thy right hand; for independency, whether with little or much, is good fortune, and places thee on even ground with the proudest of the golden fleece. Oh, then, be wise, and let industry walk with thee in the morning, and attend thee until thou reachest the evening hour for rest. Let honesty be as the breath of thy soul, and never forget to have a penny, when all thy expenses are enumerated and paid: then shalt thou reach the point of happiness, and independence shall be thy shield and buckler, thy helmet and crown; then shall thy soul walk upright, nor stoop to the silken wretch because he hath riches, nor pocket an abuse because the hand which offers it wears a ring set with diamonds.

Franklin.

8270. ECONOMY, Results of Trifling. Lafitte in boyhood applied to the rich banker M. Perregaux in Paris, in 1778, for a situation, and was informed that there would be no opening for a considerable time. As he passed from the office he stooped, picked up a pin, and placed it in the lapel of his coat. The banker from a window observed the action, and considered it the best kind of a recommendation for the young man. In the evening of the same day, M. Lafitte received the following note from M. Perregaux: "A place is made for you in my office, which you may take possession of to-morrow morning." From simple clerk he soon rose to be cashier—then partner—then head of the first banking-house in Paris; and, afterwards, in rapid succession, a deputy and president of the Council of Ministers, the highest point which a citizen could then attain.

8271. ECONOMY, Worthy. Let us learn the meaning of economy. Economy is a high, humane office; a sacrament, when its aim is grand; when it is the prudence of simple tastes; when it is practised for freedom, or love, or devotion. Much of the economy which we see in houses is of a base origin, and is best kept out of sight. Parched corn eaten to-day, that I may have roast fowl to my dinner to-morrow, is a baseness; but parched corn and a house with one apartment, that I may be free of all perturbations of mind; that I may be serene and docile to what the gods shall speak, and girt and road-ready for the lowest mission of knowledge or good will, is frugality for gods and heroes.

Emerson.

8272. EDUCATION, Agent of. There have been periods when the country heard with dismay that "The soldier was abroad." That is not the case now. Let the soldier be abroad: in the present age he can do nothing. There is another person abroad—a less important person in the eyes of some, an insignificant person, whose labors have tended to produce this state of things. The school-master is abroad! And I trust more to him, armed with his primer, than I do the soldier in full military array, for upholding and extending the liberties of his country.

Lord Brougham.

8273. EDUCATION, Aim of. It seemeth to me that the true idea of education is contained in the word itself, which signifies the act of drawing out, or educing; and being applied in a general sense to man, must signify the drawing forth or bringing out those powers which are implanted in him by the hand of his Maker. This, therefore, we must adopt as the rudimental idea of education; that it aims to do for man that which the agriculturist does for the fruits of the earth, and the gardener for the more choice and beautiful productions thereof: what the forester does for the trees of the forest, and the tamer and breaker-in of animals does for the several kinds of wild creatures.

E. Irving.

8274. EDUCATION, Barbarism and. The Goths despised education. An instance of this is the opposition they raised to the purpose of Amalasunta, who was eager to give the advantage of a liberal education to her son Alaric. "No, no," said the assembled warriors, "the idleness of study is unworthy of a Goth; high thoughts of glory are not fed by books, but by deeds of valor; he is to be a king whom all should dread. Shall he be compelled to dread his instructors? No."

8275. EDUCATION, Beginning of. Begin the education of the heart, not with the cultivation of noble propensities, but with the cutting away of those that are evil. When once the noxious herbs are withered and rooted out, then the more noble plants, strong in themselves, will shoot upwards. The virtuous heart, like the body, becomes strong and healthy more by labor than by nourishment.

Richter.

8276. EDUCATION, Benefits from. Education gives fecundity of thought, copiousness of illustration, quickness, vigor, fancy, words, images, and illustrations; it decorates every common thing, and gives the power of trifling without being undignified and absurd.

S. Smith.

8277. EDUCATION, Business of. The business of education is not to perfect a learner in all, or any of the sciences, but to give his mind that freedom, that disposition, and those habits, that may enable him to obtain any part of knowledge he shall apply himself to, or stand in need of, in the future course of his life.

Locke.

8278. EDUCATION, Christian. The great work of Christian education is not the direct and certain fruit of building schools and engaging schoolmasters, but something far beyond, to be compassed only by the joint efforts of all the whole church and nation, by the schoolmaster and the parent, by the schoolfellow at school, and by the brothers and sisters at home, by the clergyman in his calling, by the landlord in his calling, by the farmer and the tradesman, by the laborer and the professional man, and the man of independent income, whether large or small, in theirs; by the queen and her ministers, by the great council of the nation in parliament; by each and all of these laboring to remove temptations to evil, to make good easier and more honored, to confirm faith and holiness in others by their own example; in a word, to make men love and glorify their God and Saviour when they see the blessed fruits of his kingdom even here on earth.

Dr. Arnold.

8279. EDUCATION, Dual. Every man has two educations—that which is given to him, and the other that which he gives to himself. Of the two kinds, the latter is by far the most valuable. Indeed, all that is most worthy in a man, he must work out and conquer for himself. It is this that constitutes our real and best nourishment. What we are merely taught, seldom nourishes the mind like that which we teach ourselves.

Tynman.

8280. EDUCATION, Early. I think we may assert that in a hundred men, there more than ninety who are what they are, good or bad, useful or pernicious to society, from the instruction they have received. It is on education that depends the great difference observable among them. The least and most imperceptible impressions received in our infancy, have consequences very important, and of a long duration. It is with these first impressions as with a river, whose waters we can easily turn, by different canals, in quite opposite courses; so that from the insensible direction the stream receives at its source, it takes different directions; and at last arrives at places far distant from each other; and with the same facility we may, I think, turn the minds of children to what direction we please.

Locke.

8281. EDUCATION, Forgotten. It is said of the learned Castell, author of the "Lexicon Heptaglotton," that he so completely devoted himself to Oriental studies that he totally forgot his own language.

8282. EDUCATION, Inheritance of. We are, if we know how to use our advantages, inheritors of the wealth of all the richest times; strong in the power of the giants of all ages; placed on the summit of an edifice which thirty centuries have been employed in building.

Whewell.

8283. EDUCATION, A Liberal. He that makes his son worthy of esteem by giving him a liberal education, has a far better title to his obedience and duty than he that gives a large estate without it.

Socrates.

8284. EDUCATION, Light of. Were it not better for a man in a fair room to set up one great light, or branching candlestick of lights, than to go about with a rushlight into every dark corner?

Bacon.

8285. EDUCATION, Lustre of. Virtue and talents, though allowed their due consideration, yet are not enough to procure a man a welcome wherever he comes. Nobody contents himself with rough diamonds, or wears them so. When polished and set, then they give a lustre.

Locke.

8286. EDUCATION, Mission of. I consider a human soul without education like marble in the quarry, which shows none of its inherent beauties until the skill of the polisher fetches out the colors, makes the surface shine, and discovers every ornamental cloud, spot, and vein that runs through the body of it. Education, after the same manner, when it works upon a noble mind, draws out to view every latent virtue and perfection, which without such helps are never able to make their appearance. If my reader will give me leave to change the allusion so soon upon him, I shall make use of the same instance to illustrate the force of education, which Aristotle has brought to explain his doctrine of substantial forms, when he tells us that a statue lies hid in a block of marble, and that the art of the statuary only clears away the superfluous matter and removes the rubbish. The figure is in the stone, the sculptor only finds it. What sculpture is to a block of marble, education is to a human soul. The philosopher, the saint, or the hero, the wise, the good, or the great man, very often lie hid and concealed in a plebeian, which a proper education might have disinterred, and have brought to light.

Addison.

8287. EDUCATION, Mistakes of. All of us, who are worth anything, spend our manhood in unlearning the follies, or expiating the mistakes, of our youth.

Shelley.

8288. EDUCATION, Neglect of Moral. A father inquires whether his boy can construe Homer, if he understands Horace, and can taste Virgil; but how seldom does he ask, or examine, or think whether he can restrain his passions; whether he is grateful, generous, humane, compassionate, just, and benevolent.

Lady Hervey.

8289. EDUCATION, Personal. Costly apparatus and splendid cabinets have no magical power to make scholars. As a man is in all circumstances, under God, the master of his own fortune, so he is the maker of his own mind. The Creator has so constituted the human intellect, that it can only grow by its own action: it will certainly and necessarily grow. Every man must, therefore, educate himself. His books and teacher are but helps; the work is his. A man is not educated until he has the ability to summon, in an emergency, his mental powers in vigorous exercise to effect the proposed object. It is not the man who has seen the most, or read the most, who can do this. Such an one is in danger of being borne down, like a beast of burden, by an overloaded mass of men's thoughts. Nor is it the man who can boast merely of native vigor and capacity. The greatest of all warriors, who went to the siege of Troy, had not the pre-eminence, because nature had given him strength and he carried the largest bow, but because self-discipline had taught him how to bend it. Webster.

8290. EDUCATION, Primary. Having learned our letters, and some small syllables printed on a fly-sheet of the Shorter Catechism, we were at once passed into the Book of Proverbs. In the olden time this was the universal custom in all the common schools in Scotland—a custom that should never have been abandoned. That book is without a rival for beginners, containing quite a repertory of monosyllables and pure Saxon—"English undefiled." Take this passage, for example, where, with one exception, every word is formed of a single syllable, and belongs to the Saxon tongue: "Train up a child in the way he should go; and when he is old, he will not depart from it." What a contrast to the silly trash of modern school-books for beginners, with such sentences as, "Tom has a dog," "The cat is good," "The cow has a calf!" Dr. Guthrie.

8291. EDUCATION, Profit of. All but ten of the signers of the Declaration of Independence were trained in universities and colleges. More than one-fourth of the members of the National Congress from the beginning to this day have been graduates of colleges. This fact, taking the ratio of population and graduates, shows that the colleges have given their graduates more than thirty chances to one. Were Cicero, and Pitt, and Sumner, less effective in their oratory because of the affluence of their culture? Dr. Foss.

8292. EDUCATION, Public or Private. At a great school there is all the splendor and illumination of many minds; the radiance of all is concentrated in each, or at least reflected upon each. But we must own that neither a dull boy, nor an idle boy, will do so well at a great school as at a private one. For, at a great school there are always boys enough to do well easily, who are sufficient to keep up the credit of the school; and the dull or idle boys are left at the end of the class, having the appearance of going through the course, but learning nothing at all. Such boys may do good at a private school, where constant attention is paid to them, and they are watched. So that the question of public or private education is not properly a general one; but whether one or the other is best for my son. Dr. Johnson.

8293. EDUCATION, Religion in. In America the college is the child of the church. The seal of Harvard University, the oldest on the continent, bears the legend, "Christo et Ecclesiae." One of the hymns sung at the inauguration at Harvard is Luther's grand old lyric, beginning, "A strong tower is our God." Yale began in the gifts of a few Connecticut clergymen, who, bringing each a few books from their library, said, "I give these for the founding of a college." A late report of the commissioner of education shows that of the 368 colleges it enumerates, thirty only are known to be secular in their origin and management, while 261 are known to be under the care of different churches. Dr. Foss.

8294. EDUCATION, Religious. There is no object of study which ought not to be studied in relation to Christianity. Must we not stand rebuked before the heathen, when we remember the most universal infusion of their idolatry into all the various occupations of life? Referring to the religion of ancient Rome, Mr. Gibbon tells us, "It was, moreover, interwoven with every circumstance of business or pleasure, of public or private life, with all the offices and amusements of society." And how interesting the reply of the Chickasaw Indian to Mr. Wesley, when he asked him if his tribe often thought and talked of their gods. "We think of them always," said the Indian; "wherever we are, we talk of them and to them, at home and abroad, in peace and in war, before and after the fight, and, indeed, whenever and wherever we meet together." Anon.

8295. EDUCATION, Self. Chevalier Ramsay gives the following account of Stone: "Born a son of the gardener of the Duke of Argyll, he arrived at eight years of age before he learned to read. By chance, a servant having taught young Stone the letters of the alphabet, there seemed nothing more to discover and expand his genius. He applied himself to study, and he arrived at the knowledge of the most sublime geometry and analysis, without a master, without a conductor, without any other guide than pure genius. At eighteen years of age he had made these considerable advances without being known, and without knowing himself the prodigiousness of his acquisitions. The Duke of Argyll, who joined to his military talents a general knowledge of every science that adorns the mind of a man of his rank, walking one day in his garden, saw lying on the grass a Latin copy of Sir Isaac Newton's celebrated 'Principia.' He called some one to him to take it and carry it back to his library. Our young gardener told him that the book belonged to him. 'To you!' replied the Duke; 'do you understand geometry, Latin, Newton?' 'I know a little of them,' replied the young man, with an air of simplicity, arising from a profound ignorance of his own knowledge and talents. The Duke was surprised, and having a taste for the sciences, he entered into conversation with the young mathematician; he asked him several questions, and was astonished at the force, the accuracy, and the candor of his answers. 'But how,' said the Duke, 'came you by the knowledge of all these things?' Stone replied, 'A servant taught me ten years since; does any one need to know anything more than the twenty-four letters, in order to learn everything else that one wishes?' The Duke's curiosity was redoubled; he sat down upon a bench, and requested a detail of his proceedings in becoming so learned. 'I first learned to read,' said Stone; 'the masons were then at work upon your house; I went near them one day, and saw the architect used a rule and compasses, and that he made calculations. I inquired what might be the meaning and use of these things, and I was informed that there was a science called arithmetic; I purchased a book of arithmetic, and I learned it. I was told there was another science called geometry; I bought the books, and I learned geometry. By reading, I found that there were good books of these sciences in Latin. I bought a dictionary, and I learned Latin; I understood, likewise, that there were good books of the same kind in French. I bought a dictionary, and I learned French. And this, my lord, is what I have done; it seems to me that we may learn everything when we know the twenty-four letters of the alphabet.' This account charmed the Duke. He drew this wonderful genius out of his obscurity, and provided him with an employment which left him plenty of time to cultivate the sciences. He discovered in him, also the same genius for music, for painting, for architecture, for all the sciences which depend on calculations and proportions." He distinguished himself especially as a mathematician, and was the author of Stone's "Mathematical Dictionary."

8296. EDUCATION, Sphere of. The effects of philosophy are different according to the difference of inclinations in men. If indeed it lights on one who loves a dull and inactive sort of life, that makes himself the centre and the little conveniences of life the circumference of all his thoughts, such a one does contract the sphere of her activity, so that only having made easy and comfortable the life of a single person, it fails and dies with him; but when it finds a man of ruling genius, one fitted for conversation and able to grapple with the difficulties of public business, if it once possess him with principles of honesty, honor, and religion, it takes a compendious method, by doing good to one, to oblige a great part of mankind. Such was the effect of the conversation of Anaxagoras with Pericles, of Plato with Dion, and of Pythagoras with the principal statesmen of Italy. Plutarch.

8297. EDUCATION, Superficial. Real education is the formation and training of the mind. To train the mind, requires hard, patient, and independent thinking and work; the mere crude teaching a youth a bundle of facts, which he acquires with no labor, and, only retaining, neither digests nor assimilates, is no training at all; they no way nourish his mind, but deposited there, are utterly as raw and undigested as he swallowed them. He may be a full man, but it is the fullness of a bottle, which will pour out what has been previously poured in, whether vinegar or claret; he may be a convenient depository of other men's thoughts—he may have sufficient capacity for holding them;—but to call such a man educated is a misuse of terms. Cayley.

8298. EDUCATION, Unconscious. Every man is to himself what Plato calls the Great Year. He has his sowing time and his growing time, his weeding, his irrigating, and his harvest. The principles and ideas he puts into his mind in youth lie there, it may be, for many years, apparently unprolific. But nothing dies. There is a process going on unseen, and by the touch of circumstances the man springs forth into strength, he knows not how, as if by a miracle. But after all, he only reaps as he had sown.

J. A. St. John.

8299. EFFECTS, Abiding. The earth is a vast whispering gallery, and the centuries are but telegraphic wires which convey the thoughts of one age to another. The nineteenth century sits at one end of the telegraphic wire, and the first century at the other end, and the former hears transmitted to it lessons from the latter, that mould and shape it for heaven, for happiness, or woe. Nothing that is said is ever extinguished, nothing that is done ever ceases its influence. It goes out from us, and is never arrested or put an end to. The pebble that I drop into the sea will send out its undulations for ever and ever. The blow that I strike upon the earth will transmit its vibrations for ever and ever. The act I thought no eye followed, that deed which I fancied was done and annihilated forever, are each still sounding in successive vibrations and repetitions in the atmosphere, and throughout the earth, and at the judgment-seat God has but to make man's ear more sensitive, man's eye more susceptible, and all he said and did will come back to him, the good in sweet music, the evil in crashes and reverberations of woe and agony, that shall never, never cease. Science can demonstrate, with absolute precision, that a blow once struck, carries on its vibrations to the end, that a word once said is repeating itself in the air till the judgment-day; and Scripture leads us to infer that it will at that day meet us again, a memorial of the good or the evil we have done. Cumming.

8300. EFFECTS, Judging by. A dervish was journeying alone in the desert, when two merchants suddenly met him. "You have lost a camel," said he to the merchants. "Indeed we have," they replied. "Was he not blind in his right eye, and lame in his left leg?" said the dervish. "He was," replied the merchants. "Had he lost a front tooth?" said the dervish. "He had," rejoined the merchants. "And was he not loaded with honey on one side, and wheat on the other?" "Most certainly he was," they replied; "and as you have seen him so lately, and marked him so particularly, you can in all probability conduct us unto him." "My friends," said the dervish, "I have never seen your camel, nor ever heard of him, but from you." "A pretty story, truly!" said the merchants, "but where are the jewels, which formed part of his cargo?" "I have neither seen your camel nor your jewels," repeated the dervish. On this they seized his person, and forthwith hurried him before the cadi, where, on the strictest search, nothing could be found upon him, nor could any evidence whatever be adduced to convict him either of falsehood or of theft. They were then about to proceed against him as a sorcerer, when the dervish with great calmness thus addressed the court: "I have been much amused with your surprise, and own there has been some ground for your suspicions; but I have lived long, and alone, and I can find ample scope for observation, even in a desert. I knew that I had crossed the track of a camel that had strayed from its owner, because I saw no mark of any human footstep on the same route; I knew that the animal was blind in one eye, because it had cropped the herbage only on one side of its path; and I perceived that it was lame in one leg, from the faint impression which that particular foot had produced upon the sand: I concluded that the animal had lost one tooth, because wherever it had grazed a small tuft of herbage was left uninjured in the centre of its bite. As to that which formed the burden of the beast, the busy ants informed me that it was corn on the one side, and the clustering flies that it was honey on the other."

8301. EFFEMINACY, Example of. Sinyndirides the Sybarite excelled in effeminacy. At one time he cast himself upon a bed, prepared from the leaves of roses, and after taking a sleep complained that there were pustules upon his body, from lying upon so hard a bed. It is also said that when going to a distant country he was such an epicure, that he took with him a thousand cooks, a thousand fowlers, and as many fishermen.

8302. EFFEMINACY, Royal. Sardanapalus, king of Assyria, was of such an effeminate disposition that he adopted the fashion and dress of women, and practiced all their arts. Upon his sepulchre he caused a statue to be cut, attired like a woman, and under it was engraven "Sardanapalus, the son of Anacyndaraxes, hath built Anchiala and Tarsus in one day. Eat, drink and be merry; the rest is not worth the fillop of a finger." Cicero says that Aristotle, lighting upon this tomb and inscription, exclaimed, "It should have been upon the grave of a beast, not upon a tomb of a king."

8303. EFFORT, Daily. A Boston merchant resolved to let no day pass without personally persuading some one to come to Christ. This of course, led him to look out for opportunities. But on retiring one night it occurred to him that he had said nothing to any one on the subject during that day. At first he saw no chance to redeem himself, but remembering that a grocer near by generally kept open late, he arose, dressed, and went to the store, and found the man in good condition for conversation—alone and at leisure. That visit was the means of bringing the old gentleman to God and the church, with several of his family.

Dr. James Porter.

8304. EFFORT, Individual. It is said that an American declared he could fight the whole British army, and when he was asked how, he said, "Why, this is what I would do: I know I am the best swordsman in the world, so I would go and challenge one Britisher, and kill him; then take another, and kill him. Thus, I only want time enough, and I would kill the whole British army." It was a foolish boast, but illustrates the principle on which the world is to be conquered. One by one, and one per year by every Christian, and the race will be saved in ten years.

8305. EFFORT and Intercession. Mrs. Palmer tells of an invalid boy of eleven years, who asked his pastor, "Can you tell me anything I can do for Jesus?" The pastor directed him to pray for his most intimate friend, and to invite him to the class-meeting. He did so, and his friend was converted. He then began to pray for his unsaved father, and told him of his earnest desire for his conversion, and he became a Christian. Next he prayed for his own brother, with like result. From this time he continued to intercede for his friends and acquaintances. Too ill to attend the revival services in the church, he longed for his father's report of the meetings. One night he asked, "Father! was Samuel Coleman saved to-night?" "No, Samuel Coleman was not saved to-night, but he was forward kneeling at the form, crying for mercy," said his father. "Thank God!" The next night, on his father's return from meeting, he repeated the question, and, receiving an affirmative reply, said, "Thank God! then I can die happy," as though his life-work was finished, and soon after expired. Among his papers was found a list of fifty-five names, every one of which had with him been a subject of special prayer and effort, and all of whom had professed religion. The last name on the list was Samuel Coleman.

8306. EFFORT, Nature of Christian. He who in the regeneration has been made partaker of Christ, gives forth in his life Christ-like actions. There is a good deal of artificial charity a-going. People can tie oranges to the sprigs of a fir-tree in a parlor, and the show will gratify children on a winter evening. But true Christian beneficence is a fruit that grows, and is not tied on. It swells up from sap which the tree of righteousness draws out of that infinite love in which it is rooted. He who is in Christ cannot stand still, any more than the water in those iron tubes which traverse our streets in connection with the great reservoir; on it must flow, wherever there is an opening, by reason of the pressure from above. Hear the exclamation of that ancient Christian in explanation of his wonderful self-sacrifice and energetic labors for the good of men: "The love of Christ constraineth me." Efforts burst impetuous from his bosom whenever an opening was made, because he was in union with the Fountain-head on high. As fruit is sweet and profitable, so are the efforts of Christians for the good of the world. And like the abundance with which good trees bear, is the abundance of a true disciple's labors. The fecundity of nature is a standing wonder with all who possess sufficient intelligence to observe it. The faculty of production in the vegetable creation is beyond all calculation or expression great. Through adverse seasons and other causes, the actual quantity of fruit brought to perfection is greatly limited; but the tendency and willingness and capability of plants to produce their fruit in inconceivable quantities may be seen everywhere in the teeming, flowering spring. Such is the tendency of a renewed heart.

Wm. Arnot.

8307. EFFORT, Special. A worthy Methodist, burning with a desire to do good and save souls, seeing a man on the road before him, hastened to make up to him, that he might deal with him about his soul. Ignorant of these good intentions, the other, taking him for a footpad, did all he could to throw him out, but in vain. At length the Methodist runs him down, confirming his worst fears—as they now stood face to face—with the startling question, "Are you prepared to die?" At this awful question, down goes the poor man on his knees, to offer the other all his money if he will but spare his life, happy, as the supposed footpad raised him, to find out his mistake.

Guthrie.

8308. EFFORT, Union of. A certain traveler, when crossing a bleak and precipitous mountain, reached a place where a great stone had rolled down from the heights above, and lodged in the path, completely filling it, so that it was impossible to pass. Night came on, and he sat down in sorrow, complaining bitterly of his desolate and helpless circumstances. At length, another traveler arrived, tried to remove the stone, and also sat down in despair. In the course of time a few more joined them, and sat down discouraged. One of them said, "Let us pray to God;" after which he arose, saying, "Let us all take hold of it together." They did so, and, by their united strength, rolled it over the precipice, and continued their journey.

Anon.

8309. EGOTISM, Avoiding. Lord Chesterfield in a letter to his son says, "The only sure way of avoiding these evils is never to speak of yourself at all. But when, historically, you are obliged to mention yourself, take care not to drop one single word that can directly or indirectly be construed as fishing for applause. Be your character what it will, it will be known; and nobody will take it upon your own word. Never imagine that anything you can say yourself will varnish your defects or add lustre to your perfections; but, on the contrary, it may, and nine times in ten will, make the former more glaring and the latter obscure. If you are silent upon your own subject, neither envy, indignation, nor ridicule will obstruct or allay the applause which you may really deserve; but if you publish your own panegyric, upon any occasion, or in any shape whatsoever, and however artfully dressed or disguised, they will all conspire against you, and you will be disappointed of the very end you aim at."

8310. EGOTISM, Bravery and. After the remarkable campaign in which Xerxes was driven and frightened out of Greece by Themistocles, the Grecian officers undertook to decide by vote who had done the best service. Every ballot bore first the name of the voter, and second the name of Themistocles. It is always best to do our best, but not best to make proclamation of it.

8311. EGOTISM, Effect of. There can be no doubt that this remarkable man (Lord Byron) owed the vast influence which he exercised over his contemporaries at least as much to his gloomy egotism as to the real power of his poetry. We never could very clearly understand how it is that egotism, so unpopular in conversation, should be so popular in writing; or how it is that men who affect in their compositions qualities and feelings which they have not, impose so much more easily on their contemporaries than on posterity. Lord Macaulay.

8312. EGOTIST, Weakness of the. Only by the supernatural is a man strong—only by confiding in the Divinity which stirs within us. Nothing is so weak as an egotist—nothing is mightier than we, when we are vehicles of a truth before which the state and the individual are alike ephemeral.

Emerson.

8313. ELECTION, Doctrine of. This opinion is not believed by thee, but is only pretended, as a cloak for thy wickedness and idleness; for if thou dost believe that, if God hath elected, he will save thee however thou livest, why are not thy practices answerable to such principles? Why dost thou not leave thy ground unsowed, and thy calling unfollowed, and say, If God hath decreed me a crop of corn, I shall have it, whether I sow my ground or no; and if God hath decreed me an estate, I shall have it though I never mind my calling? Why dost thou not neglect and refuse eating, and drinking, and sleeping, and say, If God hath decreed that I shall live longer, I shall do it, though I never eat, or drink, or sleep? For God hath decreed these things concerning thy ground, estate, and natural life, as well as concerning thine eternal condition in the other world.

Spurgeon.

8314. ELECTION, Evidence of. There is no way for men to discern their names written in the book of life but by reading the work of sanctification in their own hearts. I desire no miraculous voice from heaven, no extraordinary signs, or unscriptural notices and informations in this matter. Lord, let me but find my heart obeying thy calls; my will obediently submitting to thy commands; sin my burden, and Christ my desire: I never crave a fairer or surer evidence of thy electing love to my soul: and if I had an oracle from heaven, an extraordinary messenger from the other world, to tell me thou lovest me, I have no reason to credit such a voice, whilst I find my heart wholly sensual, averse to God, and indisposed to all that is spiritual.

Flavel.

8315. ELECTION, General. One day the news came into the prison that there was a boat up from City Point, and there were over 900 men in the prison rejoicing at once. They expected to get good news. Then came the news that there was only one man in that whole number that was to be let go, and they all began to say, "Who is it?" It was some one who had some influential friend at Washington that had persuaded the Government to take an interest in him and get him out. The whole prison was excited. At last an officer came and shouted at the top of his voice, "Henry Clay Trumbull!" The chaplain told me his name never sounded so sweet to him as it did that day. That was election: but you can't find any Henry Clay Trumbull in the Bible. There is no special case in the Bible. God's proclamations are to all sinners. Everybody can get out of prison that wants to. The trouble is they don't want to go. They had rather be captives to some darling sin like lust, appetite, covetousness, than to be liberated. You need not be stumbling over election. The proclamation is, "Whosoever will, let him come and drink of the water of life freely."

Moody.

8316. ELECTION, Knowledge of. Now whosoever thou art that desirest to know whose names are written in heaven, who is elected to life eternal, it shall not be told thee this or that individual person; but generally thus, men so qualified, faithful in Christ and to Christ, obedient to the truth and for the truth; that have subjected their own affections, and resigned themselves to the guidance of the heavenly will. These men have made noble conquests, and shall have princely crowns. Find but in thyself this sanctimony, and thou art sure of thy election. In Rome the patres conscripti were distinguished by their robes, as the liveries of London from the rest of the company. So thy name is enrolled in the legend of God's saints, if thy livery witness it, that thy "conversation is in heaven" (1 John 3: 16).

T. Adams.

8317. ELECTION, Links in the Chain of. Archbishop Leighton uses the figure of a chain, which he describes as having its first and last link—election and final salvation—up in heaven in God's own hands; the middle one, which he says is effectual calling, being let down to earth into the hearts of his children; and they laying hold on it have sure hold on the other two, for no power can sever them. Then the events that lead to that calling, and those that follow it even to the final consummation and bliss of God's people in heaven may be so many connected and connecting links, not one of which but bears evidence of the Master's hand. How often does Satan exert all the skill of his infernal mechanism to hammer out an additional fetter for his blind and hopeless captive, already fast bound in misery and iron, which is laid hold on by the divine alchemist, and changed into a golden link in the wondrous chain of providential mercies, destined to form an everlasting song of praise in the mouth of that ransomed sinner! We can say it of every dispensation towards us, that God has wrought it into a link in that precious chain; and such indeed is the retrospect of bygone days, when thus enlightened by the beams of covenant mercy.

Anon.

8318. ELECTION, True. It is not by the rapture of feelings, and by the luxuriance of thought, and by the warmth of those desires which descriptions of heaven may stir up within us, that I can prove myself predestined to a glorious inheritance. If I would find out what is hidden, I must follow what is revealed. The way to heaven is disclosed; am I walking in that way? It would be a poor proof that I were on my voyage to India; that, with glowing eloquence and thrilling poetry, I could discourse on the palm-groves and spice-isles of the East. Am I on the waters? is the sail hoisted to the wind? and does the land of my birth look blue and faint in the distance? The doctrine of election may have done harm to many; but only because they have fancied themselves elected to the end, and have forgotten that those whom Scripture calls elected are elected to the means. The Bible never speaks of men as elected to be saved from the shipwreck, but only as elected to tighten the ropes, and hoist the sails, and stand to the rudder. Let a man search faithfully; let him see that when Scripture describes Christians as elected, it is as elected to faith, as elected to sanctification, as elected to obedience; and the doctrine of election will be nothing but a stimulus to effort. It cannot act as a soporific. I shall cut away the boat, and let drive all human devices, and gird myself, amid the fierceness of the tempest, to steer the shattered vessel into port.

Melville.

8319. ELEVATION, True. True elevation does not consist in the elevation of nature, in the material or exterior hierarchy of beings. True elevation, an elevation essential and eternal, is one of merit, one of virtue. Birth, fortune, genius, are nothing before God. For what is birth before God who was never born? What is fortune before God who made the world? What is genius before God who is an infinite mind, and from whom we derive that little flame which we honor by so fine a name? Evidently nothing. That which is something before God, which approaches him, is personal elevation, due to an effort of virtue, which, in whatever rank of nature we are placed, reproduces in the soul an actual image of the Deity.

Lacordaire.

8320. ELIJAH, Character of. The Power which came upon him cut, by its fierce coming, all the ties which bound him to his kind, tore him from the plough, or from the pastoral solitude, and hurried him to the desert, and thence to the foot of the throne, or to the wheel of the triumphal chariot. And how startling his coming to crowned or conquering guilt! Wild from the wilderness, bearded like its lion-lord the fury of God glaring in his eye; his mantle heaving to his heaving breast; his words stern, swelling, tinged on their edges with a terrible poetry; his attitude dignity; his gesture power—how did he burst upon the astonished gaze! how swift and solemn his entrance! how short and spirit-like his stay! how dream-like, yet distinctly dreadful, the impression made by his words long after they had ceased to tingle on the ears! and how mysterious the solitude into which he seemed to melt away! Poet, nay prophet, were a feeble name for such a being. He was a momentary incarnation—a meteor kindled at the eye, and blown on the breath, of the Eternal. God testified him to be the greatest of the family of the prophets, by raising him to heaven. G. Gilfillan.

8321. ELISHA, Qualities of. Elisha was, in the strictest sense, a great and a good man; and in his goodness consisted his greatness. His life is a living sermon. He was to be found in season and out of season—in every occasion of need. Never do we find him lacking in moral courage. Wherever his word and presence were required to rebuke sin, this righteous man was “bold as a lion.” He seems to grudge no time, no labor, if only his great work be advanced. We find him in royal palaces, in martial camps, in weeping households. At one time, hurling the awful malediction over impotence and wrong-doing; at another mingling his tears over “the loved and lost,” and then his songs of joy over the lost, raised to be loved again. Poor and unostentatious in dress, in mien, in dwelling, he had been again and again the saviour of his country, and exercised what was equivalent to regal sway in court and city—by the throne and by the altar. He had fostered, with loving heart, the schools of the prophets—training, with holy fidelity, those on whom the mantle of his office and example was afterwards to fall. In fine, he was the John of the prophetic period, the Barnabas of the Old Testament. Macduff.

8322. ELOCUTION, Importance of. On being asked what was the first and chiefest among the precepts of rhetoric, Demosthenes answered—“Elocution;” what the second, he answered—“Elocution;” what the third, he answered still—“Elocution.” St. Augustine.

8323. ELOQUENCE, Adaptation of. If our eloquence be directed above the heads of our hearers we shall do no execution. By pointing our arguments low, we stand a chance of hitting their hearts, as well as their heads. In addressing angels, we could hardly raise our eloquence too high; but we must remember that men are not angels. Would we warm them by our eloquence, unlike Mahomet's mountain, it must come down to them, since they cannot raise themselves to it. It must come home to their wants and their wishes, to their hopes and their fears, to their families and their fire-sides. The moon gives a far greater light than all the fixed stars put together, although she is much smaller than any of them; the reason is, that the stars are superior and remote, but the moon is inferior and contiguous. Colton.

8324. ELOQUENCE, Finished. Phavorinus used to say of Plato and Lysias, “Take or change any word in an oration of Plato's, and you take from the eloquence; and the like will you do, if you take or change a word in any sentence of Lysias.”

8325. ELOQUENCE, God of. In Greek mythology Mercury was accounted the god of Eloquence. The most important item of his outfit was a rod or wand, by virtue of which he had the power of conducting some souls to hell, and freeing others from it. By this they signify that the power of eloquence frees from death such as the hangman waited for, and as often exposes innocence to the utmost severity of the law.

8326. ELOQUENCE, Power of. In whom does it not enkindle passion? Its matchless excellence is applicable everywhere, in all classes of life. The rich and the poor experience the effects of its magic influence. It excites the soldier to the charge and animates him to the conflict. The miser it teaches to weep over his error, and to despise the degrading betrayer of his peace. It convicts the infidel of his depravity, dispels the cloud that obscures his mind, and leaves it pure and elevated. The guilty are living monuments of its exertion, and the innocent hail it as the vindicator of its violated rights and the preserver of its sacred reputation. How often in the courts of justice does the criminal behold his arms unshackled, his character freed from suspicion, and his future left open before him with all its hopes of honors, station and dignity! And how often, in the halls of legislation, does eloquence unmask corruption, expose intrigue, and overthrow tyranny! In the cause of mercy it is omnipotent. It is bold in the consciousness of its superiority—fearless and unyielding in the purity of its motives. All opposition it destroys: all power it defies. Melville.

8327. ELOQUENCE, Prayer and. Pericles the Athenian was said to thunder and lighten, and to carry a dreadful thunderbolt in his tongue by reason of his eloquence. Whenever he was to make an oration, he applied himself studiously to it, and always prayed first to the gods, that no single word might fall from his lips which was not agreeable to the matter in hand.

8328. ELOQUENCE, True. Oliver Cromwell was one day engaged in a warm argument with a lady upon the subject of oratory, in which she maintained that eloquence could only be acquired by those who made it their study in early youth, and their practice afterwards. The Lord Protector, on the contrary, maintained that there was no eloquence but that which sprang from the heart; since, when that was deeply interested in the attainment of any object, it never failed to supply a fluency and richness of expression which would in the comparison render vapid the studied speeches of the most celebrated orators. This argument ended, as most arguments do, in the lady's tenaciously adhering to her side of the question, and in the Protector's saying he had no doubt he should one day make her a convert to his opinion. Some days after, the lady was thrown into a state bordering on distraction by the unexpected arrest and imprisonment of her husband, who was conducted to the Tower as a traitor to the Government. The agonized wife flew to the Lord Protector, rushed through his guards, threw herself at his feet, and, with the most pathetic eloquence, pleaded for the life and innocence of her husband. Cromwell maintained a severe brow, till the petitioner, overpowered by the excess of her feelings and the energy with which she had expressed them, paused. His stern countenance then relaxed into a smile, and, extending to her an immediate liberation of her husband, he said, "I think all who have witnessed this scene will vote on my side of the question, in the dispute between us the other day, that the eloquence of the heart in power certainly surpasses all other eloquence." Anon.

8329. ELYSIUM Preferred. If I were now disengaged from my cumbrous body, and on my way to Elysium, and some superior being should meet me in my flight, and make the offer of returning, and remaining in my body, I should, without hesitation, reject the offer, so much should I prefer going to Elysium to be with Socrates, and Plato, and all the ancient worthies, and to spend my time in converse with them. Cicero.

8330. EMANCIPATION, Universal. I speak in the spirit of the British law, which makes liberty commensurate with and inseparable from British soil; which proclaims even to the stranger and sojourner, the moment he sets his foot upon British earth, that the ground on which he treads is holy, and consecrated by the genius of universal emancipation. No matter in what language his doom may have been pronounced; no matter what complexion, incompatible with freedom, an Indian or an African sun may have burnt upon him; no matter in what disastrous battle his liberty may have been cloven down; no matter with what solemnities he may have been devoted upon the altar of slavery; the first moment he touches the sacred soil of Britain, the altar and the god sink together in the dust; his soul walks abroad in her own majesty; his body swells beyond the measure of his chains that burst from around him; and he stands redeemed, regenerated, disenthralled, by the irresistible genius of universal emancipation! Curran.

8331. EMINENCE, Road to. I do not hesitate to say that the road to eminence and power from an obscure condition ought not to be made too easy, nor a thing too much of course. If rare merit be the rarest of all things, it ought to pass through some sort of probation. The temple of Honor ought to be seated on an eminence. If it be open through virtue, let it be remembered too, that virtue is never tried but by some difficulty, and some struggle. Burke.

8332. EMPLOYMENT, Advantage of. Assure yourself, that employment is one of the best remedies for the disappointments of life. Let even your calamity have the liberal effect of occupying you in some active virtue, so shall you in a manner remember others, till you for get yourself. Pratt.

8333. EMPLOYMENT, Amusements and. Employment does not mean no amusement; the workers, or those who use their time instead of wasting it, have more holidays than any one else, for every change is a going out to play. When rational and unsophisticated, play, commonly so-called, is still work; at all events, no man ever played genially and heartily without gaining something by it, and thus gathering from it a fruition of work. Play, moreover, is perfectly compatible with work: let no one suppose that art and science disallow it, or that they render play uninteresting and distasteful. Pastime and fun are as great a need as occupation, and as great a luxury. He who refuses to play is but a stately fool; to sport and gambol with children is one of the sweetest lyric-songs of life: grown people, however, should remember that, as the end of all exertions, even the slightest, should be profit, play should always be based upon an intelligent idea. People may be mirthful without being silly, just as they may be grave without being gloomy; a mind in right order can descend into frolics as readily as it can soar into magnificent ideas; for it is the characteristic of well-disciplined intelligence, and of purity and earnestness of the affections, that they are universal in their capacity. It is this which makes the philosopher, the true idea of whom is that of an amiable and pious man—who, with the profound and scientific, combines the lively and the droll. Grindon.

8334. EMPLOYMENT, Fixed. The Jews compared a man with a fixed employment to "a vineyard fenced." A good comparison. A man's activities, within his proper calling, are not like trees scattered up and down the way-side, or over the wilderness, when much of the fruit is lost; but like well-planted and well-trained vines in a garden, where the most is made of them, and they are all husbanded and preserved. Stoughton.

8335. EMPLOYMENT, Honorable. It is related of Sir Thomas More, by his daughter, that His Grace of Norfolk coming to dine with him, finds him in the church choir, singing, with a surplice on. "What!" cries the Duke as they walk home together, "my Lord Chancellor playing the parish-clerk! sure, you dishonor the King and his office." "Nay," says father, smiling, "your Grace must not deem that the King, your master and mine, will be offended at my honoring his Master."

F. F. Trench.

8336. EMPLOYMENT, Most Useful. Suppose a man to have a talent at finding out springs and contriving of aqueducts (a piece of skill for which Hercules and other of the ancients are much celebrated in history), surely he could not so satisfactorily employ himself in sinking a well or driving water to some private seat or contemptible cottage, as in supplying conduits to some fair and populous city, in relieving an army just perishing from thirst, or in refreshing and adorning with fountains and cool streams the beautiful gardens of some glorious monarch. Plutarch.

8337. EMPLOYMENT Necessary for Man. With the exception of one extraordinary man, I have never known an individual—least of all, a man of genius—healthy and happy without a profession; that is, some regular employment, which does not depend on the will of the moment, and which can be carried on so far mechanically, that an average quantum only of health, spirits, and intellectual exertion are requisite to its faithful discharge. Three hours of leisure unannoyed by any alien anxiety, and looked forward to with delight as a change and recreation, will suffice to realize, in literature, a larger product of what is truly genial, than weeks of compulsion. Coleridge.

8338. EMPLOYMENT, Seek. Exert your talents and distinguish yourself, and don't think of retiring from the world until the world will be sorry that you retire. I hate a fellow whom pride, or cowardice, or laziness, drives into a corner, and who does nothing when he is there but sit and growl. Let him come out as I do, and bark. Dr. S. Johnson.

8339. EMPHASIS, Improper. The following story is told of a theological student at Andover, who had an excellent opinion of his own talents. On one occasion he asked the professor who taught elocution at the time: "What do I especially need to learn in this department?" "You ought first to learn to read," said the professor. "Oh, I can read now!" replied the student. The professor handed the young man a Testament, and pointed to the twenty-fifth verse of the twenty-fourth chapter of Luke's Gospel; he asked him to read that. The student read: "Then he said unto them, O fools, and slow of heart to believe all that the prophets have spoken." "Ah," said the professor, "they were fools for believing the prophets, were they?" Of course that was not right, and so the young man tried again: "O fools, and slow of heart to believe all that the prophets have spoken." "The prophets, then, were sometimes liars?" asked the professor. "No. 'O fools, and slow of heart to believe all that the prophets have spoken.'" "According to this reading," the professor suggested, "the prophets were notorious liars." This was not a satisfactory conclusion, and so another trial was made: "O fools, and slow of heart to believe all that the prophets have spoken." "I see now," said the professor, "the prophets wrote the truth, but they spoke lies." This last criticism discouraged the student, and he acknowledged that he did not know how to read. "The difficulty lies in the fact that the words 'of heart to believe' apply to the whole of the latter part of the sentence, and emphasis on any particular word entirely destroys the meaning."

8340. ENCOURAGEMENT, Angelic. Rufinus and Valerius suffered martyrdom about 287, at Vidola in Gaul. They were tortured upon the little horse and beaten with leaded whips till their bodies were a mass of mangled flesh. But just alive, they were cast into prison. In the night an angel stood before them holding a crown of dazzling brightness in either hand, and saying, "Be of good cheer, valiant soldiers of Jesus Christ. A little more of battle, and then these crowns are yours." In the morning they were ordered to execution, and went to receive their crowns.

8341. ENCOURAGEMENT from Small Things. Diogenes, once on a feast day, when very dependent and tempted to give up his philosophic life, received a lesson from a little mouse which came and nibbled the mouldy crusts in his pouch. Addressing himself he said, "What is the matter with thee, Diogenes? Thou seest this tiny mouse lives well, and is very glad of thy scraps; but thou, who must needs be a person of quality, forsooth art extremely sorry and out of humor, because thou dost not feast upon down-beds, and canst not have the genteel privilege at this merry time to be drunk as well as others."

8342. END, Consider the. It is said that as an ancient king of Tartary was riding with his officers of state, they met a dervis crying aloud, "To him that will give me a hundred dinars I will give a piece of good advice." The king, attracted by this strange declaration, stopped, and said to the dervis: "What advice is this that you offer for a hundred dinars?" "Sire," replied the dervis, "I shall be most thankful to tell you as soon as you order the money to be paid me." The king, expecting to hear something extraordinary, ordered the dervis to be paid at once; so he said: "Begin nothing without considering what the end may be." The officers of state, smiling at what they thought ridiculous advice, looked at the king, who they expected would be so enraged at this insult as to order the dervis to be severely punished. But the king said: "I see nothing to laugh at in this advice; on the contrary, I am persuaded that if it were more frequently practiced, men would escape many evils. Indeed, so convinced am I of the wisdom of this maxim, that I shall have it engraved on my plate, and written on the walls of my palace, so that it may be ever before me." Some time after this occurrence, one of the nobles of the court resolved to destroy the king, and place himself on the throne. In order to accomplish his purpose, he secured the confidence of one of the king's surgeons, to whom he gave a poisoned lancet, saying: "If you will bleed the king with this lancet I will give you ten thousand pieces of gold, and when I ascend the throne you shall be my vizier." This surgeon, dazzled by such brilliant prospects, wickedly assented to the proposal. Soon the king sent for this man to bleed him. He put the poisoned lancet into a side pocket, and hastened into the king's presence. The arm was tied, when suddenly the surgeon's eye read at the bottom of the basin: "Begin nothing without considering what the end may be." He thought within himself: "If I bleed the king with this lancet he will die, and I shall be seized and put to a cruel death. Then of what use will all the gold in the world be to me?" Then, returning the lancet to his pocket, he drew forth another. The king, observing this, and perceiving that he was much embarrassed, asked why he changed his lancet so suddenly. He stated that the point was broken; but the king, doubting his statement, commanded him to show it. This so agitated him that the king felt assured all was not right. He said: "Tell me instantly what you mean, or your head shall be severed from your body!" The surgeon, trembling with fear, promised to relate all to the king, if he would only pardon him. The king consented, and the surgeon related the whole matter, acknowledging that had it not been for the words in the basin, he should have used the fatal lancet. The king summoned his court, and ordered the traitor to be executed. Then, turning to his officers, he said: "You now see that the advice of the dervis, at which you laughed, is most valuable; it has saved my life. Search out this dervis, that I may amply reward him for his wise maxim."

8343. END, Enduring to the. Among the different games and races at Athens, there was one in which they carried a burning torch in their hand. If they arrived to the end without its being extinguished, they obtained the prize. Thus, they only shall be saved, says the Saviour, who endure to the end. It is not the man who makes a splendid profession for a season—it is not the man who appears to carry the torch of truth only a part of the way, that shall be crowned—but he who perseveres, and whose lamp is trimmed, and who holds fast his confidence, and the rejoicing of his hope unto the end. Yet, alas! how many seem to bid fair for a season, but in time of temptation fall away. Epictetus tells us of a gentleman returning from banishment, who in his journey towards home, called at his house, told a sad story of an imprudent life; the greater part of which being now spent, he was resolved for the future to live philosophically—to engage in no business, to be candidate for no employment—not to go to court, nor to salute Cæsar with ambitious attendances: but to study, and worship the gods and die willingly, when nature or necessity called him. Just, however, as he was entering his door, letters from Cæsar met him, and invited him to court: where, alas! he forgot all his promises, which were warm upon his lips; grew pompous, secular, and ambitious; and gave the gods thanks for his preferment. Thus many form resolutions in their own strength, make for a season some pretensions to seriousness, but are like the children of Ephraim, who, though armed and carrying bows, yet turned back in the day of battle.

Buck.

8344. END, Question of the. A young shopman once took up a leaf of the Bible, and was about to tear it in pieces, and use it for packing up some small parcel, when a pious friend said, "Do not tear that: it contains the word of eternal life." The young man, though he did not relish the reproof, olded up the leaf, and put it in his pocket. Shortly after this, he said within himself, "Now I will see what kind of life it is of which this leaf speaks." On unfolding the leaf, the first words that caught his eye were the last in the book of Daniel: "But go thou thy way till the end be: for thou shalt rest, and stand in thy lot at the end of the days." He began immediately to inquire what his lot would be at the end of the days, and was led to a religious life.

8345. END OF THE WORLD, Expected. There was an almost universal idea, in the tenth century, that the end of the world was approaching. Many charters began with these words: "As the world is now drawing to its close." An army marching under the Emperor Otho I. was so terrified by an eclipse of the sun, which it conceived to announce this consummation, as to disperse hastily on all sides. This notion seems to have been founded on some confused theory of the Millennium, and died away with the dawn of the eleventh century.

8346. ENDURANCE, Sublimity of. I cannot help thinking that the severe and rigid economy of a man in distress has something in it very sublime, especially if it be endured for any length of time serenely and in silence. I remember a very striking instance of it in a young man, since dead; he was the son of a country curate, who had got him a berth on board a man-of-war, as a midshipman. The poor curate made a great effort for his son; fitted him out well with clothes, and gave him fifty pounds in money. The first week, the poor boy lost his chest, clothes, money, and everything he had in the world. The ship sailed for a foreign station; and his loss was without remedy. He immediately quitted his mess, ceased to associate with the other midshipmen, who were the sons of gentlemen; and for five years, without mentioning it to his parents—who he knew could not assist him—or without borrowing a farthing from any human being, without a single murmur or complaint, did that poor lad endure the most abject and degrading poverty, at a period of life when the feelings are most alive to ridicule, and the appetites most prone to indulgence. Now, I confess I am a mighty advocate for the sublimity of such long and patient endurance. If you can make the world stare and look on, there you have vanity, or compassion, to support you; but to bury all your wretchedness in your own mind—to resolve that you will have no man's pity, while you have one effort left to procure his respect—to harbor no mean thought in the midst of abject poverty, but, at the very time you are surrounded by circumstances of humility and depression, to found a spirit of modest independence upon the consciousness of having always acted well;—this is conduct, which, though found in the shade and retirement of life, ought to be held up to the praises of men, and to be looked upon as a noble model for imitation.

S. Smith.

8347. ENDURANCE, Uncomplaining. The orchardist takes much care of his trees, using saw and knife upon them, as well as spade and hoe about them. They do not cry out at the loss of their branches, or at being dug about, for this will do them nothing but good, causing a better growth, and more perfect fruit.

8348. ENDURANCE, Utility of. A sore-eyed Spartan enlisted as a soldier. One said to him, "Poor man, in thy condition what wilt thou do in a fight?" He answered, "If I can do nothing else I shall blunt the enemies' swords."

8349. ENEMIES, Kindness to. "Is this for me?" said a wounded Confederate colonel, a prisoner to whom a cup of coffee and a slice of buttered bread was handed. "Yes, sir. Will you please drink it?" "Well, this beats me. We don't treat our prisoners so." "We make no distinction," was the answer. The colonel drank his coffee and ate his bread in silence, but with tears in his eyes, which showed that his heart was touched.

8350. ENEMIES, Lessons from. Now, our enemy (to gratify his ill-will towards us) doth acquaint himself with the infirmities, both of our bodies and minds, with the debts we have contracted, and with all the differences that arise in our families, all which he knows as well, if not better than ourselves. He sticks fast to our faults, and chiefly makes his invidious remarks upon them. Nay, our most depraved affections, that are the worst distempers of our minds, are always the subject of his inquiry, just as vultures pursue putrid flesh, noisome and corrupted carcases, because they have no perception of those that are sound and are in health. So our enemies catch at our failings, and then they spread them abroad by uncharitable and ill-natured reports. Hence, we are taught this useful lesson for the direction and management of our conversations in the world, that we be circumspect and wary in everything we speak or do, as if our enemy always stood at our elbow and overlooked every action. Hence, we learn to live blameless and inoffensive lives. Plutarch.

8351. ENEMIES, Love to. A few years since, a young man in the vicinity of Philadelphia was one evening stopped in a grove, with the demand, "Your money or your life!" The robber then presented a pistol to his breast. The young man, having a large sum of money, proceeded leisurely and calmly to hand it over to his enemy, at the same time setting before him the wickedness of his career. The rebuke of the young man cut the robber to the heart. He became enraged, cocked his pistol, held it to the young man's head, and with an oath, said, "Stop that preaching, or I will blow your brains out." The young man calmly replied, "Friend, to save my money I would not risk my life; but to save you from your evil course I am willing to die; I shall not cease pleading with you." He then urged the truth more earnestly and kindly. Soon the pistol fell to the ground, the tears began to flow, and the robber was overcome. He handed the money all back, with the remark, "I cannot rob a man of such principles!" Bibl. Treasury.

8352. ENEMIES, Power Over. If strong and mighty enemies should come upon thee, as sault and besiege thee, and thou hadst on thy side one whom thou knewest certainly to be lord, and to have power over all thine enemies, thou mightest lawfully be bold and without fear. Now have we, through faith, Christ on our side, which is Lord over all lords, which hath full power over all fortune and misfortune, prosperity and adversity. Coverdale.

8353. ENEMIES, Repugnance to. A cat, according to Æsop, in affected kindness asked a sick hen how she did. The hen replied with spirit, "The better if you were further off."

8354. ENEMIES, Surrender to. A venerable negro in Iowa was on trial for an offense against the State. When the case was announced in court, "The State of Iowa versus Sampson Caesar," the aged African exclaimed: "What! de whole State of Iowa agin dis chile Den I surrenders."

8355. ENEMIES, Utilizing. The best experienced gardener cannot so change the nature of every tree, that it shall yield pleasant and well-tasting fruit; neither can the craftiest huntsman tame every beast. One therefore makes the best use he can of his trees, the other of his beast; although the first are barren and dry, the latter wild and ungovernable. So sea water is unwholesome, and not to be drunk; yet it affords nourishment to all sorts of fish, and serves as it were for a chariot to convey those who visit foreign countries. The Satyr would have kissed and embraced the fire the first time he saw it; but Prometheus bade him take heed, else he might have cause to lament the loss of his beard, if he came too near that which burns all it touches. Yet this very fire is a most beneficial thing to mankind; it bestows upon us both the blessings of light and heat, and serves those who know how to use it for the most excellent instrument of mechanical arts. Directed by these examples, we may be able to take right measures of our enemies, considering that by one handle or other we may lay hold of them for the use and benefit of our lives; though otherwise they may appear very untractable and hurtful to us. Plutarch.

8356. ENEMY, Giving Drink to. At Hanover C. H., two wounded soldiers lay near each other. One of them, a Confederate from North Carolina, suffered much from thirst, and cried, "Water! water!" The other, a Federal, managed to crawl to a stream, fill his canteen, and returning with it, held it to the lips of the dying man. He in return gave the other his Testament, the thing he most prized, and in a few moments entered the land whose inhabitants thirst no more.

8357. ENEMY, His Own. "No one's enemy but his own," happens generally to be the enemy of everybody with whom he is in relation. The leading quality that goes to make this character is a reckless imprudence and a selfish pursuit of selfish enjoyments, independent of all consequences. "No one's enemy but his own," runs rapidly through his means; calls in a friendly way on his friends for bonds, bail, and securities; involves his nearest kin, leaves his wife a beggar, and quarters his orphans upon the public; and after enjoying himself to his last guinea, entails a life of dependence upon his progeny, and dies in the ill-understood reputation of a harmless folly, which is more injurious to society than some positive crimes. Mrs. Jameson.

8358. ENEMY, Punishing an. There is a Persian story of Gobryas, who contended with Darius against the Magi. Gobryas was pursued by one of them into a dark room, where a severe conflict went on. Darius entered to help his friend, but dared not attack with his sword, lest he should slay his friend; whereupon Gobryas bade him run both through together rather than fail.

8359. ENEMY, Rescuing an. In the year 1567, King Philip II. of Spain sent the Duke of Alva as Governor of the Low Countries. Alva was notorious for his bitter persecution of all who embraced the Reformed religion. So many people were put to death during the term of his government that it was called "The Reign of Terror," and his Council received the name of the "Blood Council." Amongst the persecuted people was a poor Protestant named Dirk Willemzoon, who was condemned to death for his opinions. Dirk made his escape from his persecutors, and fled for his life, pursued by an officer of justice. A frozen lake lay in his way. It was early in the year, and the ice had become unsafe; he ventured upon it; it cracked and shook beneath his steps as he ran, but he ran for his life; a horrible death would be his portion if he was caught. The shore lay before him; so on he ran over the trembling ice till at last he set foot on the firm shore. But a cry of terror came from behind: he looked back and saw the officer sinking through the broken ice into the waters of the lake. No one was near to help him but the poor fugitive, Dirk Willemzoon. He might have left the officer to perish, and escaped himself; but Dirk went back over the cracking ice, putting his own life in danger, and succeeded in reaching and saving his pursuer. Anon.

8360. ENEMY, Revenge upon an. Diogenes, to one that asked him how he might be revenged of his enemy, said, "The only way to gall and fret him effectually is for yourself to appear a good and honest man."

8361. ENEMY, Robbing an. Tasso was told that he had an opportunity of taking advantage of a bitter enemy. He replied, "I wish not to plunder him; but there are things I wish to take from him;—not his honor, his wealth, or his life—but his malice and ill-will."

8362. ENEMY, Trusting an. Some pigeons had long lived in fear of a kite, but by being always on the alert, and keeping near their dove-cote, they had contrived hitherto to escape the attacks of the enemy. Finding his sallies unsuccessful, the kite betook himself to craft:

"Why," said he, "do you prefer this life of anxiety when, if you would only make me your king, I would secure you from every attack that could be made upon you?" The pigeons, trusting to his professions, called him to the throne; but no sooner was he established there than he exercised his prerogative by devouring a pigeon a day. Whereupon one that yet waited his turn said, "It serves us right."

Æsop.

8363. ENEMY, Watching the. When in the immediate presence of the enemy Washington used to give the order, "Put only Americans on picket to-night."

8364. ENERGY, Effect of. It is idleness that creates impossibilities; and where men care not to do a thing they shelter themselves under a persuasion that it cannot be done. The shortest and surest way to prove a work possible, is strenuously to set about it; and no wonder if that proves it possible that for the most part makes it so. South

8365. ENERGY, Ministerial. Thaddeus Conolly of Ireland, says, "I went one Sabbath into a church to which a new incumbent had been lately appointed. The congregation did not exceed half a dozen, but the preacher delivered himself with as much energy and affection as if he were addressing a crowded audience. After the service, I expressed to the clergyman my wonder that he should preach so fervently to such a small number of people. 'Were there but one,' said he, 'my anxiety for his improvement would make me equally energetic.'" The following year Conolly went into the same church: the congregation was multiplied twenty-fold. The third year he found the church full.

8366. ENERGY, Power of. He who would do some great thing in this short life must apply himself to the work with such a concentration of his forces as to idle spectators, who live only to amuse themselves, looks like insanity.

John Foster.

8367. ENERGY, Sphere of. I know it is common for men to say that such and such things are perfectly right, very desirable, but that, unfortunately, they are not practicable. Oh, no, sir! no! Those things which are not practicable are not desirable. There is nothing in the world really beneficial that does not lie within reach of an informed understanding and a well-directed pursuit. There is nothing that God has judged good for us that He has not given us the means to accomplish, both in the natural and the moral world. If we cry, like children, for the moon, like children we must cry on. Burke.

8368. ENGAGEMENTS, Keeping. Sextus Pompeius had seized upon Sicilia and Sardinia, and made war upon the triumvirate and people of Rome; having pressed them with want and scarcity, they sued for peace. Octavianus Cæsar and Antonius met Sextus, and terms of peace were agreed upon, and they mutually entertained one another. While the captains were with Sextus, on board his vessel, Menas, the Admiral of the Navy, asked him "If he should not cut the cables, put off the ship, and make him lord, not only of Sicily and Sardinia, but of the whole world itself?" It would have been a very easy thing to do, but Sextus regarded his honor too much for that. He replied, "Menas might have done it unknown to me; but since they are here let us think no more about it, for perjury is none of my property."

8369. ENGLAND, Blessings of. Oh, England! abode of comfort, and cleanliness, and decorum! Oh, blessed asylum of all that is worth having upon earth! Oh, sanctuary of religion and of liberty for the whole civilized world! It is only in viewing the state of other countries, that thy advantages can be duly estimated! May thy sons, who have "fought the good fight," but know and guard what they possess in thee! Oh, land of happy firesides, and cleanly hearths, and domestic peace; of filial piety, and parental love, and connubial joy; "the cradle of heroes, the school of sages, the temple of law, the altar of faith, the asylum of innocence," the bulwark of private security and of public honor. Clarke.

8370. ENJOYMENT, Capacity for. It is something to look upon enjoyment, so that it be free and wild, and in the face of nature, though it is but the enjoyment of an idiot. It is something to know that heaven has left the capacity of gladness in such a creature's breast; it is something to be assured that, however lightly men may crush that faculty in their fellows, the great Creator of mankind imparts it even to his despised and slighted work. Who would not rather see a poor idiot happy in the sunlight, than a wise man pining in a darkened jail? Ye men of gloom and austerity, who paint the face of Infinite Benevolence with an eternal frown, read in the everlasting book, wide open to your view, the lesson it would teach. Its pictures are not in black and sombre hues, but bright and glowing tints; its music—save when ye drown it—is not in sighs and groans, but songs and cheerful sounds. Listen to the million voices in the summer air, and find one dismal as your own. Remember, if ye can, the sense of hope and pleasure which every glad return of day awakens in the breast of all your kind who have not changed their nature; and learn some wisdom even from the witless, when their hearts are lifted up they know not why, by all the mirth and happiness it brings. Dickens.

8371. ENJOYMENT, Limited. Providence has fixed the limits of human enjoyment by immovable boundaries, and has set different gratifications at such a distance from each other, that no art or power can bring them together. This great law it is the business of every rational being to understand, that life may not pass away in an attempt to make contradictions consistent, to combine opposite qualities, and to unite things which the nature of their being must always keep asunder. Johnson.

8372. ENJOYMENT, Man's Power of. Let us look at the sky over our heads. What a lovely prospect have we even there! Had God chosen, he might have made the sky of a dull and leaden hue. If the atmosphere were duly supplied with oxygen, we could live under a leaden sky as well as under one of the most gorgeous tints. There is no absolute necessity for the beauty, and oftentimes the splendor, which meets our eye when we look up. At one hour we see the sky a deep liquid blue, without a cloud or spot; then we have presented to us pillared masses of resplendent cloud, reminding us of the great white throne which shall be set; and then the scene changes again, and the pillared cloud is removed, and smaller clouds, all glittering is the sunshine, with swift yet stately motion, traverse that field of blue, and we think of the armies of heaven which follow Jesus on white horses. Oh! that sky is a grand and noble object of contemplation, and if only God teach us by his own handiwork, our hearts may be elevated, indeed, by looking at its glories. There go the pall-like clouds with their golden fringes, and their silver linings, telling us that there is wealth attached even to our darkest sorrows; there lie scattered all over the heavens, the dappled masses of silver and gold, as though the Lord of glory had himself passed by that way, and it had been strewn for his feet by adoring angels' hands; yonder the heavens are overspread with a burnished sheet, as though the sun would remind us as he set of what shall be the portion of the Lord's people after their life's sunset, even the city of gold. Times there are when the jasper, the sapphire, the chalcedony, the emerald, the sardonyx, the sardius, the chrysolite, the beryl, the topaz, the chrysoprasus, the jacinth, and the amethyst, seem all flung in wild confusion abroad upon that sky; or when, amid its ever-changing hues, they seem to melt into, or give place to one another; and if we look at this sky as it is, and as it might have been, is there not cause for praise, even as we look up? But it is impossible to sum up man's daily powers of enjoyment. Power.

8373. ENJOYMENT, Natural. All real and wholesome enjoyments possible to man, have been just as possible to him since first he was made of the earth as they are now; and they are possible to him chiefly in peace. To watch the corn grow and the blossom set, to draw hard breath over plough-share and spade, to read, to think, to love, to hope, to pray—these are the things to make man happy; they have always had the power of doing these—they never will have power to do more. Ruskin.

8374. ENJOYMENT, Pursuit of. All solitary enjoyments quickly pall, or become painful, so that, perhaps, no more insufferable misery can be conceived than that which must follow incommunicable privileges. Only imagine a human being condemned to perpetual youth while all around him decay and die. Oh! how sincerely would he call upon death for deliverance! What, then, is to be done? Are we to struggle against all our desires? Luckily, we should strive in vain, or, could we succeed, we should be fools for our pains. To strangle a natural feeling is a partial suicide; but there is no need to extinguish the fertility of the soil lest the harvest should be unwholesome. Is it not better far to root up the weeds, and to plant fruits and flowers instead? Were but a tithe of the time and thought usually spent in learning the commonest accomplishments bestowed upon regulating our lives, how many evils would be avoided or lessened! how many pleasures would be created or increased!

Sharpe.

8375. ENJOYMENT, Religious. They might generally tell where a man's heart was by his joy. Some people went to religion for consolation. A member of the Rev. Rowland Hill's congregation had the habit of going to the theatre. Mr. Hill went to him and said, "This will never do—a member of my church in the habit of attending a theatre!" Mr. So-and-so replied that it surely must be a mistake, as he was not in the habit of going there, although it was true he did go now and then, for a treat. "Oh!" said Rowland Hill, "then you are a worse hypocrite than ever, sir. Suppose any one spread the report that I ate carrion, and I answered, 'Well, there is no wrong in that; I don't eat carrion every day in the week; but I have a dish now and then for a treat!' 'Why,' you would say, 'What a nasty, foul and filthy appetite Rowland Hill has to have to go to carrion for a treat.'" Religion was the Christian's truest treat, Christ was his enjoyment—he went to the house of God because there his heart leaped with holy mirth. Where their joy was, there would their heart be also. Was Jesus Christ the fountain of their joy? if not, he was none of theirs. Some Christians, like Peter, followed Christ afar off. Let them mend their pace—if they would be happy let them take Mary's place, Martha's, or John's. Let them have fellowship with Jesus.

Spurgeon.

8376. ENJOYMENT, Secret of. Life is made up of minutes, and its happiness of corresponding little pleasures: the wise man secures the atoms as they flit past him, and thus becomes owner of the aggregate. Making every circumstance of life—sensuous, moral, and intellectual—and every day and hour, contribute a little something, he finds that though a brilliant and memorable pleasure may come but twice or thrice, the secret of a happy life is nevertheless his own. That fine secret is not so much to lay plans for acquiring happy days, as to pluck our enjoyment on the spot; in other words, to spend that time in being happy, which so many lose in deliberating and scheming how to become so.

Grindon.

8377. ENJOYMENTS, Temporary. Every comfortable enjoyment, whether it be in relations, estate, health, or friends, is a candle lighted by Providence for our comfort in this world: and they are but candles, which will not always last: and those that last longest will at length be consumed and wasted. But oftentimes it falls out with them as with candles—they are blown out before they are half consumed.

Flevel.

8378. ENJOYMENTS, Uncertainty of. You would never think of detaining the birds which come in their season, and fill the air with their melody. Pet them and feed them as you may, they use their wings and fly away from you to a warmer clime. The flowers which adorn your grounds to-day will fade and die to-morrow. Such winged and vanishing things are all earthly enjoyments. One fountain only sends forth perpetual streams of joy—the fountain of life.

8379. ENLIGHTENMENT, Spiritual. "I remember once being present," says Captain Basil Hall, "at the Geological Society, when a bottle was produced which was said to contain certain Zoophytes (delicate water-animals, having the form of plants). It was handed round in the first instance among the initiated on the foremost benches, who commented freely with one another on the forms of the animals in the fluid; but when it came to our hands, we could discover nothing in the bottle but the most limpid fluid, without any trace, so far as our eyes could make out, of animals dead or alive, the whole appearing absolutely transparent. The surprise of the ignorant, at seeing nothing, was only equal to that of the learned, who saw so much to admire. Nor was it till we were specifically instructed what it was we were to look for, and the shape, size, and general aspect of the zoophytes pointed out, that our understanding began to co-operate with our sight in peeping the fluid which, up to that moment, had seemed perfectly uninhabited. The wonder then was, how we could possibly have omitted seeing objects now so palpable." How many are the things which appear to the illuminated Christians to be palpably revealed, which the unconverted cannot discover to have any place in the Scriptures of truth; and how much surprised does he feel that he could ever have overlooked them!

F. F. Trench.

8380. ENMITY to God. It profits nothing to be peaceful towards all men, if we be at war with God; it is no good to us if all men approve, and the Lord be offended; neither is there any danger, though all shun and hate us, if with God we find acceptance and love.

St. Chrysostom.

8381. ENNUY, The Evils Produced by. Ennui perhaps has made more gamblers than avarice, more drunkards than thirst, and perhaps as many suicides as despair.

Colton.

8382. ENTHUSIASM, Apostolic. There are some who, proscribing the exercise of the affections entirely in religion, would reduce Christianity to a mere rule of life; but, as such persons betray an extreme ignorance of human nature as well as of the Scriptures, I shall content myself with remarking that the apostles, had they lived in the days of these men would have been as little exempt from their ridicule as any other itinerants. If the supreme love of God, a solicitude to advance his honor, ardent desires after happiness, together with a comparative deadness to the present state, be enthusiasm, it is that enthusiasm which animated the Saviour and breathes throughout the Scriptures.

Robert Hall.

8383. ENTHUSIASM, Demand for. We want enthusiasm in God's work. We find it in the world. Men are desperately in earnest in business circles. Hell is in earnest. Why should not we? We talk about infidelity, and all the isms that are creeping over the world. I am more afraid of cold formalism than anything else. Let the children of God but see eye to eye, and Christianity will overcome all the hosts of hell and death. There is as much power in the gospel to-day as ever. Man has been as bad as he can be. He was bad in Eden, he was bad for two thousand years under the law, and he has been bad these eighteen centuries under grace; but, my friends, there is power in the gospel to save. When men are willing to give their lives to work for God, then he takes these men and uses them. One thing I admire about Garibaldi—his enthusiasm. In 1867, when he was on his way to Rome, he was told that if he got there he would be imprisoned. Said he, "If fifty Garibaldis are imprisoned, let Rome be free." And when the cause of Christ is buried so deep in our hearts, that we do not think of ourselves, but are willing to die, then we will reach our fellow-men.

Moody.

8384. ENTHUSIASM, Example of. Five years ago I went to Edinburgh, and stopped a week to hear one man speak—Dr. Duff, the returned missionary. A friend told me a few things about him, and I went to light my torch with his burning words. My friend told me that the year before he had spoken for some time, and fainted in the midst of his speech. When he recovered, he said, "I was speaking for India, was I not?" And they said he was. "Take me back, that I may finish my speech." And notwithstanding the entreaties of those around, he insisted on returning, and they brought him back. He then said, "Is it true that we have been sending appeal after appeal for young men to go to India, and none of our sons have gone? Is it true, Mr. Moderator, that Scotland has no more sons to give to the Lord Jesus? If it is true, although I have spent twenty-five years there, and lost my constitution—if it is true that Scotland has no more sons to give, I will be off to-morrow, and go to the shores of the Ganges, and there be a witness for Christ." That is what we want. A little more, a good deal more, of that enthusiasm, and Christianity will begin to move, and go through the world, and will reach men by thousands.

Moody.

8385. ENTHUSIASM, Noble. Whitefield was ever busily engaged in his Master's work. He heard a voice constantly ringing in his ear the command, "Occupy till I come!" expecting soon to hear the same voice say, "Give an account of thy stewardship, for thou shalt be no longer steward." His motto was, "No nestling on this side eternity." At one time he writes, "Lord, when thou seest me in danger of nestling, in tender pity put a thorn into my nest to prevent my doing it;" and again, "I am determined to go on till I drop; to die fighting, though it be on my stumps."

Dr. J. B. Wakeley.

8386. ENTHUSIASM, Power of. Nothing is so contagious as enthusiasm; it is the real allegory of the lute of Orpheus; it moves stones, it charms brutes. Enthusiasm is the genius of sincerity, and truth accomplishes no victories without it.

Lord Lytton.

8387. ENTHUSIASM, Religious. Souls are gravely warned, without regard to time, or place, or person, or condition, to be detached from the gifts of God, and to eschew sweet feelings, and gushing fervors, when the danger is rather in their attachment to their carriages and horses, their carpets and their old china, the parks and the opera, and the dear bright world. Why, if the poor Belgravians could get a little attachment, were it only to an image or a holy water-stoup, and I care not how inordinate, it would be a welcome miracle of grace, considering all they have to keep them far from God, for they move in a sphere which seems to be outside his omnipresence. No! no! the warnings of St. Theresa to barefooted Carmelites are hardly fit for such as those. Oh, better far to flutter like a moth round the candles of a gay benediction than lie without love in the propinities of sensual ease and worldly comfort, which seem, but perhaps are not (and you cannot tell), without actual sin.

F. W. Faber.

8388. ENTHUSIASM, Work Under. The great artist, Michael Angelo, was a man of eager, ardent temperament, and when he came to work on marble he destroyed many a block of beautiful stone by his haste to get out his imprisoned idea; and it is said that some parts of some of his great statues are out of proportion, the marble having been cut away too much in the beginning to allow of their being finished in perfection. But just as they are, they are among the finest and grandest in the world. So many of our inspirations to goodness and usefulness are better wrought out in heat and haste than to never attempt them at all. The world needs the great soul of goodness and truth as well as the cold, correct, and faultless forms.

A. D. Vail.

8389. ENVY, Avoid. Let age, not envy, draw wrinkles on thy cheeks; be content to be envied, but envy not. Emulation may be plausible, and indignation allowable, but admit no treaty with that passion which no circumstance can make good. A displacency at the good of others because they enjoy it, though not unworthy of it, is an absurd depravity, sticking fast unto corrupted nature, and often too hard for humility and charity, the great suppressors of envy. This surely is a lion not to be straggled but by Hercules himself, or the highest stress of our minds, and an atom of that power which subdueth all things unto itself.

Broune.

8390. ENVY, Biblical. Is "as rottenness in the bones," Prov. 14: 30. What rust is to iron, and mildew is to corn, and the moth is to the cloth it breeds in, that is envy to the unhappy heart in which it dwells. It is "the deadly nightshade," which produces nothing but rank poison; "the poisonous herb," which spreads nothing but death. See what an apostle says, James 3: 16. A fire, Ps. 37: 1

Heb., "inflammeth not thyself." The evil eye, Prov. 23: 6; 28: 22; Matt. 6: 23; 20: 15. "Envy is the devil's evil eye, as hypocrisy is the devil's cloven foot," see 1 Sam. 18: 9, "Saul eyed David." How soon envy rose in the world. "The first instances that we have of sin are Adam's pride and Cain's envy. The first man was undone by pride, and the second debauched by envy. The whole world, though otherwise empty of men, could not contain two brothers, when one was envied. Pride gave us the first merit of death, and envy the first instance of it: the one was the mother, the other the midwife, of human ruin."—Manton.—The folly of envy, see 1 Cor. 12: 15–23. The foot envying the hand, or the ear envying the eye. Freedom from envy. It is beautiful to observe how some eminent saints have been marked by freedom from envy, as Moses, Num. 11: 27–29; Samuel, 1 Sam. 15: 11, 35; Jonathan, 1 Sam. 23: 17, 18; John the Baptist, John 3: 30; Peter, 2 Pet. 3: 15; Paul, Phil. 1: 15–18. Bowes.

8391. ENVY, Cure of. We may cure envy in ourselves, either by considering how useless or how ill these things were for which we envy our neighbor, or else how we possess as much or as good things. If I envy his greatness, I consider that he wants my quiet; as also I consider that he possibly envies me as much as I do him; and that when I begun to examine exactly his perfections, and to balance them with my own, I found myself as happy as he was. And though many envy others, yet very few would change their condition even with those whom they envy, all being considered.

Mackenzie.

8392. ENVY, Dwelling of. There is no guard to be kept against envy, because no man knows where it dwells, and generous and innocent men are seldom jealous and suspicious till they feel the wound, or discern some notorious effect of it. It shelters itself for the most part in dark and melancholy constitutions, yet sometimes gets into less suspected lodgings, but never owns to be within when it is asked for.

Lord Clarendon.

8393. ENVY, Literary. Plato and Xenophon were cotemporaries; both were conversant with Socratic wisdom, and eminent persons in their times. Though they were well known to one another, and both voluminous writers, yet neither one mentioned the other in their writings.

8394. ENVY, Malignity of. Plutarch compares envious persons to cupping glasses, which ever draw the worst humors of the body to them; they are like flies, which resort only to the raw and corrupt parts of the body, or, if they light on a sound part, never leave blowing upon it till they have disposed it to putrefaction. When Momus could find no fault in the face of the picture of Venus, he picked a quarrel with her slipper.

8395. ENVY, Object of. Envy opposes him who is a beginner on the very steps of the tribune, hindering his access, but she meekly bears an accustomed and familiar glory, and not churlishly or difficultly. Wherefore, some resemble envy to smoke, for it arises thick at first, when the fire begins to burn; but when the flame grows clear, it vanishes away.

Plutarch.

8396. ENVY, Occasion of. Themistocles, while he was yet young, said that he had done nothing gallant, for he was not yet envied. And we know that as the cantharis is most busy with ripe fruits and roses in their beauty, so envy is most employed about the eminently good and those who are glorious in their places and esteem.

Plutarch.

8397. ENVY, Poison of. Quintilian tells of a rich man who poisoned the flowers in his garden, that his neighbor's bees might get no more honey there.

8398. ENVY, Self-destructive. A French officer, General Cherin, was once conducting a detachment through a deep and dangerous glen. Seeing that his men flagged, he encouraged them to bear the fatigues of the march patiently. A soldier near him muttered angrily, "It is all very well for you to talk of patience—you who are mounted on a fine horse; but for us poor wretches it is a different matter." The quick ear of the General heard the words. He felt that it was unjust that his men should think he would not willingly share all their dangers. He reined in his horse at once, and, dismounting, said to the murmuring soldier, "Here, take my place awhile." Scarcely had the latter mounted, his face covered with confusion, when a shot from the adjacent heights struck the poor fellow, and he fell badly wounded. The General turned to his troop and said, as some were told off to carry their comrade: "You see, my men, that the most elevated place is not the least dangerous."

8399. ENVY, Spirit of. Caligula, the emperor, deprived the noblest personages of Rome of their badges of honor, simply because he was envious of them. From Torquatus, the chain or collar; from Cincinnatus, the curled lock of hair, and from Pompeius, the surname of Great, belonging to his family. After he had entertained King Ptolemaeus, he ordered him to be slain, because the people admired his purple robe.

8400. EPHESUS, Desolation of. Arundell says, "Once it had an idolatrous temple, celebrated for its magnificence as one of the wonders of the world, and the mountains of Corissus and and Prion re-echoed, with the shouts of ten thousand tongues, 'Great is Diana of the Ephesians!' Once it had Christian temples almost rivaling the Pagan in splendor, wherein the image that fell down from Jupiter lay prostrate before the cross, and many tongues, moved by the Holy Ghost, made public avowal that 'Great is the Lord Jesus!' Once it had a bishop, the angel of the church, Timothy, the beloved disciple of St. John; and tradition relates that it was honored with the last days of both these great men, and of the mother of our Lord. Some centuries passed on, and the altars of Jesus were again thrown down to make way for the delusions of Mahomet; the cross is removed from the dome of the church, and the crescent glitters in its stead. Now, a few unintelligible heaps of stones, with some mud cottages, untenanted, are all the remains of the great city of the Ephesians! The busy hum of a mighty population is silent in death; 'thy riches and thy fairs, thy merchandise, thy mariners and thy pilots, thy caulkers, and the occupiers of thy merchandise, and all thy men of war' are fallen (Ezek. 27: 27). Even the sea has retired from the scene of desolation, and a pestilential morass, covered with mud and rushes, has succeeded to the waters which brought up the ships laden with merchandise from every country." Dr. Eadie remarks: "While thousands over the world read the Epistle to the Ephesians, no one reads it in the place to which it was originally addressed. The lamp has been extinguished, and the sanctuary desolated. The threatened blight has fallen on Ephesus."

8401. EPIQUIRE, Example of an. Mr. Rogerson, the son of a gentleman of large fortune in Gloucestershire, after receiving an excellent education, was sent abroad to make the grand tour. In this journey young Rogerson attended to nothing but the various modes of cookery and the methods of eating and drinking luxuriously. Before his return his father died, when he entered into the possession of a very large fortune, and a small landed estate. He was now able to look over his notes of epicurism, and to discover where the most exquisite dishes were to be had, and the best cooks to be procured. He had no other servants in his house but men cooks, for his footman, butler, house-keeper, coachman, and grooms, were all cooks. Amongst those that were more professionally so were three cooks from Italy, one from Florence, another from Siena, and another from Viterbo, who was employed for the special purpose of dressing one particular dish only, the docce picante of Florence. He had also a German cook for dressing the livers of turkeys, and the rest were all French. Mr. Rogerson had a messenger constantly traveling between Brittany and London, to bring him the eggs of a certain sort of plover near St. Malo; and so extravagant was he that he once ate a single dinner which, though consisting of two dishes only, cost him upwards of fifty guineas. He counted the minutes between his meals, and was wholly absorbed in devising means to indulge his appetite. In the course of nine years he found his table dreadfully abridged by the ruin of his fortune, and he was verging fast to poverty. When he had spent a fortune of a hundred and fifty thousand pounds, and was totally ruined, a friend gave him a guinea to keep him from starving; but a short time after he was found dressing an ortolan for himself. A few days afterwards he died by his own hand. Anon.

8402. EPIQUIRE, Portrait of an. Mr. Guthrie resided in a pension in Paris with a strange character, whom he called Boots, of whom he writes: "Boots would wade through fire and water for a full dinner. There is nothing on earth would persuade him to march up to the cannon's mouth, but roast beef and plum pudding. But, place inside the breach a full smoking dish, sufficiently visible through the fire and dust and smoke of the deadly conflict, and Boots would fearlessly dash on, sword in hand, for the reeking prize!"

8403. EPIGRAMS, American. Franklin—"He has paid dear for his whistle."—Washington—"To be prepared for war is the most effectual means of preserving peace."—John Dickinson, 1768—"By uniting we stand, by dividing we fall."—Patrick Henry—"Give me liberty or give me death," and, "If this be treason make the most of it."—Thomas Paine—"Rose like a rocket, fell like a stick!" 8404. EQUANIMITY Preserved. The equanimity which a few persons preserve through the diversities of prosperous and adverse life reminds me of certain aquatic plants which spread their tops on the surface of the water, and with a wonderful elasticity keep the surface still, if the water swells, or if it falls. J. Foster.

8405. EQUITY, Fidelity to. Agesilaus, being bidden by his own father to give sentence contrary to law, replied, "I have been always taught by you to be observant of the laws, and I shall endeavor to obey you at this time by doing nothing contrary to them." And Themistocles, when Simonides tempted him to commit a piece of injustice, said, "You would be no good poet should you break the laws of verse; and should I judge against the law, I would make no better magistrate." Plutarch.

8406. EQUITY, Uncertainty of. Equity is a roguish thing. For law we have a measure; we know what to trust to. Equity is according to the conscience of him that is chancellor, and as that is larger or narrower, so is equity. It is all one as if they should make the standard for the measure we call a foot, a chancellor's foot. What an uncertain measure would this be! One has a long, another a short, a third an indifferent foot. It is the same thing in the chancellor's conscience. Selden.

8407. EQUIVOCATION, Crime of. A sudden lie may be sometimes only manslaughter upon truth; but by a carefully constructed equivocation, truth always is with malice aforethought deliberately murdered. Morley.

8408. ERRING, Duty to the. Here are men of our own flesh and blood, with hearts that ache and yearn like ours, with souls just as precious as ours; and can we regard them with unfeeling eyes and stony hearts, as if their welfare in time and eternity were nothing to us? And can we, selfishly seeking our own good, be insensible to the iniquity and misery which daily meet our eyes, or forget the weak, the fallen, the deluded among us, and neglect to give them the helping hand and speak the warning word? All that is Christian and human in us bids us feel for our fellow-men as for ourselves, and stretch forth our hands to grasp and lead back every straying brother. Dr. Fowler.

8409. ERROR, Career of. Once upon the inclined road of error, and there is no swiftness so tremendous as that with which we dash adown the plane, no insensibility so obstinate as that which fastens on us through the quick descent. The start once made, and there is neither stopping nor waking until the last and lowest depth is sounded. Our natural fears and promptings become hushed with the first impetus, and we are lost to everything but the delusive tones of sin, which only cheat the senses and make our misery harmonious. Farewell all opportunities of escape—the strivings of conscience—the faithful whisperings of shame, which served us even when we stood trembling at the fatal point! Farewell the holy power of virtue, which made foul things look hideous, and good things lovely, and kept a guard about our hearts to welcome beauty and frighten off deformity! Farewell integrity—joy—rest—and happiness. Melville.

8410. ERROR, Causes of. None sooner topple over into error than such who have not an honest heart to a nimble head. The richest soil, without culture, is most tainted with such weeds. Anon.

8411. ERROR, Effects of. If those alone who "sowed the wind did reap the whirlwind," it would be well. But the mischief is—that the blindness of bigotry, the madness of ambition, and the miscalculations of diplomacy, seek their victims principally amongst the innocent and the unoffending. The cottage is sure to suffer for every error of the court, the cabinet, or the camp. When error sits in the seat of power and of authority, and is generated in high places, it may be compared to that torrent which originates indeed in the mountain, but commits its devastation in the vale. Colton.

8412. ERROR, Encouragement of. Before we permit our severity to break loose upon any fault or error, we ought surely to consider how much we have countenanced or promoted it. Johnson.

8413. ERROR, Warnings of. It is a melancholy fact, verified by every day's observation, that the experience of the past is totally lost both upon individuals and nations. A few persons, indeed, who have attended to the history of former errors, are aware of the consequences to which they invariably lead, and lament the progress of national violence in the same way as they do the career of individual intemperance. But, upon the great mass of mankind—the young, the active, and the ambitious—such examples are wholly thrown away. Each successive generation plunges into the abyss of passion, without the slightest regard to the fatal effects which such conduct has produced upon their predecessors, and lament, when too late, the rashness with which they slighted the advice of experience, and stifled the voice of reason. Steele.

8414. ESCAPE, Only Means of. One April night, a mammoth ocean-steamer went crashing upon the coast of Nova Scotia. There was all the confusion of a wreck at sea, the hopeless cries of men, women, and children, the hurrying to and fro, the frantic shouts of the officers, and, added to all, came the hoarse cries of the tempest, the surging of the billows, the roar of the breakers. Between the rock, where the vessel struck, and the shore, was a passage-way a hundred yards wide. A rope was swung across this chasm of death, and by this line many of the dark group of survivors, one after another, successfully struggled to the shore. Dear friend, had you been there, would you not have pressed aside all possibilities of harm, and cried, "Let me grasp it!" The waves of death must overtake unpardoned sin. The one rope to save you is the help of the Lord Jesus Christ. Over the dark chasm between earth and heaven is swung this only hope of safety. Cling to it for your eternal life.

Am. Messenger.
8415. ESTEEM, Reputation and. The consideration we are held in is owing to the effect which our personal qualities have on others. If these be great and exalted, they excite admiration; if amiable and endearing, they create friendship. We enjoy esteem much more than we do reputation; the one affects us nearly, the other lies more at a distance; and, though greater, we are less sensible of it, as it seldom comes close enough to become a real possession. We acquire the love of people, who being in our proximity, are presumed to know us; and we receive reputation (or celebrity) from such as are not personally acquainted with us. Merit secures to us the regard of our honest neighbors, and good fortune that of the public. Esteem is the harvest of a whole life spent in usefulness; but reputation is often bestowed upon a chance action, and depends most on success. Salat.

8416. ETERNITY, Belief in. There is, I know not how, in the minds of men, a certain presage, as it were, of a future existence; and this takes the deepest root, and is most discoverable, in the greatest geniuses and most exalted souls. Cicero.

8417. ETERNITY, Choice for. The following question is started by one of the schoolmen: Supposing the whole body of the earth were a great ball or mass of the finest sand, and that a single grain or particle of this sand should be annihilated every thousand years: Supposing then that you had it in your choice to be happy all the while this prodigious mass of sand was consuming by this slow method until there was not a grain of it left, on condition you were to be miserable forever after! Or, supposing that you might be happy forever after, on condition that you would be miserable until the whole mass of sand were thus annihilated at the rate of one sand in a thousand years: which of these two cases would you make your choice? . . . Reason therefore tells us, without any manner of hesitation, which would be the better part in this choice. . . . But when the choice we actually have before us is this, whether we will choose to be happy for the space of only threescore and ten, nay, perhaps of only twenty or ten years, I might say of only a day or an hour, and miserable to all eternity, or, on the contrary, miserable for this short term of years, and happy for a whole eternity; what words are sufficient to express that folly and want of consideration which in such a case makes a wrong choice? I here put the case even at the worst, by supposing, what seldom happens, that a course of virtue makes us miserable in this life; but if we suppose, as it generally happens, that virtue would make us more happy even in this life than a contrary course of vice, how can we but wonder at the stupidity or madness of those persons who are capable of making so absurd a choice?

Addison.

8418. ETERNITY, Conceptions of. O eternity! eternity! How are our boldest, our strongest thoughts lost and overwhelmed in thee! Who can set landmarks to limit thy dimensions; or find plummets to fathom thy depths! Arithmeticians have figures to compute all the progressions of time; astronomers have instruments to calculate the distance of the planets; but what number can state, what lines can gauge, the lengths and breadths of eternity? It is higher than heaven, what canst thou do? deeper than hell, what canst thou know? The measure thereof is longer than the earth, broader than the sea. Mysterious, mighty existence! A sum not to be lessened by the largest deductions. An extent not to be contracted by all possible diminutions. None can truly say, after the most prodigious waste of ages, "that so much of eternity is gone." For, when millions of centuries are elapsed, it is but just commencing; and when millions more have run their ample round, it will be no nearer ending. Yea, when ages numerous as the bloom of spring, increased by the herbage of summer, both augmented by the leaves of autumn, and all multiplied by the drops of rain which drown the winter—when these, and ten thousand times ten thousand more—more than can be represented by any similitude, or imagined by any conception, are all revolved, eternity, vast, boundless, amazing eternity, will only be beginning, or rather, only beginning to begin. What a pleasant yet awful thought is this! Full of delight and full of dread. Hervéy.

8419. ETERNITY, God and. A Christian, traveling in a steam-boat, distributed tracts. A gentleman took one, and folding it up, cut it with his pen-knife into small pieces; then holding it up in derision, threw it away. One piece adhered to his coat; he picked it off, and looking at it, saw only the word "God." He turned it over; on the other side, "Eternity." They stood out as living words before him. "God!"—"Eternity!" He went to the bar, called for brandy to drink to drive them away; but in vain. Then to the gambling-table; to social intercourse and conversation; but those solemn words haunted him wherever he went, until he was brought a penitent to the feet of Jesus.

8420. ETERNITY, Home in. I heard of a man that was dying some time ago, a man of great wealth, and when the doctor told him he could not live, the lawyer was sent for to come and make out his will, and the dying man's little girl, only about four years old, did not understand what death meant, and when the mother told her that her papa was going away, the little child went to the bedside and looked into her father's eyes and asked, "Papa, have you got a home in that land you are going to?" And the question sunk down deep into his soul. He had spent all his time and all his energy in the accumulation of great wealth. He had a grand home and had now got to leave it; and how that question came home to him! Moody.

8421. ETERNITY, Import of. "Ever," a little word, but of immense significance! a child may speak it; but neither man nor angel can understand it. Oh, who can take the dimensions of eternity? The whole space between the creation of the world, and the dissolution of it, would not make a day in eternity; yea, so many years as there be days in that space, would not fill up an hour in eternity. Eternity is one entire circle, beginning and ending in itself. This present world, which is measured out by such divisions and distinctions of time, is therefore mortal, and will have an end.—2 Cor. 4: 18. If eternity did consist of finite times, though ever so large and vast, it would not be eternity, but a longer tract of time only; that which is made up of finite is finite. Eternity is but one immense, indivisible point, wherein there is neither first nor last, beginning nor ending, succession nor alteration, but is like God Himself, one and the same for ever. Case.

8422. ETERNITY Incomprehensible. None can comprehend eternity but the eternal God. Eternity is an ocean whereof we shall never see the shore; it is a deep where we can find no bottom; a labyrinth whence we cannot extricate ourselves, and where we shall ever lose the door. Boston.

8423. ETERNITY, Preaching for. The favorite maxim of Whitefield was to "preach as Apelles painted—for eternity." He was first struck with this maxim when a young man at the table of Archbishop Boulter in Ireland, where the great Doctor Delany said to him, "I wish whenever I go into a pulpit, to look upon it as the last time I shall ever preach, or the last time the people may hear me." Whitefield never forgot this remark. He often said, "Would ministers preach for eternity, they would then act the part of true Christian orators, and not only calmly and coolly inform the understanding, but, by persuasive, pathetic address, endeavor to move the affections and warm the heart. To act otherwise bespeaks a sad ignorance of human nature, and such an inexcusable indolence and indifference in the preacher as must constrain the hearers to suspect, whether they so will or not, that the preacher, let him be who he will, only deals in the false commerce of unfelt truth."

Dr. J. B. Wakeley.

8424. ETERNITY, Prepare for. Were any other event of far superior moment ascertained by evidence which made but a distant approach to that which attests the certainty of a life to come—had we equal assurance that after a very limited though uncertain period we should be called to migrate into a distant land whence we were never to return—the intelligence would fill every breast with solicitude; it would become the theme of every tongue; and we should avail ourselves with the utmost eagerness of all the means of information respecting the prospects which awaited us in that unknown country. Much of our attention would be occupied in preparing for our departure; we should cease to regard the place we now inhabit as our home, and nothing would be considered of moment but as it bore upon our future destination. How strange is it then that, with the certainty we all possess of shortly entering into another world, we avert our eyes as much as possible from the prospect; that we seldom permit it to penetrate us; and that the moment the recollection recurs we hasten to dismiss it as an unwelcome intrusion! Is it not surprising that the volume we profess to recognize as the record of immortality, and the sole depository of whatever information it is possible to obtain respecting the portion which awaits us, should be consigned to neglect, and rarely if ever consulted with the serious intention of ascertaining our future condition.

Robert Hall.

8425. ETERNITY, Promises of. All great natures delight in stability; all great men find eternity affirmed in the very promises of their faculties.

Emerson.

8426. ETERNITY, Prospect of. The prospect of a future state is the secret comfort and refreshment of my soul; it is that which makes nature look gay about me; it doubles all my pleasures, and supports me under all my afflictions. I can look at disappointments and misfortunes, pain and sickness, death itself, and, what is worse than death, the loss of those who are dearest to me, with indifference, so long as I keep in view the pleasures of eternity, and the state of being in which there will be no fears nor apprehensions, pains nor sorrows, sickness nor separation. Why will any man be so impertinently officious as to tell me all this is fancy and delusion? Is there any merit in being the messenger of ill news? If it is a dream, let me enjoy it, since it makes me both the happier and better man.

Addison.

8427. ETERNITY, Rewards of. He that will all low exquisite and endless happiness to be but the possible consequence of a good life here, and the contrary state the possible reward of a bad one, must own himself to judge very much amiss, if he does not conclude that a virtuous life, with the certain expectation of everlasting bliss which may come, is to be preferred to a vicious one, with the fear of that dreadful state of misery which it is very possible may overtake the guilty, or at best the terrible, uncertain hope of annihilation. This is evidently so, though the virtuous life here had nothing but pain, and the vicious, continual pleasure; which yet is for the most part quite otherwise; and wicked men have not much the odds to brag of, even in their present possession: nay, all things rightly considered, have I think, the worse part here. But when infinite happiness is put in one scale, against infinite misery in the other, if the worst that comes to the pious man if he mistakes, be the best that the wicked attain to if he be in the right, who can without madness run the venture? Who in his wits would choose to come within a possibility of infinite misery, which if he miss there is yet nothing to be got by that hazard? whereas, on the other side, the sober man ventures nothing against infinite happiness to be got, if his expectation comes to pass. If the good man be in the right, he is eternally happy; if he mistakes, he is not miserable, he feels nothing. On the other side, if the wicked be in the right, he is not happy; if he mistakes, he is infinitely miserable.

Locke.

8428. ETERNITY, Time and. Eternity hath neither beginning nor end. Time hath both. Eternity comprehends in itself all years, all ages, all periods of ages, and differs from time as the sea and the rivers; the sea never changes place, and is always one water, but the rivers glide along and are swallowed up in the sea; so is time by eternity, Charnock.

8429. ETERNITY, Troubled at. I heard a few years ago of a scene that took place in London. A French nobleman went to consult Dr. Forbes Winslow. He felt he was going to lose his reason. Dr. Winslow wanted to find out what had brought this young man into this terrible state of mind. The young nobleman said he didn't know of anything in particular. "Have you lost any friends?" said the doctor. No, he didn't know as he had lost any friends. "Any property?" No, he didn't know as there was anything of that kind troubling him. "But," said the doctor, "there is something driving you into this state of mind." At last the young man confessed that he was an infidel, and said he: "My father was an infidel and my grandfather was an infidel; but, sir, for the last two years, this question has haunted me day and night, 'Eternity, and where shall I spend it?'" "Well," says the doctor, "I can't help you; you have come to the wrong physi-clan." Says the young man, "Is there no help for me?" Have I got to be troubled with this forever? I cannot sleep more than an hour or two at night; I cannot rest; the question comes home to me, "Eternity, and where shall I spend it?" The doctor took him to the 53d chapter of Isaiah, and read that whole chapter through. "He was wounded for our transgressions, he was bruised for our iniquities." "Well," said the young man, "do you really believe that Jesus Christ was the Son of God, and voluntarily gave up his life, and came down into this world and suffered and died that we might live?" "Yes," said the doctor, "that is just what I believe. I was at one time an infidel myself. Settle that, and that question won't trouble you any more." And the light of eternity at last broke on this man, and he went back to Paris; and, just before Dr. Forbes Winslow died, he said that that nobleman had corresponded with him ever since like a Christian, and often mentioned where he settled the question where he would spend eternity. Moody.

8431. ETERNITY, Voyage to. This world, in its course through space, is like a ship at sea. Every port is a landing place for eternity. On it goes, ever receiving and as often landing mortals on the eternal shores. Some make an early port, others a longer voyage, but the destination is the same. Swiftly speeds the ship; its passengers are constantly changing. Soon the voyage will be over, and the port of bliss or woe be gained.

8432. ETERNITY, Weight of. Upon laying a weight in one of the scales, inscribed eternity, though I threw in that of time, prosperity, affliction, wealth and poverty, which seemed very ponderous, they were not able to stir the opposite balance. Addison.

8433. ETERNITY, Window into. The Bible is a window in this prison of hope, through which we look into eternity. Dwight.

8434. ETIQUETTE, Undue Regard to. Philip the Third was gravely seated by the fireside; the fire-maker of the court had kindled so great a quantity of wood that the monarch was nearly suffocated with heat, and his grandeur would not suffer him to rise from the chair; the domestics could not presume to enter the apartment, because it was against the etiquette. At length the Marquis de Pota appeared, and the king ordered him to damp the fires; but he excused himself, alleging that he was forbidden by the etiquette to perform such a function, for which the Duke d'Usseda ought to be called upon, as it was his business. The duke was gone out; the fire burned fiercer, and the king endured it rather than derogate from his dignity; but his blood was heated to such a degree that an erysipelas of the head appeared the next day, which, succeeded by a violent fever, carried him off in 1621, in the twenty-fourth year of his age. The palace was once on fire; a soldier, who knew the king's sister was in her apartment, and must inevitably have been consumed in a few moments by the flames, at the risk of his life rushed in, and brought her highness safe out in his arms; but the Spanish etiquette was here wofully broken into! The loyal soldier was brought to trial, and as it was impossible to deny that he had entered her apartment, the judges condemned him to die! The Spanish princess, however, condescended, in consideration of the circumstances, to pardon the soldier, and very benevolently saved his life! Anon.

8435. EVENING, Pleasures of the. There are two periods in the life of man in which the evening hour is peculiarly interesting—in youth and in old age. In youth, we love it for its mellow moonlight, its million of stars, its thin, rich and shooting shades, its still serenity; amid those who can commune with our loves, or twine the wreaths of friendship, while there is none to bear us witness but the heaven and the spirits that hold their endless Sabbath there,—or look into the deep bosom of creation, spread abroad like a canopy above us, and look and listen till we can almost see and hear the waving wings and melting songs of other worlds. To youth, evening is delightful: it accords with the flow of his light spirits, the fervor of his fancy, and the softness of his heart. Evening is also the delight of virtuous age: it seems an emblem of the tranquil close of busy life,—serene, placid, and mild, with the impress of its great Creator stamped upon it, it spreads its quiet wings over the grave, and seems to promise that all shall be peace beyond it. Lord Lytton.

8436. EVENTS, Extraordinary. Man reconciles himself to almost any event, however trying, if it happens in the ordinary course of nature. It is the extraordinary alone that he rebels against. There is a moral idea associated with this feeling; for the extraordinary appears to be something like an injustice of heaven. Humboldt.

8437. EVIDENCE, Chain of. In Captain Head's amusing and vivid description of his journey across the Pampas of South America occurs this anecdote. His guide one day suddenly stopped him, and pointing high into the air, cried out, "A lion!" Surprised at such an exclamation, accompanied with such an act, he turned up his eyes, and with difficulty perceived, at an immeasurable height, a flight of condors soaring in circles in a particular spot. Beneath that spot, far out of sight of himself or guide, lay the carcass, and over that carcass stood (as the guide well knew) the lion, whom the condors were eying with envy from their airy height. The signal of the birds was to him what the sight of the lion alone could have been to the traveler, a full assurance of its existence.

Herschel.

8438. EVIDENCE, Circumstantial. At a table-d'hôte at Ludwigsburg, one of the company was showing a very rare gold coin, which passed round the table on a plate, and gave rise to many suppositions as to its age, country, value, etc. The conversation then gradually branched off to other subjects, till the coin was forgotten, and on the owner asking for it back, to the surprise of all, it was not to be found. A gentleman sitting at the foot of the table was observed to be in much agitation; and as his embarrassment seemed to increase with the continuance of the search, the company were about to propose a very disagreeable measure, when suddenly a waiter entered the room, saying, "Here is the coin; the cook has just found it in one of the finger glasses." The relief to all was manifest; and now the suspected stranger for the first time spoke as follows: "Gentlemen, none of you can rejoice more than myself at the recovery of the coin; for picture to yourselves my painful situation! By a singular coincidence I have a duplicate of the very same coin in my purse! (here showing it to the company.) The idea that on the personal search which would probably be proposed, I would be taken for the purloiner of the coin, added to the fact that I am a stranger here, with no one to vouch for my integrity, had almost driven me distracted. The honesty of the cook, and lucky accident, has saved my honor." The friendly congratulations of the company soon effaced the remembrance of their unjust suspicions.

Deutsche Schnell Post.

8439. EVIL, Abhorring. A monk spoke to Poemen of a hermit who held all evil in abhorrence. "What do you mean by that expression?" he asked. The monk spoke in generalities. "Do not talk so vaguely. Say that he hates all the bad habits, bad tempers, bad thoughts which he finds in himself, and then I can understand you. I do not like the idea of monks learning about evil in order to acquire an abhorrence of it," said Poemen.

8440. EVIL, Avoid. To pray against temptations, and yet to rush into occasions, is to thrust your fingers into the fire, and then pray that they may not be burnt. The fable saith, "That the butterfly inquired of the owl, how she should do with the candle which had singed her wings; the owl counseled her, not so much as to behold the smoke." If you hold the stirrup, no wonder Satan gets into the saddle. Secker.

8441. EVIL, Dispersion of. Hesiod, the Greek poet, has the fancy that all evils were shut up in a box, and that Pandora, opening it, scattered all sorts of mischiefs over land and sea through the whole earth. Since that, diseases with silent feet creep over the earth and torment mankind.

8442. EVIL, Extinction of. It is certain that all the evils in society arise from want of faith in God, and of obedience to his laws; and it is no less certain, that by the prevalence of a lively and efficient belief, they would all be cured. If Christians in any country, yea, if any collected body of them, were what they might, and ought, and are commanded to be, the universal reception of the Gospel would follow as a natural and a promised result. And in a world of Christians, the extinction of physical evil might be looked for, if moral evil, that is, in Christian language, sin, were removed.

Southey.

8443. EVIL, Forgiving. When the traveler Bruce was in Abyssinia, the governor, according to the custom, sent him horses for his own use. The groom urged Bruce to mount one of them, assuring him falsely that it was safe. Bruce was skilled in horsemanship, and completely conquered the animal. The governor was surprised at his success, and declared the groom should be put to death. "Sir," said the traveler, "as this man has attempted my life, according to the laws of the country, it is I that should name the punishment." "It is very true," replied the governor, "take him and cut him in a thousand pieces if thou wilt." "Then" said Bruce, "I am a Christian; I desire you to set this man at liberty, and give him the position he had before." Every one was pleased with him for returning good for evil, and the governor remarked, "A man who behaves as that man does, may go through any country."

8444. EVIL, Hiding from. At an explosion in a coal mine, one boy of about twelve was missing, several men were injured for life, and some were burnt to death on the spot. Search was made for the boy, and his name was called along the roads in the pit. At length they came to the place where he was last seen. The ass he was driving lay dead, and the boy was alive and well in a hole. He said, "I was driving the ass, when I saw a blue blaze coming along the road; and thinking all was not right, I crept into this hole, and here I am, quite safe."

8445. EVIL, Inherited. If a father indulges in drunkenness, what is the effect? His children inherit his weakness, his wife is covered with rags, his home is desolate. Is it not very cruel that by the father's drunken habits his poor sober wife, and his innocent children, should be doomed to suffer? But it is a fact. Does not the tyranny of an autocrat tell upon the comfort of his subjects? Turn back to 1715 and to 1745; certain noblemen stood by Prince Charles, believing him to be the legitimate successor to the throne. They lost the day. What was the consequence? That their descendants to this day are stripped of their noble rank, and they are in the eye of the law, and according to the usages of society, commoners.

Dr. Cumming.

8446. EVIL, No Co-operation with. A master cooper called upon a colored man in Ohio, and wished to purchase some stave-timber

He inquired for what purpose he wanted it, and received for answer: "I have contracted for fifty whisky-barrels." "Well, sir," was the prompt reply, "I have the timber for sale, and want money; but no man shall purchase a stave from me for that purpose." Mr. Cooper was indignant to meet such stern reproach from a black, and called him a nigger. "That is very true," replied the other; "it is my misfortune to be a negro; I can't help that. But I can help selling my timber to make whisky-barrels, and I mean to help it."

8447. EVIL Not a Necessity. As surely as God is good, so surely there is no such thing as necessary evil. For by the religious mind, sickness, and pain, and death, are not to be accounted evils. Moral evils are of your own making; and undoubtedly, the greater part of them may be prevented. Deformities of mind, as of body, will sometimes occur. Some voluntary cast-aways there will always be, whom no fostering kindness and no parental care can preserve from self-destruction: but if any are lost for want of care and culture, there is a sin of omission in the society to which they belong.

Southey.

8448. EVIL, Question of. If revelation speaks on the subject of the origin of evil, it speaks only to discourage dogmatism and temerity. In the most ancient, the most beautiful, and the most profound of all works on the subject, the book of Job, both the sufferer who complains of the divine government, and the injudicious advisers who attempt to defend it on wrong principles, are silenced by the voice of supreme wisdom, and reminded that the question is beyond the reach of the human intellect. St. Paul silences the supposed objector who strives to force him into controversy in the same manner. The church has been ever since the apostolic times agitated by this question, and by a question which is inseparable from it, the question of fate and free-will. The greatest theologians and philosophers have acknowledged that these things were too high for them, and have contented themselves with hinting at what seemed to be the most probable solution. What says Johnson? "All our effort ends in belief that for the evils of life there is some good reason, and in confession that the reason cannot be found." What says Paley? "Of the origin of evil no universal solution has been discovered; I mean, no solution which reaches to all cases of complaint. The consideration of general laws, although it may concern the question of the origin of evil very nearly, which I think it does, rests in views disproportionate to our faculties, and in a knowledge which we do not possess. It serves rather to account for the obscurity of the subject than to supply us with distinct answers to our difficulties."

Macaulay.

8449. EVIL, Recompense of. During the revolutionary war lived Peter Miller, the leading member of an humble community of Baptists, located in the state of Pennsylvania. In this community lived a man who distinguished himself for very base conduct towards the society to which Mr. Miller belonged, and treason to his country. On the latter charge he was sentenced to death. No sooner was the sentence pronounced than Peter Miller set out on foot to visit General Washington, at Philadelphia, to intercede for the man's life. But he was told his prayer could not be granted "for his unfortunate friend." "My friend!" exclaimed Miller, "I have not a worse enemy living than that same man." "What," rejoined Washington, "you have walked sixty miles to save the life of your enemy? that in my judgment puts the matter in a different light; I will grant you his pardon." The pardon was made out, and, without a moment's delay, Miller proceeded on foot to a place fifteen miles distant, where the execution was to take place on the afternoon of the same day. He arrived just as the man was being conducted to the scaffold, who, seeing Miller in the crowd, remarked, "There is old Peter Miller; he has walked all the way from Ephrata to have his revenge gratified to-day by seeing me hung." These words had scarcely been spoken when he was made acquainted with the very different nature of Miller's visit, and that his life was spared.

Family Treasury.

8450. EVIL, Seeds of. A man was once walking with a farmer through a beautiful field, when he happened to see a tall thistle on the other side of the fence. In a second, over the fence he jumped, and cut it off close to the ground. "Is that your field?" asked his companion. "O, no!" said the farmer, "bad weeds do not care much for fences, and if I should leave that thistle to blossom in my neighbor's field I should soon have plenty of my own." In some of our Western states the law requires the farmers and road-masters to destroy all weeds on their farms and in the highways.

8451. EVILS, Enduring. Pain and sickness, shame and reproach, poverty and old age, nay, death itself, considering the shortness of their duration, and the advantage we may reap from them, do not deserve the name of evils. A good mind may bear up under them with fortitude, and with cheerfulness of heart. The tossing of a tempest does not discompose him who is sure it will bring him to a joyful harbor.

Addison.

8452. EVILS, Self-Imposed. As to those two hogsheads, my friend, which Homer says lie in heaven full, the one of good, the other of ill fates of men—it is not Jupiter that sits to draw out and transmit to some a moderate share of evils mixed with good, but to others only unqualified streams of evil; but it is ourselves who do it. Those of us that are wise, drawing out the good to temper with our evils, make our lives pleasant and potable; but the greater part (which are fools) are like sieves which let the best pass through, but the worst and the very dregs of misfortune stick to them and remain behind.

Plutarch.

8453. EVIL SPEAKING, Caution to. Speak not ill of a great enemy, but rather give him good words, that he may use you the better if you chance to fall into his hands. The Spaniard did this when he was dying: his confessor told him, to work him to repentance, how the devil tormented the wicked that went to hell; the Spaniard, replying, called the devil "My lord: I hope my lord the devil is not so cruel." His confessor reproved him. "Excuse me," said the Don, "for calling him so: I know not into what hands I may fall; and if I happen into his, I hope he will use me the better for giving him good words." Selden.

8454. EVIL SPEAKING Rebuked. The following anecdote is related of the late Joseph John Gurney, of Norwich, England, by one who was often one of his family circle:—One night—I remember it well—I received a severe lesson on the sin of evil speaking. Severe I thought it then, and my heart rose in childish anger against him who gave it; but I had not lived long enough in this world to know how much mischief a child's thoughtless talk may do, and how often it happens that talkers run off the straight line of truth. S— did not stand very high in my esteem, and I was about to speak further of her failings of temper. In a few moments my eye caught a look of such calm and steady displeasure, that I stopped short. There was no mistaking the meaning of that dark, speaking eye. It brought the color to my face, and confusion and shame to my heart. I was silent for a few moments, when Joseph John Gurney asked, very gravely, "Dost thou know any good thing to tell us of her?" I did not answer: and the question was more seriously asked: "Think; is there nothing good thou canst tell us of her?" "Oh yes; I know some good things, but—" "Would it not have been better, then, to relate those good things, than to have told us that which would lower her in our esteem? Since there is good to relate, would it not be kinder to be silent on the evil? for 'Charity rejoiceth not in iniquity.'"

8455. EVOLUTION Not Proved. His (Professor Huxley's) conclusion is an hypothesis evolved from an hypothesis. To see that this is indeed the case, let us put his argument in syllogistic form. It is as follows: Wherever we have an ascending series of animals with modifications of structure rising one above another, the later forms must have evolved themselves from the earlier. In the case of these fossil horses we have such a series, therefore the theory of evolution is established universally for all organized and animal life. Now, even if we admit his premises, every one must see that the conclusion is far too sweeping. It ought to have been confined to the horses of which he was treating. But passing that, let us ask where is the proof of the major premise? Indeed, that premise is suppressed altogether, and he nowhere attempts to show that the existence of an ascending series of animals, with modifications of structure ascending one above another, is an infallible indication that the higher members of the series evolved themselves out of the lower. The existence of a series does not necessarily involve the evolution of the higher members of it from the lower. The steps of a stair rise up one above another, but we cannot reason that therefore the whole staircase has developed itself out of the lowest step. It may be possible to arrange all the different modifications of the steam engine, from its first and crudest form up to its latest and most complete organized structure, in regular gradation; but that would not prove that the last grew out of the first. No doubt in such a case there has been progress—no doubt there has been development too—but it was progress guided and development directed by a presiding and intervening mind. All present experience is against this major premise which Huxley has so quietly taken for granted. It is a pure conjecture. I will go so far as to say that even if he should find in the geologic records all the intervening forms he desires, these will not furnish evidence that the higher members of the series rose out of the lower by a process of evolution. The existence of a graduated series is one thing; the growth of the series out of its lowest member is quite another.

Dr. W. M. Taylor.

8456. EXACTNESS, Advantages of. What makes the scholar? Exactness. What is most likely to secure success in the learned professions? Exactness. What raises men of various callings to the highest position attainable by persons in their occupations? Exactness. What makes a man's word pass current as gold? His known exactness. What, above all things, is essential in the laboratory? Exactness.

S. Martin.

8457. EXAGGERATION, Slander and. Being in the company of Mr. —, I found he spoke with much fluency and propriety, and particularly about religion. My attention was excited by his conversation; for he appeared to have more enlarged views of men and things than most I had met with. He spoke in terms so high of some particular characters, as induced me to think their value was not sufficiently known. But soon after I was rather confounded by a sentiment he dropped concerning another character, which was as remarkable for its detraction as the other expressions were for their approbation. While I remained with him, he pursued the same method in his discourse, and I saw plainly he fell into the sin of exaggeration; for he could scarcely find words to express his encomiums on some, he again appeared at a loss to represent in a manner sufficiently horrid the faults of others.

Anon.

8458. EXALTATION, Danger of. When I think on the eagle's carrying up of the shell-fish into the air, only to the end he may break him by his fall, it puts me in mind of the devil's costly courtesies, who out of the bounty of his subtlety, is still ready to advance us to destruction. Thus more than once he dealt with my Redeemer; no sooner had he raised him to the top of an high pinnacle, but straight follows, "Cast thyself down." Having placed him on a high mountain, let him fall down, and he shall be largely rewarded with his own. If advancement be so dangerous, I will take heed of being ambitious. Any estate shall give me content; I am high enough if I can stand upright.

Warwick.

8459. EXALTATION, Punishment of. A noble chamber had Pope John XXI., writes Dr. Milman, "and when he was contemplating with too great pride the work of his own hands and burst out into laughter, at that moment the avenging roof came down upon his head." The catastrophe was held at the time to be a special judgment on a reprobate pontiff—Nebuchadnezzar's boast, and worse than Nebuchadnezzar's doom. The historian of Mexico tells us of Montezuma, while exacting from his people the homage of an adulation worthy of an oriental despot, and the profuse expenditure of whose court was a standing marvel, that, "while the empire seemed towering in its most palmy and prosperous state, the canker had eaten deepest into its heart." Ruin was at hand. The hour was come, and the man; and that man was Fernando Cortes. F. Jacox.

8460. EXAMPLE, Best. In the discharge of thy place, set before thee the best examples, for imitation is a globe of precepts; and after a time set before thee thine own example; and examine thyself strictly whether thou didst not best at first. Neglect not also the examples of those that have carried themselves ill in the same place; not to set off thyself by taxing their memory, but to direct thyself what to avoid. Lord Bacon.

8461. EXAMPLE, Choice of. Be sure you set your pattern right. Take not the most noisy and airy Christians, who glory in talk and censures. Take not one who hath an affectation of being religious after a new mode and fashion. Take not one who seeks to raise a fame for piety only by deyring or condemning this or that form of profession; and who, if there were no differences among us, would lose very much of his reputation for sanctity: for these are only torrents, that run with a violent stream; but they are shallow, and we know not how soon they may grow dry. . . . But propound those to yourselves for examples, who are of fixed principles and sober practices; who are grave and solid, and, in all the duties that belong to a Christian conversation, labor to do them substantially rather than ostentatiously; that live within God and themselves; that have deep thoughts and solid expressions of them, and whose actions are suitable and correspondent to both. Such a one is the Christian indeed; and such, for some such there are, I recommend to you for your imitation. And yet there is no man that walks so uprightly, but that sometimes he steps awry. And therefore be not led by a blind and implicit adherence to him, but continually eye the rule; and whereinsoever they forsake that, be they Apostles, yea, or if it were possible, even angels themselves, therein forsake them. Hopkins.

8462. EXAMPLE of Christ. Those that have searched into the monuments of Jerusalem write that our Lord was crucified with his face to the west; which, however spitefully meant of the Jews (as not allowing him worthy to look at the holy city and temple), yet was not without a mystery. "His eyes looked to the Gentiles," etc., saith the Psalmist. As Christ, therefore, on his cross, looked towards us, sinners of the Gentiles, so let us look up to him.

Bishop Hall.

8463. EXAMPLE Contagious. Nothing is so contagious as example. Never was there any considerable good or ill done that does not produce its like. We imitate good actions through emulation, and bad ones through a malignity in our nature, which shame conceals and example sets at liberty. La Rochefoucauld.

8464. EXAMPLE, Conversion by. A young lady very rich in earthly gifts had youth, beauty, wealth; but she had not the best gift, the "peace" that Jesus gives. She was not in the habit of visiting the poor, but one day she went with a friend to see an old woman who had been confined to bed for thirty years, suffering from a painful complaint, and was apparently near death. While the young lady stood pitying by, she was struck by hearing no word of repining or impatience. The aged Christian spoke of happiness and peace, the mercies she had experienced, the joys she was so soon to know. The contrast was great between these two—the one in the flush of youth, health, prosperity; the other so different! But the young lady turned to her friend, and said, "I would gladly change places with that poor creature to have her peace." The saint went to her rest, but the lesson was not lost; the young lady sought for peace in Jesus, and found it and became a consistent Christian.

8465. EXAMPLE, Dangerous. At a "Union Temperance Conference" in England, one of the speakers, Rev. C. Garrett, urged that, even if an occasional glass did not harm some who took it, the example might prove exceedingly harmful to others. He (Mr. Garrett) was fond of climbing. He had pretty strong limbs and a cool head. A few months ago he was climbing a precipice—he thought he could hold on with safety. When at a dangerous point he heard a voice which almost paralyzed him; it was the voice of his own boy, who had caught sight of him, and who was following not far behind. The voice said, "Papa, take the safe path, for I am following you." He stopped in a moment. He did not say, "I am not responsible for my example." He thought if his Fred should perish through his example, his heart would break; he therefore stopped in a moment. In like manner he would say to all his friends, "Take the safe path, because of those who are following you." He charged this upon the ministers especially, for the sake of the little ones that were coming up; in the name of the feeble ones, in the name of the reclaimed, in the name of all who were trying to rise, "Take the safe path!"

8466. EXAMPLE, Fatal. "I wish I was dead," said a little boy one day to his mother. "Why?" asked his kind mother. "Why, the boys all pester me so about father, and I don't want to go again, in the night, to the store after him." His mother talked to him, but thought he did not feel in earnest about it. But one day, when she had returned from a visit, she inquired for the children, and found all but this boy. She looked, she called, but no answer. She went to the barn as it was just growing dark. She opened the door, and there, in one corner, was her little sensitive boy hanging by the neck. She burst into tears. "Oh my son, my son, is it you?" She felt his cold hands, and he was dead. And at the funeral, his father promised to drink no more rum: "I have for ever done." A long time he kept his promise. One day, however, Deacon P. was in the store; and Deacon P. was a good man—he drank but little. He asked for some brandy. And while he drank it, he saw that same man who had been a drunkard looking at him; and he saw, too, that he was very uneasy; he walked about; he sat down. Again he would go to the door as if going away. He was in silent thought. At length he went to the counter and asked for a little brandy: "I may drink a little as well as Deacon P." He did drink, and became a confirmed drunkard again. Vermont Chronicle.

8467. EXAMPLE, Following Bad. Tinder is not apter to take fire, nor wax the impression of the seal, nor paper the ink, than youth is to follow ill examples. Brooks.

8468. EXAMPLE, Good. If the present lecturer has a right to consider himself a real Christian—if he has been of any service to his fellow creatures, and has attained to any usefulness in the church of Christ—he owes it, in the way of means and instrumentality, to the sight of a companion, who slept in the same room with him, bending his knees in prayer, on retiring to rest. That scene, so unostentatious, and yet so unconcealed, roused my slumbering conscience, and sent an arrow to my heart; for, though I had been religiously educated, I had restrained prayer, and cast off the fear of God. My conversion to God followed, and soon after my entrance upon college studies for the work of the ministry. Nearly half a century has rolled away since then, with all its multitudinous events; but that little chamber, that humble couch, that praying youth, are still present to my imagination, and will never be forgotten, even amidst the splendor of heaven, and through the ages of eternity. J. A. James.

8469. EXAMPLE, Imitating. Gallus Vibius, an eloquent Roman, imitated madmen till he became himself mad. Tully laughed at Hircus, a very ridiculous man, till he confessed, "While I laugh at him, I have almost become the same kind of person." The small feet of Chinese ladies are produced in imitation of a queen who had deformed feet.

8470. EXAMPLE, Inconsistent. Though "the words of the wise be as nails fastened by the masters of the assemblies," yet sure their examples are the hammer to drive them in to take the deeper hold. A father that whipt his son for swearing, and swore himself whilst he whipt him, did more harm by his example than good by his correction. Dr. Fuller.

8471. EXAMPLE, Influence of. The ancient Hungarian king, being benighted with his followers, who were weary by reason of the way, and wished to lay themselves down to rest on the snow-covered ground, knowing that if they slept their sleep would be the sleep of death, resorted to the device of commanding each man to tread in the foot-prints that he himself should make. Weary as they were, they felt that what their king could do they ought to do, and they followed him. Their freezing blood was warmed into a new life, and they were saved! And if we follow Christ, though it be a great way off, we shall be strengthened by his life, and day by day draw nearer to him. J. G. Pilkington.

8472. EXAMPLE, Jesus our. It is our comfort that we have always One to look to. Ours is no interminable road, no lonely, solitary path. Jesus, if we can only see aright, is never very far ahead. And this is great encouragement to us. The soldier whose officer says, not "Go on," but "Come on," has tenfold the spirit for entering the battle. The mowers who mow in line have much more heart during the burden and heat of the day when their scythes sweep through the grass keeping time to the stroke of their fellow-workmen in front. Even walking along the road ourselves, we know that we can walk better and continue longer if we be following some one that is a little way ahead. We have One always to look to, and we can most go out of ourselves when most we look at him. Power.

8473. EXAMPLE, License of. Ernest, Prince of Lunenburg, complained to Luther of the immeasurable drinking there was at court. Luther replied, "That Princes ought to look thereto." "Ah, sir," said the Prince, "We do so ourselves, otherwise it would long since have been done." "When the abbot throws the dice, the whole convent will play."

8474. EXAMPLE, Ministerial. One of my parishioners said to me, "I have something which I wish to say to you; but I am afraid you may be offended." "I answered," says Mr. Scott, "that I could not promise, but I hoped I should not." She then said, "You know A—B—; he has lately appeared attentive to religion, and has spoken to me concerning the sacrament; but last night he, with C—D—, and others, met to keep Christmas; and they played at cards, drank too much, and in the end quarrelled, and raised a sort of riot. And when I remonstrated with him on his conduct, as inconsistent with his professed attention to religion, his answer was, 'There is no harm in cards—Mr. Scott plays at cards.' This smote me to the heart. I saw that if I played at cards, however soberly and quietly, the people would be encouraged by my example to go farther; and if St. Paul would eat no flesh while the world stood, rather than cause his weak brother to offend, it would be inexcusable in me to throw such a stumbling-block in the way of my parishioners, in a matter certainly neither useful nor expedient. So far from being offended at the hint thus given me, I felt very thankful to my faithful monitor, and promised her that she should never have occasion to repeat the admonition. That very evening I related the whole matter to the company, and declared my fixed resolution never to play at cards again. I expected I should be harassed with solicitations, but I was never asked to play afterwards.

Thomas Scott.

8475. EXAMPLE, Motive of. The efficacy of good examples in the formation of public opinion is incalculable. Though men justify their conduct by reasons, and sometimes bring the very rules of virtue to the touchstone of abstraction, yet they principally act from example. Metaphysical reasons have, in reality, as little to do in the formation of the principles of morals, as rules of grammar in the original structure of language, or those of criticism in the formation of orators and poets.

Robert Hall.

8476. EXAMPLE, Noble. Since the worst of times afford imitable examples of virtue; since no deluge of vice is like to be so general but more than eight will escape; eye well those heroes who have held their heads above water, who have touched pitch and not been defiled, and in the common contagion have remained uncorrupted.

Browne.

8477. EXAMPLE, Paternal. A man was walking through the deep snow when he heard the voice of his oldest son saying: "I'll step in father's tracks." He was trying to do it, and two younger brothers were at the same thing. The father went to the house of prayer to seek God that evening, thinking, "If I lead my sons thus, I'll make tracks for heaven."

Sunday-School Times.

8478. EXAMPLE, Power of. In a town of Bavaria there was a little tumble-down church building, where the duke, as often as he came that way, used to go in and pray. If, on coming out of the chapel, he happened to meet any one of the peasants in the field, he loved to converse with them in a friendly way. One day he met an old man with whom he fell into conversation on various things; and, taking a liking to the man, he asked him, in parting, whether he could do anything for him. The peasant replied, "Noble sir, you cannot do anything better for me than what you have done already." "How so?" answered he. "I do not know that I have done anything for you." "But I know it," said the old man; "for how can I ever forget that you saved my son? He traveled so long in the ways of sin that for a long time he would have nothing to do with the church or prayer, and sank every day deeper in wickedness. Some time ago he was here, and saw you, noble sir, enter the chapel. 'I should like to see what he does there,' said the young man scornfully, to himself, and he glided in after you. But when he saw you pray so devoutly, he was so deeply impressed that he also began to pray; and from that moment he became a new man. I thank you for it. And that is why I said you can never do me a greater favor than you have done me already."

Anon.

8479. EXAMPLE, Preaching by. A pious man who lived some six miles from the house of worship, complained to his pastor of the distance he had to go to attend public worship. "Never mind," said the minister, "remember every Sabbath you have the privilege of preaching a sermon six miles long—you preach the gospel to all the residents and people you pass."

8480. EXAMPLE, Silent. St. Claude, a man of eminent piety, was unjustly imprisoned in the Bastille. At the same time there was a man confined of so ferocious and brutal a disposition that no one dared to approach him. He seldom spoke without a volley of oaths and blasphemies, and struck every one who approached him with the utmost violence. Every expedient to humanize this monster had proved in vain, when the governor entreated Claude to undertake the work. His humility would have induced him to decline, but persuasion prevailed. Accordingly, the humble Christian was shut up with this human brute, who exhausted his ferocity in revilings, blows, and yet more savage tokens of the barbarity of his disposition. Whilst this treatment continued, silence, patience, and mildness, were the only reply of the man of God. His prayers achieved the rest. The monster at length looked on the face of his companion, suddenly threw himself at his feet, and embracing them, burst into a flood of tears, entreated his forgiveness, and besought him to give him instructions in the religion which thus influenced his conduct. He became entirely changed; and, even when his liberty was given him, he could scarcely be prevailed on to leave his Christian friend.

Anon.

8481. EXAMPLE, Stimulus of. Nestor's relation of his own achievements inflamed Patroclus and nine others with a vehement desire of single combat; and we know the counsel that brings persuasive deeds as well as words, a lively exemplar, and an immediate familiar incentive, insouls a man with courage—moves, yea, vehemently spurs him up to such a resolution of mind as cannot doubt the possibility and success of the attempt.

Plutarch.

8482. EXAMPLE, Teaching and. It is the duty of every man to take care lest he should hinder the efficacy of his own instructions. When he desires to gain the belief of others, he should show that he believes himself; and when he teaches the fitness of virtue by his reasonings, he should, by his example, prove its possibility: thus much at least may be required of him, that he shall not act worse than others because he writes better, nor imagine that, by the merit of his genius, he may claim indulgence beyond mortals of the lower classes, and be excused for want of prudence or neglect of virtue.

Dr. S. Johnson.

8483. EXAMPLE, Teaching by. The novelist presents us with a scene in a prison, which is likely enough to have its counterpart in real life: "Mr. Eden, the gaol chaplain, had a great collection of photographs. His plan with Carter, a half-witted prisoner, was to tell him, by means of a photograph, some fact or anecdote. First, he would put under his eye a cruel or unjust action. He would point out the signs of suffering in one of the figures. Carter would understand this, because he saw it. Then Mr. Eden would excite his sympathy. 'Poor so-and-so,' he would say. Afterwards he would produce a picture of more moderate injustice, and so raise a shadow of a difficulty, and thus draw upon Carter's understanding as well as his sympathy. Then would come pictures of charity, of benevolence, of other good actions. Thus the chaplain got at this man's little bit of mind through the medium of the senses. Honor to all the great arts! The limit of their beauty and their usefulness has never yet been reached. Painting was the golden key which this thinking man held to the Bramah lock of an imbecile's understanding."

Papers on Preaching.

8484. EXCELLENCE, Cost of. It is certain that if every one could early enough be made to feel how full the world is already of excellence, and how much must be done to produce anything worthy of being placed beside what has already been produced; of a hundred youths who are now poetizing, scarcely one would feel enough courage, perseverance, and talent to work quietly for the attainment of a similar mastery. Many young painters would never have taken their pencils in hand, if they could have felt, known, and understood, early enough, what really produced a master like Raphael.

Goethe.

8485. EXCELLENCE, Human. Parted from God, human excellence is like the fabled flower which, according to the Rabbins, Eve plucked when passing out of Paradise—severed from its native root, it is only the touching memorial of a lost Eden; sad, while charming—beautiful, but dead.

Charles Stanford.

8486. EXCELLENCE, Price of. Excellence is never granted to man, but as the reward of labor. It argues, indeed, no small strength of mind to persevere in the habits of industry, without the pleasure of perceiving those advantages which, like the hands of a clock, whilst they make hourly approaches to their front, yet proceed so slowly as to escape observation.

Sir Joshua Reynolds.

8487. EXCELSIOR, Import of. The individual who wishes to improve himself never finds a halting-place on earth. His career is upward, in one sense, whatever it may appear to be. His very degradations are means of increased ennoblement, because of incessant compurgation and purity. And in one respect the human almost surpasses the angelic lot; because the one, being perfect in its kind, does not, perhaps, admit of progress, and the other does indefinitely. The yearning to fulfill this progressive lot engenders a noble discontent, and that discontent is expressed by the word Excelsior. Observe, it is not Excelsius; it is therefore entirely interior; whereas Excelsius would refer to the circumstances, rather than to him who was in them.

M. G. Keon.

8488. EXCESS, Evils of. Too much noise

deafens us; too much light blinds us; too great a distance or too much of proximity equally prevents us from being able to see; too long and too short a discourse obscures our knowledge of a subject; too much of truth stuns us.

Pascal.

8489. EXCESS, Reaction of. Excess generally causes reaction, and produces a change in the opposite direction, whether it be in the seasons, or in individuals, or in governments.

Plato.

8490. EXCITEMENT, Occasions for. Tell the mother, as she watches the dying agonies of her only babe, to beware of excitement; she has a husband left, and for his sake it behooves her to cling to life, and hope to be happy. Tell the widower, as he tears himself from the coffin of his best earthly treasure, to beware of excitement; his children are spared, and for their sakes he must return to the cares of life again.

Tell the man whose house is burning over his head, to beware of excitement; for calmness and self-possession may facilitate his rescue. But never tell the sinner who bewails his transgressions, who apprehends the terrors of the Lord, who trembles at the thought of judgment to come; who is uncertain whether the next moment of his life will not find him in hell,—never tell that man to beware of excitement: (for what can you set before him to countervail his anxiety?) but caution him against a spirit of slumber; caution him against a return to indifference; tell him that the struggle is for immortality; and that the alternative is death,—certain, remediless, and eternal.

Anon.

8491. EXCUSE, Absurd. One asks, "Was there ever an invalid so senseless as to say, When I am somewhat better, when the fever burns less fierce, I will repair to the hospital or to the physician?" Only sick souls are guilty of this folly.

8492. EXCUSE, False. A young man was brought to the hospital, City Point, shot in the neck and completely paralyzed. I spoke to him of preparation for death. "I might as well own up," he said, "I'm not prepared; I've lived a bad life, and been a great trouble to my mother. I've got no religion, and I don't want any. I won't burn out my candle now, and throw the snuff in God Almighty's face. I'll die as I've lived. It's honestest." I argued with him, plead the promises, entreated him, but all to no purpose. "I deserve no mercy, I don't ask for any. I've never prayed, I'm not going to do so now."

Chas. Cutler.

8493. EXCUSE: No Time for Religion. An earnest minister called on a lady and found her too busy, as she said, to talk with him. He repeated the visits with no better success. At the last call she said, "Oh, be sure and not be long in coming back again, for I do wish to see you." In a few days he called. "I'm sorry," she said, the moment she opened the door, "I have no time to receive you to-day; I've a friend come from London, and I've to go out with him." "Well, you will have time to die, whether you're prepared or not. So you've no time just now?" "No, not to-day." "Well, let me say this to you, in case you and I never meet again, 'Behold, now is the accepted time, now is the day of salvation.'" She thanked him, and he went away. That night she and her brother went to the theatre. She was taken ill while there, went home, grew worse, and was in eternity by five o'clock the next morning. "The thing" said Mr. Paterson, "so impressed me, that I resolved, if God spared me, to labor by his grace more diligently than ever."

8494. EXCUSE, Others' Sins an. A man on entering a stage-coach said, "My head aches dreadfully; I was very drunk last night." A gentleman affecting surprise, replied, "Drunk! sir. What! do you get drunk?" "Yes," said he, "and so does every one at times, I believe. I have no doubt but you do." "No, sir," he replied, "I do not." "What! never?" "No, never; and amongst other reasons I have for it, one is, I never find, being sober, that I have too much sense, and I am loth to lose what little I have."

8495. EXCUSES Always Easy. As a wolf was lapping at the head of a running brook, he spied a stray lamb paddling at some distance down the stream. Having made up his mind to seize her, he bethought himself how he might justify his violence. "Villain!" said he, running up to her, "how dare you muddle the water that I am drinking?" "Indeed," said the lamb humbly, "I do not see how I can disturb the water, since it runs from you to me, not from me to you." "Be that as it may," replied the wolf, "it was but a year ago that you called me many ill names." "Oh, sir!" said the lamb, trembling, "a year ago I was not born." "Well," replied the wolf, "if it was not you, it was your father, and that is all the same; but it is no use trying to argue me out of my supper;" and without another word he fell upon the poor helpless lamb, and tore her to pieces. Æsop.

8496. EXCUSES, Indian. The Catholic missionaries among the Hurons found them ready to receive instruction, assenting to the truth of every doctrine, and they seemed likely to become easy converts. But whenever the matter was brought to a point, and they were urged to accept the faith, they uniformly replied, "It is good for the French, but we are another people, with different customs." The spirit of this excuse was not confined to the red men.

8497. EXCUSES, Lies. I will not go on enumerating the possible and frequent excuses that men and women give—not that I have exhausted them; no. If I had exhausted all this afternoon, you would have as many more manufactured by to-morrow, or even before I got through the sermon. If you drive a man from behind one excuse, he takes immediate refuge behind another. If you drive him from that, he gets behind another like a flash. You cannot exhaust excuses. They are more numerous than the hairs upon your head. I will tell you what you can do with them. You can take them up and bind them in one bundle, and mark it "Lies, lies, lies," in great big letters. God will sweep away those refuges of lies. It is only a question of time. By and by you will be left without an excuse. He that believeth not will be without God, without hope, without excuse. Do not think of giving excuses here. If you have any excuse that you call good, if you have any excuse that you think will stand the light of eternity and of the judgment day, if you think you have any excuse that God will accept, do not give it up for anything I have said. Take it into the grave with you. Let it be buried with you, and when you come before him tell it out. If not, then give your excuses to us here to-day. It is easy to excuse yourself into hell, but you cannot excuse yourself out of it. It is easy to take a seat here, and to make light of everything you hear, and go away laughing and scoffing at the whole thing, but ah! it will be terrible to stand before God without an excuse. Moody.

8498. EXCUSES, Ready. A traveler in Venezuela returning to his lodging drunk, had hard work to find his hammock. He made many efforts to get his boots off, but was too drunk to accomplish it, and crawled into his hammock with them on. He was overheard to soliloquize, "Well, I have traveled all the world over; I lived five years in Cuba, four in Jamaica, five in Brazil; I have traveled through Spain and Portugal, and been in Africa, but I never before was in such an abominable country as this, where a man is obliged to go to bed with his boots on."

8499. EXCUSES, Useless. There was once a master who sent his servant with a letter: "Go," said he, "to such and such a town with it." He started, but he soon came back with the letter and said, "Master, I could not deliver it." "How was that?" said the master. "Sir, there is a deep river, and I cannot get across." Now, that looked very much like an excuse, didn't it, and like a very good excuse too? But the master knew better, and he said, "There was a ferry-boat across—did you call for the ferryman?" "No, sir, I did not." "Very well, then," said he, "the blame lies with you." Now, it is true you cannot save yourselves, most true, but there is One who can. Did you ever call to him to help you? If you did not, then surely the mischief, the fault, the blame, the ruin, must lie at your own door. Did you ever pray? Soul, did you ever cry out for the Ferryman? Did you ever say, when you found you could not get across the river—"Lord Jesus, save or I perish?" Why, if you had ever prayed that from your heart, he would have heard you. "Oh," saith one, "but I do not think he could hear me even if I called." I stood at Bangor, some time ago, and there is a ferry there across to Anglesea. You cannot be heard on the other side of the bank with your simple voice; but there is a speaking trumpet, and if you just speak through that you may say, "Hoy!" and it is heard all across the straits, and the boatman will come and meet you. Well now, prayer is God's great speaking trumpet, and if you come to God in prayer, pleading the name of Jesus, it is certain that he will hear you and deliver you. Away with your excuses, we pray you, away with your excuses, or else your excuses will but make fuel for your burning in hell!

Spurgeon.

8500. EXECUTION, Faulty. A wretched painter showed Apelles a picture, remarking that he had spent but little time upon it. Apelles answered, "If thou hadst not told me so, I see cause enough to believe it was a hasty draught; but I wonder that in that space of time thou hast not painted many more such pictures."

8501. EXERCISE, Importance of. Two friends are in a canoe in the Mozambique channel. A flaw of wind upsets the boat. Before they right her she fills with water, and sinks; and the two men are swimming for their lives. "Ah, well!" says one of them to the other, "it is a long pull to the shore, but the water is warm, and we are strong. We will hold by each other, and all will be well." "No," says his friend. "I have lost my breath already; each wave that strikes us knocks it from my body. If you reach the shore—and God grant you may!—tell my wife I remembered her as I died. Good-by, God bless you!" and he is gone. There is nothing his companion can do for him. For himself, all he can do is to swim, and then float and rest himself, and breathe; and then float again, and then float and rest again—hour after hour, to swim and float, swim and float, with that steady, calm determination that he will go home; that no blinding spray shall stifle him, and no despair weaken him—hour after hour, till at last the palm-trees show distinct upon the shore, and then the tall reeds, and then the figures of animals. Will one never feel bottom? Yes, at last his foot touches the coral, and with that touch he is safe. That story that man told me. Now, what is the difference between those two men? Why does one give up the contest at once, and resign himself to what people call his fate, while the other fights the circumstances for hours, and wins the battle? On shipboard one was as strong as the other. He was as brave. He was as prudent as the other. "What if he was?" you say. Strength and bravery and prudence were all needed in the crisis; but something else was needed also. The man had never trained himself to swim, if knowing a method were of much use, where one has not trained himself to the habit. But that training he had never given. Take that as a precise illustration, where nobody questions the answer, of the difference wrought in two men merely by exercise, or the steadiness of training. In matters like this, of pure bodily exercise, everybody sees and owns its work and its result.

E. E. Hale.

8502. EXERCISE, Power of. Æschylus chanced to be a spectator at the Isthmian games, where some were engaged at a sword play; seeing one of the combatants wounded, and observing that the theatre immediately made a great shouting upon it, he jogged one Ion, who sat next to him, and whispered to him, "Do you see what exercise can do? He that is wounded holds his peace, and the spectators cry out."

8503. EXERTION, Delightful. All exertion is in itself delightful, and active amusements seldom tire us. Helvetius owns that he could hardly listen to a concert for two hours, though he could play on an instrument all day long. The chase, we know, has always been the favorite amusement of kings and nobles. Not only fame and fortune, but pleasure is to be earned.

Abp. Sharp.

8504. EXERTIONS, Demand for. God has created man imperfect, and left him with many wants, as it were to stimulate each to individual exertion, and to make all feel that it is only by united exertions and combined action that these imperfections can be supplied, and these wants satisfied. This pre-supposes self-reliance and confidence in each other. Prince Albert.

8505. EXHORTATION, Appropriate. The profligate Duke of Warton recounted to Swift several extravagances he had run through. Swift observed to him, "You have had your frolics, my lord; let me recommend one more to you. Take a frolic to be virtuous; take my word for it, that one will do you more honor than all the other frolics of your whole life."

8506. EXHORTATION, Tender. An old divine says, "He that will take the bird, must not scare it. A froward, peevish messenger, is no friend to him that sends him. Sinners are not pelted into Christ with stones of hard-knocking language, but wooed into Christ by heart-melting exhortations."

8507. EXISTENCE, Animated. I would rather be a fly than a sublime mountain—than even Ætna.

J. Foster.

8508. EXISTENCE Immeasurable. Existence is not to be measured by mere duration. An oak lives for centuries, generation after generation of mortals the meanwhile passing away; but who would exchange for the life of a plant, though protracted for ages, a single day of the existence of a living, conscious, thinking man?

Caird.

8509. EXPECTATION: Proverb. You talk about your hopes of some coming good: what say the ancients? "Expectation is the midday dream of life."

8510. EXPEDIENCY, Carnal. It should well be considered, how often we find carnal expedients followed with disastrous results, especially in the histories of godly persons. Abraham twice tried to induce Sarah to equivocate. Gen. 12: 10-13; 20: 5; and brought upon himself thereby the rebuke of a heathen king, and might, but for the Lord's intervention, have been involved in serious disaster. Sarah tried to hasten the fulfillment of the promise of a child, by persuading Abraham to take Hagar, Gen. 16: 2. It brought upon her Hagar's contempt, and ultimately led to Hagar's flight, besides bringing trouble between herself and her husband. Rebekah and Jacob, Gen. 27. How cunning was the plot Rebekah laid to obtain the blessing for Jacob, by deceit, to which Jacob consented! Her deceit ended in the hatred of Esau, in Jacob's being an exile for twenty years; and Rebekah never saw her favorite son again, after he left his father's house. Ahab's attempt, by disguising himself, to escape the judgment threatened by Micaiah, only exposed Jehoshaphat's life to danger, and failed to preserve his own, 1 Kings 22: 30-37. Jeroboam. God promised, when He raised Jeroboam to the throne, to make his throne as secure as David's, on condition of Jeroboam's obedience, 1 Kings 11: 38. But Jeroboam, not trusting God, thought he would secure it better by his own crafty policy. Thus "wise to do evil, but to do good having no knowledge," he and his family were soon cut off, 1 Kings 15: 29, and his name branded with perpetual infamy, 2 Kings 10: 31; 13: 6; 14: 24; 17: 22. Jehoshaphat. By marrying his son Jehoram to Athaliah, daughter of Ahab, it seems likely Jehoshaphat hoped to unite the two kingdoms of Israel and Judah, or, at least, make a durable peace. The expedient failed, 2 Kings 8: 16-18. Jezebel's plot to secure Naboth's vineyard by his death, brought the just retribution of her own death, 1 Kings 21: 23; 2 Kings 9: 36. Hezekiah's paying a bribe to the king of Assyria only impoverished himself, and was of no avail, 2 Kings 18: 14-17. Caiaphas, in condemning our Lord, sacrificed justice to expediency. His hope was, by this stroke of policy, to turn aside the ruin of his country by the Romans, John 11: 49, 50. The result was to bring the very ruin he sought to avert. Pilate, by scourging Christ, hoped to pacify the Jews, and wash his hands from the blood of an innocent man, John 19: 1. Bowes.

8511. EXPEDIENCY, Political. "These, fellow citizens, are my sentiments," said a western candidate for office, "as I'm a politician and an honest man! But if they do not suit you, fellow citizens, I can change them till they do."

8512. EXPEDIENCY, Tyranny of. It is easy to see how this moral discipline must fare under the doctrine of expediency—a doctrine which teaches man to be looking continually abroad—a doctrine which not only justifies but enjoins a distrust of the suggestions of the inward monitor; which will not permit the best feelings of the heart, its clearest dictates, its finest emotions, to have the smallest influence over the conduct; and, instead of yielding any thing to their direction, cites them at its bar. Robert Hall.

8513. EXPERIENCE, The Believer's. It is expressed in various ways: Trying.—The Lord Jesus is the foundation stone, precious and "tried"—tried by the experience of the saints of all ages, Isa. 28: 16. "The words of the Lord are pure words," like "silver tried" in the crucible, "purified seven times," Ps. 12: 6. The gospel of God's grace is like "gold tried in the fire," Rev. 3: 18. The saints find God's promises always true, and God's judgments always right. Proving, by personal realization and heart experiences, Eccles. 7: 23. Seeing—a step beyond "the hearing of the ear," Job. 42: 5. Tasting—the relish and sweet savor of spiritual blessings, Ps. 34: 8. Exercised in discerning, Heb. 5: 4; 12: 11. Learning—Phil. 4: 11, "I have learned" (literally, being initiated, as certain persons were, anciently, into the secrets of the heathen mysteries). Knowing—"I know"—"we know," etc., the emphatic utterance of assured belief, which occurs frequently, Job. 19: 25. The Book of Psalms owes to this much of its spiritual value. It is a record of the heart experiences of many tried saints, who themselves learnt wisdom from their deep trials of faith and patience. Mark, on reading the Psalms, how at times the psalmists pass from what the Lord does for men in general, to what he has done for them personally, See Ps. 4: 3.—"The Lord hath set apart the godly for himself: the Lord will hear when I call unto him." Ps. 37.—A psalm of experience—the testimony of an old man's faith. John 4: 39-42.—Samaritan testimony. "Come—see," was the woman's testimony, when she had herself seen and heard. "Now we believe," was the neighbors' testimony, on the same ground of their own experience. Rom. 5: 4.—"Patience worketh experience;" rather, the grateful approval of our faith and trust. Heb. 5: 13.—"Unskillful"—"hath no experience," (Marg.) There is generally a close connexion between these two; where there is little or no experience, we look in vain for much skillfulness in the word of righteousness. St. Paul's frequent references to his conversion and previous life are a standing testimony to the depth of his convictions; whilst the tone and style of his epistles show how deeply he had learnt by experience in himself to comfort and counsel others, 2 Cor. 1: 3-6; Acts 22: 1-21; 26: 9-23; 1 Cor. 15: 8, 9; Gal. 1: 13-24; Phil. 3: 4-11; 1 Tim. 1: 2-16. St. Peter's Epistles derive an additional force and beauty if received as the remembrance of Peter's history. 2 Pet. 2: 1, and 3: 17. Bowes.

8514. EXPERIENCE, Christian. Every man that goes to heaven by Christ will have a Christian experience; but I know some people who seem to me to be trusting in their experience. If I ask a man "What is the ground of your faith?" and he says, "I have felt this, and felt that;" then I say that ground of his faith is a rotten one; and he that rests on his feelings will be as much deceived as he that rests on his works. "Not of a man, neither by man," is true in this case. Because I have had an experience of my deep depravity, and been shaken over hell's mouth, am I to trust in this to be saved by it? No, no, beloved. The blood saves—not my sense of guilt; not my depravity; nor all my knowledge and understanding of it—but the blood, the blood alone. And so I may have had high and wrapt communion, and deep fellowship with Christ; but if I rest in my communion, I am as much deceived as he that rests on the Romish priests—for there is nothing in anything I can do, or be, or ever could be, that can save me; it is all in Christ from first to last; and, putting his pierced hand on all your doing, believing, seeing, feeling, experiences, he covers them all up, and says, "I am the way," and none of these. I like the way Wilcox puts this in his "Precious Drop of Honey." "All that is of nature's spinning," says he, "must be unraveled," and I like to know also, that even if I put the Spirit's work in the place of Christ, I make that work to be an anti-Christ.

Spurgeon.

8515. EXPERIENCE, Comparing. Mr. Turner, a missionary, related his experience of conversion. Joel Bulu, a South Sea Island pagan, heard it, and says, "My heart burned within me while I listened to his word; for in speaking of himself he told all I had felt, and I said to myself, 'We are like two canoes, sailing bow and bow, neither being swifter nor slower than the other.' Thus it was with me when he told of his repentance; but when he went on to speak of his faith in Christ, the forgiveness of his sins, and the peace and joy which he found in believing, then said I, 'My mast is broken, my sail is blown away; he is gone clean out of my sight, and I am left here drifting helplessly over the waves.' But while I listened eagerly to his words, telling of the love of Christ to him, my eyes were opened. I saw the way, and I, even I, also believed and lived. I was like a man fleeing for his life from an enemy behind him, and groping along the wall of a house in the dark to find the door, that he may enter in and escape, when lo! a door is suddenly opened before his face, and straightway, with one bound, he leaps within. Thus it was with me as I listened to the words of Mr. Turner: my heart was full of joy and love." Bulu became a very useful helper to the missionary.

8516. EXPERIENCE, Dearness of. Experience keeps a dear school, but fools will learn in no other, and scarcely in that; for it is true, we may give advice, but we cannot give conduct. Remember this: They that will not be counseled cannot be helped. If you do not hear reason, she will rap your knuckles. Franklin.

8517. EXPERIENCE, Deep. Shallow waters are easily muddled. After a night of storm the waters of the bay, along the beach, stirred by the winds, are foul and black with the mire and dirt. But look beyond, out into the deep water, how blue and clear it is! The white caps on the surface show the violence of the wind, but the water is too deep for the storms that sweep its surface to stir up the earth at the bottom. So is Christian experience. A shallow experience is easily disturbed; the merest trifles becloud and darken the soul whose piety is superficial; while the most furious storm of life fails to darken or disturb the soul which has attained a deep experience of the things of God. The agitation may produce a sparkle on the surface, but in the calm depths of such a spirit reigns eternal tranquility, the peace of God that passeth all understanding.

Beecher.

8518. EXPERIENCE, Defective. We find persons acquainted with the fundamental doctrines of religion, and we are glad. But a year afterwards, we converse with them again, and find them just the same. Two years elapse, and we come into contact with them again, but still no progress can be perceived, till at length the sight of them reminds us of a piece of wood-work carved in the form of a tree, rather than a living production of nature; for there are no fresh shoots, nor any new foliage to be seen: on the contrary, the very same modes of speech, the same views and sentiments upon every point, and the same limited sphere of spiritual conception; no enlarged expansion of the inward horizon; not a single addition to the treasury of Christian knowledge.

Salter.

8519. EXPERIENCE, Dependence on. He hazardeth much who depends for his learning on experience. An unhappy master, he that is only made wise by many shipwrecks; a miserable merchant, that is neither rich nor wise till he has been bankrupt. By experience we find out a short way by a long wandering. Ascham.

8520. EXPERIENCE, Depth of. In my house there is a well of extraordinary depth, which reminds me of something better than the boasted deep experience of certain censorious professors, who teach that to feel sin within is the main thing, but to be delivered from it of small consequence. When this well was commenced, the owner of the place resolved to have water, cost what it might. The well-sinkers dug through mud, and clay, and stone, but found no water; here was the deep experience of the corruptionist, all earth and no living spring, the filth revealed but not removed, the leper discovered but not healed. Another hundred feet of hard digging deep in the dark, but no water—still deeper experience. Then a third hundred feet, and still dirt, but no crystal—the very finest grade of your deeply experimental professor, who ridicules the joys of faith, as being of the flesh and presumptuous. Still on, on, on went the workers, till one day leaving their tools to go to dinner, upon their return they found that the water was rising fast, and their tools were drowned. Be this last my experience—to go so deep as to reach the springs of everlasting love, and find all my poor doings and efforts totally submerged, because the blessed fountains of grace have broken in upon me, covering all the mire, and rock, and earth, of my poor, naturally evil heart.

Spurgeon.

8521. EXPERIENCE, Disregarding. In the early days of American history, the Indians mounted upon swift horses, and, armed with bows and arrows, hunted the buffalo. They sought to secure their prey by driving them upon some high bluff, having a steep precipice on one side. Cutting off their retreat in the rear, and sending panic among the animals by hot pursuit and wild yells, they drove their victims to leap the cliff to their own destruction. Man, the reasoning animal, lured on by his own appetites, passions, and conceits, rushes through all barriers, disregards all experience, closes his ears to all warnings, and leaps the cliff of eternal ruin. It is the common course of folly. Every year, and in every community, this case s paralleled and repeated. "A prudent man foreseeth the evil, and hideth himself; but the simple pass on and are punished." (Prov. 22: 3.)

8522. EXPERIENCE of Faith. Orthodoxy can be learned from others; living faith must be a matter of personal experience. The Lord sent out his disciples, saying, "Ye shall testify of me, because ye have been with me from the beginning." He only is a witness who speaks of what he has seen with his own eyes, heard with his own ears, and handled with his own hands. Orthodoxy is merely another form of rationalism, if it be learned from without.

Buchsel.

8523. EXPERIENCE, Judging. Rev. John Wesley was asked by a young gentleman "if he had seen Whitefield's Journals." He replied he had. "And what do you think of them?" said he; "Don't you think they are cant, enthusiasm from end to end? I think so." Wesley inquired, "Why do you think so?" He replied, "Why, he talks so much of joy and stuff, and inward feelings. As I hope to be saved, I cannot tell what to make of it." Wesley asked, "Did you ever feel the love of God in your heart? If not, how should you tell what to make of it? Whatever is spoken of the religion of the heart, and of the inward workings of the Spirit of God, must appear enthusiasm to those who have not felt them; that is, if they take upon them to judge of the things of which they own they know nothing."

8524. EXPERIENCE, New Light in. A soldier after evening prayers came and asked the chaplain to pray with him. He said, "I have navigated every channel to perdition, but now I want to lead a different life." He was pointed to Jesus. He looked and lived. "Oh," said he, the next day, "how easy it is to be a Christian! I did not suppose it was so easy. I thought it was a long and very troublesome way; I just asked with all my heart, and I hadn't to wait for the answer; I just prayed to God, and light came in at once. How glorious everything is! Even this Virginia mud now seems to have become beautiful."

8525. EXPERIENCE, Ordeal of. A skeptical young man having heard several relations of religious experience in which a great change of disposition and enjoyment was affirmed, resolved to test it for himself. Without the sense of conviction for sin, he formed a plan of duty, viz., to forsake all sin, and to do every duty as long as life lasted, and announced his decision to his companions. He kept his purpose for some weeks without any change of feeling. He looked for a burden of conviction, but instead lost all feeling. He went on as usual in the way of Christian duty, when at length joy filled his soul. A great transformation had come over him. He felt it in every faculty, and knew the truth of religion to his entire satisfaction.

8526. EXPERIENCE of Solomon. Solomon went through a peculiar experience of his own, and God, who in nature gives sweet fruit to men through the root sap of a sour crab, when a new nature has been engrafted on the upper stem, did not disdain to bring forth fruits of righteousness through those parts of the king's experience that cleaved most closely to the dust. None of all the prophets could have written the Proverbs or the Preacher; for God is not wont, even in his miraculous interpositions, to make a fig-tree bear olive-berries, or a vine figs: every creature acts after its kind. When Solomon delineated the eager efforts of men in search of happiness, and the disappointment which ensued, he could say, like Bunyan, of that fierce and fruitless war, "I was there." The heights of human prosperity he had reached: the paths of human learning he had trodden, further than any of his day; the pleasures of wealth and power and pomp he had tasted, in all their variety. No spring of earthly delight could be named, of whose waters he had not deeply drunk. This is the man whom God hath chosen as the schoolmaster to teach us the vanity of the world when it is made the portion of the soul, and he hath done all things well. The man who has drained the cup of pleasure can best tell the taste of its dregs. Arnot.

8527. EXPERIENCE, Thankful. I shall go to the gates of heaven as a poor, wretched, ruined sinner saved by grace. But when I begin to tell my tale of his wondrous love to me, methinks all the harps of heaven will be silent, and the angels, still as statues, will listen to my ascriptions. Dr. Robert Simpson.

8528. EXTORTION, Reward of. An old New York merchant was noted for demanding the utmost farthing. He had conspicuously posted in sight of all, "No compromise." If a bankrupt debtor approached him and said, "How much will you accept and cancel my debt?" he would reply, "One hundred cents on the dollar, sir." Many who knew of his extortions, prophesied his downfall. At length retribution overtook him. His overthrow was sudden, complete and irretrievable.

8529. EXTRAVAGANCE, Beginning of. A young husband, whose business speculations were unsuccessful, said: "My wife's silver tea-set, the bridal gift of a rich uncle, doomed me to financial ruin. It involved a hundred unexpected expenses, which, in trying to meet, have made me the bankrupt that I am." His is the experience of many others, who, less wise, do not know what is the goblin of the house, working its destruction. A sagacious father of great wealth exceedingly mortified his daughter by ordering to be printed on her wedding cards, "No presents, except those adapted to an income of $1,000." Said he, "You must not expect to begin life in the style I am able, by many years of labor, to indulge; and I know nothing which will tempt you to try, more than the well-intentioned but pernicious gifts of rich friends." Such advice is timely. If other parents would follow the same plan, many young men would be spared years of incessant toil and anxiety; they would not find themselves on the downward road because their wives had worn all of their salary, or expended it on the appointment of the house.

The fate of the poor man who found a linchpin and felt obliged to make a carriage to fit it, is the fate of the husband who finds his bride in possession of gold and silver valuables, and no large income to support the owner's gold and silver style. Anon.

8530. EXTRAVAGANCE: Brevities. The injury of prodigality leads to this, that he that will not economize will have to agonize.—Confucius.—He that is extravagant will quickly become poor; and poverty will enforce dependence and invite corruption.—Dr. Johnson.

—A miser grows rich by seeming poor; an extravagant man grows poor by seeming rich.—Shenstone.—An extravagant man, who has nothing else to recommend him but a false generosity, is often more beloved than a person of a much more finished character, who is defective in this particular. Addison.

8531. EXTRAVAGANCE, Fruits of. Extravagance does not pay. A piece of lace, fine as film and costly as diamonds, was offered for sale lately in Europe. Queens declined to purchase at the enormous price. The wives of great bankers passed by on the other side. An American lady heard of it and sent a check for the amount. This was a year or so ago. Last week the estate of the husband of this American lady passed into the hands of trustees, and some savings banks, with moneys of the poor and the industrious in their possession, were closed up. The moral every one may draw. Presbyterian.

8532. EXTREMITY, Deliverance in. Abraham.—God spared Abraham from actually offering up his treasured child; but to what an extremity was he first brought. The knife was uplifted, and one moment more would have been too late! But that moment was enough! Gen. 22: 10-12; Rom. 4: 18. Israel.—How often were they delivered in times of extremity? In Egypt, when Pharaoh's cruel edict against the male children was well-nigh executed; when they were oppressed and crushed to the lowest point before they left the house of bondage. In the wilderness, when at times they suffered from thirst or other trials; when they were bitten by fiery serpents; smitten by the plague; it was generally in the extremity of distress that deliverance came; frequently it was not till then that they cried to the Lord. See Ps. 78: 34; 107: 6, 13, 19, 28. In Canaan, many times, as under Hezekiah, when the Lord interposed in the hour of danger, Isa. 37: 36. In Babylon.—The very last year of the predicted seventy came before any signs of deliverance appeared, Dan. 9: 1, 2; and meantime the crafty design of Haman had almost extirpated the whole nation. The gallows was erected for pious Mordecai before the Lord interposed to break the snare. Christ often saved when all other means failed. Luke 8: 43-50; 7: 12-15; Matt. 14: 25 Bowes.

8533. EYE, Chamber of the. The eye-chamber is small; but it is large enough. A single tent sufficed to lodge Napoleon; and Nelson guided the fleets of England from one little cabin. And so it is with the eye; it is set apart for the reception of one guest, whose name is Light, but also Legion; and as the privileged entrant counsels, the great arms and limbs of the body are set in motion. G. Wilson.

8534. EYE, Education of the. The eye was intended by its Maker to be educated, and to be educated slowly; but if educated fully, its powers are almost boundless. It is assuredly then a thing to be profoundly regretted, that not one man in a thousand develops the hidden capacities of his organ of vision, either as regards its utilitarian or its æsthetic applications. The great majority of mankind do not and cannot see one fraction of what they were intended to see. The proverb, that "None are so blind as those who will not see," is as true of physical as of moral vision. By neglect and carelessness we have made ourselves unable to discern hundreds of things which are before us to be seen. Thomas Carlyle has summed up this in one pregnant sentence—"The eye sees what it brings the power to see." How true this is! The sailor on the lookout can see a ship where the landsman can see nothing; the Esquimaux can discover a white fox amid the white snow; the American backwoodsman will fire a rifle-ball so as to strike a nut out of the mouth of a squirrel without hurting it; the Red Indian boys hold their hands up as marks to each other, certain that the unerring arrow will be shot between the spread-out fingers; the astronomer can see a star in the sky, where to others the blue expanse is unbroken; the shepherd can distinguish the face of every sheep in the flock; the mosaic worker can detect distinctions of color, where others see none; and multitudes of additional examples might be given of what education does for the eye. It is not to be denied, that some eyes can be educated to a much greater extent than others; that, however, can be no excuse for neglecting to educate the eye. The worse it is, the more it needs education; the better it is, the more it will repay it.

G. Wilson.
8535. EYE, The Jaundiced. It may be said, that objects take a color from the eyes that look at them. That is true. The very sun, as well as sky, and sea, and mountains, appear yellow to the jaundiced eye; the brightest prospect wears an air of gloom to a gloomy mind; a sunny temper gilds the edges of life's blackest cloud, and flings a path of light across its stormy sea; contentment sits down to a crust of bread and a cup of water, and gives God thanks; and the plainest face looks beautiful in the eyes of fond affection.

Dr. Guthrie.
8536. EYES, Ignorant. It is said that a countryman, who noticed that old people when they wanted to read put on a pair of spectacles, went into the city to a spectacle-maker to buy a pair. The spectacle-maker put a pair on the man's nose and gave him a book, which he took and looked at, but in a moment said: "These spectacles are not good." The dealer then put upon his nose the best glasses he had in the shop, but the countryman, after trying them, declared that they were no better than the others. At last the spectacle-maker said to him: "Friend, perhaps you don't know how to read." "Even so," said the countryman. "If I knew how to read without glasses, I shouldn't want to buy a pair to help me!"

8537. EYES, Importance of the. What is the world, says one, without the sun but a dark melancholy dungeon? What is a man without eyes, but monstrous and deformed. The two eyes are two luminaries, that God hath set up in the microcosm, man's little world. When God would express his tender love unto his people, he calls them the apple of his eye. "He that toucheth you, toucheth the apple of his eye." And the like phrase St. Paul makes use of, when he speaks of the love of the Galatians unto himself: "I bear you record, that if it had been possible, ye would have plucked out your eyes, and have given them to me." The Emperor Adrian with an arrow, by accident, put out one of his servant's eyes; he commanded him to be brought to him, and bade him ask what he would that he might make him amends. The poor man was silent; he pressed him again, when he said he would ask nothing, but he wished he had the eye which he had lost; intimating that an emperor was not able to make satisfaction for the loss of an eye. So the light of divine truth is infinitely more valuable than all other blessings. If we come short of this, there can be no substitute found. If the soul should be lost, the whole world can afford us no relief. The Latin verses Adrian addressed to his soul, and translated by Pope ("Vital spark," etc.), are well known.

Buck.

8538. EYES, Mechanism of the. The eye infinitely surpasses all the works of the industry of man. Its formation is the most astonishing thing the human understanding has been able to acquire a perfect knowledge of. The most skillful artist could imagine no machine of that kind which would not be much inferior to what we observe in the eye. Whatever sagacity or industry he might have, he could execute nothing which would not have the imperfections necessarily belonging to all the works of man. We cannot, it is true, perceive clearly the whole art of Divine Wisdom in the formation of this fine organ; but the little we do know is sufficient to convince us of the infinite knowledge, goodness, and power of our Creator. The most essential point is for us to make use of this knowledge, weak as it is, to magnify the name of the Most High. In the first place, the disposition of the external parts of the eye is admirable. With what intrenchment, what defence, the Creator has provided our eyes! They are placed in the head at a certain depth, and surrounded with hard and solid bones, that they may not easily be hurt. The eye-brows contribute also very much to the safety and preservation of this organ. Those hairs which form an arch over the eyes prevent drops of sweat, dust, or such things, falling from the forehead into them. The eye-lids are another security; and also, by closing in our sleep, they prevent the light from disturbing our rest.

The eye-lashes still add to the perfection of the eyes. They save us from a too strong light which might offend us; and they guard us from the smallest dust, which might otherwise hurt the sight. The internal make of the eye is still more admirable. The whole eye is composed of coats, of humors, of muscles and veins. The tunica, or exterior membrane, which is called cornea, is transparent, and so hard, that it can resist the roughest touch. Behind that there is another within which they call uvea, and which is circular and colored. In the middle of it there is an opening, which is called the pupil, and which appears black. Behind this opening is the crystal, which is very perfectly transparent, of a lenticular figure, and composed of several little flakes, very thin, and arranged one over another. Underneath the crystal there is a moist and transparent substance, which they call the glassy humor, because it resembles melted glass. The cavity, or the hinder chamber, between the cornea and crystal, contains a moist humor, and liquid as water, for that reason called the watery humor. It can recruit itself when it has run out from a wound of the cornea. Six muscles, admirably well placed, move the eye on all sides, raise it, lower it, turn it to the right or left, obliquely, or round about, as occasion requires. What is the most admirable is the retina, a membrane which lines the inside bottom of the eye. It is nothing but a web of little fibres extremely fine, fastened to a nerve or sinew, which comes from the brain, and is called the optic nerve. It is in the retina that the vision is formed, because the objects paint themselves at the bottom of the eye on that tunica. And, though the images of exterior objects are painted upside down on the retina, they are still seen in their true position. Now, in order to form an idea of the extreme minuteness of this picture, we need only consider, that the space of half a mile—that is to say, of more than eleven hundred yards—when it is represented in the bottom of the eye, makes but the tenth part of an inch.

Sturm.

8539. EYES, Power of the. Martin Luther was noted for his piercing eyes. A ruffian called upon him under pretence of a private conference, but with the real purpose of assassinating him. He was so confounded by the power of Luther's eyes that he left him unhurt. It is said that there were in Scythia women having two sights in each eye, and that they killed by their look whoever they looked upon when they were thoroughly angry.

8540. EYES, The Use of the. These are the windows which God hath placed in the top of the building, that man from thence may contemplate God's works, and take a prospect of heaven, the place of our eternal residence.

Manton.

8541. EZEKIEL, Portrait of. Ezekiel was a priest as well as a prophet, and alludes more frequently than any of the prophets to the ceremonial institutes of the temple. He was every inch a Jew; and none of the prophets possessed more attachment to their country, more zeal for their law, and more hatred to its foes. We know little of his history; but we cannot check our fancy, as she seeks to represent to us the face and figure of this our favorite prophet. We see him young, slender, long-locked, stooping, as if under the burden of the Lord—with a visible fire in his eye and cheek, and an invisible fire about his motions and gestures, earnest purpose pursuing him like a ghost, a wild beauty hanging around him, like the silver on the blue cones of the pine, and the air of early death adding a supernatural age and dignity to his youthful aspect. We see him as he moved through the land, followed by looks of admiration, wonder, and fear; and, like the hero of "Excelsior," untouched by the love of maidens, unterrified by the counsel of elders, undismayed by danger or by death, climbing straight to his object. Such a being was Ezekiel—among men, but not of them—detained in the company of flesh, his feet on earth, his soul floating amid the cherubim. G. Giffillan.

8542. FABLE, Influence of. Men are the subjects of it. Human actions, projects, thoughts, follies, and virtues, are delineated under the veil and emblems of animals endowed with the faculties of speech and reason. Thus human motives are dissected, human infirmities exposed, and human conduct described, in a method recommending itself to the conscience more forcibly than would the adoption of any definite reproof or any direct condemnation, and thereby saving the self-love of those to whom the counsel conveyed is applicable.

G. H. Townshend.

8543. FABLES, Advantage of. Among all the different ways of giving counsel, I think the finest, and that which pleases the most universally, is fable, in whatsoever shape it appears. If we consider this way of instructing or giving advice, it excels all others, because it is the least shocking, and the least subject to exceptions. This will appear to us if we reflect, in the first place, that upon the reading of a fable we are made to believe we advise ourselves. We peruse the author for the sake of the story, and consider the precepts rather as our own conclusions than his instructions. The moral insinuates itself imperceptibly; we are taught by surprise, and become wiser and better unawares. In short, by this method a man is so far overreached as to think he is directing himself, while he is following the dictates of another, and consequently is not sensible of that which is the most unpleasing circumstance in advice.

Addison.

8544. FABLES, Popularity of. As fables took their birth in the very infancy of learning, they never flourished more than when learning was at its greatest height. To justify this assertion, I shall put my reader in mind of Horace, the greatest wit and critic in the Augustan age, and of Boileau, the most correct poet among the moderns; not to mention La Fontaine, who by this way of writing is come more into vogue than any other author of our times.

Addison.

8545. FABLES, Teaching by. I have been all ways wonderfully delighted with fables, allegories, and the like inventions, which the politest and the best instructors of mankind have always made use of. They take off from the severity of instruction, and enforce it at the same time that they conceal it. Addison.

8546. FACETIOUSNESS, Diversion of. Facetiousness is not unseemly when it serves the purposes of wholesome diversion or pleasant conversation; nor is it contrary to the spirit and genius of Christianity, if it be kept within the bounds of prudence and charity. Wilson.

8547. FACTS, Corruption of. Every day of my life makes me feel more and more how seldom a fact is accurately stated; how almost invariably when a story has passed through the mind of a third person it becomes, so far as regards the impression that it makes in further repetitions, little better than a falsehood; and this, too, though the narrator be the most truth-seeking person in existence.

Hawthorne.

8548. FACTS Mental Food. Facts are to the mind the same thing as food to the body. On the due digestion of facts depends the strength and wisdom of the one, just as vigor and health depend on the other. The wisest in council, the ablest in debate, and the most agreeable companion in the commerce of human life, is that man who has assimilated to his understanding the greatest number of facts.

Burke.

8549. FACULTIES, Development of the. We are born with faculties and powers capable almost of anything—such at least as would carry us further than can easily be imagined; but it is only the exercise of those powers which gives us ability and skill in anything, and leads us towards perfection.

Locke.

8550. FAILURE, Benefits from. Albeit failure in any cause produces a correspondent misery in the soul, yet it is, in a sense, the highway to success, inasmuch as every discovery of what is false leads us to seek earnestly after what is true, and every fresh experience points out some form of error which we shall afterward carefully eschew.

Keats.

8551. FAILURE, Philosophic Endurance of. A little child was chasing a butterfly. Whenever it alighted near her she tried to seize it with her tiny hand, but it always arose triumphantly and fluttered over her head as if to mock her feeble effort. Wearied at last, she threw herself upon the ground, and with a look of sweet resignation, exclaimed: "Well, no matter; it might have stung me."

8552. FAILURE, Substitute for. If you have failed for this life, do not fail for the other, too. There is very much that may yet be done, even in the afternoon and twilight of men's lives, if they are hopeful and active. When one of my Norway spruces died from the rude handling of last winter, instead of rooting it up and throwing it away, I let the ampelopsis take possession of it, and it grew up rapidly through all the branches of the tree, and covered its top with leaves. And in the autumn, these leaves, which had been green before, were all changed to a brilliant crimson; and the tree in its own life was not half so beautiful as it was when covered by this vine, clad with all the colors of the setting sun. Are you like an old tree that is dead, and has dropped all its foliage, and stands with its trunk and branches bare? Let faith and love cover you over, and you will be more comely and more useful standing clothed in such garniture than you were clad in all your former strength. Be patient, old man. Be patient, mother. Be patient, widow. Be patient, you that are impoverished. Be patient, men that are scarcely thought of, and are treading lower and lower. God thinks of you.

Beecher.

8553. FAILURE, Useful. It is far from being true, in the progress of knowledge, that after every failure we must recommence from the beginning. Every failure is a step to success; every detection of what is false directs us towards what is true; every trial exhausts some tempting form of error. Not only so; but scarcely any attempt is entirely a failure.

Whewell.

8554. FAITH, Absence of. When men cease to be faithful to their God, he who expects to find them so to each other, will be much disappointed. The primitive sincerity will accompany the primitive piety in their flight from the earth, and then interest will succeed conscience in the regulation of human conduct, till one man cannot trust another further than he holds him by that tie; hence, by the way, it is, that although many are infidels themselves, yet few choose to have their families and dependents such; as judging—and rightly judging—that true Christians are the only persons to be depended on for the exact discharge of their social duties.

Bishop Horne.

8555. FAITH, Aid to. Rev. Newman Hall aided a timid young disciple, who was a telegraph operator, by the following: "Suppose a man wrote a message, and having asked if it was all right, he went away, perfectly satisfied. Suppose there also came to your office an old lady, who never before had sent a telegram, and was full of doubts and fears about everything. She wrote her message, and said, 'Are you sure it will go?'—'O yes.' 'How long will it take?' 'Not more than an hour.' 'What, go two hundred miles in an hour? Are you sure?' 'Quite sure.' 'But will it go just as I send it?' 'Yes.' 'Are you sure they'll understand it.' 'Quite sure.' After many such questions she went away; and again came back to ask. Now, would a message be any slower in going, and would it be delivered with less accuracy, than the message of the man, who had no fear at all?"

kept apart; but, if I attempt nicely to reconcile them, it is ten to one if I do not begin to bungle.

Salter.

8557. FAITH, Answer to. A Christian friend came one day to Rev. Mr. Henke, who unhesitatingly invited him to dine with him, although he knew not what he could set before him. When the bell rang at noon, the servant passed through the room with an anxious countenance, in order unobservedly to beckon her master out. Henke, however, was not aware of her meaning, and only reminded her, at last, that it was time to lay the cloth. The servant was perplexed, and requested her master to step out to her for a minute. "Sir," she began in a mournful voice, "you wish me to lay the cloth; but don't you know that we have scarcely a piece of dry bread in the house, and you sent your last penny to a sick person this very day?" "Ah!" answered Henke with a smile, "is that all you have to say to me? Do but lay the cloth as usual; it will be time enough for the meat, when we sit down to table." The maid, not a little astonished, did as she was told. "Let us take our seats," said the friendly host, with a cheerful countenance. They sat down to the empty table, and the worthy childlike man offered up a prayer. On his saying "Amen!" the door-bell rang and there was a basket with abundance of food, which a neighbor had felt constrained to send him. Calmly, as if nothing particular had happened, Henke ordered all the dishes to be filled; and then looking smilingly at the astonished servant, he said: "Well, have you still anything to object to our kind entertainer?" These are valuable facts; but such things cannot be imitated. It is certainly easy to order the cloth to be laid; but nothing is accomplished by that. However, if you possess anything of Henke's faith, then do not hesitate to order the cloth to be laid. A Royal Host will provide the feast. Krummacher.

8558. FAITH, Attendants of. Faith is a noble duchess; she ever hath her gentleman usher going before her, the confessing of sins; she hath a train after her, the fruits of good works, the walking in the commandments of God. He that believeth will not be idle; he will walk, he will do his business. Have ever the gentleman usher with you. So if you will try Faith, remember this rule, consider whether the train is waiting upon her. Latimer.

8559. FAITH, Beautiful. A poor family in great need were being relieved by some Christian ladies; among other necessities sent them was a large basket filled with children's clothing. Little Ettie, a bright, curly-haired child of four years, stood looking on, asking questions, and wondering, "Who could be so good?" and "Who sent them, mamma?" till her mother replied, through her tears, "The Lord sent them, my dear. We must thank the Lord for all things." After the last garment was handed out, and she saw there was nothing suitable for her little baby-brother, she looked up sorrowfully to her mamma, and said, "I des de Lord fordote ee had a itty baby." So, going up to him, she placed her arm around his little neck, and kissed him, saying, "Don't feel bad, Dordy de Lord will ememy oo some time." Not many days after this there was a parcel sent in, directed "To Baby B——." No sooner was it read than the little one clapped her hands, and shouted, "I knew de Lord ood tend baby tunfin pretty too!" With impatience she waited the undoing of the bundle, and the first thing that she spied was a soft, white flannel blanket, which she quickly caught, and folded around him; then, taking the little dresses and other articles as fast as she could get them, laid them one by one in his lap. Then, with more than childish reverence, she said, "Now ess all fank de Lord; tause Dordy tant peak." Turning to the little fellow, she added, "Oo tut up oo eyes, baby." Then, "Don't ty, mamma. Dod ill tate dood tare of baby; I know he 'ill." Christian Era.

8560. FAITH, Biblical. The Greek word for faith is derived from the verb meaning to persuade; passive, to be persuaded—to believe. It is called a shield, Eph. 6: 16; a breastplate, 1 Thess. 5: 8; a grain of mustard seed, Matt. 17: 20; one of the smallest of seeds, but containing the germ of a full-sized tree, see Matt. 13: 32. The true nature and office of faith are clearly illustrated by the many expressions which are used as synonyms. Faith is repeatedly spoken of as believing, especially by St. John, in whose gospel it occurs about eighty times; as receiving testimony—being persuaded—fully persuaded—seeing—looking—coming—apprehending—comprehending—taking hold—embracing—feeding—resting—trusting.—See Conc. under these and similar words. Heb. 11: 1—one of the few definitions given in Scripture—"Now faith is the confidence of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen." (Alford.) "The confident expectation—the powerful conviction." (Dodridge.) The Greek word for "substance" properly means a foundation—a prop on which something can stand and be supported. Rom. 10: 10.—Faith is the belief of "the heart." Matt. 16: 8; Mark 8: 17.—Faith is the trust of the heart, more than the mere intellectual apprehension. Bowes.

8561. FAITH, Calmness of. An old divine says, "Faith may live in a storm, but it will not suffer a storm to live in it. As faith rises, so the blustering wind of discontented troublesome thoughts goes down. In the same proportion that there is faith in the heart, there is peace also: they are joined together. 'In returning and rest shall ye be saved; in quietness and confidence shall be your strength.'"

8562. FAITH, Chemistry of. It is the chemistry of faith (let me use that word) to turn all things into good and precious ore. It is Abraham's country, in a strange land; Jacob's wages, when Laban defrauded him; Moses' honor, when he refused to be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter; Rahab's security, when all Jericho besides did perish; David's rescue, when there was but a step between him and death: the power of the apostles, to be able to cast out devils: Mary Magdalene's sweet ointment, to take away the ill-savor of her sins. Plead, therefore, with the oratory of faith, and say, "Lord, I have no life but in thee, I have no joy but in thee, no salvation but in thee: but I have all these in thee; and how can my soul refuse to be comforted?"

Bishop Hackett.

8563. FAITH, Childish. A boy aged four years heard his grandmother say, "My flowers will all be burnt up, and we shall have no strawberries." A few minutes afterward he was seen kneeling in one corner of the room, with his hands to his face, and was overheard praying thus: "O Lord! send down rain, so that grandma's flowers shan't be burnt up, and so we shall have plenty of strawberries." He then went to his grandmother, saying, "Your flowers won't burn up, grandma. We are going to have rain." "How do you know?" "Oh!" said he, "I have been praying for it, and it will come." He seemed to have no doubt about it. The next morning he came downstairs and went to the back door to see if it rained. According to his prediction, the rain was falling upon the thirsty flowers and the perishing berries. As soon as he saw it, he joyously shouted: "It's come, it's come, I knowed it would! I prayed for it."

8564. FAITH, Childlike. The first summer the war broke out I heard in the fall of that same year something that touched my heart. A poor woman had been made a widow by the war. In mid-winter time she heard that her husband had been cut down. She had two little children, and she did not know what would become of her; her health was not very good, and she had no money. A few days after the landlord came around for his rent. He was a poor, heartless wretch, and when she told him her husband was dead and she could not pay her rent, he said, with an oath, that he would not have any one in his house who could not pay. After he had gone she threw herself in the rocking-chair and wept; her little girl came to her and said: "Mamma, does not God answer prayer?" "Yes, my child." And the child wanted to put in practice what she had heard her mother preach. She said: "Then won't he take care of us if we ask him?" "I suppose he will." "Then may I go and ask him to take care of us?" "Yes, my child, you may if you want to." The lady told me of it the next day, and she said the child never looked so sweet to her as when she went into the room where her mother had taught her to pray. The door was open a little way, and she could see her; she put up her hands and her curls lay back from her face and she said, "Oh, Father! you came and took away my dear papa; he was killed in the war; my mamma has no money to pay the landlord the rent, and he is going to turn us out doors. We will sit on the door-step and catch cold and die unless you lend us a little house to live in." Then she went to her mother and said, "Jesus will take care of us, because I have asked him." There is faith for you! They did not have to pay any rent, a house was soon provided, and that widow and her children were taken care of.

Moody.

565. FAITH, A Child's. Little Willie, whose father was a drunkard, went to his mother, saying, "Mother, can't I have some new boots? My toes are all out of these; the snow gets in, and I am so cold." Tearfully the mother replied, "Soon, Willie, I hope to give them to you." After waiting some days he sobbed, "O mother, it is too hard! Can't I get some boots anywhere?" He stood a moment, in deep thought, and then said, "Oh, I know! God will give them to me, of course. Why didn't I think of that before? I'll go right off and ask him." He walked out of the parlor into his mother's room, knelt down, and covering his face with his hand, prayed: "O God! father drinks; mother has no money; my feet get cold and wet. I want some boots. Please send me a pair, for Jesus' sake. Amen." He often repeated this petition, and expected an answer to his prayer. "They'll come, mother!" he would often say, encouragingly; "they'll come when God gets them ready." Within a week, a lady who loved the child came to take him out walking. He hesitated for a few moments, but soon determined to go, and away they started. At length the lady noticed his stockings peeping out at the toes of his boots, when she exclaimed, "Why, Willie, look at your feet! They will freeze. Why didn't you put on better boots?" "These are all I have, ma'am." "All you have! But why don't you have a new pair?" she inquired. "I will just as soon as God sends them," he replied. Tears filled the lady's eyes as she led him into a shoe-shop near by, saying, "There, child, select any pair you please." On his return he went to his mother, and showing his boots, said, "Look, mother! God has sent my boots! Mrs. Gray's money bought them, but God heard me ask for them, and I suppose he told Mrs. Gray to buy them for me." Then, kneeling at his mother's feet, he said, "Jesus, I thank you for my new boots. Please make me a good boy, and take care of mother. Amen."

566. FAITH, Comfort of. The practice of this virtue administers great comfort to the mind of man in times of poverty and affliction, but most of all in the hour of death. When the soul is hovering in the last moments of its separation, when it is just entering on another state of existence, to converse with scenes and objects and companions that are altogether new—what can support her under such tremblings of thought, such fears, such anxiety, such apprehensions, but the casting of all her cares upon him who first gave her being, who has conducted her through one stage of it, and will be always with her to guide and comfort her in her progress through eternity?

Addison.

567. FAITH, Commercial. Men of trade rely on the unseen. They freight their ships to China, and they bring back their cargoes, though they have never seen that land. Commerce, trade, exchange, are based upon this faith. You place your money in your bank here and draw for it in London, though you have never been there; and you cross the ocean with the certainty that you will have the money in London when you get there. It is the same thing as to draw from the merits of Christ, and know you have the treasure when you cross the ocean and get into glory—the same principle precisely. Here is a man of means in your city, and I want money from the bank. I cannot get it on my own name, but I draw up a note and take it to him and he endorses it, and I go to the bank knowing I will get it. They don't know me, don't care for me; they would not trust me; but they know that man and his influence and power, and they trust him, and I go to the bank with perfect confidence that I will get the money, for I have the name of that millionaire. Jesus says, "Whatsoever ye ask in my name, the Father will give it you." There is a name that has power in heaven—all power, all wealth—and I ask in the name of Jesus, and I receive. And when I learn to go with the same confidence to the bank of glory in the name of Christ that I can go to the bank in your city in the name of one of your millionaires, then I have the things that I ask of God.

Bp. Simpson.

568. FAITH, Cultivating. The faith to which the Scriptures attach such momentous consequences, and ascribe such glorious exploits, is a practical habit, which, like every other, is strengthened and increased by continual exercise. It is nourished by meditation, by prayer, and the devout perusal of the Scriptures; and the light which it diffuses becomes stronger and clearer by an uninterrupted converse with its object and a faithful compliance with its dictates; as on the contrary it is weakened and obscured by whatever wounds the conscience or impairs the purity and spirituality of the mind.

Robert Hall.

569. FAITH in the Dark. Look at a railway train—all the carriages crowded with passengers. They fly over high bridges, and through dark tunnels, and the least mistake or fault of the engine-driver would produce a terrible accident. Do they see that man to whose care they have entrusted their lives? No. How, then, are they so calm and secure? Because they trust him.

Bibl. Treas.

570. FAITH, Encouragement for. It may be thou art a poor, trembling soul; thy faith is weak, and thy assaults from Satan strong; thy corruptions great, and thy strength little; yea, thou art apt to dread that thou shalt one day be cast as a wreck on the shore of the infernal world. And yet to this day thy grace lives. Thou art still longing, panting, desiring, wishing, and groaning for God. Is it not worth while to turn and see this strange sight? A broken ship, with masts and hull rent and torn, full of leaks, yet towed along by the Almighty power through a tempestuous sea; nor tempestuous only, but thick set with armadas of sins, afflictions, doubts and temptations, safely into God's harbor! To see the poor smoking flax in the face of the boisterous winds, and liable to the frequent dashes of quenching waves, yet not blown out! In a word, to see a weak stripling in grace held up in God's arms until all enemies are under his feet! "This is the Lord's doing, and it is marvelous in our eyes."

Salter.

8571. FAITH, Faculty of. Faith is that strange faculty by which man feels the presence of the invisible, exactly as some animals have the power of seeing in the dark. That is the difference between the Christian and the world.

8572. FAITH, Flower of. In ascending the Alps, the traveler passes through different regions of vegetation. First comes the vine, then the fruit-trees, then magnificent forest-trees; higher up the stunted pines; higher again, dwarf-trees and mosses; at last, the regions of eternal snow. But far up, almost on the very top of the mountain, a tiny, sweet flower peeps through the snow. It has often drawn tears from the eyes of the manliest traveler. It blooms away there, cheerfully, sweetly. And thus, in the soul, you pass on through the regions of knowledge, emotion, will; and on the summit, despite the cold atmosphere of moral depravity and continual alienation—if you are a child of God—the flower of faith, true faith, ever blooms and cheers.

Teachers' Treasury.

8573. FAITH in God's Promises. Faith in God's promises may be compared to a bank-note; full and felt possession of the blessings promised is like ready cash. The man who has bank-notes to any given value looks upon himself as possessed of so much money, though in reality it is only so much paper. Thus faith is as satisfied, and rests with as great complacency in the promises of Jehovah, as if it had all the blessings of grace and glory in hand. In faith's estimation God's note is current coin.

Salter.

8574. FAITH, Golden Thread of. Each of the gospels might be read with profit, as affording illustrations of faith; perhaps St. John's especially (see John 6), where the office and work of faith are set forth by so many figures: coming to Christ—seeing—feeding—eating his flesh and drinking his blood, etc.—all synonymous with believing on him. An old writer (Adams) says, St. John treats in his Gospel especially of faith; in his Epistles of love; and in the Revelation of hope. Faith is the golden thread that runs through the many-linked chain of Christian graces. The Christian's life is the "life of faith," as it is written, "The just shall live by faith," Rom. 1: 17; Gal. 3: 11; Heb. 10: 38. We "stand"—we "walk"—we "fight"—we "resist"—we "overcome," by faith. The duties and privileges of the Christian's life derive their energy and vigor from the energy of faith; hence we read of "the prayer of faith;" "the hearing of faith;" "the obedience of faith;" "the work of faith;" "the unity of the faith;" "the joy of faith;" the "profession of faith;" the "measure and proportion of faith;" "the righteousness of faith;" the "assurance of faith."

Bowes.

8575. FAITH and the Graces. Faith finds all the graces with work. As the rich tradesman gives out his wool, some to this man, and some to that, who all spin and work off the stock he gives them out, so that when he ceaseth to trade, they must also, because they have no stock but what he affords them; thus faith gives out to every grace what they act upon. If faith trades not, neither can they. Anon.

8576. FAITH, Help to. The teacher of an infant school having directed a little fellow to move a stool, but so as not to be himself seen, thus endeavored to instruct his infant charge: "You cannot see any one moving the stool—is it not alive?" "Oh, no, it's not alive, never was alive; some one must be moving it." "But, my little fellow, you cannot see anybody; perhaps it moves itself?" "Oh, no, sir; though we do not see anybody, that does not make any odds: it does not move itself." He then told them of the sun, and the moon, and stars, and that although we did not see any one move them, yet it was certain they were moved, and no other could do so but God himself, but we could not see him. "Yes, it must be God." "But then, my little folks, you cannot see him?" "Please, sir, we must believe it." "Well, then, you believe it?" "Yes." "This then is faith."

8577. FAITH Honors God. When the late Elector of Hanover was declared by the Parliament of Great Britain successor to the vacant throne, several persons of distinction waited upon his highness, in order to make timely application for the most valuable preferments. Several requests of this nature were granted, and each was confirmed by a kind of promissory note. One gentleman, particularly, solicited for the Mastership of the Rolls. Being indulged in his desire, he was offered the same confirmation which had been vouchsafed to other successful petitioners; upon which he seemed to be under a pang of graceful confusion and surprise, begged that he might not put the royal donor to such unnecessary trouble, at the same time protesting that he looked upon his Highness's word as the very best ratification of his suit. With this conduct and this compliment the Elector was not a little pleased. "This is the gentleman," he said, "who does me a real honor—treats me like a king; and, whoever is disappointed, he shall certainly be gratified." So we are assured by the testimony of revelation that the patriarch who staggered not through unbelief gave—and in the most signal, the most acceptable manner—glory to God. (Rom. 4: 20.) Hervey.

8578. FAITH, Hope and Charity. Justinian erected a church in Constantinople, which he consecrated to Eternal Wisdom, Aiona Sophia. In course of time the legend grew that St. Sophia was a great female soul, and that she was the mother of three fair daughters, Faith, Hope and Charity. Another addition made those daughters virgins and then martyrs. Then the grim joke that Faith, Hope and Charity were dead, originated. The relics of these saints are shown in the church of St.

Peter and St. Sylvester at Rome. All this shows the danger of a literal translation of figures of speech.

8579. FAITH, Increase of. As a man beginning life without sixpence has made a fortune of tens of thousands, so he who at first has little faith may become like Abraham, or the woman of Canaan. Coal beds may be exhausted; gold and silver mines abandoned as not worth working any longer; but faith is a mine that cannot be exhausted. Griffith.

8580. FAITH in the Invisible. Some believe the better for seeing Christ's sepulchre; and when they have seen the Red Sea, doubt not of the miracle. Now, contrarily, I bless myself, and am thankful, that I live not in the days of miracles, that I never saw Christ nor his disciples; I would not have been one of those Israelites that passed the Red Sea, nor one of Christ's patients on whom he wrought his wonders; then had my faith been thrust upon me; nor should I enjoy that greater blessing pronounced to all that believe and saw not. 'Tis an easy and necessary belief to credit what our eye and sense hath examined; I believe he was dead and buried, and rose again; and desire to see him in his glory, rather than to contemplate him in his cenotaph or sepulchre. T. Browne.

8581. FAITH a Link. Faith brings us into contact with Christ. You have seen a chain in two pieces, and a link connecting them that looks like the letter S. Faith is that link; on the one side it takes hold of the Saviour, on the other it takes hold of the sinner.

Thomas Jones.

8582. FAITH, Living by. "We live by faith," says the apostle, "and not by sight, or by sense." They are as two buckets—the life of faith, and the life of sense; when one goes up, the other goes down; the higher faith rises, the lower sense and reason; and the higher sense and reason, the lower faith. That is true of the schools. Reason going before faith weakens and diminishes it; but reason following upon faith, increases and strengthens it. Luther says well, "If you would believe, you must crucify that question, why?" God would not have us so full of wherefores. And if you would believe, you must go blindfold into God's command. Abraham subscribes to a blank when the Lord calls him out of his own country. Bridge.

8583. FAITH, Means and. He that believes God for the event, believes him for the means also. If the patient dare trust the physician for his cure, he dare also follow his prescription in order to do it, and therefore, Christian, sit not still and say thy sins shall fall, but put thyself in array against them. Anon.

8584. FAITH, Obedient. A minister wishing to teach a child the nature of faith took a chair and placed it at some distance from him, and told him to stand on it and fall forward, and he would catch him. The boy immediately got on to the chair, but did not fall forward. He wished to obey, but was afraid he would not catch him. He put however, one hand upon the mantel-piece, thinking to save himself if he did not catch him; but the minister told him that would not do; he must trust to him alone. The minister then told him he would surely catch him if he would fall forward. The boy at last summoned all his courage and fell, and he caught him. The minister then told him that that was faith, and that he wished him to go with the same confidence to Jesus Christ.

8585. FAITH, Observation of. Let this thought, that God cannot lie, keep in conscious safety the heart of every one who looketh to Jesus. They who look shall be saved. The sun in the firmament is often faintly seen through a cloud; but the spectator may be no less looking at him than when he is seen in full and undiminished effulgence. It is not to him who sees Christ brightly that the promises are made, but to him who looks to Christ. A bright view may minister comfort; but it is the looking which ministers safety. Chalmers.

8586. FAITH, Penetration of. God cannot be seen but covered under something. See his mercy in his anger. In what appears bringing us to hell, faith sees him bringing us to heaven; in darkness, it beholds brightness; in hiding his face from us, it beholds his cheering countenance. How did Job see God, but as you would say under Satan's cloak? For who cast the fire from heaven upon his goods? Who overthrew his house and stirred up men to take away his cattle, but Satan? And yet Job pierced through all these, and saw God's work, saying, "The Lord hath given, the Lord hath taken away; blessed be the name of the Lord."

Bradford.

8587. FAITH a Pilgrim-grace. Faith is a right pilgrim-grace; it travels with us to heaven, and when it sees us safe got within our Father's doors (heaven I mean) it takes leave of us. Now the promise is this pilgrim's staff with which it sets forth, though (like Jacob on his way to Padan-Aram) it hath nothing else with it; "Remember thy word unto thy servant," saith David, "upon which thou hast caused me to hope."

Anon.

8588. FAITH, Pillars of. I remember an old experimental Christian speaking about the great pillars of our faith; he was a sailor; we were then on board ship, and there were sundry huge posts on the shore to which the ships were usually fastened by throwing a cable over them. After I had told him a great many promises, he said, "I know they are good, strong promises, but I cannot get near enough to shore to throw my cable around them; that is the difficulty." Now, it often happens that God's past mercies and loving-kindnesses would be good sure posts to hold on to, but we have not got faith enough to throw our cable round them, and so we go slipping down the stream of unbelief, because we cannot stay ourselves by our former mercies. I will, however, give you something that I think you can throw your cable over. If God has never been kind to you, one thing you surely know, and that is, he has been kind to others. Spurgeon

8589. FAITH and Prayer. Faith builds in the dungeon and the lazar-house its sublimest shrines; and up through roofs of stone, that shut out the eye of heaven, ascends the ladder where the angels glide to and fro—Prayer.

Lytton.

8590. FAITH, Preserve Your. "In the Grecian courts the warrior who lost his sword or spear in battle was acquitted, but he who threw away his shield was severely punished, because by doing so he either displayed an unworthy cowardice or a contempt of danger or a despair which ill became a soldier. Nothing was to be preserved with such care as the shield. Like the modern standard, it was to be fought for to the death; and it was regarded as a great honor for a warrior to be borne back dead upon the shield that was braced to his arm when he went forth to fight." So faith must be preserved at all hazards.

8591. FAITH and Reason. An old writer compares Faith and Reason to two travelers: Faith is like a man in full health, who can walk his twenty or thirty miles at a time without suffering; Reason is like a little child, who can only with difficulty accomplish three or four miles. Well, says this old writer, on a given day Reason says to Faith, "O good Faith, let me walk with thee." Faith replies, "O Reason, thou canst never walk with me." Well, they set out together; when they come to a deep river, Reason says, "I can never ford this." When they reach a lofty mountain, there is the same exclamation of despair; and in such cases Faith, in order not to leave Reason behind, is obliged to carry him on his back; and, adds the writer, "Oh, what a luggage is Reason to Faith!"

8592. FAITH and Repentance. Faith and repentance are the whole duty of a Christian. Faith is a sacrifice of the understanding to God; repentance sacrifices the whole will; that gives the knowing, this gives up all the desiring faculties: that makes us disciples, this makes us servants of the holy Jesus. Nothing else was preached by the Apostles, nothing else was enjoined as the duty of man, nothing else did build up the body of Christian religion. So that as faith contains all that knowledge which is necessary to salvation, so repentance comprehends in all the whole practice and working duty of a returning Christian.

Bishop Taylor.

8593. FAITH, Saving. An inquirer, anxious about his soul, went to a converted sailor and said, "I believe the Bible to be true, and every word of it from God. I know that I can be saved only by the redemption of Jesus Christ. I feel my misery as a sinner. I believe everything; but how am I to believe so as to be saved? I want faith; and how am I to get it?" He answered, "I did not once know what faith was, or how to obtain it; but I know now what it is, and believe I possess it. But I do not know that I can tell you what it is, or how to get it. I can tell you what it is not. It is not knocking off swearing, and drinking, and such like; and it is not reading the Bible, nor praying, nor being good. It is none of these; for, even if they would answer for the time to come, there is the old score still, and how are you to get clear of that? It is not anything you have done, or can do; it is only believing and trusting to what Christ has done. It is forsaking your sins, and looking for their pardon, and the salvation of your soul, because he died, and shed his blood for sin; and it is nothing else."

8594. FAITH, Security of. Cajetan organized the order of regular clerks, in 1524, called also Theatines, which had for its object the reformation of morals, then notoriously bad both among priests and people. The principle of the order was that it was to have no property, and also its members were never to beg. To live without either property or begging was a new idea, and the cardinals hesitated about sanctioning it. Its members considered Providence the best endowment. Cajetan opened a house at Naples, and the Count of Oppido wished to endow it with lands. Cajetan would not accept it. "But, my father," said the Count, "what security have you got that you will be able to obtain daily sustenance?" "What security have you, my lord?" "Oh, as for me," said the Count, "I trust that my farmers will pay their rents." "But if the crops fail they will not be able to do so." "We must trust God to give the seasons." "So, so," said Cajetan, "it comes to trust in God as the root of all security." "But," urged the Count, "your mode of living is all well enough in Venice, a large and opulent city; but Naples is small and poor." "The God of Venice is the God also of Naples," answered Cajetan.

8595. FAITH, Shield of. Chabuas, the Athenian general, ordered his soldiers to put one knee on the ground, and firmly to rest their spear on the other, and cover themselves with their shields, by which means he daunted the enemy. He had a statue raised to his honor in that same posture. Myrillus' shield, it is said, secured him in the field, and saved him when shipwrecked at sea, by wafting him to the shore. But how much more serviceable is the shield of faith. By this the Christian overcomes his spiritual enemies, and is enabled to triumph even in the midst of difficulties. Such at last will have to say, "I have fought a good fight, for I have kept the faith. Henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, and not to me only, but to all them who love his appearing."

Buck.

8596. FAITH, Temporary. What comfort is there of temporary faith, which giveth over when there is most need of it? What use of that illumination that leaveth us in darkness at the last? What were the foolish virgins better for that oil and light which failed them before they came to the wedding chamber?

Thomas Taylor.

8597. FAITH, Trial of. Is like the testing of silver in the refining pot, Prov. 17:3. Gold in the furnace, 1 Pet. 1:7. A beautiful image; only in one point there is a most important difference—gold, though the purest of metals, is not increased in the furnace; but faith, by being tried, “groweth exceedingly.” EXAMPLES. Noah commanded to build an ark. A strange work, which had never been done before; a work of immense difficulty, toil, and patience; exposed to the ridicule of that unrighteous age; and then, when the ark was finished, he was told to enter it, when there was no sign of the threatened flood; nor was he told how long it might be before he was released from his confinement. What a test of “the obedience of faith!” Abraham, of all the early saints, was perhaps, tried the most—so many times, and so severely. (1) In the charge to leave his native land and kindred, and go to a land which the Lord would show him (it was not said at first, “which I will give thee”) Gen. 12: 1. No place was named—no distance mentioned—no time of his prospective sojourn intimated. He was to go forth, “not knowing whither he went,” Heb. 11: 8; and he had no inheritance in it, and no child, Acts 7: 5. (2) In the promise given of a “seed” which should inherit the land, when the Canaanite was then in full possession, Gen. 12: 6; 13: 15; and he had no heir (16: 1) for more than twenty years; and both he and Sarah were advanced in years when the promise was more definitely renewed, Gen. 18: 10–14; Rom. 4: 18–21. (3) In the strange command, when the promised seed was given at last, and had grown, to offer him for a burnt offering in the land of Moriah, Gen. 22: 1, 2; a command apparently contrary to all known laws of affection, reason, revelation, and against God’s own promise of the seed’s inheriting the land. What trial could well be greater? Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob.—It is not a little remarkable that there was a famine in the days of each of the honored three, Gen. 12: 10; 26: 1; 41: 54; 43: 1. Thus were they not only called to wander in a strange land, but almost driven from it by want of sustenance. Israel, tried by their hard bondage in Egypt, and their wanderings in the wilderness, and at their entrance into Canaan; see Deut. 8: 2, 3. What a strange command it seemed, Exod. 14: 15, “Go forward!” “as if there had been a fleet of transport ships ready for them to embark in!” So the Lord tried their faith by leading them about, at times to places like Rephidim, where there was no water, Exod. 17: 1. Job, the patriarch, pre-eminent for unparalleled accumulation of trials, met with almost unexampled fortitude; see Job 1: 6–22; 2: 10; 13: 15. Elijah, the subject of many severe trials of faith. During the time of famine sent to Cherith (which means drouth, as if it dried up sooner than other brooks), and when that was dried, ordered to go to Zarephath, a Gentile city, nearly a hundred miles off, in the very region where Jezebel came from, and find support there from a widow woman, whose name and residence were not foretold him. So, afterwards, through his life.

8598. FAITH, True. Faith is the first stone of the building, but it is not the foundation.

It is the act of cleaving to Christ, but all its value depends upon the worth of the Christ to whom you cleave. A man may have faith—real, ardent, energetic faith—in saints and images, and priests and relics; yet his faith does not save him. A drowning man puts forth his hand and seizes with more than natural energy a bit of froth that dances on the crest of a wave; his hand cleaves it like air, and he sinks helpless in the deep. He is lost, not for want of precision in his aim, or of energy in his grasp, but for want of truth and power in the phantom to which he fled.

Arnot.

8599. FAITH in the Unseen. Now there is a fact in nature, I cannot explain it, nor can you, that a piece of steel touched with a magnet trembles as it varies; suspend it on a pivot and it becomes a needle and it turns toward the pole. Why it turns I cannot tell. I say it is magnetism; it is influenced by the magnetic current. What makes that current, how it is developed and constituted I know not. Some of its facts I can see, and yet, I will risk my life, and the life of my friends, and all I have, on the certainty that everywhere, and under all circumstances, when left free from other influences, that needle will turn toward the pole. I go on the sea and the mariner may guide the ship by the sun and stars when visible; but there comes a time when the stars are invisible and the sun is not seen for days. There is a wild waste of billows all around and the tempests howl, and yet in the midst of that darkness and storm and threatened danger, the eye is kept on that needle, and believing that it points northward, and that there is a North, though I cannot see it, and while there may be rocks on the one hand and destruction on the other, I go safely through because I trust in the unseen. Great journeys are accomplished and great deeds are performed in the same manner. Bishop Simpson.

8600. FAITH, Vision of. Astronomy affords us an illustration of the relation of faith to sight. Those stars that are scattered like silver-dust over the firmament of heaven, but are only disclosed by the powerful glasses of the scientific inquirer, are to us objects of faith. Many stars we see, but these we see not. We believe that they exist on the evidence of others, who have had their vision enlarged by the appliances of science. What to us is an object of faith is to them one of sight. And there is a heavenly world far beyond all that the assisted sight of man has ever reached, which is not within the bounds of human experiment, and of which we can only learn through the revelation of God in Christ. The things of this world are received by the eye of faith, for “faith is the evidence of things not seen.” Faith, in short, has the same relation to the things of heaven as sight has to the things of the world in which we live.

Pilkington

8601. FAITH, Walking by. The difference between walking by faith and by sight is wonderful! It is as great as that of our walking in a clear, shining morning, when the sky in summer is without a cloud, while the sun sheds his enlivening beams, or our going out in one of our November fogs, when the sky is overcast, and the heavy-clouded atmosphere looks gloom and sadness, and all nature is dreary and cheerless.

Salter.

8602. FAITH, What is. Mr. Wesley was once engaged in a very important conference with some of his leading associates. The subject of discussion was faith. No one was able to furnish a definition satisfactory to himself or to any one present. In the midst of their perplexity, Mr. Wesley said, "Let us call in Mrs. —," naming an individual of strong good sense and of very deep piety. "She," continued Mr. Wesley, "can tell us just what faith is, because she has consciously exercised it." When asked to tell what faith is, her reply was this, "It is taking God at his word." "That will do," exclaimed Mr. Wesley. And that will do for us all.

8603. FAITH and Works. "Mamma," said a little girl in Philadelphia—when she was looking for a lost treasure, "I think God will help us find it if we ask him. So I'll pray, and you hunt."

8604. FAITH—not Works. Some years ago two men, a bargeman and a collier, were in a boat above the rapids of a cataract, and found themselves, unable to manage it, being carried so swiftly down the current that they must both inevitably be borne down and dashed to pieces. At last, however, one man was saved by floating a rope to him, which he grasped. The same instant that the rope came into his hand a log floated by the other man. The thoughtless and confused bargeman, instead of seizing the rope, laid hold on the log. It was a fatal mistake; they were both in imminent peril; but the one was drawn to shore, because he had a connection with the people on the land, while the other, clinging to the loose, floating log, was borne irresistibly along, and never heard of afterwards. Faith has a saving connection with Christ. Christ is on the shore, holding the rope, and, as we lay hold of it with the hand of our confidence, he pulls us to the shore; but our good works, having no connection with Christ, are drifted along down to the gulf of fell despair. Grapple our virtues as tightly as we may, even with hooks of steel, they cannot avail us in the least degree; they are the disconnected log which has no hold-fast on the heavenly shore. Spurgeon.

8605. FAITH, Works and. Cromwell said to his soldiers on the field of battle, "Trust in the Lord, and rely on your pikes."

8606. FAITHFULNESS, Conjugal. A Shawnee Indian woman made this reply to a man whom she met in the woods, and who implored her to love and look on him: "Oulman, my husband, who is forever before my eyes, hinders me from seeing you or any other person."

8607. FAITHFULNESS, Divine. EMBLEMS. A rock, the representation of stability and endurance, Deut. 32: 4. A shield or buckler, Ps. 91: 4; 18: 30. The rainbow, the "faithful witness in heaven," Ps. 89: 37. Very blessed assurances are given us of the Divine faithfulness. It is, firmer than the strong mountains, Isa. 54: 10; more fixed than the sun and moon and ordinances of heaven, Jer. 31: 35, 36; of day and night, 33; 20, 21, 25, 26; than the very existence of the heaven above and earth beneath, with them that dwell therein, Isa. 51: 6: Matt. 5: 18; . . . more certain than any earthly parent's love, Isa. 49: 15, 16; reaching to the clouds, Ps. 57: 10; 1 Kings 7: 21. The two pillars in Solomon's temple—Boaz (in him is strength), and Jachin (he will establish) were probably meant as symbols, that the counsels and purposes of God are faithfulness and truth. Ps. 119: 89, "Forever, O Lord, thy word is settled in heaven." Luther had this text written in charcoal upon the walls of his chamber and embroidered on the dresses of his servants. Ps. 119: 160, "Thy word is true from the beginning." Dr. A. Clarke would translate this, "true from the first word." 2 Tim 2: 19, "Nevertheless, the foundation of God standeth sure." Amidst all the upheavings of a restless world, and all the errors of a distracted Church, the rock of truth remains steadfast forever. The notions of men are constantly changing; the founders of systems pass away; but "the foundation of God standeth sure." The truth, the word, the promises, the covenant, of an unchanging God, are as sure as he is faithful.

8608. FAITHFULNESS, Evidence of. Mohammed, king of Khoozistan, was an exceedingly effeminate prince. Good fortune had given him a good minister, who was a sincere lover of justice, of his master, and of the country confided to his government. He made no enemies but such as he offended by a thorough disdain of all parasites; an integrity which neither blandishments nor money could shake. A conspiracy hatched against him drove him at length from the counsels of his prince. He neither offered to justify himself, nor to solicit his restoration; he simply wrote to the prince, "That as it was always his desire to be useful, he requested of his highness to grant him some barren lands, which he promised to cultivate, and which would be sufficient for his subsistence." Mohammed, who could not but esteem a man that had served him with fidelity, gave orders to search for some uncultivated estates in his dominions. None such, however, were to be found. All the lands were fertile; commerce and agriculture, equally encouraged, furnished the inhabitants with plenty; and throughout the whole land of Khoozistan there was neither an indigent person nor a barren territory to be found. The monarch, to whom this report was made by persons who were ignorant of the inferences to be necessarily drawn from it, sent a message to the discarded Vizier, stating that he had no barren lands to give him, but that he might make choice of any portion of cultivated territory which he pleased. "I desire nothing more," replied this great minister, "as a recompense for all my services, than the happiness which this answer gives me. I was willing my master should know the condition in which I have left his kingdom. Nothing remains for me but to wish that my successors may follow my example." The king was awakened by this answer to a just sense of the value of the man whom he had inconsiderately discarded from his service, and immediately reinstated him. Anon.

8609. FAITHFULNESS, Example of. Two Hanoverian horses assisted in drawing the same gun during the whole Peninsular war, in the German brigade of artillery. One of them met his death in an engagement; after which the survivor was picketed as usual, and his food was brought to him. He refused to eat, and kept constantly turning his head round to look for his companion, and sometimes calling him by a neigh. Every care was taken, and all means that could be thought of were adopted, to make him eat, but without effect. Other horses surrounded him on all sides, but he paid no attention to them; his whole demeanor indicated the deepest sorrow, and he died from hunger, not having eaten anything from the time his companion fell.

8610. FAITHFULNESS, God's. The family of a persecuted minister of the seventeenth century was several times reduced to great straits. Once, when they had breakfasted, and had nothing left for another meal, his wife exclaimed, "What shall I do with my poor children?" He persuaded her to walk abroad with him, and, seeing a little bird, he said, "Take notice how that little bird sits and chirps, though we cannot tell whether it has been to breakfast; and if it has, it knows not whither to go for dinner. Therefore be of good cheer, and do not distrust the providence of God; for are we not better than many sparrows?" Before dinner-time plenty of provisions were brought them.

8611. FAITHFULNESS, Import of. There is an intimate connection between the words "faith" and "faithfulness." The word "faith" as is obvious at once to the ear and to the eye, is part and parcel of the word "faithfulness." Faith is in faithfulness, because faithfulness is supposed to be the quality of a person's character who is faithful—that is, faithful, or full of faith. Morrison.

8612. FAITHFULNESS, Logic of. A Christian lady was engaged in marriage to a gentleman who respected, but did not confess, religion. Thinking that it might please him to attend a ball and mingle in the dance, she proposed that they both go to the ball. To her astonishment he declined, for he was greatly surprised that one who professed to follow Christ "in the narrow way" should offer to enter with him through that wide gate into "the broad way which leadeth to destruction." In a few minutes he withdrew for the evening. When he next called, he asked that their engagement of matrimony might be broken off. Mortified at the request of her affianced husband, she requested an explanation of his unlooked-for demand. He replied, "You have solemnly vowed to Christ to be his, yet you propose to turn your back on him and mingle with sinners in the dance. Your relation to Christ is more sacred than your relation to me could be if we were married. If you are untrue to God—in your offer to forsake him—what reason have I to believe you would not be untrue to me, and forsake me? The greater always includes the less." Severe as his conclusion was, she could not say it was unjust. Ebenezer Arnold.

8613. FAITHFULNESS, Required. When the battle of Corioli was being won through the stimulus given to the soldiers by the impassioned vigor of Caius Marcius, they mourned to see their leader covered with wounds and blood. They begged him to retire to the camp, but with characteristic bravery he exclaimed, "It is not for conquerors to be tired!" and joined them in prosecuting the victory to its brilliant end. Such language might well become the Christian warrior. He is tempted to lie down and rest before the conquest is complete and the triumph thoroughly achieved. But his conquests should but stir him with a holy zeal and fire him with a sublime courage, that he may be faithful unto death, and then receive a crown of life. Anon.

8614. FAITHFULNESS, Wayside. In 1854, Rev. T. H. Pearne and Bp. Simpson started on a canoe voyage up the Columbia river in Oregon. Their companions were some Indians and two drunken white men, who sought by profanity and obscenity to annoy the clerical passengers. One of the whites at length became stupid, and the other silent. The bishop asked the latter if his mother was still living. He said she was. "Is your mother a praying woman?" "O yes." "Do you think she prays for you every day?" He answered with feeling, "I have no doubt of it." "Do you suppose your mother knows the kind of life you are leading?" With tears and sobs the young man answered, "I would not have her know it for the world." The bishop's conversation continued with evident good effect. In 1864 Mr. Pearne met a well-dressed gentleman while traveling in a fine steamer on the same river. He said he was the man who passed up the river in a canoe with himself and the bishop ten years before. He informed Mr. Pearne that he was a religious man, and dated his reform from the bishop's conversation. He was married, had acquired a competence, and a respectable position in society. He ascribed all to the bishop's faithfulness.

8615. FALL, Children after the. In my travels through Syria, on a mountainous ridge, my attention was suddenly arrested by a magnificent grove of trees of the cedar species. They were evidently the growth of many ages, and had obtained the perfection of beauty and grandeur. As I descended into the vale I beheld a number of other trees stunted in their growth, and as remarkable for their meanness as the former were for their magnificence. The guide assured me that they were of the same species. I thought it impossible. Not a trace of resemblance could I find in them; but he assured me that they had been planted by the agency of the winds, and had fallen upon that spot. We had not proceeded very far before another group presented itself. These had been planted by the hand of man, and carefully attended to as they grew up. And on examining them I had no difficulty in discovering the family likeness to the first grove of trees; they were giving promise of great beauty, and seemed to say that, if ages were allowed for them to grow up, they would prove no insignificant rivals of their parent stock. This appears to be a remarkable emblem of the children of fallen Adam. They were "planted a noble vine, but how they are turned into the degenerate plant of a strange vine!" Like the scattered trees in the vale, they are stunted in their growth, mean, despicable and useless, having lost all resemblance to their parent stock. Instead of the image of God, they have the likeness of him whose children they are, and, like those trees where there is no friendly hand to cultivate them, they will continue forever in their degenerate and ruined state. But there is also another class, like the newly planted grove, who are brought under cultivation, and under the care and watchfulness of the good husbandman, their heavenly Father. These, though immeasurably inferior to the noble stock from which they were originally taken, are yet again bearing evident marks of their parentage, their high and heavenly original. Every year the family likeness appears more evident and conspicuous, and as "trees of the Lord," "the planting of his right hand," they have the promise that "they shall cast forth their roots as Lebanon; their branches shall spread, and their beauty shall be as the olive tree, and their smell as Lebanon."

Salter.

8616. FALL, Consciousness of the. The degenerate plant has no consciousness of its own degradation, nor could it, when reduced to the character of a weed or a wild-flower, recognize in the fair and delicate garden-plant the type of its former self. The tamed and domesticated animal, stunted in size, and subjugated in spirit, could not feel any sense of humiliation when confronted with its wild brother of the desert, fierce, strong and free, as if discerning in that spectacle the noble type from which itself had fallen. But it is different with a conscious moral being. Reduce such an one ever so low, yet you cannot obliterate in his inner nature the consciousness of falling beneath himself; you cannot blot out from his mind the latent reminiscence of a nobler and better self which he might have been, and which to have lost is guilt and wretchedness.

Caird.

8617. FALL, Traditions of the. Traditions of the fall in ancient history and mythology are very numerous. Thus on an ancient bas-relief there are two groups that offer, as it were, a biblical key to the whole scene. On the one hand are a man and a woman standing naked under a tree; the man with one hand raised to the tree, and the other directed towards the woman. It is such a picture that a child would at once say, "That is Adam and Eve!" At the other extremity is a sedate and august figure, seated upon a rock, and strangling the serpent with his outstretched hand. Again Apollo is represented as the son of the supreme God: out of love to mankind he destroyed the serpent Python; after his victory the conqueror underwent a lustration in the vale of Tempe; here also he was crowned with laurel, and according to some, with that mysterious fruit the gathering of which had proved the source of all evil, and occasioned the necessity for the defeat of the serpent. So of the garden of the Hesperides, we read that, being situated at the extreme limit of the then known Africa, it was said to have been shut in by Atlas on every side by lofty mountains, on account of an ancient oracle that a son of the deity would at a certain time arrive, open a way of access thither, and carry off the golden apples which hung on a mysterious tree in the midst of the garden. Having procured access to the garden, and having destroyed the watchful serpent that kept the tree, the hero gathered the apples. In engraving from gems and other ancient remains, many representations of this event may be found. In all of them the Python is a serpent; and in all of them he is wreathed around a fruit-laden tree, exactly as modern painters represent him in their pictures of Eve's temptation.

Kitto.

8618. FALL, Type of the. In all the sacrifices, from Adam to Christ, this was still preached to the world, that there was a fearful breach between God and man, and, therefore, that justice required that our blood should be shed. And the fire flaming upon the altar, which wholly burnt up the sacrifice, was a lively emblem of that fiery indignation that should devour the adversaries. But, above all, when Christ, the true and the great Sacrifice, was offered up to God, the clearest mirror was set before us in which to see our sin and misery by the fall.

John Flavel.

8619. FALLING, Dishonor of. Lusts ever bring inconstancy with them, and make the soul, like weary and distempered bodies, never well in any posture or position. Wicked men flee like bees from one flower to another, from one vanity to another, can never find enough in any to satiate the endless intemperance of unnatural desires. Only the gospel, being spiritually apprehended, hath treasures enough for the soul to rest in, and to seek no farther. And, therefore, falling away from the truth, power, or purity of the gospel, is said to expose Christ to shame, and to crucify him again. For as, in baptism, when we renounce sin, and betake ourselves to Christ, we do, as it were, expose sin unto public infamy, and nail it on the cross of Christ; so when we revolt from Christ unto sin again, and in our hearts turn back unto Egypt, and thrust him from us, we do then put him to shame again, as if he were either in his power deficient, or unfaithful in those promises which before we pretended to rely upon. If Israel, as they consulted, should likewise actually have rebelled against Moses, and returned in their body as well as in heart into Egypt again, what a scorn would it have wrought in that proud nation, that their vassals should voluntarily resume their thralldom, after so many boasts and appearances of deliverance! If a man should relinquish the service of some noble person, and apply himself unto some sordid master for subsistence, would not the mouths of men be quickly open or their minds jealous to suspect that however such a man carries a high name, and there be great expectations from attending on him, yet, in truth, he is but a dry master, whom his own servants do so publicly dishonor? So, when any men turn apostates from the power and profession of the gospel of Christ, presently wicked men are apt to blaspheme, and to conceive desperate prejudices against our high and holy calling.

Bp. Reynolds.

8620. FALLING, Kept from. If it is glory to him to rescue us when we sink, it is surely greater glory to keep us from sinking. Said one traveler to another, "I have great cause to be thankful; my horse stumbled, but did not fall." Said his companion, "I have greater cause to be thankful, for my horse did not even stumble at all." Nothing but constant confidence and trust in the Lord can keep us afloat; and, mark you, Jesus did not say to Peter that it was to be expected that he should doubt and begin to sink, but he said, "Wherefore didst thou doubt?"

M. Monod.

8621. FALLING, Security Against. One of the old Puritans, to remind him of his dependence upon God, used to keep a wine-glass with the foot broken off, and with this inscription upon it: "Hold thou me up and I shall be safe."

8622. FALSEHOOD, Acting. Robert Hall was spending an evening at the house of a friend. A lady who was there on a visit retired, that her little girl of four years old might go to bed. She returned in about half an hour, and said, "She is gone to sleep; I put on my night-cap and lay down by her, and she soon dropped off." Mr. Hall said, "Excuse me, madame, do you wish your child to grow up a liar?"

Oh dear, no, sir; I should be shocked at such thing." "Then bear with me while I say you must never act a lie before her. Children are very quick observers, and soon learn that that which assumes to be what it is not is a lie, whether acted or spoken." This was uttered with a kindness which precluded offence, yet with a seriousness that could not be forgotten.

8623. FALSEHOOD, Faith in. The most absurd and injurious adage that has ever gained currency among mankind, is, that "it is no difference what a man believes, if he only be sincere." Now, the truth is, that the more sincerely a man believes falsehood, the more destructive it is to all his interests, for time and eternity. This statement can be confirmed in every mind beyond the reach of doubt. A gentleman of property and the highest respectability, in the course of his business transactions, became acquainted with an individual who, as the event showed, was a man destitute in a great degree of a conscientious regard of truth. The persuasions and false representations of this man led the gentleman referred to, to embark almost his entire fortune with him in speculations in which he was at that time engaged. While this matter was in progress, the friends of the gentleman called upon him, and stated their doubts of the individual's integrity who solicited his confidence, and likewise of the success of the enterprises in which he was solicited to engage. The advice of his friends was rejected—he placed confidence in the false statements of the individual referred to—he acted upon those statements, and was consequently involved in pecuniary distress. In this case the gentleman not only sincerely believed the falsehood to be the truth, but he had good motives in relation to the object which he desired to accomplish. He was a benevolent man. He had expended considerable sums for charitable and religious uses, and his desire was, by the increase of his property, to be enabled to accomplish greater good. In this case he was injured likewise by believing what others did not believe. The individual who seduced him into the speculation, had endeavored to lead others to take the same views and to act in the same way; they did not believe the falsehood, and were consequently, saved; he believed, and was consequently ruined. Power.

8624. FALSEHOOD, Scars of. To tell a falsehood is like the cut of a sabre, for, though the wound may heal, the scar will remain. Saadi.

8625. FAME, Anxiety for. Pausanias, an attendant of Philip, King of Macedon, asked Hermocles, "How may a man suddenly become famous?" He replied, "By killing some illustrious person; for thereby the glory of that man shall pass over to himself." Pausanias thereupon slew King Philip, and became as infamous for his crime, as the king had been famous for his virtue.

8626. FAME, Brevity of. There is no antidote against the opium of time, which temporally considereth all things: our fathers find their graves in our short memories, and sadly tell us how we may be buried in our survivors'. Grave-stones tell truth scarce forty years. Generations pass while some trees stand, and old families last not three oaks. Browne.

8627. FAME, Efforts to Secure. When Alexander the Great had demolished the walls of Thebes, Phrine, a beautiful and rich courtesan, went to the Thebans and offered to rebuild the walls at her own expense, provided she might be permitted to engrave on them these words, "Alexander overthrew Thebes, and Phrine did in this manner restore it."

8628. FAME, Emptiness of. We have a striking illustration of the emptiness of the rewards of fame, in the Memoirs of Henry Martyn. He tells, that after a severe contest with many distinguished competitors, for the prize of being Senior Wrangler, the highest mathematical honor which the University of Cambridge can bestow upon its students, the palm was awarded to him; and having received it, he exclaims, "I was astonished to find what a shadow I had grasped." Perhaps there never yet was a candidate for fame, whatever was the particular object for which he contended, who did not feel the same disappointment. The reward of fame may be compared to the garlands in the Olympic games, which began to wither the moment they were grasped by the hand, or worn upon the brow of the victor.

Anon.

8629. FAME, Favorites of. In Fame's temple there is always a niche to be found for rich dunces, importunate scoundrels, or successful butchers of the human race.

Zimmerman.

8630. FAME, Fickleness of. Among the writers of all ages, some deserve fame, and have it; others neither have nor deserve it; some have it, not deserving, others, though deserving, yet totally miss it, or have it not equal to their deserts.

Milton.

8631. FAME, The Hope of. My consolation for the sacrifices which I am called upon to make I must find in that hope of honorable fame which is to be acquired only by those who, according to the best of their judgment, fallible at the best, pursue the course which leads to the public good.

Wellington.

8632. FAME, Infamous. Erostratus, desirous of fame, set fire to the Temple of Diana at Ephesus. He confessed that his only reason for doing so, was that he might be remembered for it in aftertimes. So indignant were the Ephesians, that they made a severe decree that his name should never be mentioned.

8633. FAME, Limit of. An old woman in a village in the west of England was told one day that the king of Prussia was dead, such a report having arrived when the great Frederick was in the noon-day of his glory. Old Mary lifted up her great slow eyes at the news, and fixing them in the fullness of vacancy upon her informant, replied, "Is a? is a? The Lord ha' mercy! well, well! The king of Prussia—and who's he?" The who's he? of this old woman might serve as a text for a notable sermon upon ambition. "Who's he?" may now be asked of men greater than Frederick or Wellington, greater as discoverers than Sir Isaac or Sir Humphrey. Who built the pyramids? Who ate the first oyster? But the perception of the evanescence of the great names need not wait until forced upon the mind by associations like these. No; a few years only have to pass away, and a dark, mythological gloom comes down like the certain march of night, over names and performances exciting the most lively admiration and interest.

Southey.

8634. FAME, Perpetuating. Trajan, the Emperor, caused his name to be inscribed on everything he did, whether repairing old work or building anything new. So constantly did he demand this, he was scoffingly called the "Wall Flower, or Pellitory on the Wall."

8635. FAME, Representations of. The poets make fame a monster: they describe her in part finely and elegantly, and in part gravely and sententiously: they say, Look how many feathers she hath! so many eyes she hath underneath! so many tongues! so many voices!

she pricks up so many ears! This is a flourish: there follow excellent parables; as that she gathereth strength in going; that she goeth upon the ground, and yet hideth her head in the clouds; that in the daytime she sitteth in a watch-tower, and flieth most by night; that she mingleth things done with things not done; and that she is a terror to great cities.

Lord Bacon.

8636. FAME, Silencing. Fame may be compared to a scold; the best way to silence her is to let her alone, and she will at last be out of breath in blowing her own trumpet.

Fuller.

8637. FAME, Solitude about. A boy's being flogged is not so severe as a man's having the hiss of the world against him. Men have a solicitude about fame; and the greater share they have of it, the more afraid they are of losing it.

Dr. Johnson.

8638. FAMILIARITY Breeds Contempt. A fox who had never seen a lion, when by chance he met him for the first time, was so terrified that he almost died of fright. When he met him the second time, he was still afraid, but managed to disguise his fear. When he saw him the third time, he was so much emboldened that he went up to him and asked him how he did.

Æsop.

8639. FAMILY, Death in a. A death in the family!—who at one period or another of his life has not been compelled to pass through that most dreadful of ordeals? Fortunate is he who has only once experienced the series of sensations implied by the words. How the same phenomena re-appear! There is the painful tension of mind, just lit up by feeble flashes of hope—then despair—and at last the end. The house which was the dwelling-place of the living becomes, for certain days, the abode of the dead. The mourners refuse to be comforted; the intrusive sun is excluded from the room; people move about with cautious step, and speak to each other with bated breath. Then again, in a few days, the house is restored to its living tenants. Gradually, and with a sense of strangeness at first, the "family" begin to run in the old grooves, the old occupations are resumed, strangers are readmitted, and in a brief space things are as before.

W. Irving.

8640. FAMILY, Gatherings of the. There are some gatherings in this world which are largely alloyed with pain. Christmas or some birthday season comes round, inviting the members of a scattered family. The circle is again formed; but, like that of men who have been standing under fire, and closing up their ranks, how is it contracted from former years! There are well-remembered faces, and voices, and forms, that are missing here; and the family group, which looks down from the picture, is larger than the living company met at table. Some are dead and gone—"Joseph is not, and Simeon is not;" and a dark cloud hangs on a mother's brow, for on the cheek of yet another her anxious eye, quick to see, discovers an ominous spot that threatens to "take Benjamin away."

Dr. Guthrie.

8641. FAMILY, Honor of a. It was considered a great honor to a Roman family to have three of its members in succession attain to high office or position. The family of the Fabii was an example, the founder of which was President of the Roman Senate. His son also attained to that dignity, and his son after him. The same law holds in modern times. The families who attained dignity early in our national history, and have proved themselves worthy, like the Adamses, are held especially esteemed. In the religious world a similar succession is alike honorable, happy, and to be desired. The highest ambition of the parents should be satisfied with such a succession. The noblest aspirations of the children should be to have their names written in the Book of Life, and their family history a continuous record of devotion to Christ. Abraham was especially honored by God. He gives the reason: "Abraham shall surely become a great and mighty nation, and all the nations of the earth shall be blessed in him; for I know him that he will command his children and his household after him, and they shall keep the way of the Lord. Gen. 18:18. Church history multiplies instances of family succession, both among ministers and laymen. Praying families, all over the land, may be traced back to pious homes. God honors family piety.

8642. FAMILY, Importance of the. Without the permanent union of the sexes there can be no permanent families: the dissolution of nuptial ties involves the dissolution of domestic society. But domestic society is the seminary of social affections, the cradle of sensibility, where the first elements are acquired of that tenderness and humanity which cement mankind together; and were they entirely extinguished the whole fabric of social institutions would be dissolved. Families are so many centres of attraction, which preserve mankind from being scattered and dissipated by the repulsive powers of selfishness. The order of nature is ever from particulars to generals. As in the operations of intellect we proceed from the contemplation of individuals to the formation of general abstractions, so in the development of the passions, in like manner, we advance from private to public affections; from the love of parents, brothers, and sisters, to those more expanded regards which embrace the immense society of human kind.

Robert Hall.

8643. FAMILY, a Little World. A family is a little world within doors; the miniature resemblance of the great world without.

J. A. James.

8644. FAMILY, Manners of a. The manners of a family depend upon those of the master. His principles and practices soon diffuse themselves through the house, and the piety or profaneness, the sobriety or intemperance, the sloth or diligence of servants, discover to the world the nature of that fountain from which they flow.

Bp. Horne.

8645. FAMILY, The Religious Man in His. The religious man may be considered in his family as the keystone to the arch of a building, which binds and holds all the parts of the edifice together. If this keystone be removed, the fabric will tumble to the ground, and all the parts be separated from each other. Or he is to his family as the good shepherd under whose protection and care the flock may go in and out and find pasture; but when the shepherd is smitten, the sheep will be scattered.

Salter

8646. FAMILY, Renunciation of. Irenæus, bishop of Birmich, Pannonia, was arrested by the order of Probus, the governor, and brought before him. His mother, wife and children surrounded him at the trial. His little children clung to his knees and implored him not to leave them. His wife wept upon his neck and besought him to comply with the emperor's edict and sacrifice to the gods, and save himself for the sake of his innocent children. The governor united his plea with theirs. Irenæus replied, "Our Lord Jesus Christ hath declared that the man who loveth father, or mother, wife or children, more than him, is not worthy of him; so that I forget that I am a father, a husband and a son." He was beheaded and his body cast into the sea, A. D. 304.

8647. FAMILY, Separation of a. A pious father said, "Once I dreamed that the day of judgment was come. I saw the Judge on his great white throne, and all nations were gathered before him. My wife and I were on the right hand; but I could not see my children. I went to the left hand of the Judge, and there found them all standing in the utmost despair. As soon as they saw me, they caught hold of me, and cried, 'O Father, we will never part.' I said, 'My dear children, I am come to try, if possible, to get you out of this awful situation.' So I took them all with me. But when we came near the Judge, I thought he cast an angry look, and said, 'What do thy children with thee now? They would not take thy warning when on earth, and they shall not share with thee the crown in heaven. Depart, ye cursed.' At a suitable time he told this to his children, which resulted in the awakening of all, and the conversion of five of them.

8648. FAMILY PRAYER, Duty of. Justice McLean, of Ohio, heard a minister preach. He had been a sceptic, and the minister spoke to him in such a way as convinced him of the truth of the Christian religion. He was led to see how Christ had died for him, and was born again. He went home. He had hardly got there before he said, "We are going to have family prayer; let us go to the drawing-room and pray together." "But," said his wife, "there are four lawyers in; they have come to attend court. We don't want to go there; let us go to the kitchen to have prayers." Judge McLean, afterward Chief Justice of the United States, replied, "It's the first time I ever invited the Lord to my house, and I don't propose to invite him to the kitchen, by any means. If I am a Christian, I am to have family prayer." Fathers, remember that he went in to those lawyers, and said, "My friends, I have just been convinced of the truth of Christianity. I have found out Jesus died on the cross for me. I have given myself to him, and now I propose to invite him to my house. You may do as you please; stay or go. But I am now to make my first prayer in my own house." They said they would like very much to stay, and did stay. From that day Judge McLean lived a consistent Christian life, and died a Christian death." E. P. Hammond.

8649. FAMILY PRAYER, Fidelity in. Rowland Hill once put up at a village inn. Bedtime came, and he said to the waiter who came out to say it was time the lights were out, "I have been waiting a long time, expecting to be called to family prayer." "Family prayer! we never have such things here." "Indeed! tell your master I cannot go to bed till we have prayer." The waiter told his master, who came and said, "Sir, I wish you would go to bed. I cannot go till I have seen the lights all out, I am so afraid of fire." "So am I; but I have been expecting to be summoned to family prayer." "It cannot be done at an inn." "Then get me my horses; I cannot sleep in a house where there is no family prayer." "I have no objection to have a prayer; but I do not know how." "Well, then, call your people." In a few minutes the family were upon their knees, and the landlord was called upon to pray. "Sir, I never prayed in all my life; I don't know how." "Then ask God to teach you." "God, teach us how to pray," said the landlord. "That is prayer; go on." "I'm sure I don't know what to say now, sir." "God has taught you to pray; thank him for it. Thank God Almighty for letting us pray to him." "I do." "Amen, amen!" said Mr. Hill, and then prayed himself. A chapel and a school were soon founded in that village as the result of this prayer.

8650. FAMILY PRAYER, General. The Rev. Joseph Dare from Australia, addressing the Wesleyan Conference held at Camborne in 1874, gave the following incident as illustrative of the prevalence of family prayer among the converts in Fiji: "I was taking tea with your missionary and his wife in the lone island of Kandavu, in the midst of 10,000 Fijians. As we were at tea the bell rang: the missionary said 'That is the signal for family worship. Now listen. You will hear the drum beat.' And immediately they began to echo to each other around the shores of that southern sea. The missionary said, 'There are 10,000 people on these islands, and I do not know of a single house in which there will not be family worship in the course of half an hour from this time.' What a rebuke to older Christians."

8651. FAMILY PRAYER, Love for. A little boy, who did not like to go to bed before the evening prayer in the family, being very tired, went to his mother and asked that prayer might be had. His mother answered, "Wait a little while, I am busy now. As soon as my letter is done we will have prayers." "Don't you think, mamma, that prayer is more precious than writing letters; and can't that wait?" he asked. His mother was convinced, kissed her four-year old boy and fulfilled his desire, satisfied that anything else had better wait than prayer.

8652. FAMILY PRAYER, Neglect of. An avaricious Ohio farmer, pressed with business, decided to forego family prayer. His wife expostulated, to no purpose. The men went to work one morning before breakfast, but no horn called them at the usual time. Angrily the husband went to the house, and saw his wife knitting, but no signs of breakfast. "What does this mean?" he said; "why are not the men called?" "I thought you had no time to eat?" "Do you think we can live without eating?" "As well as without praying," she said. "Well; get breakfast, and we will have prayers every morning." Chas. E. Little.

8653. FAMILY WORSHIP, Influence of. A Christian boy about fourteen years of age became impressed with the importance of family religion. As all the family were irreligious and illiterate but himself, he felt called to do the duty. He read the Scriptures and then prayed, the family looking curiously on. For some time he continued service in this manner. At length, one after another, they bowed beside him, till the whole group—father, mother and children—united in the hallowed exercise.

8654. FAMINE, Incident of. During the siege of Jerusalem, the extremity of the famine was such, that a Jewess of noble family, urged by the intolerant cravings of hunger, slew her infant child, and prepared it for a meal. She had actually eaten one-half of it, when the soldiers, allured by the smell of food, threatened her with instant death, if she refused to discover it. Intimidated by this menace, she immediately produced the remains of her son, which struck them with horror. At the recital of this melancholy and affecting occurrence, the whole city stood aghast, congratulating those whom death had hurried away from such heart-rending scenes. Whitecross.

8655. FANATICISM, Credulity of. During the Irish rebellion, a Roman Catholic priest of the name of Roche told the soldiers that he would catch the bullets in his hand, and actually exhibited some which he pretended to have got in that manner. The imposture was by no means new. The demagogue Muncer, who, adding the fanaticism of religion to the extremest enthusiasm of republicanism, by his harangues to the populace of Mulhausen soon found himself at the head of forty thousand troops, thus addressed them: "Everything must yield to the Most High, who has placed me at the head of you. In vain the enemy's artillery shall thunder against you; in vain, indeed, for I will receive in the sleeve of my gown every bullet that shall be shot against you, and that alone shall be an impregnable rampart against all the efforts of the enemy." Muncer, however, was not so good as his word. for the Landgrave of Hesse and many of the nobility marching against him, his troops were defeated, himself taken prisoner, and carried to Mulhausen, where he perished upon a scaffold in 1525. Percy 8656. FANATICISM, Example of. Eon del'Etoile, a Frenchman of the XIIIth century, conceived the insane idea that he was "judge of the quick and the dead," and that he shared the government with the Almighty. A crotched stick was his sceptre. When he turned its prongs upward he thereby gave God the government of two-thirds of the world; when he turned them down he assumed it. He had many followers, and was condemned by the Council of Rheims in 1148.

8657. FASHION, Appearance of. A beautiful envelope for mortality, presenting a glittering and polished exterior, the appearance of which gives no certain indication of the real value of what is contained therein. Mrs. Balfour.

8658. FASHION, Caprice of. Fashion always begins and ends in two things it abhors most—singularity and vulgarity. It is the perpetual setting up and disowning a certain standard of taste, elegance and refinement, which has no other formation or authority than that it is the prevailing distraction of the moment, which was yesterday ridiculous from its being new, and to-morrow will be odious from its being common. It is one of the most slight and insignificant of all things. It cannot be lasting, for it depends on the constant change and shifting of its own harlequin disguises; it cannot be sterling, for if it were it could not depend on the breath of caprice: it must be superficial, to produce its immediate effect on the gaping crowd; and frivolous, to admit of its being assumed at pleasure by the number of those who appear to be in the fashion, to be distinguished from the rest of the world. It is not anything in itself, nor the sign of anything but the folly and vanity of those who rely upon it as their greatest pride. Fashion is haughty, trifling, affected, servile, despotic, mean and ambitious, precise and fantastical, all in a breath—tied to no rule, and bound to conform to every rule of the minute. Hazlitt.

8659. FASHION, Evils of. Fashion makes people sit up at night when they ought to be in bed, and keeps them in bed in the morning when they ought to be up and doing. She makes her votaries visit when they would rather stay at home, eat when they are not hungry, and drink when they are not thirsty. She invades their pleasures, and interrupts their business; she compels them to dress gaily, either upon their own property or that of others; she makes them through life seek rest on a couch of anxiety, and leaves them, in the hour of desolation, on a bed of thorns.

Mrs. Balfour.

8660. FASHION, Government of. Fashion is the great governor of this world. It presides not only in matters of dress and amusement, but in law, physic, politics, religion, and all other things of the gravest kind. Indeed the wisest of men would be puzzled to give any better reason why particular forms in all these have been at certain times universally received, and at other times universally rejected, than that they were in or out of fashion. Fielding.

8661. FASHIONS, Origin of. In the court of Alexander the Great, every one affected to carry his head awry, because the mighty hero had a twist in his neck, which made it with him a grace of necessity. Dionysius was extremely short-sighted; and his flatterers, as Montaigne tells us, "ran against one another in his presence, stumbled at and overturned whatever was under foot to show that they were as purblind as their sovereign." Don John of Austria, son of Charles V., had a large patch of hair on one side of his head, which grew upright like bristles; and to conceal the peculiarity, he used to comb back the whole of the hair from his forehead. When he went as Governor into the Low Countries, all the people of fashion there immediately fell into the same mode, and from them it would seem to have descended to our own times. Ruffs, once so fashionable in England that even bishops and judges condescended to adopt them, and were the last to lay them aside, are said to have been introduced by Queen Anne, wife of James I., who wore them to conceal a wen in her neck. But what are all these instances to that of the Ethiopians, as recorded by Diodorus Siculus? "It was a custom among them," says he, "that when they had a lame or one-eyed sovereign, they would voluntarily break a limb, or pluck out an eye; for they thought it exceedingly uncomely in them to walk upright, when their prince was forced to halt; or to see with two eyes, when their gracious master could see only with one." Anon.

8662. FASTIDIOUSNESS, Selfishness of. Like other things spurious, fastidiousness is often inconsistent with itself: the coarsest things are done, the crudest things said, by the most fastidious people. Horace Walpole was a proverb of epicurean particularity of taste; yet none of the vulgarians whom he vilified had a keener relish for a coarse allusion or a malicious falsehood. Beckford, of Fonthill, demanded that life should be thrice winnowed for his use; but what was his life? Louis XIV. was "insolently nice" in some things; what was he in others? If we observe a person proud of a reputation for fastidiousness, we shall always find that the egotism which is its life will at times lead him to say or do something disgusting. We need expect from such people no delicate, silent self-sacrifice, no tender watching for others' tastes or needs, no graceful yielding up of privileges in unconsidered trifles, on which wait no "flowing thanks." They may be kind and obliging to a certain extent, but when the service required involves anything disagreeable, anything offensive to the taste on which they pride themselves, we must apply elsewhere. Their fineness of nature sifts common duties, selecting for practice only those which will pass the test; and conscience is not hurt, for unsuspected pride has given her a bribe. Mrs. Kirkland.

8663. FASTING, Benefit of. Fasting, too much neglected and derided among us, is a good and beautiful institution. It gives a more tangible form to ideas that should habitually dominate us,—those of our unworthiness and our dependence. It restores to mind what it takes away from matter, and by relieving, in a manner, the soul that is generally oppressed with the burden of the flesh, it facilitates its soaring up towards the objects of the invisible world. Finally, by the voluntary privations it imposes, it increases our compassions for the involuntary privations of so many of our brethren, whose life, alas! is one perpetual fast. Dr. Vinet.

8664. FASTING, Need of. There are Christians whose "flesh," whether by its quantity or natural temperament, renders them sluggish, slothful, wavering, and physically by far too fond of the "good things" of the table and the wine-cellar. I don't like your rosy-faced, jowled, mobile-lipped connoisseurs of "cooking and vintage." That sort of Christian pressingly needs fasting, ay, thorough fasting. Brave, large-fleshed Martin Luther nobly confessed his need, and nobly acted it out, not without strife and "lusting." Of fasting as a whole and as applying to all, it may be said that while it has been perverted into a pestilent superstition, yet in the words of good Bishop Andrewes, "There is more fear of a pottingerful of glutony than of a spoonful of superstition."

Grosart.

8665. FASTING, Protracted. The question was asked, "Is it possible that any man can fast forty days and forty nights?" To which Rabbi Meir answered, "When thou takest up thy abode in any particular city, thou must live according to its customs. Moses ascended to heaven, where they neither eat nor drink; therefore he became assimilated to them. We are accustomed to eat and drink; and when angels descend to us they eat and drink also."

8666. FATALISM, Absurdity of. The absurdity of fatalism is well illustrated by an anecdote of a minister, living on the frontier of Missouri, who was in the habit of saying to his family and his church: "Friends, you need not take any unusual care about your lives; the moment of your death was 'writ' before the foundation of the world, and you cannot alter it." His wife observed, when he left on Saturday to meet one of his frontier missionary engagements, that he dressed the flint of his rifle with unusual care, put in dry powder, fresh tow, and took every pains to make sure that the gun should go off in case he came upon an Indian. It struck her one day as she saw him in his saddle, with his rifle on his shoulder, that his conduct contradicted his teachings, and she said to him: "My dear, why do you take this rifle with you? If it was 'writ' before the foundation of the world that you were to be killed during this trip by an Indian, that rifle won't prevent it; and if you are not to be killed, of course the rifle is unnecessary; so why take it with you at all?" "Yes," he replied, "to be sure, my dear, of course you are all very right, and that is a very proper view; but, see here, my dear—now—really—but then—you see, my dear—to be sure—but then—suppose I should meet an Indian while I am gone, and his time had come, and I hadn't my rifle with me, what would he do? Yes, my dear, we must all contribute our part toward the fulfillment of the decrees of Providence."

Harper's Magazine.

8667. FATALISM, Baseness of. It is beneath the dignity of a soul, that has but a grain of sense, to make chance, and winds, and waves the arbitrary disposers of his happiness; or, what is worse, to depend upon some mushroom upstart, which a chance smile raised out of his turf and rottenness, to a condition to which his mean soul is so unequal, that he himself fears and wonders at his own height. Lucas 8668. FATE: Brevities. All things are in fate, yet all things are not decreed by fate.—Plato.—God over-rules all mutinous accidents, brings them under his laws of fate, and makes them all serviceable to his purpose.—Antoninus.—What must be, shall be; and that which is a necessity to him that struggles, is little more than choice to him that is willing.—Seneca.—We should consider, that though we are tied to the chains of fate, there are none but rational creatures have the privilege of moving freely, and making necessity a choice; all other things are forced onward, and dragged along to their doom.—Antoninus.

8669. FATE, Storm of. The Koran represents the destruction of Sodom as accomplished by a storm of stones of baked clay, each bearing its mark. The Mohammedan commentators say that this peculiar mark was the name of the person who was fated to be killed by the stone.

8670. FATHER, Counsel of a. The natural advisor of the child is the father. Archilochus, desiring to counsel Lycambes, whose father was dead, put the pen in the father's hand, that his advice might have the greater influence. So, Cicero desiring to instruct Clodia, raises up her father from the grave, and in his name gives his counsel to the daughter.

8671. FATHER, A Faithful. There was a man living in New York City, as elder in one of the Presbyterian churches. His little boy had been sick some time, but he had not considered him dangerous. He came home one day, and his wife was in great trouble. When he came into the house he found her weeping. "What is troubling you?" he said. "Why," she said, "there has been a great change in our boy since you left this morning. I am afraid he is dying. I wish you would go and see him, and if he is, tell him so." The father went in and took his seat at the head of the bed; he placed his hand on the forehead of the little boy, and he could see that death was stealing over him. He said to his boy, "My son, do you know you are dying?" and the little fellow looked surprised, and he said, "Am I, father? Is this death that I feel?" "Yes, my son, you are dying." "Shall I die to-day?" "Yes, you cannot live until night." And the little boy smiled, and said, "I will be with Jesus to-night, won't I?" "Yes, my son, you will be with the Saviour to-night," and the father turned away to conceal a tear; and when the little fellow saw the tears rolling down his father's cheeks, he said, "Don't weep for me, father; when I get to heaven, I will go straight to Jesus, and tell him that ever since I could remember, you tried to lead me to him." Moody.

8672. FATHER, God a. When we are full of this view of God, not a day goes by without our detecting something fatherly in him, which we never observed before. Everything about us alters by degrees. Duties grow into privileges; pains soften the heart with a delicious humility, and sorrows are heavenly presences. Work becomes rest, and weariness of limb and brain almost touches on the sweet languor of contemplation. It is as if earth were making itself into heaven; and at the commonest sights and sounds something tingles in our hearts as if God were just on the point of speaking or appearing. What another being is life when we have found out our Father; and if we work, it is beneath his eye, and if we play, it is in the light and encouragement of his smile. Earth's sunshine is heaven's radiance, and the stars of night as if the beginnings of the beatific vision; so soft, so sweet, so gentle, so reposeful, so almost infinite have all things become, because we have found our Father in our God.

F. W. Faber.

8673. FATHER, God our Heavenly. God bears not in vain the name of a Father: he fills it up to the full. It is a name of indulgence, of hope, of provision—a name of protection. It argues the mitigation of punishment; a little is enough for a father. In all temptations, oh, let us by prayer fly to the arms of our heavenly Father! and expect from him all that a father should do for his child. But yet we must remember the name of a father is a word of relation; duty is expected from us; we must reverence him as a father with fear and love. He is a great God, we ought to fear him; he is merciful, yea, hath bowels of mercy, we ought to love him; if we tremble before him, we forget that he is loving; and if over-bold, we also forget that he is a great and holy God. Therefore we should always go to the throne of grace with reverence, holy love, and confidence in the name of Jesus. Sibbes.

8674. FATHER, God the. The full meaning of God's fatherhood was not brought out in Old Testament times as we understand it now, though it was known and recognized by pious saints. See 1 Chron. 29: 10; Ps. 103: 13; Isa. 63: 16—rather nationally than personally. THE GOSPEL OF ST. JOHN is the Gospel which speaks most of God as the "Father." It contains about one hundred references, with many varieties of expression. Eph. 3: 15—"Of whom the whole family in heaven and earth is named." Some refer this to Christ, but more generally it is referred to the Father. God's ownership over the Church is involved in its being named from him. To give a name to a person or a place denotes lordship over it, or interest in it; as a father gives his own name to a child; a husband to a wife; a conqueror to a conquered city. Bowes.

8675. FATHER, Prayerless. A father lived out in the Western country on the banks of the Mississippi river. The world called him rich, but how poor he was! Thank God! he is rich now. One day his oldest son was brought home to him unconscious; a terrible accident had happened, and the family physician was hurriedly called in. As he came in, the father said, "Doctor, do you think my son will recover?" "No," said the doctor, "he is dying, and cannot recover." "Well," says the father, "only bring him to that we may tell him. I don't want him to die without knowing that he is dying." The doctor said he would try, but that the boy was fast dying. After a while the boy did become conscious for a moment, and the father cried, "My boy, the doctor tells me you are dying, and cannot live. I could not let you die without letting you know it." The young man looked up to his father, and said, "Father, do you tell me I am going to die right away?" "Yes, my boy," said the agonized father, "you will be gone in a little while." "Oh, father, won't you pray for my lost soul?" Said the speechless father, "I cannot pray, my son." The boy grew unconscious, and after a little while was gone; and the father said when he buried that boy that if he could have called him back by prayer he would have given all he was worth. He had been with that boy all those years, and had never prayed once for him. Moody.

8676. FATHER, Riches of a. At the time of the burning of the Epworth rectory, in 1709, the Wesley family had a narrow escape. They were aroused only to find themselves enveloped in smoke and flame. They seized the children and waded through the fire, and thought all were safe. Then a cry from the nursery revealed the fact that one had been left. The father sprang for the stairway, but found it impassable. The child, John, went to the window for air, and the neighbors, climbing upon each other's shoulders, rescued him just as the roof fell in. The family wealth was all consumed. Seeing his children all safe, the father said, "Come neighbors, let us kneel down, let us give thanks unto God! He has given me all my eight children. Let the house go; I am rich enough." From this time the mother looked upon John as preserved by Providence for some great work. Both Samuel and Susanna Wesley seem to have had a strong presentiment that God had a great work for their children to do. How much the work surpassed the father's thought, when with the foresight of death upon him, he said, "Do not be concerned at my death; God will then begin to manifest himself to my family." This father said that God had assured him he should have all his nineteen children around him in heaven.

8677. FATHER, An Unfaithful. A father who had a son in college requested a minister, who was going through the town where he was, to call on him and converse with him in reference to the salvation of his soul. The minister complied. He alluded to the request of the father, who wished him by all means to attend first to the salvation of his soul. The young man replied, "Did my father send such word as that?"

"He did," was the reply. "Then," said the young man, "my father is a dishonest man." "But why do you say he is dishonest?" said the minister. "Because," replied the student, "he has often advised me, in regard to the course he would have me pursue in life, how to gain the riches, honors, and pleasures of the world; but he is not the man that has ever manifested any interest in regard to the salvation of my soul, any more than if I had no soul!"

8678. FATHER, Wealth of a. Call not that man wretched, who, whatever else he suffers as to pain inflicted, pleasure denied, has a child for whom he hopes, and on whom he dotes. Poverty may grind him to the dust, obscurity may cast its darkest mantle over him, the song of the gay may be far from his own dwelling, his face may be unknown to his neighbors, and his voice may be unheeded by those among whom he dwells—even pain may rack his joints, and sleep flee from his pillow; but he has a gem with which he would not part for wealth defying computation, for fame filling a world's ear, for the luxury of the highest health, or for the sweetest sleep that ever sat upon a mortal's eye.

Coleridge.

8679. FATHER, A Worldly. A father, whose accomplished and beautiful daughter became awakened and forsook her usual fashionable pleasures, used every means to divert her from religion. Novels, pleasure excursions, and gay amusements were tried, but rejected. He then plied her with promises and threatenings. She yielded. He decked her with the fillets of death, and led her to the sacrifice like a follower of Moloch. Her pastor says, "The end was accomplished: all thoughts of piety, and all concern for the future, vanished together. But, in less than a year, the gaudy deception was completely exploded! The fascinating and gay young lady was prostrated by a fever that bade defiance to medical skill. The approach of death was unequivocal; and the countenance of every attendant fell, as if they had heard the flight of his arrow. I see, even now, that look, directed to the father, by the dying martyr of folly. The glazing eye was dim in hopelessness; and yet there seemed a something in its expiring gaze that told of proof, and tenderness, and terror, in the same glance. And that voice—(its tone was decided, but sepulchral still,)—'My father! last year I would have sought the Redeemer. Father, your child is—,'" The desolate father in the presence of his dead, saw the awful result of his folly. Her lost soul cried out against him.

8680. FAULT-FINDER, Fate of the. Jupiter, Neptune, and Minerva, as the story goes, once contended which of them should make the most perfect thing. Jupiter made a man; Minerva made a house, and Neptune made a bull; and Momus—for he had not yet been turned out of Olympus—was chosen judge to decide which production had the greatest merit. He began by finding fault with the bull, because his horns were not below his eyes, so that he might see when he butted with them. Next he found fault with the man, because there was no window in his breast that all might see his inward thoughts and feelings. And lastly he found fault with the house, because it had no wheels to enable its inhabitants to remove from bad neighbors. But Jupiter forthwith drove the critic out of heaven, telling him that a fault-finder could never be pleased, and that it was time to criticise the works of others when he had done some good thing himself.

Æsop.

8681. FAULTS, Exposure of. If the best man's faults were written on his forehead, it would make him pull his hat over his eyes.

Gaelic Proverb.

8682. FAULTS, Forgetting Our Own. "Why beholdest thou the mote that is in thy brother's eye, but considerest not the beam that is in thine own eye." There is a cutting question very similar to this of our Lord, proposed by a heather—"When you can so readily overlook your own wickedness, why are you more clear-sighted than the eagle or serpent of Epidaurus in spying out the failings of your friends?" This propensity of man to forget his own faults, and to look with the most critical accuracy into those of his neighbor, which he often magnifies, distorts, and caricatures, is not only reprehended in the sacred Scriptures, but also by many of the Greek and Roman writers.

Harmer.

8683. FAULTS, Judging. When a scar cannot be taken away, the next office is to hide it. Love is never so blind, as when it is to spy faults. It is like the painter, who about to draw the picture of a friend having a blemish in one eye, would picture only the other side of his face. It is a noble and great thing to cover the blemishes and to excuse the failings of a friend, to draw a curtain before his stains, and to display his perfections; to bury his weaknesses in silence, but to proclaim his virtue upon the house-top. It is an imitation of the charities of heaven, which, when the creature lies prostrate in the weakness of sleep and weariness, spreads the covering of night and darkness over it, to conceal it in that condition; but as soon as our spirits are refreshed, and nature returns to its morning vigor, God then bids the sun rise and the day shine upon us both to advance and to show that activity. It is the ennobling office of the understanding to correct the fallacious and mistaken reports of sense, and to assure us that the staff in the water is straight, though our eye would tell us it is crooked. So it is the excellency of friendship to rectify, or at least to qualify, the malignity of those surmises that would reprehend a friend, and traduce him to our thoughts. A friend will be sure to act the part of an advocate, before he will that of judge.

Dr. South.

8684. FAULTS, Masked. We are willing enough to keep at ever so great a distance from the faults to which we have little or no inclination and often affect to make our zeal in that respect remarkable; but then, perhaps, more favorite vices have easy entrance into our breasts, and take firm possession of them. We are shocked, for instance, and with much cause, at the monstrous and ruinous eagerness for pleasure, the profligate and unprecedented contempt of religion that prevails in the world; our behavior, on those heads, is unblamable, exemplary, and we value ourselves upon it beyond bounds. Yet possibly we indulge ourselves all the while to the full another way—are unjust and fraudulent, or selfish and unreasonable, or penurious and hard-hearted, or censorious and unforgiving, or peevish and ill-tempered; make every one about us uneasy, and those chiefly whose happiness ought to be our first care. This is applauding ourselves for being fortified, where the enemy is not likely to make an attack; and leaving the places that are most exposed, quite undefended.

Secker.

8685. FAULTS, Our Neighbors'. A man walking through the street had a wallet or sack on his shoulders, with a sort of pocket at each end; one part hung down before and the other behind him; some little boys ran after him and slyly put feathers and rags into the hind pocket, but the man was not aware of the matter. Now, thought I, if he were to turn the wallet he would see what sort of stuff he was carrying, and how ridiculous his appearance. This, then, is just what the world does; we carry a wallet: in the pocket before we put our neighbors' faults, which are continually before our eyes, and in the hind pocket we put our own faults, and therefore know not how they are laughed at. Could we turn the wallet, we should be silent. When, therefore, you find yourself talking of others, turn the wallet.

Salter.

8686. FAULTS, No Room for. Lamachus, a Grecian general, chided a captain for a fault. He replied that he would do so no more. He answered, "Sir, in war there is no room for a second miscarriage."

8687. FAULTS, Ours and Others'. St. Pior once appeared at a conference with a large sack of sand on his back, and before him a basket containing more of the same base article. By this he symbolized our treatment of our own and others' faults. Our own, however heavy or numerous, we cast behind our backs, and seldom see; others', we carry as in a basket, and have them constantly before us.

8688. FAULTS, Overcoming. It is not so much the being exempt from faults, as the having overcome them, that is an advantage to us; it being with the follies of the mind, as with the weeds of a field, which, if destroyed and consumed upon the place where they grow, enrich and improve it more than if none had ever sprung there.

Swift.

8689. FAULTS, Parable of. A hermit went to Poemen, the abbot, and asked him to expel a monk from his monastery for a fault which he did. The expelled monk cast himself into a ditch and wept there, refusing food or comfort. This was told the abbot, and he ordered him to be brought back to his cell, and sent also for the monk on whose advice he had been cast out. When he came Poemen said to him, "Two persons had each a dead man in his house, and yet one had the compassion to leave his and come to his neighbor's to bewail with him over his corpse." The hermit applied the parable to himself. "Poemen is high as heaven; I am base as the earth."

8690. FAULTS, Parading. They are fittest to find fault in whom there is no fault to be found. There is no removing blots from the paper, by laying upon them a blurred finger. Reader, what do you get by throwing stones at your enemy's windows, while your own children look out at the casements? He that blows into a heap of dust, is in danger of putting out his own eyes.

Secker.

8691. FEAR, Bloody Sweat from. Maldonatus tells of a criminal in Paris, who receiving the sentence of death, was so frightened that he sweat drops of blood from several parts of his body. There is on record also the case of a young man of Belgium, condemned to be burnt, who through extreme fear sweat blood.

8692. FEAR, Bondage of. But of all fears, nothing so dazes and confounds as that of superstition. He fears not the sea that never goes to sea; nor a battle that follows not the camp; nor robbers that stir not abroad; nor malicious informers that is a poor man; nor emulation that leads a private life; nor earthquakes that dwells in Gaul; nor thunderbolts that dwells in Ethiopia; but he that dreads divine powers dreads everything—the land, the sea, the air, the dark, the light, a sound, a silence, a dream.

—Plutarch.—They who are awake have a world in common amongst them; but they who are asleep are retired, each to his own private world. But the frightful visionary hath ne'er a world at all, either in common with others, or in private to himself; for neither can he use his reason when awake, nor be free from his fears when asleep; but he hath his reason always asleep, and his fears always awake; nor hath he either a hiding-place or refuge.

Heracitus.

8693. FEAR, Cure for. At the wedding in a wealthy family the bride received $15,000 worth of presents. But after having received them, they were unhappy, fearing they would be robbed; so the only thing they could do was to take them to the safe deposit, where they still remain; and they are happy now, because they have deposited all where they have faith to believe it will be safe. We put some jewels into the hands of the Saviour, and some into the world, and then are uneasy. Let us give our all to Jesus.

F. Remington.

8694. FEAR, Effects of. There is a virtuous fear, which is the effect of faith; and there is a vicious fear, which is the product of doubt. The former leads to hope as relying on God, in whom we believe: the latter inclines to despair, as not relying on God, in whom we do not believe. Persons of the one character fear to lose God; persons of the other character fear to find him.

Pascal.

8695. FEAR, Fable of. A mouse that dwelt near the abode of a magician was kept in such constant distress by its fear of a cat that the magician, taking pity on it, turned it into a cat itself. Immediately it began to suffer from fear of a dog, so that the magician turned it into a dog. Then it began to suffer from fear of a tiger, and the magician, in disgust, said: "Be a mouse again. As you have only the heart of a mouse, it is impossible to help you by giving you the body of a noble animal."

Æsop.

8696. FEAR of God. A candle wakes some men as well as a noise; the eye of the Lord works upon a good soul as well as his hand; and a godly man is as much afflicted with the consideration, "Thou God seest me," as with "The Lord strikes me."

Dr. Donne.

8697. FEAR, Godly. The fear peculiar to a Christian is not of that nature which is servile and tends to despair. It is not that of a slave, but of a son. They who are influenced by too great a degree of fear, may at last become subject to such despondency as to give up all hope, and relax in their diligence in the use of all the means. When Dionysius the tyrant, says Bp. Taylor, imposed intolerable tributes upon his Sicilian subjects, it amazed them, and they petitioned and cried for help, and flattered him, and feared, and obeyed him carefully; but he imposed still new ones, and greater, and at last left them poor as the valley of Vesuvius, or the top of Ætna; but then all being gone, the people grew idle and careless, and walked in the markets and public places, cursing the tyrant, and bitterly scoffing his person and vices; which when Dionysius heard, he caused the publicans and committees to withdraw their impost; "for now," says he, "they are dangerous, because they are desperate." When men have nothing, says the same author, they will despise their rulers. So it is in religion. If our fears be unreasonable, our diligence is none at all, and from whom we hope for nothing, neither benefit nor indemnity, we despise his command, and break his yoke, and trample it under our most miserable feet. Let our confidence be allayed with fear, and our fear be sharpened with the intertextures of a holy hope, and the active powers of our souls will be furnished with feet and wings, with eyes and hands, with consideration and diligence, with reason and encouragement. But despair is part of the punishment that is in hell, and the devils still do evil things, because they never hope to receive a good nor find a pardon.

Buck.

8698. FEAR, Habit and. Habit diminishes fear when it raises up contrary associations, and increases it when it confirms the first associations. A man works in a gunpowder-mill every day of his life, with the utmost sang froid, which you would not be very much pleased to enter for half an hour. You have associated with the manufactory nothing but the accidents you have heard it is exposed to; he has associated with it the numberless days he has passed there in perfect security. For the same reason, a sailor-boy stands unconcerned upon the mast, a mason upon a ladder, and a miner descends by his single rope. Their associations are altered by experience; therefore, in estimating the degree in which human creatures are under the influence of this passion, we must always remember their previous habits.

S. Smith.

8699. FEAR, Labors of. In the first pitched battle the Romans fought against Hannibal, under the Consul Sempronius, a body of twenty thousand foot that had taken flight, seeing no other escape for their cowardice, threw themselves headlong upon the battalion of their enemies, with such wonderful fury, that they routed them with a very great slaughter. People work harder through fear than they would to gain a glorious victory.

8700. FEAR of the Lord. The terrors of the Lord are great, but they do not exercise supreme sway in a human heart, and lead all its affections whithersoever they will. His anger is not a ruling, leading, drawing power. It is mighty, but not to save. It is a force that casts the wicked into hell; but not a force that can win any son of man near in willing obedience. It is not a force in that direction. The stream of the Mississippi is a great power; it floats loaded ships or fallen forests downward with great velocity to the sea; but it cannot impel one tiny boat upward to the fertile regions near its source. This is done by another and an opposite power: a breath from heaven in the sail will carry the vessel up against the stream. So with the manifested terror of the Lord against all unrighteousness of men; its power is great—greater than we can know—who knoweth the power of thine anger? but it does not lead any one any way in the path of righteousness.

Arnott.

8701. FEAR and Love. Fear produceth unwilling, servile performances, as those fruits that grow in winter or in cold countries, are sour, unsavory and unconcocted; but those which grow in summer or in hotter countries, by the warmth and influence of the sun, are sweet and wholesome. Such is the difference between those fruits of obedience which fear and love produceth.

Bishop Reynolds.

8702. FEAR, Occasion of. I once met a little boy in Wales, crying bitterly at his father's door, afraid to go in. I asked him what was the matter. He told me that his mother had sent him out clean in the morning, but that he had got into the water, and made his clothes dirty. So he feared to go in, because his father would punish him. We have soiled our characters by sin, and therefore is it that we fear death—dread the meeting with our Father.

Thomas Jones

8703. FEAR, Only Object of. To fear the censure of men, when God is your judge; to fear their evil, when God is your defence; to fear death, when he is the entrance to life and felicity, is unreasonable and pernicious: but if you will turn your passion into duty, and joy, and security; fear to offend God, to enter voluntarily into temptation; fear the alluring face of lust, and the smooth entertainments of intemperance; fear the anger of God, when you have deserved it; and, when you have recovered from the snare, then infinitely fear to return into that condition, in which whosoever dwells, is the heir of fear and eternal sorrow.

Jeremy Taylor.

8704. FEAR Removed. "Do you know," said a poor boy in a hospital in India to a lady who daily visited him, "what I've been thinking of all the morning?" "Of how soon you will see Jesus?" replied the lady. "Yes," he answered; "I've been thinking that I began this Sunday a poor sick boy in the hospital, surrounded by wicked men and sinful talk; and I think I shall be at home before night. I think I've begun a Sunday that will never end. I don't think I shall ever have another week-day." In the evening she visited him again, and found him lying with his eyes closed, sinking rapidly, but calmly. Stooping over him, she whispered, "Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil; for thou art with me; thy rod and thy staff they comfort me." Dear Willie, is Jesus with you?" "Oh yes." "Have you any fear?" "No, none; I have been wondering why they call it a dark valley. I have found the light growing much brighter every day since I first believed; and now it's so bright I must shut my eyes." After praying, he said, "That is my last prayer; now it shall be only praise for ever and ever."

8705. FEAR, Results of. Don Diogo Ossorio, a brave Spaniard of noble family, was so affected by being sentenced to death that his hair turned completely white. The king on hearing this, considered that he had suffered enough, and remitted his sentence. A boy lay upon his sick bed, and heard the physicians despairing of his life. Watching for and fearing death, his hair turned white in a single night. A young man, who was condemned to die, turned gray-headed in one night, through fear of death, and was thereupon pardoned.

8706. FEAR, Security from. What can that man fear who takes care to please a Being that is able to crush all his adversaries? Addison.

8707. FEAR, Slavish, Biblical. Faintheartedness, Lev. 26:36; as in Gideon's troops, Judges 7:3; cf. Deut. 20:8; a trembling heart, Deut. 28:65; like Saul, 1 Sam. 28:5; Felix, Acts 24:25; a melting heart, Joshua 5:1, 7:5. Terrified at the sound of a shaken leaf, Lev. 26:36; as with "a dreadful sound" in the ears, Job 15:21 ("a sound of fears," marg.); "as the trees of the wood are moved with the wind," Isa. 7:2. Flying, as from the sword, Lev. 26:36; when no man pursueth, Prov. 28:1; Lev. 26:17, 36. Turning pale with terror, as the word "perish" means literally, Acts 13:41. The spirit of slaves—of bondage and fear, Rom. 8:15; the fear that "hath torment," 1 John 4:18. Adam, Gen. 3:10: "I was afraid"—one of the first results of the fall. Magor-missabib, Jer. 20:3, 4. "Fear round about" (margin). The fear with which Pashur thought to alarm Jeremiah, recoiling upon himself. Death—"the king of terrors," Job 18:14.

Bowes.

8708. FEAR, Well-grounded. A lady professor of religion, whose daily practice was not in harmony with it, once said to Rev. R. Hill, "Oh! I am afraid lest after all I should not be saved." He replied, "I am glad to hear it, for I have long been afraid for you, I assure you." The lady retired suddenly.

8709. FEAST, Demoralization of a. When Seneca describes the spare diet of some, he says, "The prisoner keeps a better table, and he that is to kill the criminal to-morrow morning gives him a better supper over night." When the heathens feasted their gods, they gave nothing but a fat ox, a ram, or a kid; they poured a little wine upon the altar, and burnt a handful of gum; but when they feasted themselves they had many vessels filled with Campanian wine, turtles from Liguria, Sicilian beeves, and wheat from Egypt, wild boars from Thyrium, and Grecian sheep; variety, and load, and curiosity, and cost; and so do we. It is so little we spend in religion, and so very much upon ourselves; so little to the poor, and so much without measure to make ourselves sick, that we seem to be in love with our own mischief, and so passionate for necessity and want, that we strive all the ways we can to make ourselves need more than nature intended. And what wisdom can be expected from them whose soul dwells in clouds of meat, and floats up and down in wine. It is a perfect shipwreck of a man; the pilot is intoxicated, the helm dashed in pieces, and the ship first reels, and by swallowing too much, itself is swallowed up at last. And therefore the madness of the young fellows of Agrigentum, who being drunk fancied themselves in a storm, and the house the ship, was more than the wild fancy of their cups, it was really so; they were all castaways, they were broken in pieces by the foul disorder of the storm. So have I seen the eye of the world looking down upon a fenny bottom, and drinking up two free draughts of moisture, gathered them into a cloud, and that cloud crept about his face, and made him first look red, and then covered him with darkness and an artificial night; so is our reason at a feast."

Buck.

8710. FEAST, A Frugal. Timotheus was in the habit of giving and attending great feasts and sumptuous suppers. Plato was desirous of drawing him from such entertainments, so invited him to a supper in the academy. No viands were provided that would fever the brain, or excite the imagination. Timotheus, the next day, perceiving the difference between these suppers and those he had been in the habit of taking, said, "That they who supped with Plato over night, found the pleasure and comfort thereof the next day."

8711. FEAST, The Gospel. Biblical. Bread—The Lord Jesus is "the bread of God"—"the true bread"—"the bread of life"—"the bread from heaven," John 6:32, 33, 35, 48, 50, 51, 58. Born at Bethlehem (which means "the house of bread"); like the good corn, bruised and broken; and "fine flour," baked, he gave his flesh for the life of the world. An old writer well says, of our need of him, "Without bread there is no feast; with bread, there need be no famine." Water—"and wine," fresh and free—fructifying and reviving—a figure of the sweet ordinances of spiritual blessing, Ps. 23: 2; and of Christ himself and his spirit, John 4: 10, 14. Wine—"that maketh glad the heart of man," Ps. 104: 15—is symbolically used by Christ for the blessings of his kingdom, Cant. 5: 1; cf. Christ's first miracle, John 2: 8-10; and his last supper, Matt. 26: 27-29. Christ is the true vine, John 15: 1. Milk—The simplest food for babes, Heb. 5: 12; yet the token of wealth and rich abundance, Isa. 55: 1; 60: 16; the emblem of the sweet nourishment of the Divine Word, 1 Pet. 2: 3. Honey—The emblem of sweetness, Judges 14: 18; Isa. 55: 1; Ps. 19: 10; 119: 103. Marrow and fatness, Ps. 36: 8; 63: 5; Isa. 25: 6. Fruit—Representing the sweetness and variety of gospel blessings through Christ, see Cant. throughout. THE GOSPEL FEAST—"The wedding banquet"—the "great supper," Matt. 22: 1-14; Luke 14: 16-24. See Wisdom's feast, Prov. 9: 1-5; the bridegroom's call, Cant. 5: 1; the Lord's supper—the feast of commemoration, communion, and love, 1 Cor. 10: 16, 17; 11: 23-26. It is also represented figuratively how believers receive these gospel blessings. They eat and drink of Christ's bounty, Isa. 55: 1, 2; John 6: 48-58. They taste the Lord's goodness, Ps. 34: 8; 1 Pet. 2: 3. They feed (Christ's sheep) in the peaceful pastures, Ps. 23: 2; Isa. 40: 11. They sit down as Christ's guests in his banqueting house, Cant. 2: 4. They are "satisfied," "abundantly satisfied," with the fatness of the Lord's house, while they "drink of the river of his pleasure," Ps. 36: 8; 63: 5. Bowes.

8712. FEATURES, Diversity of. That men should vary in their features we might naturally expect from general analogy. There is nothing in nature that preserves an invariable uniformity. Two stones cannot be picked up on the seashore, nor two leaves from the densest forest, in every respect alike. Wherever we look, we find varieties of the same species distinguished by some striking change of aspect. Dr. Brewer.

8713. FEATURES, Inherited. A peculiar thickness of the under lip has been hereditary in the Imperial House of Hapsburgh ever since the marriage, some centuries ago, with the Polish family of Jagellon, whence it came. In our own royal family a certain fullness of the lower and lateral parts of the face is conspicuous in the portraits of the whole series of sovereigns from George I. to Victoria, and has been equally marked in other members of the family. The females of the ducal house of Gordon have long been remarkable for a peculiar elegant conformation of the neck. The Clackmannanshire Bruces, who are descended from a common stock with the famous Robert Bruce of Scotland, are said to have that strongly-marked form of the cheek-bones and jaws which appears on the coins of that heroic monarch, as it did in his actual face when his bones were disinterred at Dunfermline, about thirty years ago. The prevalent tallness of the inhabitants of Potsdam, many of whom are descended from the guards of Frederick I.; the Spanish features observable in the people of the county of Galway, in which, some centuries ago, several Spanish settlements were made; and the hereditary beauty of the women of Prague—are well-known facts which have frequently attracted the attention of chronologists. The bourgeois of Rome (the most invariable portion of every population) exhibit at the present day precisely the same type of face and form as their ancestors, whose busts may be seen carved in relief on the ancient sarcophagi; and the Jewish physiognomies portrayed upon the sepulchral monuments of Egypt are identical with those which may be observed among modern Jews in the streets of any of our great cities. Mantell.

8714. FEELING, Apprehension of. The sun is commonly said to rise and set. This, however, is spoken merely in complaisance to appearances. The truth is, that when the horizon of earth gets below the sun, we then perceive its beams, and when the horizon gets above it, we lose sight of them. Here remember, as before, that in all our varying frames of soul, the variations are not in God, but in ourselves. Remember, too, that you must lie low at his feet, if you would bask in the shinings of his face. Get above his word and ordinances, and no wonder if the horror of a great darkness falls upon you. Salter.

8715. FEELING, Caprice of. A quarter of an hour since how romantic, how enchanted with the favorite idea, how anticipative of pleasure from an expected meeting! I have advanced within two hundred yards of the place; the current of sentiment is changed, and I feel as if I could wish to slink away into deep and eternal solitude. J. Foster.

8716. FEELING, Holy Spirit in. Where the Spirit is, there is feeling. For the Spirit maketh us feel all things. Where the Spirit is not, there is no feeling, but a vain opinion or imagination. A physician serveth but for sick men, and that for such sick men as feel their sicknesses, and mourn, therefore, and long for health. Christ likewise serveth, but for such sinners only as feel their sin; and that for such sinners as sorrow and mourn in their hearts for health. Tindal.
